There is a far different story to tell of the two pianoforte concertos, presented with Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist at the final pair of subscription concerts, the B flat major on the afternoon of April 28, the D minor the following evening. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, one of the greatest pianists of his time, is also a conductor (of the Detroit Orchestra). Dr. Koussevitzky is an exceptionally adroit and sympathetic conductor in concertos. The result of their collaboration on this occasion was a pair of superb interpretations, each completely in the mood of the work in hand. With reason conductor and soloist were recalled repeatedly at both performances.

No less notable was the performance of the E minor (April 26), the D major (April 28) and the C minor (April 29) Symphonies. Dr. Koussevitzky is a devotee of Brahms, and his interpretations of the four symphonies have been long familiar; but these performances lost nothing from familiarity. The conductor has had many ovations in Boston, but none to exceed that which marked the close of the last Saturday night concert of the season.

In the Requiem, which was given for the benefit of the pension fund, the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and by Miss Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Mr. David Blair McClosky, baritone. Although there must be changes in the personnel of these choruses every year, the particular virtues of their work persist. The freshness of their voices, their devotion and their intelligence make them invaluable for this type of music. To Dr. Archibald T. Davison and Mr. Wallace G. Woodworth, conductors of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses respectively, belongs much credit for the tonal quality, balance and expressiveness of their singing.

* * *

In spite of stringent times, the orchestra's ninth season under the mace of Dr. Koussevitzky has been productive, as usual, of events of special interest. In addition to the Brahms Festival, homage was rendered to the Wagner and MacDowell anniversaries and the complete cycle of Sibelius's symphonies was traversed during the season. The series was to have been capped with the Eighth Symphony, but this the composer failed to compete in time. The tone poem "Tapiola" also had its first Boston performance last fall.

The number of "world premières" was smaller than usual, totaling only four. Of these the most important was M. Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante for orchestra and piano, an intellectual, erudite and cosmopolitan work of fine facture, and much power, though of little popular appeal. Mr. Louis Gruenberg's Symphony No. 1 is a diffuse composition in a jazzy idiom, which displays small originality in material or treatment. Mr. J. A. Carpenter's "Patterns" for orchestra and piano and Mr. Frederick Converse's "Prophecy" for soprano and orchestra will not, we think, add to the reputations of their composers.

Several interesting works were included among the 16 heard for the first time in America. Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" made its expected effect, but after two hearings its value seems very doubtful to this listener, who found much of its musical material banal, its declamation dull and its effects meretricious. Bax's Symphonie Concertante, "Winter Legends," left us feeling that its composer's muse thrives better in the Irish climate than in the rigorous airs of the Far North. Of the British school, we took more pleasure in Bax's Second Symphony, which was revived this season; and in Vaughan Williams's Tallis Fantasia and "Pastoral" Symphony. The latter was belatedly introduced to Boston Symphony subscribers at a concert conducted by Mr. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster.

* * *

Two works by Prokofieff had their first hearing in America—a Suite from "Le Joueur" and the Fifth Piano Concerto. The four characters from the opera were not clothed with reality in the concert hall. The concerto is a characteristic work which will not detract from its author's reputation.

Another novelty to the United States was the "String Quartet with Orchestra" of Martinů, one of those "well-made" but theatrical pieces in which the young modernists strive unsuccessfully to conceal their essential sterility. The "Magna Mater" of Mr. A. Tchérepnin proved to be a cleverly made Franco-Russian neo-primitive product.

A composition that has stirred a tempest in a paste-pot is the "Imaginary Ballet" called "Rébus," one of the productions of that young Markevitch called "Igor II." This work had been scheduled to be heard first in Boston. Dr. Koussevitzky, deserted by his customary tact, gave it first in New York, where it was liked by the public and torn to bits by the critics. It seems to us that an undue amount of passion has been expended on this opus, which is obviously the practice work of a boy of exceptional talent, to be heard gladly but not with the expectation of a musical revelation.

Two excellent American works were played for the first time in Boston: Prof. E. B. Hill's engaging and spontaneous Sinfonietta and Mr. C. M. Loeffler's charmingly impressionistic "Evocation," for orchestra and women's chorus.

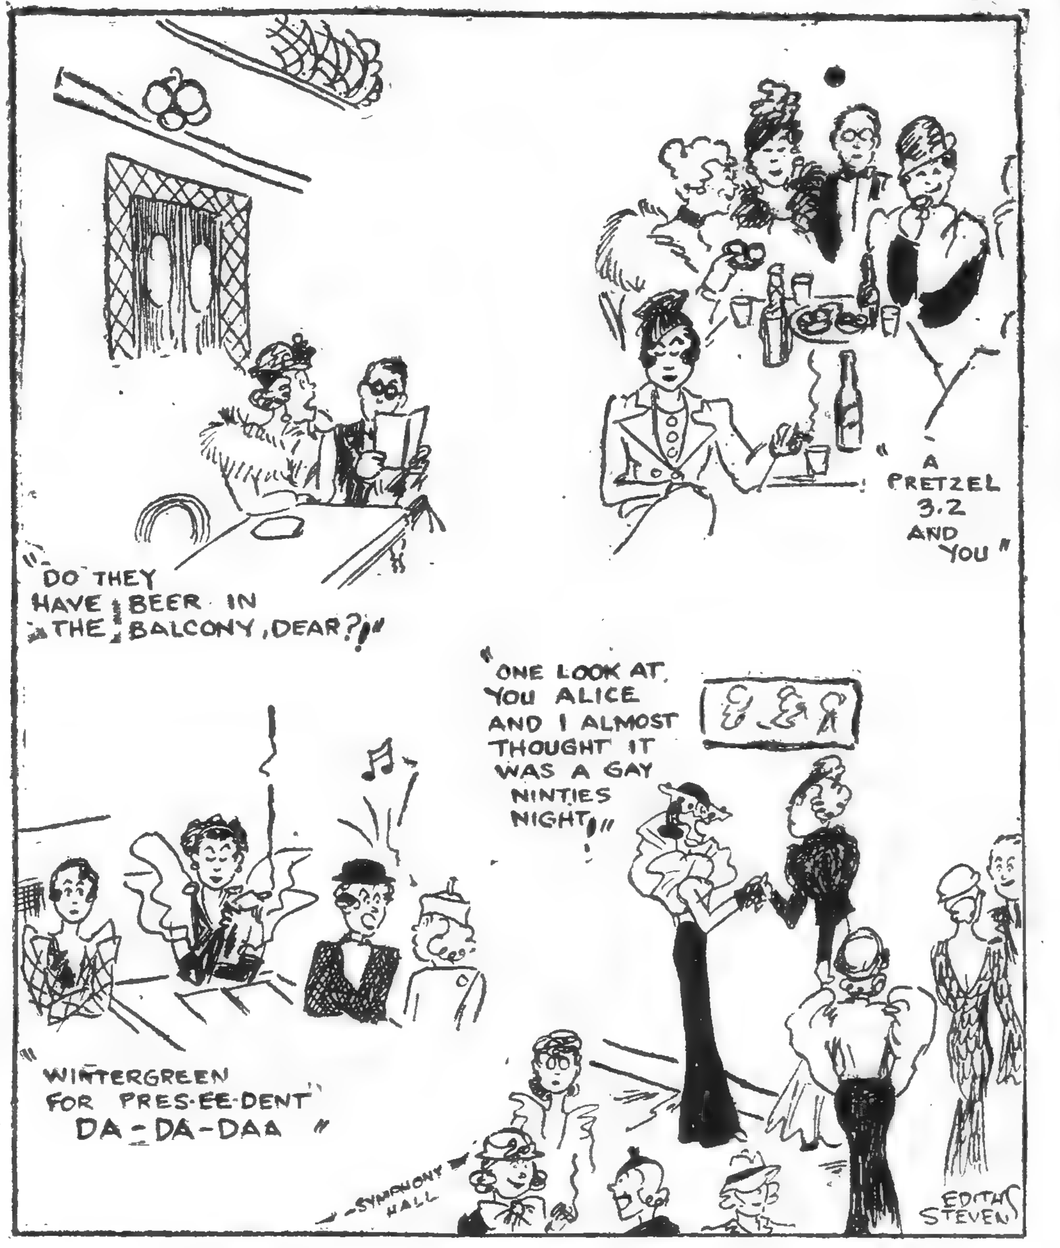
This great orchestra has been maintained on the heights throughout the economic crisis. With Dr. Koussevitzky returning next fall to a virtually unchanged personnel, new achievements will confidently be expected.

L. A. S.

Mr. Charles Laughton is shortly to appear in a British film dealing with Henry VIII. It is said, however, that this film will not be "historical."

BOSTON POST, THURSDAY, MAY 4, 1933

Pops Open Just as in Pre-War Days



"DO THEY HAVE BEER IN THE BALCONY, DEAR?"
"A PRETZEL 3.2 AND YOU"
"ONE LOOK AT YOU ALICE AND I ALMOST THOUGHT IT WAS A GAY NINTIES NIGHT"
"WINTERGREEN FOR PRES-EE-DENT DA-DA-DAA"
SYMPHONY HALL
EDITH STEVENS

Continued From First Page

So enthusiastic was the brilliant throng of music lovers that when Conductor Arthur Fiedler called for Secretary of Treasury William H. Woodin's "Franklin D. Roosevelt March," the crowd roared sustained and tumultuous approval until he had played the encore twice, an almost unheard-of event at a Pops concert.

It wasn't the crowd so much, officials said. An opening Pops concert often fills Symphony Hall's 2800 seats; it was the spirit of the crowd.

And one of the happiest, if not the happiest man in the great assembly, Arthur M. Wiggin, treasurer, said with a smile that went from ear to ear:

"The good old days are back again."

Half a Dozen Brews

Beer of half a dozen brews, including imported varieties from Germany and England, vied for patronage with one of the first shipments of Schlitz and Boston and New York beers. But whatever kind it was, beer was on nearly every table on the floor and was consumed in generous quantities.

When Fiedler called for the Stein Song, the crowd appeared to be on the point of getting up and singing. Officials said it was more like a Viennese than a typical Boston audience.

C. A. Ellis There

Charles A. Ellis, a former manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra and originator of Pops Concerts, was very much in evidence and very happy. So was Theodore Fox, seated with George B. Magrath, medical examiner, with his halo of white hair.

Officials said that the younger element, including a large sprinkling of Boston society, made up a good part of the audience. In the balconies were a sprinkling of music lovers, young and old, intensely enthusiastic over a really brilliant programme.

Pops Stay Musical

Orchestra of About 90 Plays Secretary Woodin's March as an Extra —Gershwin's "Cuban Overture" for First Time in Boston

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The 48th season of Pop Concerts opened at Symphony Hall last evening with Arthur Fiedler once more conducting an orchestra nearly 90 strong and audience in attendance that packed the hall to capacity.

In every respect but one last evening's Pop Concert was like other opening nights under Mr. Fiedler's direction, and that one respect was the inclusion in the "To Drink" section of the bill-of-fare of the items, "Beer and Ale" and "Wines." So far as the roving eye could discern the beverage at nearly every table was one or the other of the two first mentioned, whether the bottles in question contained American, Canadian, German or English brew—for all these were to be had.

Some time ago the Pops "went musical," and musical they will remain. Some last night would have liked, if only for the sake of old times, a somewhat lighter, gayer programme than Mr. Fiedler's, with more waltzes, more marches, more comic opera music of the effervescent and sparkling variety. But Mr. Fiedler's programmes have emphatically received the stamp of popular approval; at least half the audience sat in the balconies and the music that Mr. Fiedler offered seemed quite to the taste of this and the rest of the assembled company.

Yet the two pieces which received the most applause and which had to be repeated, were Secretary Woodin's march, "Franklin D. Roosevelt," offered as an extra in the first part of the programme, and Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President," itself the encore which followed that composer's surprisingly ineffective Cuban Overture, played for the first time in Boston. By so much, at least, the audience liked music of spirit.

The "Emperor" March and "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner respectively began and ended the programme. Along the way came Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride"; the Gypsy Dance from the second act of "Carmen"; a new Fantasy on themes from "Hansel and Gretel"; "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," and "Molly on the Shore" as arranged for strings, the one by Alfred Pochon, the other by Percy Grainger; Ravel's "Bolero," a selection from Jerome Kern's "Music in the Air," which makes no great impression in the concert hall, and, quite appropriately, the charming, "Wine, Woman and Song" waltz of Johann Strauss.

186

Ninth Year of Koussevitzky As Conductor

Present Policies Continued, Comprehensive Repertory, Unlessened Performance

THE conductor of a symphony orchestra may follow one of two policies. He may work within a relatively narrow repertory of established music—from the ancients, through the classics, so onward to the outer edges of our own time. Into that time, according to predilections or relations, he may occasionally dip. Whatever the music in hand, he will seek perfection in performance, especially if it be an acknowledged masterpiece, a perdurable classic, an accepted work of a later day. On these numbers, from year to year, he will renew his care and pains until in them he, and his orchestra, attain superlative excellence. He is all loyalty to the composer; but in impression upon hearers, he himself dominates. They may go, and do go, to hear Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," because it is Beethoven's; but they go yet more to hear what they believe is the conductor's unexampled performance. So with Mozart, with Haydn; nearer to our own time, with Wagner and Debussy; with the new ventures, say into Bruckner, that he may choose to make. It is this policy that Mr. Toscanini follows in the concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York. It has raised him to a solitary peak of renown.

The other policy seeks a wide and steadily diversified repertory. It finds room for ancient, for classical, for romantical, for modern, for living, for experimental, composers. It avoids, or tries to avoid, any narrow bonds of time or place or style. It searches the past for music that warrants revival. It would keep within the active repertory music of the present that deserves continuing place. It considers sympathetically the music of the younger generation. It seizes opportunity in anniversaries. It may cultivate intensively the music of a composer with whom the public should be better acquainted. Within certain standards it would traverse, year in and year out, the whole field of symphonic music; add to it, as occcasion offers, music in which orchestra and chorus are joined. Above all, it regards music as a living art, not only perpetuated from the past, but continuing into the present, thence into new future advancing. In performance such a policy seeks a high standard throughout rather than an ultimate, superlative but inevitably narrowed perfection. Above all again, that performance should vitalize the music in hand, be it time-honored classic at one extreme or newest modernism at the other.

It is this policy that Dr. Koussevitzky has followed, through nine years, with the Boston Orchestra. By results it stands justified. Rarely under it has a Symphony Concert lacked some pivotal point of interest; often more than one. Rarely again has any program failed to remind the audience that music is a living, a continuing art to be heeded for what it yields in our day as well as for what it perpetuates from days past. Run through the tables for the past season as the abounding statistician of the program-book once more arrays them. Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Lully, Gluck for ancient masters; Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, from the first half of the nineteenth century; Brahms, Bruckner, Franck, Chaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Wagner for the second; into our time with Debussy, Delius, d'Indy, Strauss, Sibelius; on to Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Roussel, Schmitt, Bax, Vaughan Williams, the younger modernists, Martinu, Walton, Markevitch.

Liszt, as some may note, is missing, save in a Concerto at the Tuesday matinées. But a year ago the conductor brought to pass a remarkable revival of his "Faust Symphony." In the Tuesday matinées Ravel figured. In the subscription concerts he had place only as arranger of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; but for long past Ravel has been plentiful. From Mahler nothing; seemingly to him and to Bruckner in alternate seasons we must agree. Some will say overmuch Brahms; but for him it was centenary year. Or overmuch Sibelius; yet the arraying in cycle of his seven symphonies was valiant act of deserved devotion. There was imagination in it.

Geographically, the list is unexceptionable outside a neglected Italy. Perhaps on these American shores Mr. Toscanini suffices for it. For Americans count Carpenter, Converse, Foote, Gruenberg, Hill, Loeffler, MacDowell—surely a sufficient array. Twenty-four programs, plus twelve for supplementary concerts more or less chosen from them, might hardly range more widely, more comprehensively. If not all the choices were felicitous, few were altogether barren. Better than in recent seasons fared most of the novel numbers. A symphonic year that yielded Bax's "Winter Legends," Loeffler's "Evocation," Martinu's Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra, Markevitch's "Rebus" is above reproach on that score.

To such a repertory add an unflagging merit of performance. It is a virtue of Dr. Koussevitzky's temperament that he approaches every piece as though for the time being there was no other for him in the world. Give him a novel number and his one desire is to persuade two audiences to believe in it as he himself believes. Give him a time-honored classic and his equal desire is to renew its vitality upon the ears, the minds, the imaginations, of his hearers. Give him yet again music that he brings to distinctive performance—Beethoven's Choral Symphony, for example, Chaikovsky's Fifth; Schumann's of the spring, and repetition bears witness to his ripening. Dr. Koussevitzky's dramatizing, emotionalizing quality intensifies whatever music it touches. Rarely does it overcloud or distort the composer. A symphonic year that brought such performances as those of Bax's "Winter Legends," of Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," of Locatelli's "Elegiac Symphony," of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," of a Concerto of Mozart with Mr. Gieseking, of Strauss's "Don Quixote," of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," of Brahms and Sibelius, passim, has not lacked distinctions.

The vitality of the orchestra is undimmed. Think back over the long course of a seven months season, and how seldom has there been routine or perfunctory performance. Less often than the frailties of human nature commonly sanction. Rather, the orchestra has done prodigious technical feats—with Schmitt's "Symphonie Concertante," Gruenberg's Symphony, Markevitch's "Rebus." Two composers at opposite extremes have more than once tested it exactingly—Mozart and Strauss. With neither did it fall short. The string choir keeps a quality of tone, an instant flexibility, hard to surpass. What with Mr. Laurent, Mr. Polatschek and Mr. Laus, the woodwinds do not lack virtuosi of distinction. Mr. Boettcher remains a horn-player of the first rank. The brass choir is equal master of the deeper sonorities of the older composers, the sharper—and stranger—sonorities of the new. The whole orchestra remains in itself fused and reciprocating ensemble; the sensitive instrument upon which conductor and composer may play. The mutual reaction between it and Dr. Koussevitzky could hardly be more complete. The years sensitize rather than stale it. "Elan vitale," as the happy French phrase has it, persists.

H. T. P.

Mary of The Muffins

Lois Moran

As She Appears Nightly at the Shubert in "Of Thee I Sing"

At the Pops Tonight

Opening Program

Kaisermarsch	Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "The Bartered Bride"	Smetana
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"	Bizet
Fantasia on Themes from Humperdinck's Opera, "Hansel and Gretel"	Fried
Cuban Overture, "Rumba"	Gershwin
Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes. (Arranged for String Orchestra)	Pochon
Molly on the Shore	Grainger
Bolero	Ravel
Selection from the Operetta, "Music in the Air"	Kern
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"	J. Strauss
Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner

Conductor: A. Fiedler

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

MAY 6 - 1933

KOUSSEVITSKY SAILS.

NEW YORK, May 5—(AP) Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for Europe today to conduct the first May festival in London since the World War. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

MONTREAL, CAN.
STAR

MAY 8 1933

GOOD MUSIC FOR A CHANGE.

Sir,—May I be permitted, through the medium of your column, to reply to one of your correspondents signing himself Mac, who complains regarding the practice of a local station in curtailing the program of "George Wade and his Corn Huskers" and presenting instead the "Boston Symphony Orchestra" which he characterizes as "pretty terrible." Surely one hour and a half in a complete evening is not too much to allow to lovers of good music even though they be sadly in the minority in this city. The opportunity of hearing a world-famous symphony orchestra is given us all too seldom, and to forego this, to present a monotonous, banging, thumping jazz band seems to be very stupid. The powers that be, if they are to be successful, must cater to all tastes, the jazz enthusiast is well looked after in the matter of radio programs. If anyone has the right to complain, surely it is ourselves.

CHROMATIC.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD
MAY 9 - 1933

A Smile or Two

Bituminous—Why, black boy, when our bugler blows "taps" you would think the Boston Symphony orchestra was playing.

Anthracite—H'm, dat ain't nothin'. When our bugler blows "chow" I looks at dem beans on mah plate and says, "Strawberries stop making that fus, you is kicking all the whipped cream off mah plate."—West Virginia Mountaineer.

* * *

"Dad," said son, "isn't there any way of borrowing a little money?"

"I'm afraid not, my boy," replied his dad. "What do you want it for now?"

"To get the blamed car fixed up," growled the son. "It's so bad now the only cars I can pass with it are those that are parked."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

157

SOCIETY A

Smart Audience at Benefit Pop Concert in Symphony Hall

1 and May 8

By MARION LYNDON

Symphony Hall was filled last night with a Pop concert that was an answer to dreams. The audience, the music, the enthusiasm of the socially select seated about the tables with beer, pretzels and even tea, as chosen by one smart young matron, were all that any one could desire. The New England Medical Centre was the fortunate beneficiary of this gala occasion.

Miss Elizabeth Harding's blonde good looks was enhanced by hyacinth blue and Miss Pauline Ehrlich's tall beauty was stunning in black and ermine with gardenias and lilies of the valley. Miss Harding and Miss Ehrlich were two of the volunteer workers at the Boston Dispensary who did so much to put over this glowingly successful concert.

It was an interesting melange of seemingly most of the past season's debutantes and distinguished hostesses of an older generation. Mrs. Richard M. Saltonstall brought on her dinner guests, Mr. and Mrs. George S. Mumford and Mr. and Mrs, William L. Allen Mrs. George Bramwell Baker was one of those of importance who attended in street clothes. Mrs. Bradley Dewey wore smart black and white.

After the concert many were heard discussing going to Friday's open house at the Medical Centre to hear Dr. Bigelow, whose unexpected lecture remarks are as startlingly delightful as his medical reputation is famous.

Another interesting group included Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Peabody, with Mrs. Peabody in dark blue and white; Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Grafton C. Perkins, with Mrs. Perkins wearing a charming print of larkspur and cerise; Mrs. Stanley Lawton in a print in tones of rose and pink; Mr. and Mrs. Channing Turner and Mrs. Otis Weld Richardson. Mrs. James A. Nelson, there with Mr. Nelson, wore a distinguished ensemble of a deep red velvet wrap over a sheer crepe gown of the same shade.

Among the vendors of flowers and cigarettes were Miss Alice Wood, in a spring print of flower tones; Miss Katherine Peabody in brown cire satin and Miss Rosamond Lockwood and Miss Anne Torbert in black. Miss Helen Jackson of Westwood was chic in a print of two tones of blue. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Osgood, 2d, brought their dinner guests, who included Miss Dorothy Lawrence in violet blue that was charming with her patrician profile and exquisite coloring, and Miss Betty Soule, whose early season tan was vivid with a black and white dinner dress.

From the list of debutantes of the past season were Miss Carol Crocker and Miss Lucy Stone in stunning evening coats of different shades of red; Miss Rose Whitman and Miss Kathleeen Crocker in day time apparel, Miss Dorothy Stone, Miss Ellen Pierce, a devoted volunteer worker at the dispensary, and Miss Helen Richmond, both in navy blue; Miss Sally Waters in beige and brown with a tiny brown hat high on her clever bob; Miss Caroline Hunnewell, attractive in navy and white, the perfect spring combination, and Miss Catherine Blake in a gray afternoon dress and a tweed coat of gray. Miss Ada Dewson's color scheme of gray and reddish purple was extremely becoming. Others in that gay throng were Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Toppan, Mrs. Robert C. Terry, Mr. and Mrs. Foster Trainer, Miss Julia Prendergast and Mrs. Winthrop W. Spenser

---

NEW YORK TIMES

Bklyn Queens L I.

MAY 9 - 1933

BOXES SOLD FOR CONCERTS

More Than 250 New Subscribers for Boston Symphony Series.

All box seats for the 1933-34 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music have been taken, according to a report yesterday by Mrs. Edward C. Blum at a meeting of the Brooklyn committee for the concerts. Mrs. William H. Good, chairman of the executive committee, presided and reported more than 250 new subscribers. The orchestra will give five concerts, starting next November.

Addresses were made by Andrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the committee; Charles B. Atkins, director of the Institute of Arts and Sciences; Frank L. Babbott, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. H. Edward Dreyer, R. Huntington Goodman, Carl H. Tollessen and Walter H. Crittenden. The Brooklyn Junior League was represented by Mrs. Edwin C. Maynard Jr. The committee will hold its next meeting in the Fall.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

MAY 3 1933

MOMENT

By SIDNE

In Honor of Brahms.

The Brahms festival in Boston last week was not devised as a money-making venture. It was in fact complimentary to the subscribers to the various regular series of the Boston Symphony orcnestra. And save for the regular concerts of Friday and Saturday those who attended were guests of the orchestra. All comers, of course, were admitted to the Sunday afternoon concert for the pension fund on the usual terms.

The writer of this column had the opportunity to hear the Thursday afternoon concert of chamber music. Symphony hall is not ideal for music of the more intimate nature. All the music would have sounded better in a smaller hall. Of the two purely instrumental works of Brams presented, the Quintet in B minor for Clarinet and Strings and the Quartet for Pianoforte and Strings, in G minor, the learned reviewer for the Transcript felt that the former came off in most satisfactory fashion. True it furnished a fine opportunity for observation of the skill of Victor Polatschek as a clarinetist, who adjusted the tones of his instrument to those of the strings with rare sympathy. But, truth to tell, the composition is prolix and somewhat dreary. Even the great composers are not always inspired. To our mind the clarinet quintet of Mozart is more grateful music . It may expose our ignorance to confess it, but the Quartet for Pianoforte and Strings with the versatile Mr. Sanroma at the piano impressed us as far more inteesting both as a composition and in point of performance. Of the songs which Jeannette Vreeland sang, she seemed to us to be most successful in "Der Schmied," the most familiar of the five which she selected for the program. The Liebeslander Waltzes for pianoforte duet and small chorus assembled from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society were wholly delightful, Brahms in his less austere vein. When Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, abetted by a young man to turn the pages, sat down to the piano with their backs to the vast audience, a general chuckle rippled through the hall. Seen from the rear of the uppermost balcony, curiously foreshortened, the three made a theme for a caricaturist. Without meaning any disrespect to the performers, to this observer they suggested that familiar plastic group of oriental origin in which three simians figure.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

MAY 3 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Attracts Support of Large Sponsoring Committee Here

A brilliant 1933-34 season seems assured for the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. With the passing of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony concerts, inaugurated a special campaign to rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough. An enlarged committee for the Boston Symphony concerts is now being formed, which includes many former members of the Brooklyn Committee for the New York Philharmonic Concerts.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good, an executive committee has been formed. This committee includes: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Mary Childs Daper, Mrs. William P. Earle, Jr., Summer Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Henry A. Ingraham, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. E. F. Maynard, Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Surrogate, George A. Wingate.

Most of the boxes for the season have been taken. Boxholders to date include Frank L. Babbott, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Good and Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. Charles Franklin the following Junior League committee for the concerts has been formed: Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read, Mrs. Robert M. Winslaw.

A meeting of the enlarged Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be held on Monday afternoon at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The committee to date includes:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Mrs. John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Jr., former Judge William R. Bayes, Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Robert E. Blum, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Mrs. Glenworth R. Butler, the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., former Senator William H. Calder, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Harris M. Crist, Judge James C. Cropsey, Judge Norman S. Dike, Miss Mary E. Dillon, the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal S. Raymond Estey, Theodore L. Frothingham, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Mrs. James M. Hills, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Dr. William A. Jewett, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. William Kennedy, Jr., Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay.

Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. rank Melville, Jr., Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. Burt F. Nichols, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, Jr., Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Mrs. Harold I. Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, William Armour Thayer, Carl H. Tollefsen, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Miss Josephine D. Wilkin, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Mrs. Harry M. Wingle, Cornelius D. Wood, R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Annie S. Wyckoff, Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

The five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music on the following evenings at 8:15 o'clock: Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2; Friday, April 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 9 - 1933

Plan to Increase Boston Symphony Concert Interest

Van Sinderen Predicts Successful Season—Series to Start Nov. 17

Plans for increasing interest in the annual concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, were formulated yesterday afternoon at a meeting of a representative Brooklyn committee at the Academy of Music.

Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the committee, spoke briefly at the meeting, pointing out that, with the passing of the New York Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn, the Boston Symphony is the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series.

Should Be Successful

"Although the financial success of the coming season seems assured," Van Sinderen said, "there is no reason why it shouldn't be the most brilliant and successful in the history of the organization's visits to Brooklyn."

Mrs. William H. Good, who is in active charge of the committee, presided at yesterday's meeting. She and others emphasized the importance of the concerts in the borough's cultural life over a period of nearly 50 years. She declared that "instead of empty seats at any concert, there ought to be at least one person waiting for every seat."

Nearly 150 persons interested in borough musical and cultural activities are listed as members of the committee. The members will work among their friends, through schools and musical organizations and through other civic channels to stimulate support of the concerts.

NEW YORK TIMES

Bklyn Queens L I

MAY 5 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRANGES SERIES

Van Sinderen Gives Dates for Five Brooklyn Concerts Next Season.

GROUP TO MEET MONDAY

Enlarged Committee Will Hear Reports and Formulate Plans for New Schedule.

Announcement of the dates of the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn next season was made yesterday by Adrian Van Sindersen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts. Under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra will come to Brooklyn once each month, except December, from November through April.

Mr. Van Sindersen said that as a result of the discontinuance of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon series his committee is being enlarged to "rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough." He felt a brilliant 1933-34 season was assured and reported that most of the season boxes already had been taken.

A meeting of the enlarged committee will be held Monday afternoon to hear reports and formulate further plans. Two other committees also have been formed. Mr. Van Sinderen said. The executive committee will be under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good and a Junior League committee under Mrs. Charles Franklin.

The five concerts next season will be given the following evenings: Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6. Boxholders include Frank L. Babbott, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mery Childs Draper, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Good and Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum.

On the executive committee are:

Frank L. Babbott
Edward C. Blum
Mrs. E. C. Blum
Mrs. B. D. Bromley
Mrs. Otis S. Carroll
Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. F. L. Cranford
Walter H. Crittenden
Dr. John H. Denbigh
Mrs. Mary C. Draper
Mrs. W. P. Earle Jr.
Sumner Ford
Mrs. L. W. Francis
Mrs. Charles Franklin
Henry A. Ingraham
Miss D. R. Johnson
Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr.
Miss Irene Miles
Mrs. C. E. Potts
Mrs. F. B. Pratt
Robert A. Shaw
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs. J. P. Warbasse
George A. Wingate

Members of the Junior League Committee are:

Mrs. Sumner Ford
Mrs. Ronald Hart
Miss Dorothy R. Johnson
Miss E. Lathrop
Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr.
Miss E. Paffard
Miss F. E. Read
Mrs. R. M. Winslow

The enlarged Brooklyn Committee includes the following members to date:

Dr. J. D. Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Mrs. John Anderson
Charles D. Atkins
Dr. F. L. Babbott Jr.
William R. Bayes
Dr. N. T. Beers
Robert E. Blum
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. C. B. Buckley
Mrs. G. R. Butler
Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman
William M. Calder
J. N. Carpenter
Mrs. I. S. Coffin
Mrs. H. M. Crist
James C. Cropsey
Norman S. Dike
Miss M. E. Dillon
Rev. S. M. Dorrance
Mrs. H. E. Dreier
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. R. Estey
T. L. Frothingham
Mrs. Emil Goetsch
Mrs. M. P. Goodfellow
Mrs. W. P. Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Mrs. James M. Hills
Miss A. B. Hollenback
Dr. A. C. Howe
Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone
William T. Hunter
Dr. W. A. Jewett
Ralph Jonas
James H. Jourdan
Mrs. W. Kennedy Jr.
Jacob C. Klinck
David H. Lanman
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. R. B. Lea
Mrs. J. E. Leech
Mrs. W. H. Lohman
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. F. D. MacKay
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Mrs. W. W. Marshall
Mrs. F. Melville Jr.
Dr. R. B. Miles
Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer
Mrs. A. E. Mudge
Frank C. Munson
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. B. F. Nichols
Mrs. C. L. Nichols
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. D. C. Osborne
Mrs. F. H. Parsons
Mrs. C. E. Perkins
James H. Post
Mrs. G. H. Prentiss
Mrs. B. Prince
G. William Rasch
Mrs. F. Reynolds
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. C. L. Rossiter Jr.
Mrs. J. D. H. Schulz
Mrs. H. W. Seeley
Mrs. H. I. Small
Mrs. B. H. Smith
Mrs. W. C. Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Mrs. J. F. Talmage
Mrs. F. Taylor
Miss M. J. Terry
T. C. Thayer
W. A. Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Dr. J. M. Van Cott
Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. E. C. Ward
Mrs. C. Waterman
Mrs. W. F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Miss J. D. Wilkin
Dr. R. C. Williams
Mrs. H. M. Wingle
Cornelius D. Wood
R. H. Woodman
Miss A. S. Wyckoff
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

Brooklyn Times Union

MAY 7 - 1933

Boston Symphony Committee Makes Plans for Its New Season

A brilliant 1933-34 season now seems assured for the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. With the passing of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn, Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, inaugurated a special campaign to rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough. An enlarged committee for the Boston Symphony concerts are now being formed, including many former members of the Brooklyn committee for the New York Philharmonic concerts.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good, an executive committee has been formed which is now working actively. This committee includes Frank L. Babbott, Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Ottis Swan Carroll, Hon. Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Henry A. Ingraham, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, jr., Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse and Hon. George Albert Wingate.

Most of the boxes for the season have now been taken. Boxholders include Mr. Frank L. Babbott, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Good and Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. Charles Franklin, the following Junior League committee for the concerts has been formed: Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

Enthusiastic and effective support is indicated in excellent results of the Junior League committee to date.

A meeting of the enlarged Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts will be held tomorrow afternoon at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At this meeting reports will be made and further plans formulated.

The committee to date includes:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Charles D. Atkins
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Hon. William R. Bayes
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Robert E. Blum
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Charles R. Buckley
Mrs. Glentworth Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
Hon. William M. Calder
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Harris M. Crist
Hon. James C. Cropsey
Hon. Norman S. Dike
Miss Mary E. Dillon
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. H. Edward Dreier
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Theodore L. Frothingham
Mrs. Emil Goetsch
Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow
Mrs. William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Mrs. James M. Hills
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone
William T. Hunter
Dr. William A. Jewett
Ralph Jonas
James H. Jourdan
Mrs. William Kennedy, jr.
Jacob C. Klinck
David H. Lanman
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Mrs. W. H. Lohman
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Frank O. Munson
Mrs. Frank Melville, jr.
Dr. Raymond B. Miles
Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer
Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. Burt F. Nichols
Mrs. Carroll Jeja Nichols
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Dean C. Osborne
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins
James H. Post
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
G. William Rasch
Mrs. Frank Reynolds
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
Mrs. John D. H. Schulz
Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley
Mrs. Harold Irving Small
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
Mrs. W. C. Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Mrs. John F. Talmage
Mrs. Frank Taylor
Miss Marion J. Terry
Thornton C. Thayer
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott
Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Clarence Waterman
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Miss Josephine D. Wilkin
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Mrs. Harry M. Wingle
Cornelius D. Wood
Raymond Huntington Woodman
Miss Annie S. Wyckoff
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

NEW BRITTAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAY 6 1933

ALL GO ABROAD

A newspaper item the other day stated that Gatti-Casazza, managing director of the Metropolitan Opera, had begun his annual trip to Europe. On the same boat was Gabrilowitsch, pianist and conductor. The conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra will spend his vacation in Egypt, Turkey or some such place; the conductor of the Boston Symphony will go to Europe; so will every other conductor and musical celebrity in the land. We have heard of no case where a top-notch musician is spending the summer months in the good old U. S. A.

These worthies stay in the country only long enough to earn their money. The moment they are free to travel they depart, always to Europe.

There is no objection against foreign travel and many a bond salesman, business Babbitt and school teacher has done it. But not even these do so every year; for many, once in a lifetime is sufficient.

The musicians, however, just cannot get along in the U. S. A. when they are not working. They spend months abroad every year and become firmly infiltrated with the foreign viewpoint in art. Perhaps that is why grand opera—run on the foreign plan—is dying on its feet in this country; and why every idiotic modernism from foreign shores is so lavishly inflicted upon unwilling American ears; for instance, when the Boston symphony recently performed the smart-aleck "Rebus" piece by the 21 year old Russian stripling.

Once there was a great foreign musician in this country and he did not enrich the boat lines while here. He saw plenty in this country to hold him enthralled for awhile. Instead of going to Asia to study ancient idioms he delved into the American idiom, and made a world-compelling contribution with it. He was Anton Dvorak. The contribution was the New World Symphony, and it remains a world's masterpiece. And one summer he spent his vacation with a Slavic colony in Iowa and enunciated a dainty "Humoresque;" and the plaintive "Indian Lament."

None of the eminent foreign musicians in the country at the present time would be worthy of shining the shoes of a Dvorak.

---

tion.

Globe May 24

Third Week of the "Pops"

With the first Sunday concert of the season this evening, the Symphony Hall "Pops" enter a third week. The program for tonight, distinctly of "symphonic" character, enlists the playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma in the E-flat concerto of Liszt. Refreshments and smoking will be in order.

Tuesday will be "Harvard Night." Mr Fiedler is to conduct a "Gay Nineties" program on Thursday. All are invited to dress in the fashions of that fabulous period. Unfamiliar music and stereopticon slides will give added zest. Indeed, as Symphony Hall aptly puts it, "only the brew will be of 1933."

The programs for these concerts, which begin at 8:30, are as follows:

Sunday, May 14. Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia (arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty), Handel; Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67, Beethoven; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in E flat (soloist, J. M. Sanroma), Liszt; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Monday, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "The Barber of Seville," overture, Rossini; Violin Concerto, finale (soloist, Carmela Ippolito), Mendelssohn; Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Invitation to the Dance," Webber-Berlioz; Fourth Symphony, Finale, Tchaikovsky; songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir and the Boston Choristers; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; Largo (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, harp, organ and strings), Handel; "Lohengrin," introduction to Act 3, Wagner.

Tuesday (Harvard Night). "Veritas," march, Densmore; "La Belle Helene," overture, Offenbach; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakov; songs by the Harvard Glee Club; "Facade," Walton; "Bolero," Ravel; songs by the Harvard Glee Club; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Danube Waves," waltz, Ivanovici; "Up the Street," march, Morse.

Wednesday, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture, Mendelssohn; intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg; "Oberon," overture, Weber; "Rhapsody in Blue," piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "By the Beautiful Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Hands Across the Sea," international fantasy, Sousa.

Thursday. ("Gay Nineties" Night.) March, "Under the Double Eagle," Wagner; "Martha," Overture, Von Flotow; Cavatina, Raff; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "The Mikado," Selection, Sullivan; Stereopticon Slides," Wilson; "Campus Memories." Prestidigitations—By the Musical Magician," Harrell; "Hearts and Flowers," Tobani; Old Song Favorites.

Friday. Military Polonaise, Chopin; "The Caliph of Bagdad," Overture, Boieldieu; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; "Danse Macabre," Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens; "Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; Largo (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; "Rienzi," Overture, Wagner; "The Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz; "March of the Toys," Herbert; "Wien bleibt Wien," March, Schrammel.

Saturday. Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Poet and Peasant," Overture, Suppe; "Turkish March," from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; Fantasy on Themes from "Hansel & Gretal," Humperdinck; Slavonic Dance in E minor, Dvorak; "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; "Music in the Air," Selection, Kern; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; "Franklin D. Roosevelt," March, Woodin.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 7 - 1933

Hans Wiener, with Otto Aschermann and dance group, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler in their "Pops" series in Boston on May 9, 10 and 11.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 6 - 1933

SSEVITSKY SAILS

New York, May 5 (AP)—Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for Europe today to conduct the first May festival in London since the World War. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

From London he will go to Vienna and thence to Bad Gustine, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitch and Leopold Stokowski, conductors of the Detroit and Philadelphia orchestras.

IRON MOUNTAIN, MICH.
NEWS

MAY 4 - 1933

Gob Humor.

Bituminous—Why, black boy, when our bugler blows "taps" you would think the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing.

Anthracite—H'm dat ain't nothin'. When our bugler blows "chow" I looks at dem beans on mah plate and says, "Strawberries stop making that fus, you is kicking all the whipped cream off mah plate."—West Virginia Mountaineer.

THIS CLIPPING

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 5 - 1933

Boston Symphony Dates Announced By Van Sinderen

Dates for the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, were announced yesterday by Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The announcement of the series came with the inauguration of a special campaign to rally to the support of the Boston Symphony following the passing of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn.

An enlarged committee for the concerts has been formed and will hold its first meeting at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Monday.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good an active executive committee has been formed. The committee includes:

Frank L. Babbott
Edward C. Blum
Mrs. E. C. Blum
Mrs. B. D. Bromley
Mrs. Otis S. Carroll
Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. F. L. Cranford
Walter H. Crittenden
Dr. John H. Denbigh
Mrs. Mary C. Draper
Mrs. W. P. Earle Jr.
Sumner Ford
Mrs. L. W. Francis
Mrs. Charles Franklin
Henry A. Ingraham
Miss D. R. Johnson
Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr.
Miss Irene Miles
Mrs. C. E. Potts
Mrs. F. B. Pratt
Robert A. Shaw
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs J. P. Warbasse
George A. Wingate

The five concerts next season will be given on Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

MAY 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans Five Concerts Here

Announcement of the dates of the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn next season has been made by Adrian Van Sindersen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts. Under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra will come to Brooklyn once each month, except December, from November through April.

Mr. Van Sindersen said that as a result of the discontinuation of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon series his committee is being enlarged to "rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough." He felt a brilliant 1933-34 season was assured and reported that most of the season boxes already had been taken.

The five concerts next season will be given on the evenings of Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 5 - 1933

Dr. Koo, Chinese Envoy, Arriving Here for Parley

Douglas Fairbanks Also Among Aquitania Passengers—6 Ships Leave

Dr. Vi Kuyuin Wellington Koo, Chinese Minister to Paris and former Minister to Washngton, s arrvng today on the Cunarder Aquitania for economic and political talks with President Roosevelt.

Besides Dr. Koo on the Aquitania, passengers include Helena Rubinstein, beauty specialist; Douglas Fairbanks, moving picture star, and Capt. Harold Farquhar, secretary to the British Embassy in Mexico City.

Six transatlantic ships are leaving port for Europe today, including the American Merchant liner American Farmer, the White Star liner Majestic, the Red Star liner Westernland, the White Star liner Britannic, the Holland-America liner Volendam and the Cunarder Franconia.

Outgoing passengers on the Majestic include Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, Deputy Controller of Finance in England; Sir William Letts, English automobile executive; Philip Lehman, New York banker, and Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, orchestral conductor.

Norman Rowe, public utilities executive, is among the passengers sailing today for Valparaiso on the Grace liner Santa Maria.

New York Herald-Tribune

MAY 6 - 1933

Koussevitsky Departs For Concerts in London

Conductor Will Proceed to Vienna, Bad Gastein, Austria

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky for Europe yesterday aboard the White Star liner Majestic. Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct concerts in Queen's Hall, London, on May 17, 18 and 19, in the first May Festival in London since the World War. Later he will go to Vienna and Bad Gatein, in Austria, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, director of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

Viscountess Furness, the former Thelma Morgan, a sister of Mrs. Reginald C. Vanderbilt, also sailed on the Majestic. Mrs. Vanderbilt and A. C. Blumenthal were at the pier to bid her good-bye.

Herald May 6

KOUSSEVITZKY SAILS FOR LONDON CONCERT

NEW YORK, May 5 (AP)—Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed for Enrope today to conduct the first May festival in London since the world war. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

From London he will go to Vienna and thence to Bad Gustine, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitch and Leopold Stokowski, conductors of the Detroit and Philadelphia orchestras.

Brooklyn Times Union

MAY 7 - 1933

Boston Symphony Committee Makes Plans for Its New Season

A brilliant 1933-34 season now seems assured for the Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. With the passing of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn, Mr. Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, inaugurated a special campaign to rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough. An enlarged committee for the Boston Symphony concerts are now being formed, including many former members of the Brooklyn committee for the New York Philharmonic concerts.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good, an executive committee has been formed which is now working actively. This committee includes Frank L. Babbott, Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Ottis Swan Carroll, Hon. Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Henry A. Ingraham, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, jr., Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse and Hon. George Albert Wingate.

Most of the boxes for the season have now been taken. Boxholders include Mr. Frank L. Babbott, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Good and Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. Charles Franklin, the following Junior League committee for the concerts has been formed: Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

Enthusiastic and effective support is indicated in excellent results of the Junior League committee to date.

A meeting of the enlarged Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts will be held tomorrow afternoon at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At this meeting reports will be made and further plans formulated.

The committee to date includes:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen
Juan A. Almirall
Charles D. Atkins
Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr.
Hon. William R. Bayes
Dr. Nathan T. Beers
Robert E. Blum
Dr. W. B. Brinsmade
Mrs. Charles R. Buckley
Mrs. Glentworth Butler
Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D.
Hon. William M. Calder
J. Norman Carpenter
Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin
Mrs. Harris M. Crist
Hon. James C. Cropsey
Hon. Norman S. Dike
Miss Mary E. Dillon
Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance
Mrs. H. Edward Dreier
Mrs. Guy DuVal
S. Raymond Estey
Theodore L. Frothingham
Mrs. Emil Goetsch
Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow
Mrs. William Peter Hamilton
Walter Hammitt
George Hewlett
Mrs. James M. Hills
Miss Amelia B. Hollenback
Dr. Alexander C. Howe
Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone
William T. Hunter
Dr. William A. Jewett
Ralph Jonas
James H. Jourdan
Mrs. William Kennedy, jr.
Jacob C. Klinck
David H. Lanman
Charles D. Lay
Mrs. Robert B. Lea
Mrs. John Eadie Leech
Mrs. W. H. Lohman
Miss Hilda Loines
Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay
Mrs. Charles J. McDermott
Mrs. William W. Marshall
Frank O. Munson
Mrs. Frank Melville, jr.
Dr. Raymond B. Miles
Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer
Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge
Charles F. Murphy
Mrs. Burt F. Nichols
Mrs. Carroll Jeja Nichols
Mrs. George Notman
Neilson Olcott
Mrs. Dean C. Osborne
Mrs. Frank H. Parsons
Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins
James H. Post
Mrs. George H. Prentiss
Mrs. Benjamin Prince
G. William Rasch
Mrs. Frank Reynolds
Mrs. Donald Ross
Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr.
Mrs. John D. H. Schulz
Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley
Mrs. Harold Irving Small
Mrs. B. Herbert Smith
Mrs. W. C. Spelman
Porter Steele
Mrs. Herman Stutzer
Mrs. John F. Talmage
Mrs. Frank Taylor
Miss Marion J. Terry
Thornton C. Thayer
William Armour Thayer
Carl H. Tollefsen
Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott
Paul E. Vernon
Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward
Mrs. Clarence Waterman
Mrs. Walter F. Wells
Mrs. J. B. Whitney
Miss Josephine D. Wilkin
Dr. Ralph C. Williams
Mrs. Harry M. Wingle
Cornelius D. Wood
Raymond Huntington Woodman
Miss Annie S. Wyckoff
Mrs. W. H. Ziegler

NEW BRITTAIN, CONN.
HERALD

MAY 6 1933

ALL GO ABROAD

A newspaper item the other day stated that Gatti-Casazza, managing director of the Metropolitan Opera, had begun his annual trip to Europe. On the same boat was Gabrilowitsch, pianist and conductor. The conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra will spend his vacation in Egypt, Turkey or some such place; the conductor of the Boston Symphony will go to Europe; so will every other conductor and musical celebrity in the land. We have heard of no case where a top-notch musician is spending the summer months in the good old U. S. A.

These worthies stay in the country only long enough to earn their money. The moment they are free to travel they depart, always to Europe.

There is no objection against foreign travel and many a bond salesman, business Babbitt and school teacher has done it. But not even these do so every year; for many, once in a lifetime is sufficient.

The musicians, however, just cannot get along in the U. S. A. when they are not working. They spend months abroad every year and become firmly infiltrated with the foreign viewpoint in art. Perhaps that is why grand opera—run on the foreign plan—is dying on its feet in this country; and why every idiotic modernism from foreign shores is so lavishly inflicted upon unwilling American ears; for instance, when the Boston symphony recently performed the smart-aleck "Rebus" piece by the 21 year old Russian stripling.

Once there was a great foreign musician in this country and he did not enrich the boat lines while here. He saw plenty in this country to hold him enthralled for awhile. Instead of going to Asia to study ancient idioms he delved into the American idiom, and made a world-compelling contribution with it. He was Anton Dvorak. The contribution was the New World Symphony, and it remains a world's masterpiece. And one summer he spent his vacation with a Slavic colony in Iowa and enunciated a dainty "Humoresque;" and the plaintive "Indian Lament."

None of the eminent foreign musicians in the country at the present time would be worthy of shining the shoes of a Dvorak.

---

tion.

Globe May 14

Third Week of the "Pops"

With the first Sunday concert of the season this evening, the Symphony Hall "Pops" enter a third week. The program for tonight, distinctly of "symphonic" character, enlists the playing of Jesus Maria Sanroma in the E-flat concerto of Liszt. Refreshments and smoking will be in order.

Tuesday will be "Harvard Night." Mr Fiedler is to conduct a "Gay Nineties" program on Thursday. All are invited to dress in the fashions of that fabulous period. Unfamiliar music and stereopticon slides will give added zest. Indeed, as Symphony Hall aptly puts it, "only the brew will be of 1933."

The programs for these concerts, which begin at 8:30, are as follows:

Sunday, May 14. Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia (arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty), Handel; Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67, Beethoven; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in E flat (soloist, J. M. Sanroma), Liszt; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Monday, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "The Barber of Seville;" overture, Rossini; Violin Concerto, finale (soloist, Carmela Ippolito), Mendelssohn; Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Invitation to the Dance," Webber-Berlioz; Fourth Symphony, Finale, Tchaikovsky; songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir and the Boston Choristers; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; Largo (solo violin, J. Theodorowicz, harp, organ and strings), Handel; "Lohengrin," introduction to Act 3, Wagner.

Tuesday (Harvard Night), "Veritas," march, Densmore; "La Belle Helene," overture, Offenbach; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakov; songs by the Harvard Glee Club; "Facade," Walton; "Bolero," Ravel; songs by the Harvard Glee Club; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Danube Waves," waltz, Ivanovici; "Up the Street," march, Morse.

Wednesday, "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture, Mendelssohn; intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; "Peer Gynt" Suite, Grieg; "Oberon," overture, Weber; "Rhapsody in Blue," piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "By the Beautiful Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Hands Across the Sea," international fantasy, Sousa.

Thursday. ("Gay Nineties" Night.) March, "Under the Double Eagle," Wagner; "Martha," Overture, Von Flotow; Cavatina, Raff; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "The Mikado," Selection, Sullivan; Stereopticon Slides," Wilson; "Campus Memories," Prestidigitations—By the Musical Magician," Harrell; "Hearts and Flowers," Tobani; Old Song Favorites.

Friday. Military Polonaise, Chopin; "The Caliph of Bagdad," Overture, Boieldieu; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; "Danse Macabre," Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens; "Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov; Largo (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; "Rienzi," Overture, Wagner; "The Band Wagon," Selection, Schwartz; "March of the Toys," Herbert; "Wien bleibt Wien," March, Schrammel.

Saturday. Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Poet and Peasant," Overture, Suppe; "Turkish March," from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; Fantasy on Themes from "Hansel & Gretal," Humperdinck; Slavonic Dance in E minor, Dvorak; "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, Sibelius; "Music in the Air," Selection, Kern; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; "Franklin D. Roosevelt," March, Woodin.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 7 - 1933

Hans Wiener, with Otto Aschermann and dance group, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler in their "Pops" series in Boston on May 9, 10 and 11.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAY 6 - 1933

SSEVITSKY SAILS

New York, May 5. (AP)—Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for Europe today to conduct the first May festival in London since the World War. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

From London he will go to Vienna and thence to Bad Gustine, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitch and Leopold Stokowski, conductors of the Detroit and Philadelphia orchestras.

IRON MOUNTAIN, MICH.
NEWS

④

MAY 4 - 1933

Gob Humor.

Bituminous—Why, black boy, when our bugler blows "taps" you would think the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing.

Anthracite—H'm dat ain't nothin'. When our bugler blows "chow" I looks at dem beans on mah plate and says, "Strawberries stop making that fus, you is kicking all the whipped cream off mah plate."—West Virginia Mountaineer.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

MAY 6 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plans Five Concerts Here

Announcement of the dates of the five concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn next season has been made by Adrian Van Sindersen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts. Under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra will come to Brooklyn once each month, except December, from November through April.

Mr. Van Sindersen said that as a result of the discontinuation of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon series his committee is being enlarged to "rally to the support of the one great orchestra now continuing a Brooklyn series all interested in the artistic life of the borough." He felt a brilliant 1933-34 season was assured and reported that most of the season boxes already had been taken.

The five concerts next season will be given on the evenings of Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 5 - 1933

Dr. Koo, Chinese Envoy, Arriving Here for Parley

Douglas Fairbanks Also Among Aquitania Passengers—6 Ships Leave

Dr. Vi Kuyuin Wellington Koo, Chinese Minister to Paris and former Minister to Washngton, s arrvng today on the Cunarder Aquitania for economic and political talks with President Roosevelt.

Besides Dr. Koo on the Aquitania, passengers include Helena Rubinstein, beauty specialist; Douglas Fairbanks, moving picture star, and Capt. Harold Farquhar, secretary to the British Embassy in Mexico City.

Six transatlantic ships are leaving port for Europe today, including the American Merchant liner American Farmer, the White Star liner Majestic, the Red Star liner Westernland, the White Star liner Britannic, the Holland-America liner Volendam and the Cunarder Franconia.

Outgoing passengers on the Majestic include Sir Frederick Leith-Ross, Deputy Controller of Finance in England; Sir William Letts, English automobile executive; Philip Lehman, New York banker, and Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, orchestral conductor.

Norman Rowe, public utilities executive, is among the passengers sailing today for Valparaiso on the Grace liner Santa Maria.

New York Herald-Tribune

MAY 6 - 1933

Koussevitsky Departs For Concerts in London

Conductor Will Proceed to Vienna, Bad Gastein, Austria

Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky for Europe yesterday aboard the White Star liner Majestic. Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct concerts in Queen's Hall, London, on May 17, 18 and 19, in the first May Festival in London since the World War. Later he will go to Vienna and Bad Gatein, in Austria, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, and Leopold Stokowski, director of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

Viscountess Furness, the former Thelma Morgan, a sister of Mrs. Reginald C. Vanderbilt, also sailed on the Majestic. Mrs. Vanderbilt and A. C. Blumenthal were at the pier to bid her good-bye.

Herald May 6

KOUSSEVITZKY SAILS FOR LONDON CONCERT

NEW YORK, May 5 (AP)—Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed for Enrope today to conduct the first May festival in London since the world war. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

From London he will go to Vienna and thence to Bad Gustine, where he will be joined by Ossip Gabrilowitch and Leopold Stokowski, conductors of the Detroit and Philadelphia orchestras.

THIS CLIPPING

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 5 - 1933

Boston Symphony Dates Announced By Van Sinderen

Dates for the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, were announced yesterday by Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The announcement of the series came with the inauguration of a special campaign to rally to the support of the Boston Symphony following the passing of the New York Philharmonic Sunday afternoon concerts in Brooklyn.

An enlarged committee for the concerts has been formed and will hold its first meeting at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Monday.

Under the chairmanship of Mrs. William H. Good an active executive committee has been formed. The committee includes:

Frank L. Babbott
Edward C. Blum
Mrs. E. C. Blum
Mrs. B. D. Bromley
Mrs. Otis S. Carroll
Frederick E. Crane
Mrs. F. L. Cranford
Walter H. Crittenden
Dr. John H. Denbigh
Mrs. Mary C. Draper
Mrs. W. P. Earle Jr.
Sumner Ford
Mrs. L. W. Francis
Mrs. Charles Franklin
Henry A. Ingraham
Miss D. R. Johnson
Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr.
Miss Irene Miles
Mrs. C. E. Potts
Mrs. F. B. Pratt
Robert A. Shaw
Mrs. Walter Truslow
Mrs J. P. Warbasse
George A. Wingate

The five concerts next season will be given on Friday, Nov. 17; Friday, Jan. 5; Thursday, Feb. 1; Friday, March 2, and Friday, April 6.

N. Y. World-Telegram

MAY 6 - 1933

Popularity of Brahms Close to Wagner Now

Centenary of Composer's Birth Finds His Works Featured Everywhere Today.

By PITTS SANBORN.

IN this year of anniversaries we are now observing the centenary of the birth of Brahms, which occurred on May 7, 1833, at Hamburg. He died at Vienna on April 3, 1897. Although he had won substantial recognition as a composer some decades before his death, there were still doubters and flouters in the eighteen-eighties and nineties. For instance, the wittiest man in Boston alleged that the red lights in the old Music Hall meant "Exit in case of Brahms," and critics of such prominence as Runciman in London and Finck in New York steadily refused to turn Brahmin.

If Brahms were alive today, however, he would have gratifying evidence of the world-swing in his direction. Take the statistics of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony's recent season. Brahms was more played than any other composer except Wagner, who is a perennial headliner of orchestral concerts as well as of opera, and Beethoven, whom the Philharmonic-Symphony treated to a special cycle.

We find Brahms represented by all four of his symphonies, both of his piano concertos, his violin concerto, the "Variations on a Theme of Haydn," the "Tragic" overture, and the less familiar rhapsody for alto solo, male chorus and orchestra.

* * *

In Boston, Too.

TURNING to Boston (though not its old Music Hall!), we find the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoting the last five days of April to a Brahms Festival, enlisting the additional services of choirs and soloists.

Works on the Boston programs that were not heard at our Philharmonic - Symphony concerts included the double concerto for violin and 'cello, the "Academic Festival" overture and "A German Requiem" (in abeyance here since the lamented demise of the Friends of Music), besides a program of songs and chamber music—the clarinet quintet, five Lieder for soprano, the "Liebeslieder Waltzes" for piano duet and four vocal parts, and the piano quartet in G minor.

* * *

Firm Favorite Now.

BRAHMS is now as solidly established in the musical pantheon as Beethoven himself, and the Brahms symphonies, once regarded as austere and forbidding, stand second only to those of Beethoven in general favor and frequency of performance, Eduard Hanslick, the Viennese critic, who in 1867 proclaimed himself an apostle of Brahms, had much to do with fortifying the reputation of the new symphonist, and so had Hans von Buelow in his capacities of conductor and epigrammatist.

It was he who bracketed Brahms with Bach and Beethoven as one of the "three great B's" of music and who spoke of Brahms' first symphony as the "tenth symphony." This latter remark has led the unwary to suppose that Buelow meant Brahms was going ahead from the point where Beethoven had left off. In other words, that the first of Brahms was a higher summit of achievement than the ninth of Beethoven.

2

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

MAY 5 1933

Symphony Readjustments . . .

Writes William J. Henderson in the New York Sun:

It is evident that orchestral concerts will have to be supported by the general public in some way, because the few wealthy men who backed them can not longer do so. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a list of guarantors filling several pages of its program book. That looks like a possible solution of the problem. Many persons contributing moderate amounts must take the places of the few giving large sums.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

①

MAY 6 - 1933

Koussevitsky To Lead Symphonies Abroad

New York, May 5 (AP) — Sergei Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for Europe today to conduct the first May festival in London since the World War. He was accompanied by Mrs. Koussevitsky.

Page Four

Fiedler

In This Way A Conductor May Be Made

From the Many-Sided Past Into the Full Present Of Arthur Fiedler

Trans.—May 6

WHEN King Alcohol, the year that the war was ended, toppled, together with a number of other potentates, off his throne, many were the strange prognostications that ran throughout the land. Even the prophets of music, a hardy tribe, lost their balance, grew Volsteady, and sang predictions. "What will become of the producers of musical comedy?" they asked. In the good old days. the gentlemen of the orchestra (those who had purchased tickets, not those who played the instruments) came to the theater with a comfortable cargo beneath their belts. Their mood was one of acceptance; almost anything, within reason, would seem good, even if it were not. Now, you can't please a sober audience as easily as you can one that is slightly alcoholized. Musical comedy would have to get really good, or it would go. And lo, hardly had the critics spoken, and with them the commercial wisdom of Broadway, than gradually the musical comedy began to improve. Jerome Kern's "Show Boat" and Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," not forgetting the respective contributions of the gentlemen who provided the stories and the words, belong to the Prohibition Era.

Alas for prophets. For prohibition era and non-consumption of alcohol are not synonymous. And though the repressive hand of Volstead weighed upon the land, who would venture to say that it was a thoroughly sober audience that came to the theater during the past fourteen years? Who would deny that, among our gentlemen of the orchestra, both such as pay for their seats and such as play the instruments, floated much contraband spirit? To all intents and purposes, during the era of its improvement our musical play has been playing to drinkers of cups that both cheer and inebriate. And those drinkers have not been only men. Can it be that alcohol had no more to do with the case than those fragrant flowers of the spring?

One thought these thoughts particularly on Wednesday afternoon, with the opening of The Pops, under Arthur Fiedler, but a few hours away. Beer was coming back. What would it do to The Pops, which so long had missed it? Would it determine a change in the type of patron? Would it cause an alteration in the type of program? Would it, somehow, in some subtle way, affect the atmosphere of the cherished institution? Would the old waiters, fat and forty, ruddy and rotund, towels slung across their elbows, mustachios gracefully curving like handlebars, return with the unsluiced cataract of beaded beverage?

The waiters, let it hurriedly be added, are still feminine, and most of them, if still a little inexpert in the handling of the brew, neither fat nor forty. One fears that on the first night of Mr. Fiedler and his company of virtuosi the flow of beer more than matched the flow of melody. One fears, too, that the sales of Pop punch declined worse than the birthrate of France, as thrice repeated by a certain ambassador now nightly reporting this sad circumstance to theatergoers of Boston. Certainly the returned beer induced a geniality of spirit that augured well for patronage. And it is not at all unlikely that this new condition will introduce changes, minor rather than major.

Mr. Fiedler, questioned on the day after, during an interview that first raced through the streets in his open car—he is, you must know, a devotee of the fresh air, and drives thus exposed not only in the warm weather but right through the year—and again was resumed in his apartment overlooking Memorial Drive, wondered audibly as to the situation. He has been intending to do much symphonic work during the season, especially on Sunday evenings. How patiently can a beer-drinking audience listen to music that requires concentration for more than a half -hour? Does, let us say, a symphony by César Franck go with 3.2 half as well as Zwei Herzen in ¾ time?

Again, and naturally, there will be a return to drinking songs, as the universal singing of the Stein Song prefigured on Wednesday evening. And we shall, the more abstemious of us, again be drinking to each other only with our eyes. That, too, may be intoxicating. Perhaps there will be a more generous reversion to the waltz. All these things, of course, occurred to Mr. Fiedler as soon as the era of beer was in sight. On the matter of symphonic music he was non-commital. After all, he wants the audiences to enjoy themselves, and wouldn't dream of serving as a pedantic kill-joy. On the other hand—it is the interviewer rather than Mr. Fiedler speaking now—it would be a pity if the temper of the times frowned upon the more ambitious type of piece. One somehow doubts that this will happen. It is simple enough, if one wants one's beer, to order it in time for delivery before the main feature of the program, or after.

One effect the new dispensation seems to have had already—that of bringing back to the Pops patrons who have remained away for many a year. These are of the older type, who missed stimulating beverage during the Volstead interregnum. Well, Prosit! And that will be all for beer today.

Mr. Fiedler, every summer, has his handful of novelties. He spoke enthusiastically of several already scheduled. There will be, for instance, Weprik's "Songs and Dances of the Ghetto"; a Concerto Grosso by Russell Bennett, who is a composer in his own right as well as this country's most brilliant orchestrator for our leaders in musical comedy; a suite from Strauss's ballet, "Whipped Cream"; another from Korivgold's incidental music to "Much Ado About Nothing," Telemann's "Tafel-Musik"; perhaps, too, a symphonic arrangement of Ferdie Grofé's "Tabloid," said to be a brilliant achievement, from the hand of Erno Rappée, and selections from the "African Suite" of William Grant Still, the Negro composer.

ment, from the hand of Erno Rappée, and selections from the "African Suite" of William Grant Still, the Negro composer.

Jazz? "I believe," said Mr. Fiedler, "that jazz is on the wane. Oh, it's still fine for dancing—wonderful, in fact. But the experience of Whiteman's band shows that its appeal has passed the peak. Of course, these matters act like a pendulum. There is a swing in one direction, then a swing directly in the opposite. At the moment it looks as if the classics were again in the ascendant. You see, the jazz writers were trying to get too symphonic, and the symphonic writers were trying to get too jazzy. . . . As for the modernists, most of them likewise seem to have quieted down. You hear them speak of going back to the lyrical and the melodic. At the same time, the modernist writers serve a valuable purpose. They are experimenters in a laboratory. They are forerunners, who, when the great man eventually grows out of their movement, are forgotten. We see and hear, today, only Wagner, only Beethoven. We forget that many composers labored humbly in their day to create the atmosphere and the innovations out of which Beethoven and Wagner arose.

Mr. Fiedler is on the sunny side of forty, having been born in Boston in 1894. His father, Emanuel, was for twenty-five years with the Symphony. He was one

Continued on Following Page

190

In This Way A Conductor May Be Made

Trans—May 6

Continued from Preceding Page

of the original members of the famous Kneisel Quartet. One of the things Arthur sincerely regrets is the strange circumstance that he cannot look back to any musical beginnings. Music was with him from the cradle. It is hard for him to say "I heard such and such a piece for the first time at such and such a place, or on such a day." He was always hearing pieces. For that matter, young Fiedler was by no means passionately interested in music. He attended our Latin School, and was headed for college, when his father decided to return to Vienna. At fifteen, Mr. Fiedler found himself in Europe, with the problem of a future to solve.

Music? It never occurred to him. He had been taught to play the violin and the piano, but they did not excite him. He had private tutoring, and by now the prospect of college was mildly terrifying. It meant the loss of a certain liberty that was precious to a roving, healthy youngster. Business? That was more promising. But when he got a place in the Vanity Fair office, in Berlin and found himself running errands, pasting stamps and filing letters, he discovered that other places than college could be dull. His father suggested music. It was, at any rate, a way out, and music it became. Young Fiedler entered the Royal Academy—a difficult place to get into, by the way, as each teacher was limited to ten pupils, and vacancies were filled only as pupils were graduated.

Here the studies included violin, theory, piano and conducting. The teachers of conducting, for Fiedler, were Kraffel and Rudolf Krasselt. Krasselt will be recalled by some as a first violoncellist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a year. "Did I ever compose any music?" Mr. Fiedler mused, in answer to that selfsame question. "Yes. . . . But I must ask credit for recognizing that my music was no good, and for having the sense to keep it to myself. It is important to know one's limitations. The experience, naturally, is of value. One gets a closer response to the materials and methods of music, and to the work that really gifted composers produce."

When had he first conducted an orchestra? At the age of seventeen, in Berlin. Later there were a couple of engagements as a third or fourth conductor in various German opera houses. Then came the war. It was on the urgent advice of Ambassador Gerard that Arthur Fiedler and his fellow-student, Albert Stoessel, left Berlin. This happened fast upon the sinking of the Lusitania.

Arriving here, Fiedler was engaged as second-violinist in the orchestra that he now directs during the summer. Almost at once he was drafted, and entrained to Camp Devens. He was honorably discharged. It was the war, really, that awakened him. It made him conscious of a purpose, a high interest. Now, at last, he knew that music was to be his lifework, and that part of this lifework would be the conducting of orchestras.

For five years there was a deal of intensive labor. And then came the year that, in Mr. Fiedler's career, must be printed in red numerals: 1924. It was then, or thereabouts, that all his various ambitions and potentialities seemed to concentrate on multiple fulfilment. In order to satisfy his design to conduct he organized the Boston Sinfonietta. In the playhouse we had had our Little Theaters. This would be a Little Symphony. . . .

Dr. Koussevitzky was very encouraging when he heard the first concert of the Sinfonietta. Here, it seemed to him, was a boon for those small communities that could not afford to hire the full complement of a modern symphonic band. . . . Then, against big odds, came the project of the Esplanade Concerts. "Fiedler's pipe dream," it was called, by sympathetic but incredulous friends. "Why," they told the ambitious young conductor, "that spot will become a fighting field between the North and the West Ends. You'll get a mob of sailors and their sweethearts, chewing gum all over the lot and eating peanuts." Maybe it wasn't hard to get that first $15,000. And maybe, again, it wasn't a pretty shaky baton that Mr. Fiedler wielded on the first night. The audience was in-between. It took a few nights for the venture to strike its real stride.

The audience? "The best-behaved audience in the world," declares Fiedler. For the essential musicality of the American audience in general he has words of high praise. Consider, he will tell you, that they come for the music alone. There is no beer, as abroad, to make it an open-air drinking party. There are no tables, to make it a congenial pastime. As for fighting grounds, here's an interesting commentary upon that prediction: in the four years that the concerts have been running, not a single arrest has been made on the grounds—not a single pocket has been picked in all those night crowds. The four series have run, respectively, six weeks, five, and two of four weeks. More statistics: during all those evenings—"talk about California weather," interjects Mr. Fiedler, proud of our Eastern skies—only four nights have been lost because of rain. "Fiedler's luck," say the men.

Almost coincident with the Esplanade concerts came Fiedler's appointments as conductor of the Cecilia Society, and of the McDowell Club Orchestra. His first opportunity to lead The Pops arrived during the trouble that wound up Mr. Jacchia's stay; the last night was entrusted to the fellow-player with the men. At the close of that season, Fiedler, having relished the experience, and no conductor having been appointed to take Jacchia's place, put in a bid for the position. It was a close race between Signor Casella and the local man; the distinguished Italian won the appointment.

These were difficult years for The Pops. Conditions were becoming increasingly bad; the depression, at that time only a slump, had begun. Pop receipts, Pop patronage, sank, like stocks, to a new low. Whereupon, at the end of Casella's term, Fiedler received at last the coveted opportunity. The rest is recent and local history. This season The Pops promise to be restored to old records. Is it beer? Is it new audiences? Is it the livelier programs? And something of "Fiedler's luck"? Whatever it may be, there it is. . . . The Esplanade—Mr. Fielder's thoughts do not stray long from this pet child, of which he is naturally and justifiably proud—acts as a feeder for The Pops; The Pops act as feeder for the Symphony. One of these nights, at the Esplanade concerts, you're likely to hear a full symphony, not merely an excerpt. You're likely also to hear of a new, democratic plan for the maintenance of this unique summer attraction. For Mr. Fiedler has a mind for the details of business.

Conducting, he holds, when you get him off the Esplanade for a moment, is a natural knack rather than a study. (Only a few days before Mr. F. J. McCormick of the Abbey Players was holding forth in much the same way about acting.) "All that can be told about conducting," says Fielder, "in distinction from what one has to learn about it from actual experience, can be told in about five minutes. It's like dancing, let us say. There are some persons, otherwise highly gifted, who simply can't fall into the rhythm of a step. Just so there are admirable musicians who simply cannot handle the conductor's stick. Among these, in fact, are certain well-known directors. Somehow, a necessary co-ordination between mind and baton fails to occur. On the other hand, some ordinary musicians make excellent leaders; that co-ordination takes place. As for improvement, it is my feeling that all conductors improve. How can they help it with an orchestra upon whom they are ever playing and from whom they are constantly learning?"

Fiedler improves his leisure by much globe-trotting; he has been all over Europe and northern Africa. He is to be seen on horseback, or on frequent tramping expeditions. Every day he does a five-mile jaunt around the Esplanade,—a great place to walk as well as conduct. He even likes to take his Sinfonietta on long jaunts, as witness what he called the "gipsying á la mode" of last summer, when they toured Pennsylvania and Virginia, appearing chiefly before State teachers' colleges. The teachers must have liked it, too, for they suggested return engagements for this September. There is also what might be called an inter-Esplanade series, al fresco, on the North Shore, played on off-Sundays. Verily, music in the air.

ISAAC GOLDBERG

At The Pops Tonight

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture to the Hindu Play, "Sakountala"	Goldmark
Perpetuum Mobile	J. Strauss
Fantasia on the Opera, "Rigoletto"	Verdi
Irish Rhapsody	Herbert
Gypsy Dance	Nachez
Overture, "The Year 1812"	Chaikovsky
Waltzes, "Grubenlichter"	Zeller
Selection from the Musical Play, "The New Moon"	Romberg
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever"	Sousa

Conductor: A. Fiedler

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

(3)

MAY 6 1933

Miss Ruth Hartwell, Somerville, formerly of Haverhill, is a member of the Radcliffe Choral society and sang with that group at the Brahms Festival program of the Boston Symphony, when the Harvard Glee ~~club also~~ sang in Symphony hall Sunday, April 30. Miss Hartwell will present her Haverhill piano pupils in a recital in this city early in June.

BOSTON EVENING

and Con

Concert-Crier

Trans May 6

Next Week

The Pops—The incidents of next week at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall are the reappearance of Hans Wiener with his ensemble of dancers, and the return of Mr. Sanromá as pianist in high favor. The addition of stage-dances to the Pops pleased a considerable public last season. They bid fair to do as much this spring, since Mr. Wiener's troupe is now of better quality. He and it will be seen on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings from ten o'clock onwards. The stage will be cleared; Mr. Fiedler and a sufficient orchestra will take post below. The Wiener troupe will then traverse three dances. On Tuesday and Thursday: "The Bride for Barter"; "Circus"; "Persian Ballet." On Wednesday: "March in Formal Style"; "Golliwog's Cake Walk"; "The Foolish Virgin." . . . Mr. Sanromá will reappear on Monday evening, playing—inevitably—the piano-part in Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." On Sunday evening, May 14, he will be heard again in a number yet to be chosen. It may be Mr. Gershwin's Concerto in F major, in which he excelled a year ago.

For the rest Mr. Fiedler has assorted his programs from the familiar repertory of The Pops, adding here and there freshening pieces. On Tuesday the list includes five of Mozart's "German Dances," written toward the close of his life for the court-balls in Vienna. . . . On Thursday, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," usually reserved for graver occasions, has place. . . . On Friday, choruses by the Orphean Club will diversify the program. . . . On Saturday, a series of excerpts from Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger," will be heard. Dukas's amusing Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," will also retu

---

HOW BOSTON ENJOYED FIRST "POPS" CONCERT

Meriden Record May 6

The first of the always popular "Pops" concerts in Symphony hall in Boston Wednesday night proved a great success musically—and otherwise—as shown by the Transcript's "Review" which follows:

But it was obvious from the start that other attractions as well as music had brought the company together. Even before Mr. Fiedler's appearance folks were casting eager glances over the pages headed: "To Nibble," "To Smoke," "To Eat,"—ah! here we are!—"To Drink!" The list was short and happy. For the convenience of future historians, who may inquire into the sumptuary habits of Bostonians, A. D. 1933, it may be reprinted here. It began with Schiltz and Pabst, added Budweiser, made room for Walsheimer from Germany, returned to Roxbury and Pickwick, crossed the border for Black Horse, and wound up with Bass's Dog's Head from Burton-on-the-Trent. A sufficiently varied selection, surely, for those conservative New Englanders who are content with a good, safe, four per cent. And the card added, for those who are willing to rob the grape of much that Nature has put in it, two "Burgundies" and a "Claret." For the rest there were listed three varieties of lemonade, three ginger ales, mineral waters, fresh grape juice, coffee, tea, and the traditional, blameless Pop punch.

It was not the Pop punch, however, which led the audience last evening to cheer, stamp its feet in the sawdust, and join in communal song. To be sure, the stamping was no more than a polite rumble. A Ninth Symphony has been similarly rewarded on a Saturday evening in winter. And the cheering was restrained—patriotic rather than bibulous, a fitting response to Secretary Woodin's "F. D. Roosevelt" March, tucked in by way of eincore by the canny Mr. Fiedler, who knows when to spring a surprise.

Beer aside, it was an evening for good music and decorous behavior. Glasses and bottles rattled no more noisily than in the days when they contained mere carbonates and benzoates of soda, acetic acid, sulphur dioxide, artificial fruit coloring, glucose and similar alternatives for alcohol.

Mr. Fiedler's happiest selections last evening were not those listed on the program. They were the supernumerary fragments which he inserted as encores. A "Slavonic Dance" from Dvorak was conventional enough addendum. Mr. Woodin's thumping marchpast was of another stripe. So was "Wintergreen for President"—rapturously applauded and repeated. So was the waltz from Heymann's score for "Kongress Tanzt"—a certain addition to the season's list of approved encores. And so, above all, were those brown October measures from Hovey and another hey-day. They turned the clock back fourteen years, and he would be a curmudgeon who denied that we all felt at least that much younger last evening.

D. W. B.

Fewer Auto Fatalitie

Pops, Hops, and Communal Song

Mr. Fiedler's Audience Becomes Vocal at Last — Sawdust and Decorum

THE forty-eighth season of Pop Concerts lost no time in getting under way at Symphony Hall last evening. Punct at eight-thirty-five—after the conventional five minutes' grace for late comers—Mr. Fiedler mounted his podium. The orchestra was as numerous as the platform would hold; large enough to have compassed the most pretentious score of Strauss—Richard, not Johann. Mr. Theodorowicz had assumed his summer post as kapellmeister. Other first-desk players were still on hand. The hall—transformed from its winter dress of dull red and gray into a dazzling green-and-gold biergarten—was filled, or rapidly filling. The applause was sharp and brief. A couple of bows, and Mr. Fiedler's baton cut in on the Emperor March. The field was off!

But it was obvious from the start that other attractions as well as music had brought the company together. Even before Mr. Fiedler's appearance folks were casting eager glances ,over the pages headed: "To Nibble," "To Smoke," "To, Eat,"—ah! here we are!—"To Drink!" The list was short and hoppy. For the convenience of future historians, who may inquire into the sumptuary habits of Bostonians, A. D. 1933, it may be reprinted here. It began with Schlitz and Pabst, added Budweiser, made room for Walsheimer from Germany, returned to Roxbury and Pickwick, crossed the border for Black Horse, and wound up with Bass's Dog's Head from Burton-on-the-Trent. A sufficiently varied selection, surely, for those conservative New Englanders who are content with a good, safe, four per cent. And the card added, for those who are willing to rob the grape of much that Nature has put in it, two "Burgundies" and a "Claret." For the rest there were listed three varieties of lemonade, three ginger ales, mineral waters, fresh grape juice, coffee, tea, and the traditional, blameless Pop punch.

It was not the Pop punch, however, which led the audience last evening to cheer, stamp its feet in the sawdust, and join in communal song. To be sure, the stamping was no more than a polite rumble. A Ninth Symphony has been similarly rewarded on a Saturday evening in winter. And the cheering was restrained—patriotic rather than bibulous, a fitting response to Secretary Woodin's "F. D. Roosevelt" March, tucked in by way of encore by the canny Mr. Fiedler, who knows when to spring a surprise. But about the song one cannot be so sure. Barring "special" nights, under the guidance of "song leaders," it is hard to recall a Pop Concert audience that really burst into music. They did last evening, and they admired their own vocal efforts so much that Mr. Fiedler—after a hasty conference of glances and shrugs with Mr. Theodorowicz—was forced to prolong an already long program by a further repetition. The occasion of this unprecedented ebullience was that half-forgotten ballad about a stein on the table. Despite the fact that the Pops management dispenses only bottled goods, and serves that in glasses, the stein-song got the best hand of the evening. So far has a benevolent Congress persuaded us in Boston to cast aside our legendary reticence!

Beer aside, it was an evening for good music and decorous behavior. Glasses and bottles rattled no more noisily than in the days when they contained mere carbonates and benzoates of soda, acetic acid, sulphur dioxide, artificial fruit coloring, glucose and similar alternatives for alcohol. Conversation was not so loud nor so general as to be obtrusive. The house was reasonably quiet for the slumber song from "Haensel und Gretel." It gave Mr. Gershwin's "Cuban Overture" a polite hearing and rather better than polite applause. It heard the first bars of the ineluctable "Bolero" in almost absolute silence. And as for the gypsy dance from Bizet's "Carmen" and the sensuous transitions of Strauss's "Wine, Woman and Song"—well, it is doubtful if either composer expected that his work would be mistaken for "Parsifal." And it is true that last evening's audience was in no mood for unwarranted solemnity.

Mr. Fiedler's happiest selections last evening were not those listed on the program. They were the supernumerary fragments which he inserted as encores. A "Slavonic Dance" from Dvorak was conventional enough addendum. Mr. Woodin's thumping marchpast was of another stripe. So was "Wintergreen for President"—rapturously applauded and repeated. So was the waltz from Heymann's score for "Kongress Tanzt"—a certain addition to the season's list of approved encores. And so, above all, were those brown October mea res from Hovey and another hey-day. T. turned the clock back fourteen year and he would be a curmudgeon who denied that we all felt at least that much younger last evening.

D. W. B.

—Japan has put another motor vehicle

191

Dancers to Join the Pops Programme for Three

P.S. May 7

The week begins tomorrow evening with Jesus Maria Sanroma playing Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" with the Pops orchestra, and with Mr. Fiedler presenting on the programme Sousa's Washington Post March; the Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus"; Rubinstein's "Reve Angelique"; a fantasia on Puccini's "Madame Butterfly"; two Wagnerian excerpts, the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" and The Ride of the Valkyries; a selection from Kern's "Music in the Air"; "Roses From the South" for the Strauss Waltz; and Skilton's Indian War Dance for conclusion.

* * * *

Tuesday evening, as on Wednesday and Thursday, Hans Weiner and a dance group will contribute the final section of the evening's programme. Tuesday night, with Otto Ashermann and a group of 26, he will present Korngold's "The Bride for Barter"; the "Circus," to music of Fucik, that was one of his successes of last season; and a Persian Ballet to the Polovetskian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." Preceding this visual presentation, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will be heard in other music of the dance: the Procession of Bacchus from Delibes' ballet "Sylvia"; five German Dances of Mozart; the Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah"; and the suite from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," that includes the Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and the Ballet of the Sylphs as well as the Rakoczy March.

* * * *

Wednesday evening's programme will open with Schubert's Marche Militaire, to be followed by Nicolai's Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," the "Goyescas" of Granados, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, Strauss' "Beautiful Blue Danube," the Londonderry Air as arranged for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty, and the Overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." Then Mr. Wiener and his group will mime the "March in Formal Style" of Fiona McCleary, a composer of New England; the Golliwog's Cakewalk of Debussy; and a ballet, "The Foolish Virgin," based on two Slavonian Dances of Dvorak.

* * * *

The wedding March from Rimsky-Korsov's "Coq d'Or" is the first number set for Thursday evening's programme. After it will come the Overture to Thomas, "Mignon"; the Berceuse of Jaernefelt; a fantasia on Verdi's "Aida"; Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana"; Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; and Liszt's "Les Preludes"; while Mr. Wiener and his dance group will offer a repetition of their programme of Tuesday evening: "The Bride for Barter" of Korngold, "Circus" to music of Fucik, and the Persian Ballet to music of Borodin.

* * * *

George Sawyer Dunham will conduct the Orphean Club in three numbers on Friday evening: Handel's "O, Lovely Peace," Brahm's "Love Will Find the Way" and Kodaly's "See the Gypsy Munching Cheese." Before these songs Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will present the Polonaise from Tchaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," the Overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" and a suite from "Carmen," while after them will come the "Forest Murmurs" from Wagner's "Siegfried"; the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt; Fourdrain's "Carnaval"; a selection from Kern's "The Cat and the Fiddle"; Strauss' waltz, "Artist's Life," and that favorite excerpt from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," "Wintergreen for President."

Saturday evening's programme has for opening number the Triumphal March from Verdi's "Aida," with Flotow's "Stradella" Overture and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" to follow it. Then will come various excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger"; Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Schubert's Ave Maria in Wilhelmj's arrangement; Tchaikowsky's Slavic March; a selection from Luder's 'The Prince of Pilsen"; the old Dutch hymn arranged by Kresmer entitled "Prayer of Thanksgiving"; and finally Meacham's stirring "American Patrol."

Hans Wiener and a member of his dancing group, to be seen at the Pops Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week.

NEXT SUNDAY'S POP CONCERT

A week from this evening will come the first of the season's Sunday evening Pop Concerts, thereafter to follow on alternate weeks. At this one a week hence, Mr. Sanroma will be the soloist in Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F.

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe May 7

Second Week of Pops

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter a second week tomorrow night. Arthur Fiedler, conducting an orchestra of 85 Symphony players, presents varied programs, while the Pops audiences, gathered about tables, combine sociability with music while refreshments are served.

This week's specialties include the appearance of Jesus Maria Sanroma in the "Rhapsody in Blue" tomorrow, and the appearance on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of Hans Wiener and Otto Ashermann with their group of 26 dancers.

The programs follow:

Monday Evening, May 8—"Washington Post," march, Sousa; "Orpheus," overture, Offenbach; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; "Madame Butterfly," Fantasia, Puccini; "Tristan and Isolde," "Prelude and Love-Death," "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "Rhapsody in Blue," piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Roses from the South," waltz, Strauss; Indian War Dance, Skilton.

Tuesday, May 9, Dance Program—"Procession of Bacchus, from the Ballet, "Sylvia," Delibes; Five German Dances, Mozart; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "The Demnation of Faust," Suite, Berlioz; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss; Tambourin, Rameau-Mottl; Bolero, Ravel.

Hans Wiener with Otto Ashermann and group of 26 dancers: "The Bride for Barter," Korngold; "Circus," Fucik; "Persian Ballet," Borodin.

Wednesday, May 10—"Marche Militaire," Schubert; "The Merry Wives of Windsor," overture, Nicolai; "Goyescas," intermezzo, Granados; "Peer Gynt," suite, Greig; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Londonderry Air," arranged for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty; "Tannhauser," overture, Wagner. With Hans Wiener and Dance Group—"March in Formal Style," McCleary; "Golliwog's Cake Walk," Debussy; "The Foolish Virgin," Dvorak.

Thursday, May 11—Wedding march from "Le Coq d'Or," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; Berceuse, Jarnefelt; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Les Preludes," symphonic poem No. 3, Liszt. With Hans Weiner Dance Group—"The Bride for Barter," Korngold; "Circus," Fucik; "Persian Ballet," Borodin.

Friday, May 12. Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; "Der Freischutz," Overture, Weber; "Carmen," Suite, Bizet; Songs by the Orphean Club, George Sawyer Dunham, conductor: "O, Lovely Peace," Handel; "Love Will Find the Way," Brahms; "See the Gypsy Munching Cheese," Kodaly; "Siegfried," "Forest Murmurs," Wagner; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Carnaval," Fourdrain; "The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection, Kern; "Artist's Life," Waltz, Strauss; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Saturday, May 13. Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi; "Stradella," Overture, Flotow; Liebesfreud, Kreisler; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Excerpts, Wagner; "The Sorceror's Apprentice," Scherzo, Dukas; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "The Prince of Pilsen," Selection, Luders; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," (Old Dutch Hymn), arranged by Kremserr; "American Patrol," Meacham.

SHUBERT—LAST W

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNE

Players --- Music and Musicia

Women Have a Way with Them

May 10

(Dana—Boston)

The Wiener Ensemble Dancing in "Bride for Barter" at The Pops

1933

SECOND WEEK OF THE POPS

Her. May 7

The Pop Concerts in Symphony hall will begin the second week of their 48th season tomorrow night. Arthur Fiedler, conducting an orchestra of 85 Symphony players, presents varied programs while the audiences, gathered about tables, combine sociability with music while refreshments are served.

This week's specialties will include the appearance of Jesus Maria Sanroma in the "Rhapsody in Blue" tomorrow, and the appearance with the Pops orchestra on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of Hans Wiener and Otto Ashermann with their group of 26 dancers. The first Sunday concert will be a week from tonight.

HANS WIENER

Who with his dance group will be an added feature of the Pops programs Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings.

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 8

Washington Post, March .... Sousa
"Orpheus," Overture .... Offenbach
Reve Angelique .... Rubenstein
Madame Butterfly, Fantasia .... Puccini
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death .... Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Music in the Air," Selection .... Kern
"Roses from the South," Waltz .... Strauss
Indian War Dance .... Skilton

TUESDAY EVENING

Procession of Bacchus, from the Ballet, "Sylvia" .... Delibes
Five German Dances .... Mozart
Im Lander Tempo—Moderato—The Canary—The Hurdy Gurdy—The Sleigh Ride
Bacchanale, "Simon and Delilah" .. Saint-Saens
"The Damnation of Faust," Suite ... Berlioz
Menuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps
Ballet of the Sylphs Rakoczy March
Tales from the Vienna Woods .... Strauss
Tambourin .... Rameau-Mottl
Bolero .... Ravel

Hans Wiener Dancers

The Bride for Barter .... Korngold
Circus .... Fucik
Persian Ballet .... Borodin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
"The Merry Wives of Windsor," Overture .... Nicolai
"Goyescas," Intermezzo .... Granados
"Peer Gynt," Suite .... Grieg
Morning Mood Anitra's Dance
In the Hall of the Troll King
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
"Londonderry Air"
Arranged for String Orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty
"Tannhauser," Overture .... Wagner

Hans Weiner Dancers

March in Formal Style .... McCleary
Golliwog's Cake Walk .... Debussy
The Foolish Virgin .... Dvorak

THURSDAY EVENING

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Mignon," overture .... Thomas
Berceuse .... Jarnefelt
"Aida," fantasia .... Verdi
"Espana," rhapsody .... Chabrier
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" .... Debussy
"Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3 . Liszt

Hans Weiner Dancers

The Bride for Barter .... Korngold
Circus .... Fucik
Persian Ballet .... Borodin

FRIDAY EVENING

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" . Tchaikovsky
"Der Freischutz," Overture .... Weber
"Carmen," Suite .... Bizet
Songs by the Orphean Club (George Sawyer Dunham, conductor).
(a) O, Lovely Peace .... Handel
(b) Love Will Find the Way .... Brahms
(c) See the Gypsy Munching Cheese .. Kodaly
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection .... Kern
"Artist's Life," waltz .... Strauss
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING

Triumphal March from "Aida" .... Verdi
"Stradella," overture .... Flotow
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts .... Wagner
Entrance of the Meistersinger—Am Stillen Herd—Dance of the Apprentices—Entrance of the Guilds—Prize Song—Greeting to Hans Sachs—Finale.
"The Sorceror's Apprentice," scherzo .. Dukas
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"The Prince of Pilsen," selection .... Luders
"Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
American Patrol .... Meacham

Post

DNESDAY, MAY 10, 1

DANCERS AT POPS MAKE MARKED HIT

Hans Wiener Group Presents Persian Ballet

BY GEORGE BRINTON BEAL

Not since the days of Daglieff's never-to-be-forgotten Ballet Russe has a Boston audience been treated to such a wealth of the musician and the dancer's art combined as that offered last evening in Symphony Hall, by the introduction of Hans Wiener and his Dancing Group into the Pops regular programme.

PERSIAN BALLET

And not in memory has an oriental ballet dance drama been done here to such beautiful musical accompaniment. The climax came in the presentation of "The Persian Ballet" from "Prince Igoe" by Borodin, bringing the combined programme to a conclusion. Here the grandeur of music and the glory of music were wonderfully wed.

Beauty of color, beauty of rhythm, costumes and mimetic characterizations flowed across that vast stage with true magnificence. It was a revelation to discover what a really fine orchestra, full toned and skilfully directed as this one is by Arthur Fiedler, can do as a help to the dancer's mimetic ability.

Barbaric in design and in coloring, fascinating with a curious old world fascination that words fail utterly to explain, this Persian ballet touched high points of magnificence. Mr. Wiener and his group are to be congratulated. It was beautifully staged, its movement was true, its course even flowing, its tempo flawless. And the playing of the orchestra wove a magic-charm about it all.

Fantastic Fairyland

That stage became a fairyland of the fantastic, where legendary figures moved in seeming life, where a story of primitive passion flamed in color and rhythmic power. Here was beauty, harmony realized both to the ear and to the eye.

The dancing, which will be repeated, with a varied programme, tonight and tomorrow night, follows the second intermission of the regular Pops concert programme. The orchestra moves to the floor of the hall and the stage is given over to the dancers. The divertisments last evening were "The Bride for Barter," from Korngold's work of that title, followed by an encore, "March in Formal Style," then Wiener's already justly famous "Circus," which as usual demanded and received an encore—it is one of the finest bits of pantomimic comedy dancing of recent years, incidentally—and then the magnificent Persian Ballet from the opera "Prince Igor." All were well received and finely done.

The Dance

Monitor May 11

Second Wiener Program

The second program of the Hans Wiener Dance Group at the Pops last evening was of much lighter material than the first, and of only a little less successful impact on the audience.

"The Foolish Virgins," a dance farce in one act, composed by Mr. Wiener, to music of Dvořá, was the new number. It contains lyrical dance movement and pictorial group arrangements by 12 young women charmingly costumed in long white frocks with a touch of coral to their bodices and blue bands on their hair. Mr. Wiener, Mr. Ashermann and Mr. Bishop make three satyr-like figures who indulge in wild cavortings. Mr. Wiener gets in some good sustained leaps. But the idea, to this writer, on first viewing, is a trifle vague. It might be well to run a printed synopsis in the program, as in the case of the "Persian Ballet."

The familiar masked "Ballet Grotesques" (to a Schubert Moment Musicale), delightfully done by Mr. Ashermann and Miss Nina Dale, always receives enthusiastic welcome. Mr. Wiener's "Golliwog's Cake Walk" (Debussy), in a terrific red wig and thrillingly bizarre outfit, is an eccentric study less appealing in form and substance than his "Circus," but not without interest. The stirring "March in Formal Style" (McCleary) which opened the program, went off rousingly.

The first and better program, consisting of the "Persian Ballet," "Circus" and "Bride for Barter," with probably the McCleary "March" for good measure, will be repeated tonight.

M. L.

Herald

MUSIC

May 10

POPS DANCE PROGRAM

The music at Pops last night was all dance music, rhythmic and tuneful, of the sort that makes fingers beat time, shoe-tips tap, and heads sway. For the third section of the program, there were three dance composition, presented by Hans Weiner, Otto Aschermann and their group, of which one was a lengthy ballet. The program in full was as follows:

Procession of Bacchus .... Delibes
(from the ballet "Sylvia.")
Five German dances .... Mozart
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" .... Saint-Saens
The Damnation of Faust, suite ...... Berlioz
Tales from the Vienna Woods, waltz .. Strauss
Bolero .... Ravel
Tambourin .... Rameau-Motti

HANS WEINER
Otto Aschermann and group of 26 dancers
The Bride for Barter .... Korngold
Circus .... Fucik
Persian Ballet .... Borodin

The bride for barter was an amusing light dance of flirtation, the costumes being of special interest inasmuch as they lent an ordinary set of three duos and an extra, a fantastic bit that brought the whole composition out of the ordinary run of such trifles. The girls wore green silk bodices, white lace skirts, rose-colored oilcloth overskirts, with black and white striped cotton caps and ties. The result was startlingly effective in the pierrot manner. But while the costuming lifted this dance out of mediocrity, the costumes for the Persian ballet distracted the attention from an otherwise deft piece of choreography. There was no valid reason for having so many conflicting colors, unless it were to keep the movements of the groups separated by mechanical means—to prevent a fusing of motion—or unless it were to simulate Persian paintings. Neither reason would be sufficient from a practical point of view, since they did not accomplish their purpose.

Mr. Weiner is always at his best in satirical, humorous or eccentric dances. Thus it was that his "Circus" yesterday evening drew the greatest applause from the large audience, and was repeated by common request. Burlesquing the favorites of every circus—the clowns, the bareback riders, the trapeze artists, the tight-rope dancers, the strong man, the jugglers—it was a neat piece of danced pantomine, and well done.

The orchestra was in fine fettle. "Tales from the Vienna Woods," sang with the Viennese lilt; "Bolero" was, as always, a percussive marvel.

E. B.

The Pops, Next Week

On Sunday Trans. May ✓

A NOTE elsewhere on this page expands the gratifying news that beer and other drinks will be served henceforth at the Sunday Pops. For the first of them, on Sunday evening next, Mr. Fiedler sets this program:

Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia .. Handel
(Arranged by Sir H. Harty)
Symphony, No. 5, in C minor .... Beethoven
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," .... Strauss
Concerto, No. 1, in E-flat major for Piano and Orchestra .... Liszt
(Pianist: Mr. Sanromá)
Overture to the Opera, "The Flying Dutchman" .... Wagner Ride of the Valkyrs .... Wagner

On Tuesday

The annual "Harvard Nght" falls this spring on Tuesday, May 16, with the Glee Club assisting in two groups of songs. Dr. Davison, making a last appearance in Boston before he departs on "sabbatical year," will conduct. Otherwise the program brings the overture to Offenbach's opéra-bouffe, "La Belle Hélène"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes"; the serio-comic numbers, pleasantly remembered, from Walton's and the Sitwells' "Façade."

On Thursday

A repetition, with new decorations and diversions, of the "Gay Nineties Nights" of last spring is announced for Thursday. Again all comers are invited to wear the dress of those distant and amusing times. Stereopticon slides, old songs and "Prestidigitations by the Musical Magician" will add other flavors. Mr. Fieller outlines this program:

March, "Under the Double Eagle" .... Wagner
Overture to the Opera, "Martha" .... Flotow
Cavatina .... Raff
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2 .... Liszt
Selections from the Operetta, "The Mikado," .... Sullivan
Stereopticon Slides
Campus Memories .... Wilson
Prestidigitations .... Harrell
Hearts and Flowers .... Tobani
Old Songs

◆

A considerable change in the etiquette of The Pops is quietly announced from Symphony Hall. Beginning on Sunday evening next, "refreshments will be served," at the fortnightly Sunday concerts. In the speech of The Pops, "refreshments" mean drinks, beer included—a long step forward toward a decent freedom on the holiday of the week. Smoking will also be permitted. Henceforth at these Sunday concerts tables will be desirable. So do changes in the control of the State Police signify.

◆

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST
MAY 11 1933

In the World

The "pop" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have begun in that city their forty-eighth season with a resumption of the European beer garden idea, which had to be abandoned in 1918. Arthur Fiedler is conductor and the programs range from the classics to Gershwin, Kern and Strauss.

TWO NEW BALLETS AT THE POPS

Two new programs have been prepared by Hans Wiener and his dance group for their appearance at the Pops this week. Wiener has adapted pantomimes to the spirit of the modern dance in two ballets. For his Persian ballet he utilizes tse Polovetakian dances from Borodin's Prince Igor, depicting his figures as marionettes which come to life. His ballet, "The Foolish Virgins," is based on two Slavonian dances of Dvorak in a humorous rustic story of Czechoslovakian character.

The second program will open with a march in modern style, by Miss Fiona McCleary, a New England composer. Wiener will repeat by request his "Circus" which had a particular success last season, and a new conception of Debussy's "Golliwog's Cakewalk."

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAY 10 1933

MUSIC MIS

"Jazz is on the wane. At the moment it looks as if the classics were again in the ascendant. The jazz writers were trying to get too symphonic and the symphonic writers were trying to get too jazzy. As for the modernists, most of them likewise seem to have quieted down. They speak of going back to the lyrical and the melodic. The modernist writers serve a valuable purpose. They are experimenters in a laboratory. They are forerunners, who, when the great man eventually grows out of their movement are forgotten. We see and hear, today, only Wagner, only Beethoven. We forget that many composers labored humbly in their day to create the atmosphere and the innovations out of which Beethoven and Wagner arose."—Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Symphony Pops.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
MAY 10 1933

At "Lasell Night at the Pops" in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday evening, May 12th, the Orphean Club, a chorus of 150 voices under the direction of Mrs. George Sawyer Dunham will sing with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

MAY 7 - 1933

Beer and Beethoven

When, on Wednesday evening and in the sacrosanct confines of Symphony Hall, on Huntington Avenue, Arthur Fiedler brings down his baton for the opening measures of "Poet and Peasant" or "Turkish March," and the first trim waitress rushes the first schooner of beer at "Pops," Boston will be reviving one of its most agreeable and representative American traditions—beer and good music. For forty-eight years now, after Boston's regular Symphony season is over, the orchestra chairs in that auditorium, which stands as a memorial to the devotion to music of Major Henry L. Higginson, have been removed, small tables instituted in their place for the service of liquid refreshments and ices, and a composite orchestra has offered a six-week nightly program of music a little less strictly classical than that upon which Dr. Muck or Mr. Koussevitzky would insist. Prohibition failed to dim the simple joys of "Pops," and now the old order of good brew is to be restored amid universal rejoicing.

Only, however, by virtue of the early start of its summer music season does Boston lay claim to greater fame in this regard than other American cities, where from now on hundreds of concert halls, beer gardens and public parks will furnish forth Beethoven and Pilsener to audiences thirsty for both. Music, as every one knows, is always a little less formal, and hence has a wider appeal, when accompanied by a tall schooner of light brew, and nobody has ever submitted that the beer was less agreeable for the music. A happy warm weather tradition lives again, and it is one in which even the sternest can discover scant excuse to play the Cato.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HANOVER, PA.
SUN

MAY 13 1933

Music

NEWS OF MUSIC WORLD

Plans are being successfully carried forward to bring to Baltimore next season the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a series of three concerts, instead of the customary single concert, and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington for a new series of three concerts.

Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr has acted as counselor in Baltimore for both of these organizations and it is largely due to her energy and enterprise that these concerts have been added to the city's cultural events.

This will compensate in part for the loss of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra which has decided not to give any concerts outside of New York next season. The Philadelphia Orchestra will play four concerts in Baltimore next season as usual.

According to present plans, the Boston Symphony will be heard at the Lyric on November 14, January 31 and April 3. The tentative dates for the National Symphony are November 8, January 17 and March 14.

* * *

Wash Star * * * * May 14

THE recently sent out subscription blanks from the Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey Concert Bureau for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought out an interesting revelation regarding the musical taste of this city. A great number of people have written in that they would like to subscribe for the season tickets provided Dr. Koussevitsky will not include modern music in the programs. This request has been so general that the conclusion must be arrived at that modern music has not increased in popularity with Washington audiences. It is possible that Mr. Stokowski's drastic efforts last Winter to acquaint the public with the new trend in music has given rise to the idea that all orchestra conductors will try to follow his example. While Dr. Koussevitsky has been responsible for introducing many novelties to the public, it is neither his policy nor that of the directors of the Boston Symphony to force modern music on his hearers and his programs have featured almost exclusively the classics and romanticists. Just how much Dr. Koussevitsky would feel he could permit himself to be bound by such restrictions cannot as yet be said. However, it is more than gratifying that music lovers of this city have a decided preference for the older music, the inspirational power of which has neither been exhausted nor equaled by any of the latest inventions. But what are the future Brahms and Wagners to do if the public refuse to listen to them?

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAY 13 1933

ON BROADWAY
by Walter Winchell

A COLUMNIST'S SEC'Y JOTS DOWN A FEW NOTES

Dear W. W.: Here's a honey. German authorities banished Bruno Walter because he doesn't eat ham...They asked Pierre Monteux (former leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra) to play for the ditto in Berlin...They thought he was Francais—and he's Jewish!...

New York Herald-Tribune

MAY 14 1933

As the Boston Symphony will be the only major orchestra appearing in Brooklyn next year, Adrian van Sinderen, chairman of the Brooklyn committee sponsoring its appearance, has begun a campaign to rally the interest of all interested in the borough's artistic activities to this series. The Brooklyn committee is being enlarged and subdivided into various special committees. The concerts next season at the Academy of Music, all, with one exception, on Friday evenings at 8:15, will take place on November 17, January 5, February 1 (Thursday), March 2 and April 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribun

MAY 14 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun its annual spring series of "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall, where attendance will undoubtedly be stimulated by the return of beer. Arthur Fiedler is now in his fourth season as conductor of this well known series, which might well be imitated here during the now relatively musicless period between the end of the Philharmonic season and the opening of the Stadium series.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

MAY 14 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S CONCERTS HELD SURE

PROSPECTS FOR a series of matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall next season, seemed brighter today with the announcement by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra, that a total of 25 boxes, exactly one-half of the 50 boxes available, had been subscribed through the efforts of the orchestra's committee on boxes, which is headed by Undersecretary of State William Phillips.

Those who have taken boxes, in the event the Boston Symphony management decides to give a series of concerts here in 1933-34, are Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. C. C. Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. W. R. Castle, jr.; Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. Henry Leonard, John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, William Phillips, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mr. George Weckel, and Mrs. C. C. Williams.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

MAY 14 1933

New Concert Series Likely

Although no statement is yet forthcoming from Symphony Hall, there is a very strong likelihood that Washington's concert calendar in 1933-34 will be augmented with three performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra.

Only a month has elapsed since the orchestra officials first sounded out Washington sentiment toward a Boston Symphony series here next season, yet in that short time, no less than 25 boxes—exactly one-half of the total boxes available at Constitution Hall—have been taken through the efforts of a box committee, headed by Undersecretary of State William Phillips, who is, himself, a trustee of the orchestra.

Additionally, over 7,000 Washington music-lovers have been forwarded questionaires, in which they were requested to set forth their willingness to subscribe to such a series, and the response from this questionaire, it is understood, has been sufficiently encouraging to impel the orchestra management to retain three dates previously tentatively reserved at the D. A. R. auditorium.

If the orchestra comes to Washington, it will be heard on Wednesday, November 15; Tuesday, January 30, and Wednesday, April 4, all afternoon concerts at Constitution Hall at 4:40 p. m. The season prices will run from $3 to $9 for the three concerts, with no government tax.

Sanroma Stars at Pop Concert

By MOSES SMITH

An enjoyable concert was the first of the Sunday evening Pops, led by Arthur Fiedler. With Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in the Liszt E-flat piano concerto, the program contained a polonaise, arietta and passacaglia of Handel, arranged by Hamilton Harty, Beethoven's fifth symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and two Wagnerian excerpts—"The Flying Dutchman" overture and "The Ride of the Valkyres."

It goes almost without saying that Sanroma gave a dazzling exhibition of piano-playing in the concerto. He did more—not content with surface brilliance and dash, he infused into the fantasia-like measures at the opening, and into the slow section melodic beauty and the glow of sentiment.

He was aided by a surprisingly plastic orchestra under Fiedler—surprising in the light of the probable fact that the orchestra had had little rehearsal for this concert. Fiedler, indeed, was on his mettle all through the program. All things considered, the performance of the orchestra was the best testimonial of Fiedler's capacity as conductor that I have observed to date.

Here and there, in the symphony, one noted obvious routine. But one noted also, especially in the scherzo and finale, and in "Till," a clear conception, excellent choice of tempi and judicious balancing of the parts. In the other numbers, too, especially the well-orchestrated Handel, the performance tended to whet the appetite of the listener for a well prepared program under Fiedler.

The audience was large and most cordial throughout the concert. Smoking was permitted and refreshments served for the first time at a Sunday concert.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

MAY 14 193

Many Boxes Aid Symphony From Boston

25 of 50 Taken for Concerts Planned for Capital Next Winter.

Prospects for a series of matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall next season seemed brighter today with the announcement by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra, that a total of 25 boxes, exactly one half of the 50 boxes available, had been subscribed through the efforts of the orchestra's committee on boxes, which is headed by Undersecretary of State William Phillips.

Those who have taken boxes, in the event the Boston Symphony management decides to give a series of concerts here in 1933-34, are Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. C. C. Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. W. R. Castle, jr., Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Hon. William Phillips, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. High Wallace, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mr. George Weckel and Mrs. C. C. Williams.

In addition, responses are being received from a large number of known Washington music lovers who were mailed a questionaire, asking them to register their subscriptions with the orchestra's local representative. These responses, Mrs. Dorsey has indicated, emphasize the desire of potential subscribers for a change from the deluge of modern music that has prevailed locally for several seasons. A number of responses made their subscriptions contingent on programs excluding this type of music.

Globe MUSIC May 15

SYMPHONY HALL

First Sunday "Pop" Concert

The series of Sunday "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall began last evening with an admirably chosen program of symphonic music. This list ranged more widely than has been the rule—if memory is correct—at Sunday "Pop" concerts in the immediate past. Both variety and proportion were respected. Beginning with a Handel Polonaise, Arietta, and Passacaglia as arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty, Mr Fiedler progressed through Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel," Liszt's E-flat piano concerto, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and two Wagner excerpts. One hopes that this type of program—with proper admissions from the modern repertory—will prevail at future Sunday "Pops."

To increase the general pleasure, there was smoking and serving of refreshments at tables. The audience seemed to enjoy all this—music no less than extraneous features—for there was little conversation while the orchestra was playing.

Mr Fiedler achieved a personal "reading" of Beethoven's symphony, one distinctly moderate and middle-course in style, but one which conveyed a sense of the symphonic structure. This was sensitive conducting, testifying to Mr Fiedler's growth as a recreating leader. The various voices were kept in just balance, and the rhythm was superb. On the other hand, he failed more than once, in the finale, to make proper contrast between the sweeping lyrical phrases and Beethoven's staccato jubilations.

The succeeding numbers, including Strauss' difficult and involved tone poem, were agreeably performed, although a few loose ends were left hanging in Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

Mr Sanroma's performance of Liszt's not too fastidious concerto was sensitive and delicate, with unusually fine tone in the "tuny" sections. ("Tuny" is just the word. Vernon Blackburn defined a tune as overripe melody. These of Liszt are fairly dropping off the symphonic apple tree.) The pianist makes it more a polished miniature, however, than an imposing, grandly proportioned musical sculpture. Some wrong notes did not detract measurably from the worth of his playing. Mr Sanroma has progressed as an interpreter of 19th Century music.

Herald MUSIC May 15

POPS CONCERT

The Pops concert at Symphony hall last evening, was unique in that, for the first time, refreshments accompanied the classics. Beer and pretzels having come back to assist one in enjoying the Strauss waltzes and German student songs, now even the Sunday symphonic programs are to be enhanced with ice cream and lemonade. There is progress. Here was the program:

Handel—Polonaise, Arietta, and Passacaglia
(Arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty)
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"
Liszt—Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1, in E-flat
Solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
Wagner—Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Wagner—"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "The Valkyrie"

The players of the symphony orchestra who compose the Pops orchestra are never listed by name. They are simply "85 players." The whole orchestra, as a matter of fact, achieves a kindred anonymity, and its accompanying virtues and faults.

The marked individuality of the orchestra, as an expressive group, under Dr. Koussevitsky, drops off it with the end of the regular symphony season. The orchestra is tired, and the Pops audiences devote at least a third of their attention to eating and drinking, or to waving glad hands at recognized friends. Discipline goes, and with it polish.

But in the loss of individuality and virtuosity as an orchestra, the Pops orchestra gains, in its very loss of a distinct character, a certain ordinariness of approach to music which is often refreshing, and which is very good for Boston audiences, just as it is good for a devotee of Anatole France in limited editions to read Dickens in a poor one, and an occasional detective yarn.

The orchestra's playing last night was ragged—in the "Till" somewhat dull, in the Liszt concerto jumpy. Perfection of ensemble was not there, nor brilliance or suavity of tone, nor startlingly effective dramatic contrasts. But it was good to hear the music "rough-hewn" for a change—to savor, through the mistakes, its form and to let the fired imagination glimpse its possibilities.

This is not to say that the Pops concert orchestra is not a good one; it is far better than average, and much better than many cities ever hear. But we have been spoiled by near-perfection, and by our rapt attention to it. It is a healthy thing to sit and listen casually to good music casually played.

E. B.

The Pops May 13

On Sunday—Elsewhere on this page Mr. Fiedler's program for the first Sunday Pop, tomorrow evening, is printed. The notable numbers are three sonorous pieces from Handel; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"; Liszt's Piano-Concerto in E-flat major, with Mr. Sanromá playing the solo-part for the second time in Boston. It is to be noted also that, by grace of the changing times, drinks and other "refreshments"—beer included—will be sold as usual; while smoking will be permitted as on week-days. In a word on a Sunday, as well as on a Monday or a Saturday, Symphony Hall will wear familiar aspect.

On Tuesday—The annual "Harvard Night" falls this spring on Tuesday, May 16, with the Glee Club assisting in two groups of songs. Dr. Davison, making a last appearance in Boston before he departs on "sabbatical year," will conduct the choir. Otherwise the program brings the overture to Offenbach's opéra-bouffe, "La Belle Hélène"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice on Spanish Themes"; the serio-comic numbers, pleasantly remembered, from Walton's and the Sitwells' "Façade."

On Thursday—A repetition, with new decorations and diversions, of the "Gay Nineties Nights" of last spring is announced for Thursday. Again all comers are invited to wear the dress of those distant and amusing times. Stereopticon slides, old songs, "Campus Memories," a resurrected "Hearts and Flowers" and "Prestidigitations by the Musical Magician" will add expected flavors.

Other Evenings—On Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, Mr. Fiedler's programs will run more ordinary course. For freshening, Miss Ippolito, the violinist, will be heard on Monday in the finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto. . . . . On Wednesday Mr. Sanromá will play the piano-part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." . . . . On Friday the lovers of Handel's so-called Largo will be gratified anew; while the musically curious may hear the overture to Boeldieu's forgotten opera, "The Caliph of Bagdad." . . . . . On Saturday Mossolov's "Soviet Foundry" will resound again, and last, but not least, the musically-minded Secretary of the Treasury will celebrate the President in a "Grand March: Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Plays and Pl

Trans May 15

Bostonians Do Not Abuse Opportunities

New Freedoms at Sunday Pops, "Till" and the Audience Liszt Notably Played

IN departure from long-standing rule and custom, drinks were obtainable at the first "Sunday Pop," last evening, and smoking was permitted. That is to say, the tabled floor of Symphony Hall wore on the first day of the week the aspect that, in May and June, it usually wears on the third or the fifth. Federal and State law imposed one restriction—that alcoholic content should not rise above three and two-tenths per cent. A house rule imposed another—that no drinks should be served while the music was proceeding. Otherwise the regulations that spring after spring compelled the tenants of the tables on Sunday evening to sit empty-handed, empty-lipped, and a little absurd to those that contemplated them from the balconies, were waived. Intelligence, good will and sympathy with the manners and customs of the times now sit in authority at the State House and make—or rather unmake—the rules for Sunday entertainment.

Certainly no audience could have been more discreet with these new freedoms. The strictest upholder of "Sabbath observance" could not have detected the smallest sign of liberty degenerating into license. Most of the tables were occupied, much as they are on a Tuesday or a Thursday, but by rather quieter folk. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra could hardly have asked closer attention from their audience above or below stairs—and that to a program including a full symphony of Beethoven, a piano-concerto of Liszt, a shorter tone-poem of Strauss. Some that were watching for consequences of the new dispensation have seen and heard, in their time, church-congregations in which there were more rustlings, whisperings and inopportune goings and comings. Most at the tables smoked. To do so, indeed, seemed the more coveted privilege. A considerable number ordered, and consumed, drinks, but everywhere sedately. In four words a more decorous audience were hard to imagine. The State House need have no fear that its wisdom and good will may be abused. At The Pops on Sunday evenings, Boston now, if belatedly, takes its place in the world of nineteen, and not seventeen. thirty-three.

Musically, the incident of the evening was the performance of Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, with Mr. Fiedler conducting and Mr. Sanromá as pianist. At the request of Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Sanromá prepared the piano-part, somewhat hastily, for a Tuesday matinée last March. Now he was both more secure and more elastic. Dr. Koussevitky seemed disposed to refine upon the Concerto, while from the conductor the pianist took cue. Mr. Fiedler, for his part, was now minded to free, vigorous, sonorous, even flamboyant performance. Evidently also, Mr. Sanromá inclined to this true Lisztian vein.

The fortunate outcome was no reticence and no evasion. The piano took over the motivs that usually the orchestra first sounded. It developed and embroidered them, firm of line, plentiful of color, large and frank in mood. There was no sparing of orchestral or pianistic sonorities; no shirking of displayful measures. The passage marked Quasi-Adagio was warmly sung. The Allegro Vivace went in light and sparkling brilliance. Forthright and imposing was the re-assembling in the Allegro Marziale, of all that has gone before. The Finale, from the trills onward, struck fire. "If you believe in Liszt, play him full-voiced and full-blooded," Busoni, who did believe, told his pupil, Michael Zadora. Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler played as though they also believed, and this Concerto, which some are fain to believe hackneyed and trumpery, was alive and rich and romantic again. The Latins succeed best with Liszt; they answer to his quasi-Italianate voice. With all his cosmopolitan training and Bostonian living, the Latin still lurks in Mr. Sanromá.

For the first time, unless memory slips, an audience at a Pop Concert listened to Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and without the "synopsis of scenes" that a program-book usually supplies. Unless present hearers had heard the piece in symphonic setting, they may never have suspected Till spreading confusion in the market-place, Till flirtatious among the burghers' wives, Till on trial and condemned, Till teetering this way and that in knavish glee. What they did hear was Strauss's Rondo as music. Unmistakably it held them by its agility, bite and color; its hearty humors; its pictorial quality, however vague; its immediate suggestion of a tour de force. And there are wistful measures to begin and end. "Once upon a time, poor old chap." . . . Usually, the nearer a piece of music draws to our own time, the more penetratingly and projectingly Mr. Fiedler plays it. "Till Eulenspiegel" was no exception; while no orchestra may escape the Straussian exhilaration.

For the rest a Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia, edited out of Handel's endless store by Sir H. Harty, curious for the quicker pace and the lighter rhythm of the Poloniaise in comparison with later treatments of that stately dance; pompous and sonorous enough in the closing pages of the Passacaglia to gratify those elderly ears that cannot hear Handel without covert sneers at Bach. Then Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, rather out of the fashion at Symphony Hall but still dependable with any audience, even if in no more than intelligently literal performance likely enough unrehearsed. Finally the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" out of Wagner's youth and the Ride of the Valkyrs out of Wagner's prime. . . . Incidentally, but notably, a young clarinetist, Valerio by name, said to be Portuguese and Conservatory-bred: plainly a desirable addition to the orchestra.

With a "Musical Magician" Added

More 'Nineties' at The Pops, Fewer Costumes, Better Stage-Show

May 19

THE gay Nineties still make entertainment for the depressed Thirties. A year ago The Pops, half-discovered, half-invented them; twice drew the town to see and hear. The infection spread. Neither summer heat, nor autumn frost, nor winter cold might nip it. By mid-February "Beware of Imitations" might have been reasonable proclamation from Symphony Hall. Instead it waited submissively for its hour: last evening again invited all and sundry to the real thing. They came in numbers sufficient to fill both balconies and a floor close-packed with tables. But fewer of them than heretofore—as it seemed to the casual bystander—donned for the smiles of May, 1933, the modes and confections of 1893.

True, the Gibsonian hat, the Gibsonian coiffure, the leg o'mutton sleeve, the flowing skirt, the veil and also the parasol, were to be seen from table to table. True also the fore-and-aft cap, the frock coat, the top-hat with high and curly brim, possibly a box-coat or two, certainly a deal of additional whiskerage, could also be descried. As usual two prizes were awarded. (Fancy taking home a stuffed bird in a glass case with a plush bottom!) None the less the impression lingered that more had come to observe than be observed. Since the passion for dressing-up springs eternal in the human breast, the presumption is that Bostonian trunk-rooms and suburban attics yield no more forty-year-old finery. Even the new beer-age could not conjure it into being.

The stage-show made amends. It began after Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra had played numbers for which the listening nineties had clapped loud hands: the overture to "Martha," not forgetting the "von" before the name of the ennobled Austrian who wrote it; a Cavatina from Raff long since suffocated in its own sweetness; a potpourri from "The Mikado" and the Second Rhapsody of Liszt, both persisting into this present day. Then Mr. Wilson, having conned anew the advertisements of the period, outspread his "finds" upon stereopticon slides. There were bathing suits, of course, and corsets, and nighties, and bustles; horse-cars no less and "bicycles built for two"; even a "horseless carriage" which is an automobile in germ. There were amusing captions as well; while we all laughed as heartily at this ancient raiment as our children will at out saucer-hats and saddle-shoes.

Next "Campus Memories," which was to say a succession of songs and ballads with the mark of the nineties upon them, whatever the actual date. "Solomon Levi" was there, for example, and "Juanita," and "Jingle Bells." There was reason to believe that many in the house knew most of them even into these thirties; waived self-consciousness (which is Bostonian melody) and sang. . . . Next the innovation—nothing less than Harrell, "the musical magician," accompanied by Mr. Caughey with the harp. Upon the bells and the water-glasses the newcomer played; out of incongruities patched together a portrait of a lady in rear view on her bicycle; touched climax when he drew from his mouth not only yards of tape but a rabbit within them enmeshed. (After all the cigarette-sellers have not revealed every trick.) Finally, the "song favorites" of last spring from "The Bowery" to "After the Ball" to the "Hot Time in the Old Town." A year ago a "Gay Nineties Night" at the Pops was a sartorial extravaganza. Now with a new edge from the stage, it is also a good show—"the source of innocent merriment" that the orchestra had thumped out in the Mikado's song. H. T. P.

RIDAY, MAY 19, 1933 Post

MERRY WITH 'GAY NINETIES' AT POPS

Songs and Costumes of That Period Feature Last Night's Performance at Symphony Hall

THE GAY NINETIES AT THE POPS

Photo snapped at Symphony Hall last night shows three young women in costumes of that ancient period. Left to right, Mrs. C. Stenstrom, Miss Helen Schmitz and Miss Lily Nyberg.

BY GRACE DAVIDSON

With glasses raised to better days, a capacity crowd welcomed and sang to the second annual opening of "The Gay Nineties" season at the "Pops" at Symphony Hall last night.

Old time liverwurst between two one inch thick slices of rye bread and foamy amber beer created the mood for a sentimental sigh or two when Conductor Arthur Fiedler lead his orchestra into "Hearts and Flowers," recalling memories of that night so long ago when a rose was pressed into the family album after an evening at the Pops.

THREE GENERATIONS THERE

At last night's Pops at least three generations were well represented. And the youngsters who did dress up for the occasion, dressed up in relics from the trunks of granddad and grandmama. Many a frock coat worn must boast at least one salty little spot from a tear of some fair one of those "hearts and flowers" days when ladies did indulge in some emotional weeping on the bosom of their beloved on the way home in the hansom.

One Back Bay inhabitant said that he was wearing the same formal attire he wore 40 years ago on the night that he first "popped" the question at the Pops to a certain lady. Last night he was taking her granddaughter, for unfortunately the lady refused, wept a little on his shoulder and married another. His reward was that 40 years later he was taking her granddaughter to the same Pops on a "Gay Nineties Night."

More Men Than Women There

There were more men than women present. There were tables galore of the girls out for a good time. The merry blades of old, the modern young gallants must have been yawning at the club or shouting at a wrestling match, if there was one, while the girls took a night off at the Pops, which wasn't fair at all. Yet the girls, from 16 to 60, had a gay time and sang in fine voices to the beat of Mr. Fiedler's precise baton.

The audience was larger last night than on the first gay nineties night of last season, but there were fewer in costume. A large crowd stood outside waiting to watch those in gay nineties costumes enter. There was the flash of cameras and the same general curiosity, but for some strange reason many who came in costumes last year absented themselves last night, or if they came, came as spectators. There were not more than a hundred in costume. However, judges who awarded the prizes said that the authenticity of the costumes was high above last year's variety. There was a great zest and spirit demonstrated among the crowd. As Mr. Fiedler said, "This occasion belongs to the audience. It is their show and they like it because it is their show and can take part."

Old Songs Were Sung

All the old songs of the days of bustles, leg-of-mutton sleeves, and pompadours were sung. And, when that song which begins, "Casey would waltz with a strawberry blonde while the band played on," was sung, many in that audience could not help but look around smilingly. The strawberry blondes had disappeared, but in their place last night was a healthy crop of platinums.

Some of the very ultra modern costumes worn looked so much like the gay nineties costumes that it was hardly necessary for the wearers to ransack attic trunks for musty costumes of a bygone period. The little flat sailors and the broad shoulder puffs, created by the very modern Elsa Schiaperelli, are not a far cry at all from those worn by grandmothers of the mauve period.

Came on Bicycles

A party of four, two Harvard boys and two girls, "bicycled in" from the Lowell House on Harvard square. They were slightly winded on arrival and the young women were not in the best of spirits. Arthur Fiedler arrived in a gas automobile, vintage of 1900.

Laning Humphrey and his sister, Caroline, a well known local actress, received first prize for the most ridiculous costumes. The prize was a live bird of the pheasant variety. Mr. Humphrey was dressed in a motorist costume of 1898 and Miss Humphrey as a bar maid.

The general programme embraced a number of popular pieces of the nineties. Liszt's "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" and [illegible] "Mikado" [illegible] large rounds of applause. The next "Gay Nineties" night scheduled shortly will be known as "the Stein Night" and will be in costume.

"GAY NINETIES" COSTUMES AT POPS

Left to right, Miss Madelyn MacKinnon, Miss Edith Baker, Miss Eleanor Murray and Miss Eleanor Hale, four members of the Firnabank Club of the First National Bank of Boston, whose "Gay Nineties" costumes caused much applause at last evening's Pops concert.

'Gay Nineties' Night at Pops Proves So Popular It Will Be Repeated

May 19, ~~Herald~~

Last evening's pops concert at Symphony hall was a "Gay Nineties" night of such popularity that another is being planned for the many unable to obtain seats last night. It was a unique concert for Arthur Fiedler's orchestra, and the audience loved it and asked for more. The first group of Wagner, von Flotow, Raff and Liszt received conventional attention, but beginning with the encore "La Paloma," favorite of Latins and played when Maximilian was shot, the whole hall hummed the tunes. In "Campus Memories" and old song favorites Arthur Fiedler applauded his listeners as they applauded him.

There was a duck under glass, a white rabbit, musical glasses played by F. O. Harrell and stereopticon slides, many taken from the Police Gazette. The duck was stuffed mallard, an achievement of taxidermy not culinary art, and the white rabbit was part of some very good magic by Mr. Harrell. The stereopticon of A. H. Wilson showed Fiske Warren in a horseless carriage of 1895; bustles, folding bath tubs, dye for whiskers, ladies of the chorus with no aenemic tendency and myriad costumes that are echoed in today's fashions.

The Firnabank Club of girls from the First National Bank of Boston had over 100 friends and members there and their authentic plumes, ruffles, huge, heavy hats and trailing skirts were the centre of all eyes. Miss Mary Wall is the president of the club and Miss Lillian Salomone organized the party. Miss Ruth Hamilton wore a mauve decade costume of heliotrope faille trimmed with magenta. Miss Betty Haywood was in embroidered organdy with three cerise plumes in court fashion and Miss Constance Sager wore one of the embroidered batiste gowns that have had so popular a fashion revival.

ORDERS SOUTH BOSTON MOTOR RACING STOP

Declaring that the pepole of South Boston must be protected and that automobile racing through the streets must be stopped, Judge William J. Day yesterday fined two South Boston men for automobile law violations and sent one of the pair to jail for two months.

William McMillan, of Fourth street, was fined $25 for driving without a license and given two months for reckless driving. Joseph LaPaglia of Champlain street was fined $10 for allowing an unlicensed person to drive his car. The pair were captured Tuesday night after a three-mile chase, during which three shots were fired by Patrolman Edward Shea of the City Point station.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONIT

Pulling Up With a Flourish

By a Staff Photographer of THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mr. Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Symphony Hall Pop Concerts, Arriving Last Night in a Schacht Motorcar of 1900 Vintage to Direct the First "Gay Nineties" Program of the Season. Mr. J. B. Brady Is the Chauffeur.

Music

"The Gay Nineties"

Bicycles built for two, bustles, picture hats and songs and stereopticon slides from the turn of the century marked the first "Gay Nineties" program of the season, at the Symphony Hall Pops last night. The affair was not merely a repetition of the similar events inaugurated last year. There were several new features. One of the most popular was the series of slides prepared by Mr. A. H. Wilson showing customs and costumes of a third of a century ago, each introduced by a descriptive title. The fashions for women of course caused most hilarity, but there was much amusement over the advertisements of bathtubs and over the rapid transit facilities of the period. The "Musical Magician" (Mr. F. O. Harrell) supplied a number in which the musical glasses were prominent. Members of the Firnabank Club of the First National Bank lent a charming costume touch to the scene on the floor.

Of course there was music, too. Campus Memories were revived by a medley of tunes played by the orchestra and sung by at least a part of the audience; and the audience was really the chief performer in the final group of Old Song Favorites. Oh, yes; the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler played some symphonic numbers too. Another "Gay Nineties" Night is promised soon, to satisfy the large numbers of persons who could get no nearer to the festivities last night than the lobby.

L. A. S.

Business Men to Study State Judicial Procedure

Business methods applied to the courts of Massachusetts is the objective of the Committee on Judicial

Tonight at the Pops

Military Polonaise	Chopin
"The Caliph of Bagdad," Overture	Boiëldieu
"Rêve Angélique"	Rubinstein
"Danse Macabre"	Saint-Saëns
"Schéhérazade," Finale	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Largo	Handel
"Rienzi," Overture	Wagner
"The Band Wagon," Selection	Schwartz
"March of the Toys"	Herbert
"Wien bleibt Wien," March	Schrammel

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDA

Music and Musician

Home-Bred

Manuel Valerio

New Clarinetist of the Symphony Orchestra Whom Quick Ears Discover These Spring Evenings at The Pops

New-Bedford Born He Comes of Good Portuguese Stock. To Develop a Youthful Talent He Studied for Seven Years at the New England Conservatory under Sand, Arcieri, Vannini and Polatschek; Proved His Ability in the Conservatory Orchestra; Now Passes to Symphony Hall

Page Six May 21

Plays and Players

Composers, Conductors, Musicians

Dr. Koussevitzky in London, Homage to Gershwin, The Violinists

FOR the first time in eight years Dr. Koussevitzky has revisited London. Last week he conducted there in three concerts of a spring festival arranged by the British Broadcasting Corporation. In them he traversed music of Sibelius, Chaikovsky, Bax, Walton, Beethoven. (The mails should soon bring reviews.) Meanwhile he renewed old acquaintance; canvassed British composers; dispensed the customary interviews. One, full of British self-complaisance, deserves re-printing, from The Daily Telegraph:

"Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, the famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declared yesterday that the outstanding feature in the world of music today was the renascence of the art now flowering in England. Mr. Koussevitzky arrived in London to conduct three concerts at the B. B. C. festival.

"'Your English composers,' he said, 'are producing works in the grand style. No other country has such wealth of music, such a school'—and he went on to tell me in French how Boston audiences appreciate Vaughan Williams, Bax and Walton. Especially, at the moment, William Walton. Just before leaving America Mr. Koussevitzky conducted three performances of 'Belshazzar's Feast'—the first in the United States.

"'It had a triumph, un succès énorme, formidable,' he said. 'I had been preparing it all the winter. It deserved to be a good performance—forty-six chorus rehearsals with the choirmaster, three more with me, and then five with chorus and orchestra together, after I had held four rehearsals with the orchestra alone.' Mr. Koussevitzky smiled as he recorded this little labor of preparation for 'Belshazzar's Feast.'

"'Walton's work is difficult,' he added, and with clenched fists recalled how the voices make their first entry. For a second he was the dynamic conductor who used to stir London to frenzy in the post-war years, and a chorus filled the quiet afternoon expanse of the lounge of his hotel. The vision passed, and he went on placidly sipping his lemon and water. Yes; English music was grand stuff. Much of it they played constantly in Boston—Bax's Second Symphony and Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral.' And naturally they enjoyed Lambert's "The Rio Grande.'

"But there was a glint in his eye as he said that he was glad to know that our English orchestras were now worthy of our composers. 'They used not to be,' he added, 'and that is one reason why I have not visited London for eight years.'"

. . . There is only to add in passing that Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral Symphony" has been played at exactly one pair of Symphony Concerts—last January, when Mr. Burgin was deputy conductor. Nor has "The Rio Grande" been repeated since the first performances in Boston in the spring of 1931.

"The Persistent Rhapsody"

Under this headline in the New York Sun, Mr. Henderson discoursed amiably, the other day, about George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," now in usual vogue, here in Boston, at the Pop Concerts: "The cheers which this writer emitted when he heard the first performance were well justified. He has heard that blessed old rhapsody since that time in a hundred thin disguises. Jazz composers themselves have been enslaved by it. Over and over they repeat its melodic germs. They even steal the orchestral idioms and afterward tell us that all these were invented by Mr. Grofé. Maybe they were. The admrable Gershwin has not given us anything else better than this rhapsody. It remains the most successful attempt to treat jazz-music in artistic form.

"However, we are not at all concerned about the comparative merits of jazz compositions. Like all other popular music, they come and they go and when they are gone, they are gone forever. Which is the chief difference between what is called popular music and what is even less accurately called 'classical.' Great music is never gone. It persists in being heard all over the world year after year and by generation after generation. The songs and fox-trots, which agitate the souls of the entire people for two or three or four months every year, are not tolerated by them the next year. So it is not worth while to strain our minds trying to determine which is the best. If the 'Rhapsody in Blue' keeps itself alive, it scores a hit."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

(2)

MAY 19 1933

New Bedford Youth Under Contract with Boston Symphony

Manuel C. Valerio, clarinetist, of this city and Boston, who is under contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season, was given this welcome by H. T. Parker, music and dramatic critic of the Boston Transcript. In reviewing last Sunday's Pop program, H. T. P. went out of his way to remark:

"Incidentally, but notably, a young clarinetist, Valerio by name, said to be Portuguese and Conservatory-bred: plainly a desirable addition to the orchestra."

Mr. Valerio, a pupil of Raposo and Da Costa in this city, earned his advanced musical training by work in the Skinner organ factory. Sand, Arcissi and Vannini have been his instructors. Recently, he has played in the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music. He has already substituted in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has been commended by Koussevitsky.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

MAY 19 1933

New Bedford Youth Under Contract with Boston Symphony

Manuel C. Valerio, clarinetist, of this city and Boston, who is under contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season, was given this welcome by H. T. Parker, music and dramatic critic of the Boston Transcript. In reviewing last Sunday's Pop program, H. T. P. went out of his way to remark:

"Incidentally, but notably, a young clarinetist, Valerio by name, said to be Portuguese and Conservatory-bred; plainly a desirable addition to the orchestra."

Mr. Valerio, a pupil of Raposo and Da Costa in this city, earned his advanced musical training by work in the Skinner organ factory. Sand, Arcissi and Vannini have been his instructors. Recently, he has played in the orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music. He has already substituted in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has been commended by Koussevitsky.

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe May 21

Fourth Week of "Pops"

The fourth week of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall, which begins tomorrow evening, will be distinguished by two appearances, with the orchestra, of Hans Wiener and his group of dancers. They will dance Tuesday and Wednesday in response to popular request which followed their first appearances there a fortnight ago.

Sunday night, May 28, will bring the second Sunday concert of the season, enhanced by the addition of refreshments and smoking. The program will be devoted to Russian music featuring numbers of Tchaikovsky,.

A new departure is announced for Monday night, May 29. This will be "artists night," and the lobbies of Symphony Hall will be at the disposal of all artists who wish to bring their pictures for exhibition. Each artist may bring one picture, and put a price upon it if he wishes. Arthur Fiedler is planning an appropriate "artists" program. All who may be interested in showing their work will be given particulars upon inquiry at Symphony Hall.

The Ladies Helping Hand Society have taken the entire house for tomorrow evening's concert. There will be no public sale.

The programs for this week follow:

Tuesday—"Entrance of the Boyards," Halvorsen; Ballet Suite, Rameau-Mottl; "Traumerei," Schumann; "Polonaise," Liszt; "Virginia," a Southern rhapsody, Haydn Wood; "Thais," meditation, solo violin, Julius Theodorowicz, Massenet; "La Valse," choregraphic poem, Ravel.

With Hans Weener, Otto Ashermann and Group of Dancers—"Golliwog's Cake-Walk," Debussy; "The Foolish Virgins," Dvorak; "Danse Grotesque," Schubert; "Persian Ballet," Borodin.

Wednesday, Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; "Fingal's Cave," overture, Mendelssohn; "Jealousy," Gypsy tango, Gade; Natchez on the Hill," Virginia country dance, Powell; "Tosca," fantasia, Puccini; Largo, (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky. With Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann, and group of dancers; "The Foolish Virgins," Dvorak; "Circus," Fucik; "Persian Ballett," Borodin.

Thursday. Program to be announced later.

Friday, French Military March, Saint-Saens; "The Marriage of Figaro," overture, Mozart; Variations on the Austrian National Anthem, from the String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3, Haydn; "Lohengrin," Finale of Act 1, Wagner; "Pathetic" Symphony, Third Movement, Tchaikovsky; Suite, Corelli; "Bolero," Ravel; "Gypsy Love," selection, Lehar; Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; "El Capitan," Sousa.

Saturday—March, "Schechenyi Indulo," Fahrbach; "The Roman Carnival," overture, Berlioz; Andante Cantabile, Fourth Symphony Third Movement, Tchaikovsky; "Lohengrin," prelude, "Rienzi" overture, Wagner; "Rhapsody in Blue," piano solo; Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; "Congress Dances," waltz, Heymann; "Stein Song," march, Bullard.

Sunday—Russian-Tchaikovsky program, "Le Coq d'Or," introduction and wedding march, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Russian and Ludmilla," overture, Glinka; Dances and Songs of the Ghetto, Weprik; "Christmas Eve," suite, Rimsky-Korsakov; Fourth Symphony, finale, waltz from the Serenade for Strings, overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged Jacchia; "Caucasian Sketches," Ippili Ivanov.

FOURTH WEEK OF THE POPS

Her May 20

The fourth week of the Pops at Symphony hall, with Arthur Fiedler and an orchestra of 85, starts Monday evening. On Tuesday and Wednesday evenings Hans Wiener and his dance group will reappear. Sunday night, May 28, brings the second Sunday concert of the season, with refreshments and smoking privileges as added inducements.

MONDAY EVENING, MAY 22

Procession of the Sardar	Ippolitov-Ivanov
"In the Spring," overture	Goldmark
The Old Refrain	Kreisler
"Die Meistersinger," prelude	Wagner
"Peer Gynt" suite	Grieg
"Scheherazade"—The Prince and the Princess	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slav	Tchaikovsky
"Of Thee I Sing," selection	Gershwin
"Volga Bargeman's Song"	Arr. by Jacchia
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," march	Woodin

TUESDAY EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen
Ballet Suite	Rameau-Mottl
Traumerei	Schumann
Polonaise	Liszt
Virginia, A Southern Rhapsody	Haydn Wood
"Thais," meditation	Massenet
Solo violin—Julius Theodorowicz
"La Valse," choregraphic poem	Ravel

HANS WIENER
Otto Ashermann, and group of dancers

Golliwog's Cake-Walk	Debussy
The Foolish Virgins	Dvorak
Danse Grotesque	Schubert
Persian Ballet	Borodin

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
"Fingal's Cave," overture	Mendelssohn
"Jealousy," gypsy tango	Gade
Natchez on the Hill, Virginia country dance	Powell
"Tosca," fantasia	Puccini
Largo	Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky

HANS WIENER
Otto Ashermann and group of dancers

The Foolish Virgins	Dvorak
Circus	Fucik
Persian Ballet	Borodin

THURSDAY EVENING

Program to be announced

FRIDAY EVENING

French military march	Saint-Saens
"The Marriage of Figaro," overture	Mozart
Variations on the Austrian national anthem, from the String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3	Haydn
"Lohengrin," Finale of Act 1	Wagner
Pathetic Symphony, Third Movement	Tchaikovsky
Suite	Corelli
Bolero	Ravel
"Gypsy Love," selection	Lehar
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"	Offenbach
El Capitan	Sousa

SATURDAY EVENING

March, "Schechenyi Indulo"	Fahrbach
"The Roman Carnival," overture	Berlioz
Andante Cantabile	Tchaikovsky
Fourth Symphony, Third Movement	Tchaikovsky
"Lohengrin," prelude	Wagner
"Rienzi," overture	Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Piano solo—Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection	Kern
"Congress Dances," waltz	Heymann
Stein Song march	Bullard

SUNDAY EVENING

Russian-Tchaikovsky program

"Le Coq d'Or," introduction and wedding march	Rimsky-Korsakov
"Russian and Ludmilla," overture	Glinka
Dances and Songs of the Ghetto	Weprik
"Christmas Eve," suite	Rimsky-Korsakov
Fourth Symphony, Finale	Tchaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song	Arr. by Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches	Ippolitov-Ivanov

---

short film subjects. A. C.

Fourth Week of Pops Announced

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall will open their fourth week on Monday night. Arthur Fiedler announces programs of interest to be performed by the Pops orchestra of 85 Symphony players.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, Hans Wiener and his group of dancers will give two return performances at the Pops in response to a general public demand, following the great success of their initial appearances.

Sunday night, May 28, will bring the second Sunday concert of the Pops season, enhanced by the addition of refreshments and smoking. The program will be devoted to Russian music, featuring numbers by Tchaikovsky.

Monday, May 29, is announced as the first Artists' night at the Pops.

Tonight's program follows:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
"Poet and Peasant," Overture	Suppe
"Turkish March," from "The Ruins of Athens"	Beethoven
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Fantasy on Themes from "Hansel and Gretel"	Humperdinck
Slavonic Dance in E minor	Dvorak
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
"Music in the Air," selection	Kern
Prelude in C sharp minor	Rachmaninoff
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March	Woodin

Concert-Crier

May 20

The Pops

On Tuesday—"By general request," Hans Wiener, Otto Ashermann and their little troupe will return for another evening of the dance. This time, the numbers are Golliwog's Cake-Walk; Foolish Virgins; Grotesque Dance; Persian Ballet. Among the orchestral pieces are Ravel's "Waltz" and the "Meditation" from Massenet's "Thais."

On Wednesday—Mr. Wiener and his dancers will be seen again—in the favorite "Circus," in the Persian Ballet, in Foolish Virgins. John Powell's Country Dance, "Natchez on the Hill," smartens the program.

On Thursday—For the second time at these concerts Richard Strauss's sensuous and fiery tone-poem, "Don Juan." There is no more exacting piece, for conductor, orchestra and audience, in the repertory of The Pops. Mr. Casella tried it once in his time and it was well received. On the same program Mr. Fiedler is also turning back to the gypsy rhythms of Kálmán's "Countess Maritza."

Other Evenings—On Monday, usual course with Goldmark's timely overture, "In the Spring," for fresh flavoring, along with the march "Franklin D. Roosevelt." They clap it—or rather him—to the echo these nights at Symphony Hall. As composer among financiers, Mr. Woodin has Mr. Dawes beaten hands down. . . . On Friday, the March Movement from Chaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" and a selection from Lehár's operetta, "Gypsy Love." . . . On Saturday, the Scherzo for plucked strings from Chaikovsky's Symphony in F minor and the waltz in the film, "Congress Dances." One, Heymann, wrote it. Who has forgotten the swirl of the screened figures?

ARTISTS NIGHT, POPS

When the first Artists night is held in Symphony hall in conjunction with the Pops, Monday, May 29, the spacious lobbies of the hall will be at the disposal of all artists who wish to exhibit their pictures. Each artist may show one picture He even may put a price on it. During the intermission the audience will inspect the exhibits. Further information as to this event may be obtained at Symphony hall.

H. May 21

197

The Pops Next Week

Trans May 25

On Sunday

WHILE Dr. Koussevitzky will have none of the Soviet composers at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Fiedler occasionally gives ear to them at The Pops. To the current repertory he added Mossolov's "Iron Foundry," now persisting through a second spring. Next Sunday evening he will expose to Boston another piece from Soviet hands—Alexander Weprik's "Dances and Songs of the Ghetto." On this side of the Atlantic it is by no means friendless. Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra included it in their concerts last winter; Mr. Toscanini and the New York Philharmonic Society in theirs. Weprik himself came out of Russian Poland; now in his early thirties dwells and teaches at Moscow. Before the revolution, Wendling at Liepzig and Janacek at Prague schooled him. After the revolution he completed his studies in Moscow under Miaskovsky. He has written for orchestra and in smaller forms. Russo-Jewish music has particularly attracted him.

These "Dances and Songs of the Ghetto" date from 1927. They are said to be actual folk-tunes of the Russian Jews elaborated by Weprik into a fantasia in which he combines or contrasts them. He scores it for full modern orchestra—woodwinds in fours—with a plentiful percussion corner. The beginning and the end are tranquil. Between, Weprik evolves a complex pattern of songs and dances, often introduced by solo-instruments; intensifies it through vigorous climax; then relaxes the musical tension into the quiet close. According to Mr. Gilman in the program-book of the Philadelphia Orchestra, one at least of the folk-tunes is "infectious." His note leaves the impression of a vivid, animated music. . . . In the program for Sunday Mr. Fiedler also included the Suite drawn by Rimsky-Korsakov from his fantastic opera, "Christmas Eve," suggested by a fairy-tale of Gogol. Nine years ago it was played at the Symphony Concerts. A few may remember the stars at a game of blindman's buff. . . . For the rest more or less familiar numbers from Chaikovsky, Glinka, Rimsky again, other Russians.

Painters, Gypsies, Steins

The progress of The Pops from concerts of light music with spring freedoms into miscellaneous entertainments with a musical background continues briskly next week. By this change they are attracting a public that used seldom to visit them. On the other hand, they may be losing, especially in the first balcony, a part of the public that annually frequented them for the sake of the music as such. Between these two audiences, conductor and management are seemingly trying to steer a middle course—how fortunately the whole season will determine. . . . As it is, on Monday evening, the corridors and the anterooms of Symphony Hall will be hung with pictures offered for sale by the artists who painted them; while indoors music appropriate to the occasion will be heard, among others, numbers from Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Strauss's waltzes, "Artists' Life;" the overture to the opera in which Berlioz celebrated Benvenuto Cellini.

Wednesday is set apart for a "Gypsy Night" at which the audience is invited to wear gypsy costumes in competition for a prize. Music of more or less gypsy origin will be distributed through the program. Miss Patay will be heard in solos upon the cimbalon; Miss Lavadoff seen in gypsy dances. . . . To this "Gypsy Night" succeed on Thursday a "Stein Night." To it the customers are asked to bring stens with the promise of prizes for "unusual specimens." Beer will be served on draught. The program will suit an evening in a beer garden. . . . On the holiday evening of Tuesday long-standing and continuously liked numbers in the repertory will be played. . . . Only on Friday and Saturday will the programs resume norm— course.

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of the Dance

March, "Sambre and Meuse" . Planquette
Overture to the Opera, "William Tell" .... Rossini
Whispering of the Flowers .... Blon
Fantasia from the Opera, "Pagliacci" Leoncavallo
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan" .... R. Strauss
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
Overture to the Opera, "Tannhäuser" Wagner

Dances

Persian Ballet .... Borodin
Circus .... Fucik
Tales from the Vienna Woods . J. Strauss

Conductor: A. Fiedler
Assisting: Hans Wiener and Ensemble

"Artists Night" at the Pops

Trans May 20

From Symphony Hall comes the following:

Mr. Arthur Fiedler has a new and interesting plan for an "Artists Night" at the Pops on Monday evening, May 29.

In addition to a special program, he is undertaking to provide an opportunity so far as corridor space will permit, so that any Boston artist may hang one picture for public exhibition on this occasion. (No picture larger than twelve square feet.)

The conditions for the exhibition are to be as simple as possible. The picture must be delivered at Symphony Hall between one and four o'clock on Monday afternoon, May 29.

There are to be no prizes, nor will there be any popular vote, nor will there be any jury, the only restriction being that pictures cannot be accepted which might give offense.

The management at Symphony Hall will undertake the following service: First, every reasonable precaution will be taken to guard the pictures while the building is open to the public, and fire and theft insurance will be carried for two days. Second, if the picture is for sale and if the artist cares to name a price, this information will be made available to anyone who may inquire. Sales, however, will be a matter between the artist and the interested individual.

The only classifications which Symphony Hall will make for pictures which are accepted will be the following groupings: oils, watercolors, pastels, etchings, etc., are to be hung together in so far as practical. If an artist cares to exhibit a picture and will be good enough to advise us in advance, we shall be glad to reserve a place for him.

It is the hope of the management that the interest in the exhibit will be such as to warrant an annual repetition of "Artists Night" at the Pops.

N.B.: By late telephone communication with Symphony Hall it is learned that there is a possibility that the pictures hung for "Artist Night" will be permitted to remain for several days instead of the one evening originally intended. This, however, is by no means certain, although quite probable.

Herald May 18

PORT OF BOSTON NIGHT AT POPS

Nautical Flavor in Program And Decorations

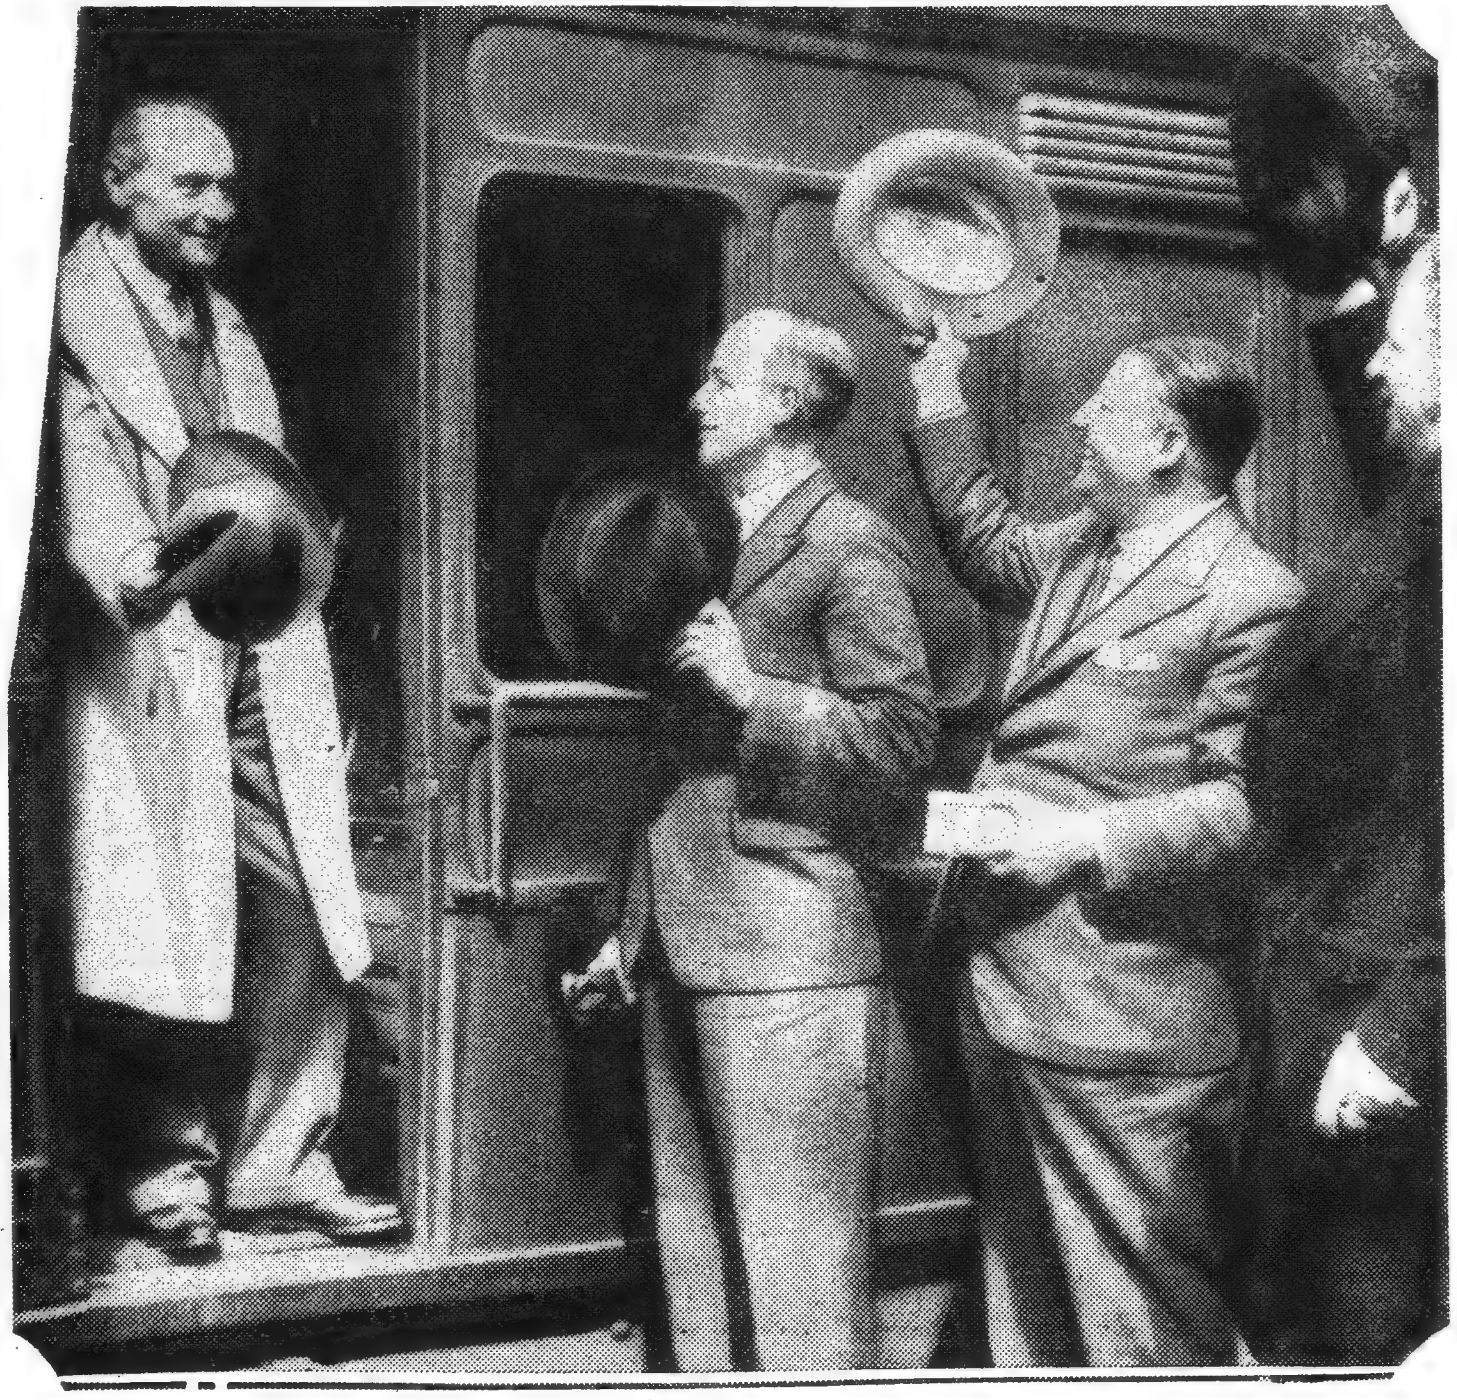
The marble gods and goddesses who populate Symphony hall just above the second balcony seats looked down on an unwonted sight last night. Banners, flags, and pendants of various countries and ship lines draped the walls and hung from the balcony railings; behind Arthur Fiedler the Pops conductor, there shone a glowing brass magnetic compass; above the heads of the orchestra players, within convenient reaching distance, there were man-sized life savers.

The reason for the nautical flavor to the evening was that last night was "Port of Boston" night at the Pops, sponsored by the Boston Port Authority, C. E. Ware, Jr. The committee in charge of the affair was headed by J B. Leonard, chairman. Other members composing the committee were Francis Minot, president of the Merchant Marine Club of Boston; Bentley W. Warren, Walter Doherty, of the Foreign Commerce Club of Boston, and Percy L. Stuart, secretary of the New England Traffic Club. Twelve subcommittees, comprising representattives from the Boston Chamber of Commerce Maritime Association, the Boston Tidewater Terminal, the U. S. customs, the American Stevedoring Association, the Boston Marine Society, various ship building companies, and freight and passenger lines, as well as Boston commercial organizations, assisted the central committee in arranging the unique party.

PORT OF BOSTON NIGHT AT POPS HAS MARINE SETTING

Only the swish of waves and the heave of a boat deck were needed to complete the nautical touch at Symphony Hall last night, when "Port of Boston Night" was held, amid such an array of international flags, marine house flags and other sea atmosphere as the famous musical auditorium never saw before. Completely around the circle of balconies the flags hung down. On the stage, life preservers, each from a different line, mingled with red and green riding lights.

Spread about at the 240 tables on the floor, most of them quietly enjoying legal beer, members of the Boston Port Authority, the Maritime Association of the Boston Chamber of Commerce and other shipping groups of the city were present. The house was a sell-out early in the afternoon.



Conductor

of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, shown arriving at Southampton, Eng., recently, will be the leader of the B. B. C. Symphony Orchestra during the forthcoming musical festival. (International

Record May 22

THIRD WEEK OF THE POPS

Her. May 14

The third week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler conducting, opens tonight with the first Sunday concert of the current season. Jesus Maria Sanroma, as soloist, will play Liszt's first pianoforte concerto in E flat. Refreshments will be served. Tuesday has been designated as annual Harvard night, and Thursday brings Gay Nineties night, repeated from last year by general request. All attending are invited to dress according to the period. Music and pictures of the olden days have been unearthed, there will be other specialties, but the brew will be that of 1933.

The week's programs:

SUNDAY, EVENING, MAY 14

Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia ... Handel
(arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty)
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" .. Strauss
Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in E-flat .... Liszt
(Soloist: J. M. Sanroma)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" . Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" .... Wagner

MONDAY EVENING

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
"The Barber of Seville," Overture .. Rossini
Violin Concerto, Finale .... Mendelssohn
(Soloist: Carmela Ippolito)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Fourth Symphony, Finale ..... Tchaikovsky
Songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir and the Boston Choristers.
"Mlle. Modiste," selection .... Herbert
Largo .... Handel
(Solo violin: J. Theodorowicz, harp, organ and strings)
"Lohengrin," introduction to act III. Wagner

TUESDAY EVENING

(Harvard night)

"Veritas," march .... Densmore
"La Belle Helen," overture ..... Offenbach
Caprice on Spanish Themes . Rimsky-Korsakov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club
Facade .... Walton
Bolero .... Ravel
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club
"Of Thee I Sing," selection ...... Gershwin
"Danube Waves," waltz .... Ivanovici
"Up the Street," march .... Morse

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," overture .... Mendelssohn
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" . Mascagni
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Peer Gynt" suite .... Grieg
"Oberon," overture .... Weber
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss
"Hands Across the Sea," international fantasy .... Sousa

THURSDAY EVENING

(Gay Nineties Night)

March, "Under the Double Eagle" .. Wagner
Martha," overture .... von Flotow
Cavatina .... Raff
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"The Mikado," selection .... Sullivan
Sterioptican slides .... Wilson
Campus Memories
Prestidigitations—By the Musical Magician .... Harrell
"Hearts and Flowers" .... Tobani
Old song favorites

FRIDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise .... Chopin
"The Caliph of Bagdad," overture .. Boieldieu
"Reve Angelique" .... Rubinstein
"Danse Macabre," symphonic poem, Saint-Saens
"Scheherazade," finale .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo .... Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
"Rienzi," overture .... Wagner
"The Band Wagon," selection .... Schwartz
"March of the Toys" .... Herbert
"Wien bleibt Wien," march ..... Schrammel

SATURDAY EVENING

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy" .... Berlioz
"Poet and Peasant," overture .... Suppe
"Turkish March," from "The Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Fantasy on themes from "Hansel & Gretel" .... Humperdinck
Slavonic dance in E minor .... Dvorak
"Finlanda," symphonic poem .... Sibelius
"Music in the Air," selection .... Kern
Prelude in C sharp minor .... Rachmaninoff
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," march .... Woodin

met strangers.

Talking It Over With Unusual Bostonians

No. 11---BERNARD ZIGHERA

This is the 11th in a series of interviews with interesting and unusual residents of Greater Boston. Another will follow next Sunday.

Her. May 24

By ELIZABETH BORTON

There are four brothers Zighera, and three of them are musicians. The musicians paraphrase the famous Marx brothers joke, and say, "Three of us living, and one of us in business in Morocco."

The one in Morocco sends leather cushions and ornaments for the studios of the three who make music. He likes music, but his violin teacher hit him across the knuckles when he was a child, and he was a proud soul. He abandoned music from that moment. A brother, Leon, is a violinist, well known in Europe. Alfred plays the 'cello with distinction in the Boston Symphony orchestra. The youngest one, a musician, too, is Bernard Zighera, first harpist with the Boston Symphony. He is a pianist as well; he took the Paris Conservatory prize for piano in 1925 and the prize for harp in 1926.

Bernard is the short, dark young man who takes up a somewhat worried struggle with the strings of his harp half an hour before each symphony program, inclining a well-washed ear toward the instrument, and paying no attention to the yearning looks of the young ladies who have come early specially to watch him.

Curiously enough there seems to be no incongruity to the spectacle of a young man in a neat gray business suit with a long golden harp reposing on his left shoulder, though poets have long since decided that only willowly young women with hair in a snood and long white silk dresses on should ever play the harp. Still, the outstanding performers on the instrument today are men. Salcedo. Grandjany. That Bernard Zighera and his harp seem a complete and not startling entity, is perhaps psychological proof of this undoubted talent and competence.

It was Salcedo who gave young Zighera's father the idea of purchasing a harp for his youngest. There was something in common. After all, wasn't Salcedo a pianist, and hadn't Bernard already started in well at his piano at the age of eight. When Bernard was 12, he got the harp.

He is now remembering his father with sentimental tenderness, because he has recently been made a father himself. And he has not yet seen the ba-bee.

"Right now all the letters," says he, with a Maurice Chevalier accent, "are—shall we bring the ba-bee to the station, or shall he wait home and only Madame meet me. In the station, there are draughts and bad air for the babee. But home is still some distance, and I have never seen my ba-bee. I don't know." He shrugs his shoulders and bows his head, writhing with indecision.

He sails in two weeks for Madame, home, and the ba-bee.

One of the most important things he has to do in Paris, besides get acquainted with the ba-bee and find out what size harp will accommodate the infant's pudgy hand, is to buy enough strings for his winter season in Boston.

The large harp has 47 strings, and strings sometimes break. Twelve of the strings, as most harpists string up their instruments, are of gut wound with metal thread. They break only after years of use. The other strings, all of gut, may break often, depending somewhat on the weather. Damp weather is bad for them. The harp is a terror at the shore; resenting the dampness it pops strings with maddening regularity.

"Tuning? No, that is not so hard," said Mr. Zighera. "In a quiet room, I can do that in one minute. But you must tune, while the strings are vibrating. It is harder to do in a noisy place—you can imagine."

The red strings are C. The blue ones F. That information for those who wonder how on earth the harpist can find himself among the maze of strings, without even any black key arrangement, as is so conveniently provided by the piano, for a guide.

"The student who wants to make progress on the harp should realize that it requires a great deal of theoretical musicianship as well as technique," he said. He indicated the pedals, of which there are six.

"The pedals control modulations." He illustrated.

The pedals are connected with a series of little stops which can be adjusted to raise the pitch of any string two half-tones, at the discretion of the musician. Therefore, any chord may be produced throughout the range of the strings of the harp. That's why the glissando may sound in different tonalities, to blend into the orchestral pattern, or to give an inescapably romantic effect to harp soli.

Though he is an excellent pianist, when he is tired or moody, or just hungry for music of his own making, it is to the harp he turns most frequently. There is not a very great literature of music for the harp alone. Harpists depend rather generally on arrangements. But some things are more harpistic than pianistic, as he points out, and it is sophistry to scorn all arrangements without considering that the composer may have compromised in the treatment of his material, occasionally, since music written expressly for the harp is likely to get very few performances in comparison with piano performances.

Many modern French composers are writing for the harp alone and in combination with a few other instruments—small ensembles. Debussy wrote for the harp. So does Ravel. And much Debussy piano music is very lovely played on the harp—more at home really, than in the stiff keys of the piano.

The outstanding problem to harpists—especially to harpists who buy their instruments in Europe—is in how to get rubber to cover the pedals, believes Mr. Zighera. He has his own pedals triumphantly muffled, but he still remembers the agony of new shoes on a metal pedal during a competition in Paris, and the awful clatter of his feet in changing modulations.

Mme. Zighera is not a musician, but she is an excellent critic.

"I don't know yet about the ba-bee," he says.

---

rtz's Yiddish

fortune to millionaires who pull down the shades

lowes and Pauline Garon.

First Sunday Pop Concert Tonight With Harvard Night on Tuesday and Return to "Gay Nineties" on Thursday

Post May 24

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

One of the most familiar personalities in the Pops Orchestra these many years is Julius Theodorowicz, the concertmaster, whose fine violin solos have been a high point in many a Pop concert. The number of times that Mr. Theodorowicz has enhanced Handel's Largo by his beautiful playing, nobody has as yet attempted to count. For example, in the coming week Largo is to be heard on Monday and again on Friday. Largo, of course, is but one of the pieces which bring Mr. Theodorowicz to the fore as soloist at the Pops. Mr. Theodorowicz is second concertmaster in the orchestra's winter season, sitting beside Mr. Burgin. He has been a member of the orchestra since 1898 with the exception of three seasons in which he played second violin to Franz Kneisel in the Kneisel Quartet, which famous organization, as everyone knows, was an off-shot of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The genial concertmaster of the Pops, "Julius," as his musical comrades know him, is a native of Poland. He came to America after attaining a reputation as soloist in many parts of Europe, most notably in Vienna, where he served as concertmaster under Komzak and Ziehrer, but to Mr. Theodorowicz Europe is only a background. His affiliations and sentiments are firmly attached to the community, where he has spent the larger part of his life.

Julius Theodorowicz, concertmaster, The Pops.

THIS WEEK'S POPS

Tonight comes the first of the Sunday night Pop concerts, to take place on alternate Sunday evenings through the rest of the Pops season, with a genuinely symphonic programme: a Polonaise, Arietta and Passacaglia of Handel, as arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Strauss' tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; the E-flat Pianoforte Concerto of Liszt, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist; and two Wagnerian excerpts, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

* * * *

Monday evening's programme will begin with Elgar's march, "Pomp and Circumstance"; Carmelia Ippolito will be the soloist in the finale of Mendelssohn's violin concerto; there will be songs by the Boston Square and Compass Club Choir and the Boston Choristers; and along the way will come a typical array of operatic overture, selection from a comic opera and varied symphonic pieces, with that prime favorite of Pops audiences, Handel's "Largo," for good measure.

* * * *

Tuesday will be Harvard Night at the Pops, with the Harvard Glee Club contributing two groups of songs. Densmore's march, "Veritas," and Morse's march, "Up the Street," begin and end a miscellaneous programme that includes Walton's "Facade," Ravel's "Bolero" and a selection from "Of Thee I sing."

* * * *

Wednesday evening Mr. Sanroma will again be the soloist in a performance of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. The programme, in addition to such familiar and well-liked things as the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," the Irish Rhapsody of Victor Herbert, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Blue Danube Waltz," includes the seldom played "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture of Mendelssohn.

* * * *

Thursday there will be another "Gay Nineties" night at the Pops, such as made such a distinct hit least season. Once more the audience is invited to appear in the dress of the period; there will be stereopticon slides of the nineties as well as music of those days, and the management promises "other specialties," with only the beer of 1933 brew. Specifically the programme lists the march, "Under the Double Eagle"; the Overture to "Martha"; a Cavatina of Raff; the Second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt; a selection from "The Mikado"; a number labelled merely "Campus Memories," and another "Prestidigitations—By the Musical Magician"; Tobani's "Hearts and Flowers," and old song favorites for the conclusion.

* * * *

Friday evening will bring again a typical list of Pops' pieces that includes Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre," the Finale of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," Handel's "Largo," the Overture to "Rienzi," and the stirring march of Schrammel, "Wien Bleibt Wien."

* * * *

Saturday night's programme may be listed entire: The "Rakoczy" March of Berlioz; Suppe's "Poet and Peasant" Overture; Beethoven's Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens"; Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry"; a Fantasy on themes from Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel"; a Slavonic Dance of Dvorak; Sibelius' "Finlandia"; a selection from "Music in the Air"; Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor; and the "Franklin D. Roosevelt March," written by Secretary of the Treasury Woodin.

* * * *

SOUTH END MUSIC SCHOOL

The pupils and faculty of the South End Music School are presenting a free concert this afternoon at 3:30 in the Williams Municipal building at Shawmut avenue and Brookline street. A string ensemble, a string quartet, a choral group, and soloists, both vocal and instrumental, will contribute to a well varied programme.

NEW YORK TIMES

199

MAY 14 1933

A CRITICAL SPRING CLEANING

Overtones of Coolidge Festival Suggest Further Deductions Concerning Contemporary Trends in Music

By OLIN DOWNES.

In the Spring the professional commentator upon music may clean up his desk and even his correspondence, and have a good time doing so. Valued material, long thought vanished, may come to light in this process. The clippings that he wants to keep are sorted out. Personally, or with the aid of unfortunate assistants, he puts indices in order. He now peruses, with a delicious sense of personal rectitude, the books that have been piling up for review. If he does not watch out, the spirit of Spring cleaning will get him and lead him to an evil pass. Because he may come to desire not only order among his papers but order, classification, logical arrangement of his ideas about music.

And if he attempts that, he is lost. Ideas change, especially about music. The article of last night, written in white heat, either with enthusiasm or detestation for the offering of the evening, will look somewhat differently the morning after. Six months later, if it comes under the eye, it will be something else again. Six or sixteen years later——! We know of a certain commentator, one of the most distinguished members of his guild in any English-speaking country, who has persistently refused to be inveigled into the writing of any book, despite all sorts of bait held out by publishers, on the grounds that under no circumstance would he put in permanent form ideas that might be read a decade or more after he had committed them to paper.

* * *

There are, of course, two sides to this matter. Since the value of criticism, when it is worthy of that name, lies essentially in its reflection of a mind and the current ideas of its period, the mistakes as well as the intuitive prophecies of this particular writer would be of significance to his own and to later generations. It may be admitted that if more writers shared his thoughtful and scrupulous point of view the public would have been saved much nonsense about music. But if a man is going to write with an air of seriousness about music he might just as well go the whole distance. He must take his chance with the rest of erring humanity, reveal intelligence or the reverse, and having thought it out as well as his limited understanding makes possible exclaim, with the great American bard, "Am I inconsistent? Very well, then, I am inconsistent." What else, in the name of reason and humanity, can a human being adrift in the vast tossing universe of ideas dream of saying?

It is only in the Spring, if ever, that this writer glances back over written opinions. He feels himself fortunate in the possession of an excellent faculty of forgetfulness. If a work is not often performed, or if it happens to have been neglected for any considerable period, he does not recall his precise impression of the earlier performances. Much less does he recall what he wrote at the time. And he does not open the Radamanthus paste-book and find out. Because he thinks it infinitely better to come with a fresh mind and with all the memory creases that there are supposed to be in the brain rubbed out where a particular composition or performer is concerned. Then he is free to have the benefit of a different mood and very possibly a different physical state in his approach to that particular music. This is a fortunate dispensation of nature. It gives a fresh chance all round.

* * *

It happens that a few minutes before the inditing of these sentences a program of the past season that is to be kept came out of the drawer. It is the program of a particularly brilliant concert of an unusually brilliant music festival, held on the 24th of last April in the Music Room of the Library of Congress at Washington—the third concert of the annual music festival which is sponsored and maintained by Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge, who is aided and abetted in her purposes by the Chief of the Music Division of the Library, Mr. Carl Engel. The program was given by Serge Koussevitzky and players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It advanced principally modern and ultra-modern music by Aaron Copland, Igor Stravinsky, Maurice Ravel and Paul Hindemith. Stravinsky was represented by a score which had been for this commentator one of his most obnoxious obfuscations—the "Octuor" for wind instruments. Aaron Copland's score was his "Music for the Theatre," for which Mr. Koussevitzky has long held admiration. Ravel was rather unfairly represented by his "Introduction and Allegro" of 1906, for harp with string quartet, flute and clarinet. Hindemith's score was his "Kammermusik No. 1, Opus 24, No. 1."

* * *

What did this commentator say about these new or relatively new works? What, one wonders, was his particular state of mind when he said it? Will he, having modified certain of his opinions, revert to first estimates in time to come, or will he take the new point of departure as a solid base for future critical operations? This he does not know. But surely he wrote different things on the 24th of April about modern compositions than he had written about other performances of the same works.

He said, for instance, of Copland's "Music for the Theatre," that he found it "music of genuine inspiration and feeling, music composed and not merely invented." He thought that this music had "a personal color, fancy, and in the best moments, emotion." "Music for the Theatre," he claimed, was "the work of a young composer, finding himself, with something real and not merely derivative to say." The writer knows without looking it up that he did not say such complimentary things when he first heard Mr. Copland's "Music for the Theatre."

* * *

He must, as a matter of fact, have been in a rarely expansive and affable mood on the evening in question. A performance of Stravinsky's "Octuor" at a modern music concert in New York, seasons prior to the Washington festival, had occasioned indignation rather too strong for explicit utterance in print. On April 24 he did not depart from his original estimate of the composition so much as he changed his attitude toward it. He discovered that "the dryness, banality, and sometimes indecent laughter of Stravinsky's Octuor amused, where it had"—he remembered so much of a previous impression—"irritated." He continued, "Its philosophy might be termed defeatist, with its deliberate negation of any emotional impulse or creative flame, and the careful avoidance, perhaps enforced, of any significant invention. Making a virtue, so to speak, of his aridity, Stravinsky does things which compel attention if not admiration for his message and which have an amusing angle."

That last sounds rather—right. Probably fair, whereas an earlier estimate is remembered as probably not being fair or appreciative of just what Stravinsky was driving at. Notwithstanding that the "Octuor" for wind instruments will probably remain a mile-stone of Stravinsky's downward path as a creative artist. The point is that decadence has its meaning and its certain value, if only as an indication of a movement in art, and that music must be estimated, so far as the personal point of view permits, for what it is rather than for what it is not.

That program was contrived, one would say, with a good deal of cunning, although certainly it was hard upon Ravel (who, on the whole, has kept quite abreast of the times) to put him among an implacable group of modernist composers with his soft, defenseless, invertebrate and Debussian piece for harp and adjacent instruments. It amounted to a fierce parody and demolition of one fragment, at least, of what is actually late nineteenth century impressionism. How the piece dated! Still, the only fair test of the impressionistic period on that program would have been one of the best works of the genius of the school and the epoch, Debussy. Then it might have been felt that the beauty and imagination of that composer and that school was far more authentic and lasting than the nervous vigor and sardonic strength, for example, of the music of Hindemith.

As it was, the Hindemith music simply swept up the floor by its vigor, virtuosity and youthful élan. It was prodigiously diverting, audacious, living. Not merely music of a moment's fashion, though perhaps music of the moment. How sure it was! How impetuous and, often, Rabelaisian!

What was most important of all in this music was the vivid and sure sense that it communicated of an evolution of a living language. That is the point. It gave notice, unmistakably, of a new period. Whether that period is the happiest one for men or not it would be profitless to inquire. It was clear, with this piece, that a new day and a new man, probably not ranking with the giants of the musical art but a man genuinely and creatively of his time, were upon us. The piece seemed also to have escaped or at least emerged from the shibboleths of a modern group. It was not neoclassic in its attitude or self-conscious in its professions. It did not aim at the elimination of feeling, or fanatically exalt line or polytonality. On the contrary, there was a slow movement in which, with a few instruments, a few notes and an ultra-modern harmonic, Hindemith certainly evoked a mood of poetry. In a finale that was partly vicious farce, partly bitter, partly dramatic, a finale which had the parenthetical indication "1922"—possibly a reference to German psychology at the particular year—he took everything by the ears with a swift and decisive manner that set the orchestra a-spinning and left the listener in a state of astonished exhilaration. And certainly with the knowledge that something real, whatever its relative importance, is going on in music.

To all these realizations the magnificent orchestral performance—magnificent in all but the reading of the Bach B minor suite for flute and strings which opened the performance—contributed. Modern music and classic music alike gain or lose much by the quality of the performance. A poor performance can obscure the quality of even very excellent and well-known music. As the combination of circumstances worked out, the occasion was one of illumination—illumination, for one listener, of changes taking place in the musical art, surely, inevitably—changes springing directly from the consciousness of this period. Illumination again of the fact that in a universe of fluctuation and relativity, only one thing is constant and to be reckoned upon. That thing is change.

Albert Stoessel, Director of the Westchester County Music Festival, to Be Given Friday at the County Centre, White Plains.

200

Noteworthy Season of Boston Symphony Recalled, Reviewed

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

Adv May 28

A DAY OR TWO before Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for Europe for his customary sojourn of quiet and study, he told me that he thought the season just closed was his most successful since he came to Boston, nine years ago. Most of those who have attended the Boston Symphony concerts regularly will agree with Dr. Koussevitzky, even though he and his orchestra have had some extraordinary successes in the past.

The season has been a full one, both in the variety and quality of the repertoire and in the standard of performance. The climax, naturally, was the Brahms Festival at the end, when the century-old master was suitably honored by performance of three of the four symphonies, the two piano cencerti and the concerto for violin and 'cello, two overtures and the "Haydn" variations, and the German Requiem. Add to this the chamber music program in the Festival and the F major symphony heard earlier in the season, and even the most avid Brahmsian had no cause for complaint.

* * *

NEXT in importance—some might say of surpassing importance—was the cycle of Sibelius symphonies. There are seven in all. When he planned the cycle Dr. Koussevitzky thought he he would be able to complete it with the first performance of a new symphony by the great Finnish master. Sibelius, however, was not ready with the work, which will presumably be heard here next season. In the meantime we have had the opportunity to see and hear in recapitulation the growth of the greatest composer of our time—and I say this with the names of Stravinsky and Strauss and Ravel in mind.

The year has had its share of novelties, several of which have been of unusual merit and interest. Four works were performed for the first time anywhere—Carpenter's "Patterns," Converse's "Prophecy," Gruenberg's first symphony, and Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante. All but the last of these were by American composers, for whose music Dr. Koussevitzky has proved himself an ardent champion and discerning executant. Of the trio, my preference was for the Gruenberg symphony. Readers of these pages have had opportunity to ascertain my views on the intricate, swollen, prodigiously difficult work of Schmitt, who was soloist at the premiere.

* * *

AMONG the other compositions new to Boston, and in many instances previously unheard in America, the outstanding were Walton's brilliant choral-orchestral "Belshazaar's Feast," brilliantly performed; Arnold Bax's far-flung "Winter Legends," for piano and orchestra; Charles Martin Loeffler's "Evocation," for women's voices and orchestra; Sibelius' "Tapiola"; and Prokofieff's fifth piano concerto, in which the composer played the piano part of a stunning performance. Yet his suite from "The Gambler" fell flat here. And I must not forget to include, in the list, Edward Burlingame Hill's charming Sinfonietta.

In performance the orchestra has gone steadily ahead, while its imaginative conductor has not only led it but also learned from it. It is not disrespectful to say that Dr. Koussevitzky is a far greater musician today than when he came here, for other great conductors have learned from this Boston Orchestra. An illustration is the performance of the Brahms E minor symphony during the Festival, when the conductor reached, to my mind, not only his high-water mark as conductor of Brahms but in some respects his top as discerning musician with any music.

* * *

THERE were inevitably some disappointments—very few. One of them was the performance of the Beethoven Ninth symphony, in which the conductor failed to display his characteristic zest, and the soloists were below the usual standard. Similarly went the excerpts from "Parsifal." Set against these, on the other hand, the superb fusion of conductor and orchestra with Gabrilowitsch, soloist in the two Brahms piano concerti; the excellent version of d'indy's symphony on a French Mountain Air, with Heinrich Gebhard as soloist; the magnificent presentation of Strauss' "Don Quixote," with Piatigorsky as the illuminating and poetic 'cellist, and Gieseking's flawless artistry in a Mozart C major concerto.

(Apropos of Gieseking, who first conquered the town in this same concerto several years ago, Koussevitzky intimated that the pianist would appear next season with the orchestra in "something big," the nature of which could not, for the present, be more completely divulged.)

Necessarily there have been numerous omissions from an article of this size. But it is certainly clear that Dr. Koussevitzky and his band have given us a series of performances comparing favorably with others given anywhere in the world; that within the limits of a prescribed budget, able and celebrated soloists were called for performance of interesting works; and, most important of all, that the symphonic repertoire was representative of the best that has been written in times past and present, in Europe as a matter of course, in America as a matter of duty and choice.

Adv May 28

First Sunday Concert Begins Pops Third Week

THE POP CONCERTS will open their 3rd week in Symphony Hall tonight with the first Sunday concert of the season. Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear with the Pops Orchestra in Liszt's Piano Concerto in E flat. Refreshments will be served at this concert.

Arthur Fiedler announces the following program for the week:

TONIGHT

Polonaise, Arietta, and Passacaglia, Handel
(Arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty)
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven
"Till Eulenspiegal's Merry Pranks," Strauss
Pianoforte Concerto No. 1 in E-flat, Liszt
(Soloist, J. M. Saroma)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner
"The Ride of the Valkyries" ...Wagner

MONDAY

Pomp and Circumstances .... Elgar
"The Barber of Seville," Overture, Rossini
Violin Concerto, Finale .... Mendelssohn
(Soloist, Carmela Ippolito)
Ballet of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
Invitation to the Dance ..Weber-Berlioz
Fourth Symphony, Finale ..Tchaikovsky
Songs by Boston Square and Compass Club Choir and the Boston Choristers.
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection ......Herbert
Largo .... Handel
(Solo violin: J. Theodorowicz)
"Lohengrin," Introduction to Act III, Wagner

TUESDAY

"Veritas" March..............Densmore
"La Belle Helene," Overture, Offenbach
Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakov
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club
Facade .... Walton
Bolero .... Ravel
Songs by the Harvard Glee Club.
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection .. Gershwin
"Danube Waves," Waltz ......Ivanovici
"Up the Street," March .... Morse

WEDNESDAY

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Overture .... Mendelssohn
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Irish Rhapsody .... Herbert
"Peer Gynt" Suite .... Grieg
"Oberon," Overture .... Weber
Rhapsody in Blue .... Gershwin
(Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma)
'Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
"Hands Across the Sea," International Fantasy .... Sousa

THURSDAY
(GAY NINETIES NIGHT)

March, "Under the Double Eagle," Wagner
"Martha," Overture .... Von Flotow
Cavatina .... Raff
Second Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
"The Mikado," Selection ...... Sullivan
Steriopticon Slides ....Wilson
Campus Memories.
Prestidigitations—By the Musical Magician .... Harrell
"Hearts and Flowers" .... Tobani
Old Song Favorites.

FRIDAY

Military Polonaise .... Chopin
"The Caliph of Bagdad," Overture, Boieldieu
"Reve Angelique" .... Rubenstein
"Danse Macabre," Symphonic Poem, Saint-Saens
"Scheherazade," Finale, Rimsky-Korsakov
Largo .... Handel
"Rienzi," Overture .... Wagner
"The Band Wagon," Selection .Schwartz
"March of the Toys" .... Herbert
"Wien bleibt Wien," March ..Schrammel

SATURDAY

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"....Berlioz
"Poet and Peasant," Overture ....Suppe
"Turkish March" from "The Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Fantasy on Themes from "Hansel & Gretel" ....Humperdinck
Slavonic Dance in E minor .... Dvorak
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem ..Sibelius
"Music in the Air," Selection .... Kern
Prelude in C sharp minor Rachmaninoff
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March..Woodin

EXETER The place where you forget your troubles
Sun., Mon., Tues., Wed.
The Barrymores in Rasputin and the Empress
3 Reel Educational. Krakatoa
Thurs., Fri., Sat.
Wm. Collier, Jr., also Joan Marsh in "Speed Demon" Katherine Hepburn in "Christopher Strong"

May 21

E OF THE BOSTON SUNDAY POST, Y, MAY 27, 1933

Art Night Is Planned as Pops Feature---Week's Programme

The pictorial arts are to be honored at the Pops a week from tomorrow night, Monday, May 29, when the spacious lobbies of Symphony Hall will be at the disposal of each and every artist wishing to display his work. Each entrant may bring one picture—and he may set a price upon it if he so desires. A large and notable exhibition of pictures in every medium, and ranging from the most conservative to the most radical in treatment, is confidently expected, and anyone interested in showing his or her work will be given full particulars upon application to Symphony Hall. Meanwhile, Mr. Fiedler is planning an appropriate programme for this first Artists' Night.

THIS WEEK AT THE POPS

Tomorrow evening the Pops begin their fourth week of the season. Mr. Fiedler's programmes, familiar by now in their general outline, once more offer an assortment of well-liked music grave and gay, old and new. Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Grieg's "Peer Gynt Suite," "The Prince and the Princess," from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," and a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing" are among the offerings for Monday evening.

* * * *

Tuesday evening, and again on Wednesday, Hans Wiener and his group of dancers will repeat the appearances so popular a short time ago. On Tuesday evening, Mr. Theodorowicz will be the soloist in the "Meditation" from Massenet's "Thais," in addition to a generous programme of purely orchestral numbers, and on Wednesday evening, Handel's "Largo" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture, two "request night" regulars, stand together on programme. As for Mr. Wiener's part of the programmes, "The Foolish Virgins," to music of Dvorak, and the Persian Ballet to the music of Borodin's "Prince Igor" Dances will be danced both Tuesday and Wednesday evenings; Debussy's "Golliwog's Cake-Walk" and a "Dance Grotesque," to music of Schubert, complete the Tuesday list, Borodin's Circus that of Wednesday.

* * * *

The programme for Thursday evening has not yet been announced as these words are written. On Friday evening the Finale of the first act of "Lohengrin," the third movement of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and Ravel's "Bolero' 'are among the more important items. Saturday evening Mr. Sanroma will once again be the pianist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," and the "Roman Carnival" Overture of Berlioz and Wagner's to "Rienzi" both have place on that list.

FIRST SPRING FESTIVAL

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

Georges Mager, trumpet soloist of the Pops orchestra.

Perhaps the most versatile musician in the Boston Symphony Orchestra happens to be the first trumpet player, both in the winter and in the Pops season. He is Georges Mager, a Frenchman, who first came to this country not as a trumpet player but as a tenor soloist, and first joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a member of the viola section. Mr. Mager came to this country as vocal soloist of the French Military Band, from which in 1918 the Boston Symphony Orchestra obtained some of its finest wood-wind players.

Naturally, Mr. Mager's development of his voice as well as his efficiency both as a string and brass player, was part of his early training. He took equal honors at the Paris Conservatoire as trumpet and viola player. Now the exacting duties of his important post in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the necessity of keeping his "lips" just right for the excessively difficult solo passages which occur in almost every symphony concert, prelude any other kind of music making. The singing in the Mager family is now done by Madame Mager, who is a fine soprano and appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carpenter's "Skyscrapers."

The Magers are going to France this summer. Usually they set off immediately after the Pops engagement, together with their child and their two police dogs, for their little house in Winter Harbor, Me., which is their usual retreat in the months of July and August.

Musicians --

London Echoes of Dr. Koussevitzky

The Conductor as He Is Heard At a Concert Across The Seas

IN the latest packet of newspapers arriving from England are to be found accounts of the concert which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in London on May 15. Mr. Francis Toye in the Morning Post writes warmly of the occasion.

"London," ~~he says~~, "had the high privilege of welcoming that great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, at the Queen's Hall for the second week of the London Music Festival organised by the enterprise of the British Broadcasting Company. Perhaps, in view of my ignorance as to the racial origin of the Finns, it is rash to describe the program as being Slav—but the designation will serve—particularly if, as an anthropologist once said, it has no real anthropological meaning.

"In any case, the selection of Prokofiev's 'Symphonie Classique,' Sibelius's Seventh and Chaikovsky's Fifth symphonies was an uncommonly happy one. for they all possess a kind of common denomination yet are wholly differentiated. Nor could any three pieces of music have been better chosen to show off M. Koussevitzky's versatile gifts as a conductor. Prokofiev's amusing and wholly charming essay in classicism—a classicism which according to the writers of the program notes follows Italian rather than German models alike in form and feeling—demands the lightest of light touches and sparkling vivacity. Sibelius's music requires a certain austerity, but an austerity illuminated by an intense glow and presented with exceptional sensitiveness to its design. Chaikovsky's symphony, on the other hand, invites definite liberties in tempo and expression, and can, of course scarcely be played in too emotional or dynamic a manner.

"The manner in which Koussevitzky handled all three was nothing less than extraordinary. Such was his insight into the characteristics of the composers that one felt that each in turn was his favorite, the man whom he delighted to honor, which, needless to say, is the highest compliment that can be paid to an interpretative artist. Perhaps it is unnecessary in the case of a conductor of his standing to stress the impeccable rhythm, the beautiful feeling for tonal balance. But one must stress his uncanny power over the orchestra. Splendidly as the orchestra often play, I would not have believed that the strings could have displayed the strength they achieved in the Sibelius, or that the whole orchestra could have attained the barbaric frenzy to which they rose in the last movement of the Chaikovsky.

"But then, Koussevitzky's handling of this particular movement was perhaps in reality the most remarkable thing in the evening. Every musician knows its pitfalls; they seemed not to exist. Small wonder, then, that at the end the huge audience went mad with enthusiasm. It was never better deserved."

"It is many years since the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has visited London, and the large audience welcomed his return to the Queen's Hall very warmly," remarked the Times.

". . . The two works in the first part of the program represent, in very diverse ways, the reaction of later generations against all that Chaikovsky stands for—the splendors of full orchestral tone, the miseries of self-expression as an end in itself, and the enlargement of an accepted symphonic formula to the utmost possible limit. The Symphonies by Prokofiev and Sibelius together took less time to perform than Chaikovsky's. But in their brevity their similarity ends. Prokofiev is brief because he has little to say and wisely curtails even the comparatively slight limits of the eighteenth century forms before we have time to weary of his elegant and clever pastiches.

"Sibelius is brief, because he is able to compress all that he has to say—and that 'all' is a great deal more than most symphonies contain—within the time-space of Chaikovsky's first movement. M. Koussevitzky must have a word of gratitude for allowing us to hear once more this grimly beautiful work, which even the recent popularity of Sibelius had not brought back to London concert programs.

"In the performances the character of each work was finely realized. Prokofiev's Symphony was exquisite in finish and not without a touch of fun. Sibelius's was at once precise in detail and full of restrained energy. Its grandeur and its eloquence were apparent in spite of a refinement that, perhaps, left out of account something of its native ruggedness.

"After the interval M. Koussevitzky, to use a colloquialism, let himself go in an intensely dramatic performance of Chaikovsky's Symphony, which yet avoided vulgarity, noisiness and, miraculously in view of the pace at which he took the slow movement, sentimentality. The playing of the orchestra was throughout entirely worthy of the special nature of the occasion, which is indicated in the word 'festival.'"

"Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a somewhat singular program," Mr. Bonavia of the Daily Telegraph found. "Prokofiev is fairly well known here. His glib, well-turned, easy music commends itself to those in search of a style which has all the appearance of being modern and daring, and at the same time evades all the problems of modernity. Its inclusion was probably due to the desire to secure an effective contrast to the Sibelius symphony. If this was the conductor's object it was certainly achieved.

"The seventh symphony is probably the most stern and gaunt work of a composer who alone can tell us in music of moods and thoughts that arise when good things of day begin to drowse. No other work of his conveys so powerfully the sense of frustration—not the Byronic despair and melancholy of a Chaikovsky, but something deeper and more elemental. It was this work which showed in clearest light the conductor's genius as an interpreter. For there is little in past experience to help us. To know Sibelius well one must possess the power of divining his thought. Those long climaxes, those curious melodic designs, cannot be realized by systems that respond well in the case of music which has grown out of a long tradition. And Mr. Koussevitzky gave us an interpretation which was not only technically superb, but closely in sympathy with Sibelius's mind and emotion.

"The Chaikovsky symphony revived memories of early wonders and early Proms. It was played freely but without the rhythmic oddities some conductors consider essential to Chaikovsky—with utmost ease and magnificent energy."

The Coming Week at Pop Concerts

Tomorrow night the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will open their fifth week with the second Sunday concert of the season, when Arthur Fiedler will present an all Russian programme featuring the music of Tchaikovsky.

Beginning Monday, programs have been arranged of special appeal to artists, and on Monday night the corridors of Symphony Hall will be covered with pictures loaned by artists far and wide for the first picture exhibition at the Pops. A large and notable display is assured for the inspection of the audience during intermissions. The program will consist of music inspired by the pictorial arts.

On Tuesday, the holiday, there will be a program of Pops favorites.

Wednesday will be the first Gypsy Night at the Pops, suggesting the bohemian side of the arts. There will be colorful decorations. The audience is invited to come in Gypsy dress, and prizes will be awarded to the best table party. Arthur Fiedler has drawn his program from the rich store of Gypsy music of various nations. The program will also include Elsie Patay, the Gypsy Cimbalom player, and Lefa Lavanoff, the Gypsy dancer, who will appear with the orchestra.

Thursday, June 1, will be Stein Night, with music suggesting the old days of drinking and singing. Every one is invited to come with a stein, for there will be beer on draught and prizes for the most curious specimens.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow night follow:

TONIGHT

March, "Schechenyi Indulo"	Fahrbach
"The Roman Carnival," Overture	Berlioz
Andante Cantabile	Tchaikovsky
Fourth Symphony, Third Movement	Tchaikovsky
"Lohengrin," Prelude	Wagner
"Rienzi," Overture	Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma	Gershwin
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection	Kern
"Congress Dances," waltz	Heymann
Stein Song March	Bullard

SUNDAY NIGHT

"Le Coq d'Or," introduction and Wedding March	Rimsky-Korsakov
"Russian and Ludmilla," overture	Glinka
"Dances and Songs of the Ghetto"	Weprik
"Christmas Eve," suite	Rimsky-Korsakov
Fourth Symphony, Finale	Tchaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song. Arranged by	Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches	Ippolitov-Ivanov

The Notice Board

May 27

The Pops

On Sunday—A program from Russian composers, ten numbers long. One item—Weprik's "Songs and Dances of the Ghetto"—is new to Boston. It was played last winter by Mr. Stokowski in Philadelphia and Mr. Toscanini in New York. . . . Another item is unfamiliar—the suite that Rimsky-Korsakov drew for the concert-hall from his opera, "Christmas Eve." . . . Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Caucasian Sketches," usually represented at The Pops by the "Procession of the Sardar," will be played in full. . . . Other familiar numbers come from Chaikovsky, Glinka and Rimsky-Korsakov. . . . Drinks will be served as usual and smoking permitted on the floor.

On Wednesday—A "Gypsy Night," to which the customers are invited to come in gypsy dress. The best-costumed party will receive a prize. Music of gypsy origin or suggestion will be distributed through the program. Miss Elsie Patay will play solo-pieces upon the cimbalon. Miss Lefa Lavanoff will dance gypsy dances.

On Thursday—A "Stein Night" to which the customers are bidden to bring their own steins and to compete for prizes awarded to singular specimens. Beer will be sold on draught. The house will be invited to join in song. The program will suggest a beer-garden.

Other Evenings—On Monday, when the corridors of Symphony Hall will be hung with pictures (submitted for sale by the painters), Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will play numbers suggested by the pictorial arts. Fragments of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Berlioz's overture to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," Strauss's waltzes, "Artists' Life," for convenient examples. . . . On Tuesday, a holiday, the program will assemble favorite numbers from the long-standing repertory. . . . On Friday, in normal course, the Tartar Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" will be played; on Saturday, Chaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

At The Pops Sunday

Introduction and March from the Opera, "The Golden Cockerel"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to the Opera, "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
Songs and Dances of the Ghetto (First time in Boston)	Weprik
Suite from the Opera, "Christmas Eve"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Finale from the Symphony in F-minor	Chaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings.	Chaikovsky
Overture, "The Year 1812"	Chaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song	Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches	Ippolitov-Ivanov

Conductor: A. Fiedler

202

N. Y. EVENING POST

MAY 27 1933

Music : By Charles Pike Sawyer

Once More the American Composer Is Defended Against Conductors Who Will Not Play His Pieces

EVERY once in a while somebody rises to remark that the American composer is the best abused person in the world, citing instances to prove that conductors, directors, producers and others have combined to keep native compositions off programs and to prevent wonderful operas from seeing the light of day—or rather the limelight of the night, as it were.

The latest outpouring was this week in Minneapolis at the convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs when John Tasker Howard took up the cudgels in their defense and pointed to Arturo Toscanini as the chief discriminator against the American composers by "conductors in high places."

"This conductor," he said, "has provided his audiences with the finest performances of master works they have ever heard. But on occasions this greatest of conductors, and he is just that, will not hesitate to produce some new work by one of his own countrymen, which, in the opinion of both critics and audiences, is frankly mediocre. In the seven years he has conducted he has presented only four American works."

BUT why pick on Toscanini? Why not the rest of the great conductors—Stokowski, Koussevitzky, Sokaloff and, even though he is no longer the head of a great symphony orchestra, Walter Damrosch? And why not pick on Gatti-Casazza for not giving us more operas by American composers? Why bring up the subject anyway? What earthly difference does it make whether the music we love was written yesterday or centuries ago, or by an American citizen or inhabitant of Timbuctoo?

There's an idea in my mind that all the great leaders of the last half century and more were concerned only in giving the music they loved for its own sake—not because it was written in any section of the world. That was the idea of Theodore Thomas, who compelled us to like Wagner beginning in the old Central Park Garden—for us—in 1869. That was the idea of his great successor, Anton Seidl, and, in my opinion, has been the ruling passion of his successors in the Philharmonic and the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Chicago and other orchestras.

What does the American composer, or he of any other nationality, gain by a single performance of a work he has labored over for many moons? Once in a great while compositions by Americans are greeted with great applause, are heard a season or two and then slip into the discard. Once in a while composers of other nations get hearings for some things that tickle the musical palates of the public and then ar forgotten. Why? Can it be possible that the question of royalty to the composer since the international copyright law comes into consideration? I wonder. Let's take a look at the history of other orchestras in Toscanini's present engagement here.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has, in the last seven years, given many first performances of American composers. By American meaning native composers. Surely Mr. Howard did not include those emigrants from Russia and Germany who began their musical careers in their native lands and came here long past the age of youth. If he ranks all these as American composers, they have had a very fair share of attention.

Probably Mr. Koussevitzky has directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in more compositions of American musicians than all the others put together, but it is not an encouraging record. Twenty-one are on the list and of them ten were born in or near Boston, with not one of the total of fifteen numbers played more than once. Edward Burlingame Hill has been represented by four—Symphony in B flat major, "Lilacs," Sinfonietta in one movement, and the ode for the Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary. Frederick Shepherd Converse has been represented by "California" and "Prophecy," and Walter Piston by "Symphonic Piece" and "Piece for Orchestra."

Other Boston or nearby composers were Daniel Gregory Mason, Symphony in C minor; Arthur Foote, Suite for String Orchestra; Blair Fairchild, "Chant Negres"; George W. Chadwick, Sinfonietta in F major; Carl McKinley, "Masquerade"; A. L. Steinert, "Legenda Sinfonica"; Mabel W. Daniels, "Exultate Deo." Not one of these played more than once, and the record of the eleven other composers is the same except that John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" has been played three times since 1927, while his "Patterns" and "Adventures in a Perambulator" have had one performance each. Other American composers with records of one performance each are:

Ernest Schelling's "Morocco," Howard Hanson's "Nordic" Symphony and "Romantic" Symphony, Rubin Goldmark's "A Negro Rhapsody," Henry Eicheim's "Java" and "Burma," Henry Hadley's "Salome" and "Streets of Pekin," Aaron Copland's "Symphonic Ode," George Gershwin's "Rhapsody No. 2," Charles T. Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Poem for flute and orchestra, Leo Sowerby's "Prairie" and Edward A. MacDowell's "Hamlet; Ophelia."

HENRY EICHEIM fared best at the hands of Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra during the same period with four pieces, "Burma," "Japanese Nocturne," "Java," and "Bali," each of which was played once, which was the record for all other American composers. This conductor did better than others for he gave an all-American program in 1931, consisting of Robert Russell Bennett's "Abraham Lincoln," Charles T. Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn," Henry Cowell's "Synchrony," John Powell's "Three Virginia Country Dances," Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theater" and Walter Piston's Suite for Orchestra, with Louis Gruenberg and Arcady Dubensky, Russians, on the same program.

Other American compositions on the list were Ruth Deyo's "Diadem of Stars," John Beach's "New Orleans Street Cries at Dawn," Frederick Jacobi's "Indian Dances," Sandor Harmati's "Prelude to a Drama," Edward A. MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Leo Sowerby's "Prairie" and Wallingford Riegger's "Study in Sonority for Forty Violins." Not one of the eighten compositions by American musicians was played more than once.

During the same period the records of the other orchestras was practically the same, although Mr. Sokaloff in Cleveland, gave three performances of MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose," two of "In Autumn" and one of "To a Waterlily"; three of Griffes's "The White Peacock," and one each of Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," "The Garden of Live

Werner Josten's Concerto for piano and string orchestra.

Surely these conductors have tried to give American composers an opportunity, and if they never gave a piece more than one hearing it is safe to say that it was because of its reception by the public. The man on the podium can always tell whether his hearers like his program, and rarely tries to force his likes upon his hearers. Once in a while he compels us to get into step as did Theodore Thomas with Wagner, and we are mighty glad he did.

NEW YORK TIMES

MAY 28 1933

Serge Koussevitzky appeared as guest conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra at the B. B. C. London Music Festival's last three concerts some days ago. He had not conducted in London since 1925. His program included Sibelius's Seventh symphony, Arnold Bax's Second symphony, William Walton's "Portsmouth Point" and Beethoven's Ninth symphony.

NEW YORK SUN

MAY 27 1933

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

THE advent of summer, which is at hand, sees the customary decrease in local musical activities. Those who cannot find pleasure in the opulent silences of the prairie or the mountain, but must have their daily ration of Bach, Beethoven or Brahms, will be able to obtain a plentiful supply from the Stadium concerts. These are to continue in spite of the lingering depression. And there will be band concerts in Central Park as usual. There will be a plenty of music in other places. Many music lovers, however, will hasten to Europe to attend festivals. One can but hope that their delights will be in no way impaired by political disruptions. Possibly some of the cheerfully unconcealed dislike of Americans may disappear under the benign influence of the peaceful promulgations from Washington.

There has been no desperate effort to smile at Americans in Europe in recent summers, although dollars continued to enjoy their long established favor. But while most other travelers took note of the antagonistic attitude of Europe, music lovers seemed to be unaware of it. They habitually reported that they found everything as it always had been. Thus do we see how the absorption of music's devotees in their art makes them insensible to the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune.

Wagnerites will go to Bayreuth even if the dramas are edited. Probably they will not be, for they do not clamor for political reconstruction as "Rienzi" seemed to. A learned German lately blue penciled that work for home consumption so that it could speak no offense to the Government. The editor explained that certain elements in the drama were unnecessary to the delineation of the character of the great Rienzi, savior of his people. So he calmly cut out all those portions of the score.

Toscanini might object to revision of "Der Ring des Nibelungen." But there ought not to be any thought of editing a fourfold drama which sets forth the overthrow of a worn out dynasty and the birth of a new world purified by fire. There will be festivals in other places. Bayreuth has no monopoly of enterprises designed to attract tourists. Doubtless some of the progressives will get together and perform their music for one another and for their immediate followers. Meanwhile if you cannot go to Europe, there will be doings in the Hollywood bowl and even at Chautauqua.

Novelties and Conductors.

IT WILL not be at Bayreuth nor yet at Chautauqua that the renaissance of music will emerge. At both places audiences will hear no revelations. The dearth of creative genius compels musical managers and conductors to rely on the older materials. It is true that Mr. Koussevitzky introduced numerous novelties to us in the season just ended. But how many of them proved of importance? He made us acquainted with some Russian things. So did Stokowsky. We have heard nothing less hopeful than the specimens of Soviet art which have been industriously advertised. Perhaps it is not exact to include the "Rebus" of Markevitch among them, but this prophetic young man gave us one of the completely worthless scores of a sterile winter. Some time ago the writer read remarks of this youth about his predecessors, of whom he disposed with curt contempt. Nevertheless it is the safest of all predictions that indolent publics, not eagerly seeking for new things, will go on listening to Bach and that lot.

The plain truth is that the Soviet composers appear to be intellectually under the domination of the machine. They may cherish some ideals of art, but when they compose they do it like workmen laboring at a task imposed upon them by a government which has a hand of steel. Outside of Russia composers are apparently at sea. They go from purpose to purpose and manner to manner, just as Stravinsky has been doing, and they eventually arrive nowhere. Mr. Toscanini gave us some Italian novelties in the course of his Philharmonic season and these served to show us that even in Italy there was a poverty of musical ideas. Incidentally Toscanini has been scolded for not producing more American works. We have no apology to make for the famous conductor, but he should not be blamed for presenting music which is sympathetic to him and ignoring that which is not.

German conductors know and feel German music; Italian conductors, Italian music. If the Philharmonic would entrust half a dozen of its programs to some American conductor perhaps he would introduce native works to us. But, unfortunately, what almost invariably happens when an American conductor is in command is a performance of some composition of his own which no one else will play. Are there not some American conductors who do not compose? Whatever else the dissatisfied ones may say about Toscanini they cannot charge him with playing his own music.

Cannot Americans Conduct?

WHY do we not produce conductors? We have two or three good directors, but none to be placed beside the celebrities of Europe. Setting aside Toscanini we have no Furtwaengler, no Busch, nor even a Sir Thomas Beecham. Cannot a great conductor be developed in this country? That question has already been answered. Frederick Stock and Leopold Stokowsky both rose to distinction and indeed made their whole careers in these United States. Neither is an American. Is it impossible for any one named Anderson or Clark to be a great conductor? Ernest Newman, who is about as competent a judge as the world contains, believes that Beecham is one of the best of present conductors. Sir Thomas is a Briton of average type. If that kind of man can be a great conductor, why not James H. Parker or Alfred L. Perkins?

Such a futile inquiry leads inevitably to the other—why must we have only great conductors? Why is not a good conductor satisfactory? Do our audiences go to orchestral concerts to hear the music of Beethoven and Brahms or to hear marvelous things done with it by a famous wizard of the baton? There is little doubt that the conductor legend has grown to ominous dimensions. It is not good for musical art that we should refuse to listen to immortal masterpieces well performed and demand that every interpretation should be a superhuman achievement. The demand is abnormal, but it is now habitual. One does not have to be a very acute observer to detect the obvious disappointment of an audience which finds itself unable to become excited about an orchestral performance.

We may be told that this is only another evidence of the present state of mental unrest. Doubtless that is true as far as it goes. But if there is ever going to be again any approach to intellectual poise where should one expect to perceive it sooner than in the world of art? There is a certain degree of encouragement to be drawn from the fact that Toscanini seems to be a fixture. The longer he remains with us the less likely will audiences be to regard his every doing as a sensation. For this attitude, as we have frequently noted, the conductor himself is in no slightest manner responsible. There is not in all the world a more devoted and self effacing artist than Arturo Toscanini. But one cannot help wondering what will happen if he suddenly makes up his mind to settle here.

Music and Interpreters.

THERE are few themes for musical comment at this time and even few available variations. The writer rings the changes on old ideas. Yet one of the oldest and most persistent is the irrepressible question of the place of the interpretative artist. The virtuoso conductor is not an ideal personage, but he is assuredly a necessity. We should like to get rid of the virtuoso view of him. A sound and correct plodder is better for the continued health of a musical community than a magician who works wonders at every concert. But you cannot make the community believe that. One would like much to know how many of those who applaud Toscanini rapturously and utter loud cheers actually realize that what he is doing is to get a completely just and clear performance of a score. He is not effecting any transformation. He is giving us what the composer wished us to have.

This writer believes that when Harold Samuel or James Friskin plays Bach he is playing it as Bach would play it himself were he alive. The truth is that too many interpreters treat masterworks as if they were museum pieces to be brought out, dusted off, repaired, and furbished up for public exhibition. The great interpreters are those for whom musical compositions of worth are always splendidly alive. It is some comfort therefore to know that the Philharmonic will have both Toscanini and Bruno Walter next season. These are men who find old music still vital. With those conductors who believe that it is their power which puts vitality into such music we have no crushing sympathy.

So this is the end of the season's platitudes. The writer of this column will endeavor in the course of the summer to refresh his mind so that he may have something to say when the musical season of 1933-4 begins. In concluding this chatter let us remind readers that there is possibly too much philosophizing and too much speculation about music. We are perhaps taking the joy out of life by converting the purest of aesthetic delights into a matter for discord and dire debate. This does not mean that musical criticism will be discontinued. It will have to go on because—if for no other reason—it furnishes a daily target for music lovers to shoot at. And that is wholly for good.

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Glob May 28

Russian Music at "Pops" Concert This Evening

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall, has elected to play Russian music at the second Sunday concert, this evening. Compositions by Tchaikovsky will be featured.

Tomorrow night has been designated "Artists' Night." Accordingly, there will be an exhibition of pictures in the lobbies of Symphony Hall. Artists from far and wide have loaned specimens of their work for this exhibition, the first ever to be held in Symphony Hall. Music inspired by the pictorial arts will be played.

On Tuesday, Memorial Day, there will be a program of "Pops" favorites.

Wednesday will be the first "Gypsy Night" at the "Pops," suggesting the Bohemian side of the arts. There will be colorful decorations. The audience is invited to come in gypsy dress and prizes will be awarded to the best table party. Mr Fiedler has drawn his program from the rich store of gypsy music of various Nations. Elsie Patsy, gypsy cimbalom player, and Lefa Lavanoff, gypsy dancer, will appear with the orchestra.

Thursday will be "Stein Night," with music suggesting the old days of drinking and singing. Everyone is invited to come with a stein, for there will be beer on draught and prizes for the most curious specimens. Concerts begin at 8:30.

The programs of the week follow:

Tonight—"Le Coq d'Or," introduction and wedding march, Rimsky-Korsakov; "Russian and Ludmilla," overture, Glinka; dances and songs of the Ghetto, Weprik; "Christmas Eve," suite, Rimsky-Korsakov; Fourth Symphony, finale; waltz from the serenade for strings; overture solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "Soviet Iron Foundry," Mossolov; Volga Bargamen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; "Caucasian Sketches," Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Monday, Artists Night—"At the Exhibition," march, Fahrbach; "Benvenuto Cellini," overture, Berlioz; nocturne, "Nuages," Debussy; "La Boheme," fantasia, Puccini; "Pictures at an Exhibition," suite, Moussorgsky-Ravel; "Konzertstuck," piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Weber; "Artists' Life," waltz, Strauss; "Mona Lisa," Stolz; "La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours, Ponchielli.

Tuesday, "Stars and Stripes Forever," Souso; "Light Cavalry," Overture, Suppe; "Dubinushka," Russian folk song, arranged by Jacchia; "Peer Gynt," suite, Greig; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier; "Ave Maria," (violin solo, harp, organ and strings), Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "Danube Waves," waltz, Ivanovici; "Sheep and Goat" ("Walkin' to the Pasture"), Guion; American Fantasy, Herbert.

Wednesdayq. Gypsy Night, Fifth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; Gypsy Rondo, Haydn; Hungarian Gypsy Dance, Nachez; "The Fortune Teller," selection, Herbert; "Carmen," suite, Bizet; Cimbalom Solos; Selection of Hungarian Airs, "Two Guitars" (Russian folk song), (Elsie Patsy, soloist); Hungarian Rhapsody (with cimbalom solo), Liszt; Gypsy dances, with orchestra, Lefa Lavanoff, Spanish dancer; "Play, Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman; Hungarian Czardas; "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman.

Thursday, Stein Night, "Torchlight Dance," Meyerbeer; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; Horn Quartet; "Tannhauser," overture, Wagner; Bacchanale," "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Jolly Fellows," waltz, Volstedt; Songs of the Old Days; "The Prince of Pilsen," selection, Luders; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltz, Strauss; "Franklin D. Roosevelt," march, Woodin.

Friday—"Rakoczy" March, Berlioz; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; "To a Wild Rose," Macdowell; "Faust," fantasia, Gounod; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "The Lost Chord," trumpet solo; Georges Mager, Sullivan; "Prince Igor," Polovetzkian dances, Borodin; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Humoresque," Dvorak; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Saturday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; overture, "Zampa," Herold; "Whispering of the Flowers," Elon; ballet from "Faust," Gounod; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; prelude to "The Deluge" (violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz), Saint-Saens; "Capriccio Italien," Tchaikovsky; Victor Herbert favorites, Sanford; prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Three I Sing," Gershwin.

Wood are but two of a distinguished cast.

Adv May 28

Another Week of Music and 'Wassail' at the Pops

MOST of the Pops programs this week will be influenced by special nights. Tonight there is a Russian program, tomorrow brings "Artists' Night," Wednesday "Gypsy Night" and Thursday "Stein Night.' The programs in detail follow:

TONIGHT

"Le Coq d'Or", Introduction and Wedding March ......Rimsky-Korsakovk
"Russian and Ludmilla," Overture ......Glinka
Dances and Songs of the Ghetto..Weprik
"Christmas Eve", Suite ......Rimsky-Korsakov
Fourth Symphony, Finale..Tchaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings ......Tchaikovsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" ......Tchaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry..........Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song
Arranged by Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches.....Ippolitov-Ivanov

MONDAY—Artists' Night

"At the Exhibition", March..Fahrbach
"Benvenuto Cellini", Overture...Berlioz
Nocturne: "Nuages" ....Debussy
"La Boheme" Fantasia.........Puccini
"Pictures at an Exhibition", Suite ......Moussorgsky-Ravel
Konzerstuck ....Weber
Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Artists' Life", Waltz..........Strauss
"Mona Lisa", Tango
"La Gioconda"; Ballet of the Hours ......Ponchielli

TUESDAY—Program of Pops Favorites

"Stars and Stripes Forever"......Sousa
"Light Cavalry", Overture........Suppe
"Dubinushka", Russian Folk Song
Arranged by Jacchia
"Peer Gynt", Suite ....Grieg
"Espana", Rhapsody ....Chabrier
"Ave Maria" ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Marche Slave" ....Tchaikovsky
"Danube Waves", Waltz......Ivanovici
Sheep and Goat" (Walkin' to the Pasture) ....Guion
American Fantasy ....Herbert

WEDNESDAY—Gypsy Night

Fifth Hungarian Dance..........Brahms
Gypsy Rondo.....................Haydn
Hungarian Gypsy Dance........Nachez
"The Fortune Teller", Selection..Herbert
"Carmen", Suite.................Bizet
Cimbalom Solos:
Selection of Hungarian Airs
Two Guitars (Russian Folk Song)
Elsie Patay
Hungarian Rhapsody.............Liszt
(With Cimbalon Solo)
Gypsy Dances, with Orchestra
Lefa Lavanoff, Spanish Dancer
"Play, Gypsies" from "Countess Maritza" ....Kalman
Hungarian Czardas: "Ghost of the Warrior" ....Grossman

THURSDAY—Stein Night

Torchlight Dance ....Meyerbeer
"Reve Angelique" ....Rubinstein
Horn Quartet
"Tannhauser", Overture.......Wagner
Bacchanale, Samson and Delilah ......Saint-Saens
"Jolly Fellows", Waltz.......Volstedt
Songs of the Old Days
"The Prince of Pilsen", Selection ......Luders
"Wine, Woman, and Song", Waltz ......Strauss
"Franklin D. Roosevelt", March..Woodin

FRIDAY

Rakoczy March ....Berlioz
"Mignon", Overture ....Thomas
"To a Wild Rose" ....Macdowell
"Faust", Fantasia.............Gounod
The Ride of the Valkyries......Wagner
"The Lost Chord" ....Sullivan
"Prince Igor", Polovetzkian Dances ......Borodin
"Music in the Air," Selection......Kern
"Humoresque" ....Dvorak
"Strike Up the Band'........Gershwin

SATURDAY

Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar
Overture "Zampa"..............Herold
"Whispering of the Flowers"......Blon
Ballet from "Faust"...........Gounod
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube", Waltz ....Strauss
Prelude to "The Deluge"...Saint-Saens
Capriccio Italien ....Tchaikovsky
Victor Herbert Favorites.......Sanford
Prelude in G minor......Rachmaninoff
"Wintergreen for President", from "Of Thee I Sing"..........Gershwin

---

ARTISTS' NIGHT MAY 29 AT SYMPHONY HALL

Fr. Fiedler has a new and interesting plan for an "artists' night" at the Pops on Monday evening, May 29. He is arranging a program of special interest and artistic significance.

In addition to a special program, there will be an opportunity, so far as corridor space will permit, so that any Boston artist may hang one picture for public exhibition on this occasion. (No picture larger than 12 square feet.)

The conditions for the exhibition are as follows: The picture must be delivered at Symphony hall between 1 and 4 o'clock on Monday afternoon, May 29.

There are to be no prizes, nor will there be any popular vote, nor will there be any jury to determine the artistic merits of any of the pictures, the only restriction being that pictures cannot be accepted which might give offence.

The management at Symphony hall will undertake the following service: First, every reasonable precaution will be taken to guard the pictures while the building is open to the public and fire and theft insurance will be carried for two days; second, if the picture is for sale and if the artist cares to name a price, this information will be made available to any one who may inquire about the picture. Sales, however, will be a matter between the artist and the interested individual.

The only classification which Symphony hall will make for pictures which are accepted will be the following: Oils, water colors, pastels, etchings, etc., are to be hung together in so far as practical.

Herald May 21

Current Exhibitions

LEFA LAVANOFF, DANCING AT THE POPS ON WEDNESDAY EVENING

Post May 28

Post May 28

Boston Artists at Pops

Boston artists are responding with enthusiasm to the invitation to exhibit examples of their work in the corridors of Symphony Hall tomorrow evening on the occasion of the first "Artists' Night" at the Pops, arranged by Arthur Fiedler, conductor. The list contains a goodly number of names of well-known local painters and others less familiar. The display will include oils, water colors, etchings and miniatures. Mr. Fiedler has tied up the two arts interestingly in the programme with Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Strauss' "Artists' Life" Waltz, Debussy's Impressionistic Nocturne "Nuages," Puccini's "La Boheme," and other numbers. The first "Artists' Night" at the Pops is expected to be a gala affair, both pictorially and musically. All artists are invited to show one picture each.

Exhibitions of the Week

Glob May 28

LEFA LAVANOFF. DANCER AT POP CONCERT WEDNESDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY HALL

Art Symphony in Colors and Tones Opens Tomorrow

Sun Advertiser May 28/33

Unique Exhibit Is Hung by Noted Musicians With Ear for Paint, Too

In probably the most unique art show ever seen in Boston, a full orchestra in colors has been hung in Symphony Hall where the "free-for-all" exhibition opens tomorrow—with the compositions in paint arranged by Boston Symphony players sensitive to tones both of music and of paint.

It has been held that tones of color and tones of music are directly related—that a certain tone in the musical scale is a certain definite color—and on this basis the paintings have been hung.

The hanging committee of Symphony players, with that in mind, were chosen to embrace a wide range of tone sensitivity, from harp to double bassoon, for high and low.

Therefore if there is anything to the relation of paint and music—and musicians say there is—the art show promises to present a complete orchestra of tone.

Scientifically the committee represents a tone range of from 42 vibrations per second at the lower end (double bassoon) to [illegible]072 at the higher end (violin).

Making up the committee were Arthur Fiedler, violin; Charles Dean, viola; Hippolyte Droeghmans, cello; Boaz Piller, double-bassoon, and Alford Kaughey, harp.

SUN. ADVERTISER, May 28/33

204

ARTISTS' WEEK AT THE POPS

Her May 28

Tonight the Pop concerts in Symphony hall will open their fifth week with the second Sunday concert of the season, when Arthur Fiedler will present an all-Russian program featuring the music of Tchaikovsky. Monday night, the corridors of Symphony hall will be covered with pictures loaned by artists far and wide for the first picture exhibition at the Pops and the program will consist of appropriate musical numbers. On Tuesday, the holiday, there will be a program of Pops favorites.

Wednesday will be the first Gypsy night at the Pops, suggesting the Bohemian side of the arts. There will be colorful decorations. The audience is invited to come in Gypsy dress, and prizes will be awarded to the best table party. Arthur Fiedler has drawn his program from the rich store of Gypsy music of various nations, including Elsie Patay, the Gypsy cimbalom player, and Lefa Lavanoff, the Gypsy dancer, who will appear with the orchestra. Thursday, June 1, will be Stein night, with music suggesting the old days of drinking and singing. Everyone is invited to come with a stein, for there will be beer on draught and prizes for the most curious specimens.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 28

"Le Coq d'Or," Introduction and Wedding March .... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Russian and Ludmilla," Overture .... Glinka
Dances and Songs of the Ghetto .... Weprik
"Christmas Eve," Suite .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Fourth Symphony, Finale .... Tchaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings .... Tchaikovsky
Overture Solennelle "1812" .... Tchaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry .... Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song .... Arranged by Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches .... Ippolitov-Ivanov

MONDAY EVENING

"At the Exhibition," March .... Fahrbach
"Benvenuto Cellini," Overture .... Berlioz
Nocturne: "Nuages" .... Debussy
"La Boheme," Fantasia .... Puccini
"Pictures at an Exhibition," Suite .... Moussorgsky-Ravel
Konzertstuck .... Weber
Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Artists' Life," Waltz .... Strauss
"Mona Lisa," .... Stolz
"La Gioconda:" Ballet of the Hours .... Ponchielli

TUESDAY EVENING

"Stars and Stripes Forever" .... Sousa
"Light Cavalry," Overture .... Suppe
"Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song .... Arranged by Jacchia
"Peer Gynt," Suite .... Grieg
"Espana," Rhapsody .... Chabrier
"Ave Maria" .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Violin solo, harp, organ and strings)
"Marche Slave" .... Tchaikovsky
"Danube Waves," Waltz .... Ivanovici
"Sheep and Goat," (Walkin' to the Pasture) .... Guion
American Fantasy .... Herbert

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Fifth Hungarian Dance .... Brahms
Gypsy Rondo .... Haydn
Hungarian Gypsy Dance .... Nachez
"The Fortune Teller," Selection .... Herbert
"Carmen," Suite .... Bizet
Cimbalon Solos
Selection of Hungarian Airs
Two Guitars (Russian folk song)
Elsie Patay
Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
(With Cimbalom Solo)
Gypsy Dances, with orchestra
Lefa Lavanoff, Spanish dancer
"Play, Gypsies" from "Countess Maritza" .... Kalman
Hungarian Czardas: "Ghost of the Warrior" .... Grossman

THURSDAY EVENING

Torchlight Dance .... Meyerbeer
"Reve Angelique" .... Rubinstein
Horn Quartet
"Tannhauser," Overture .... Wagner
Bacchanale, Samson and Delilah .... Saint-Saens
"Jolly Fellows," Waltz .... Volstedt
Songs of the Old Days
"The Prince of Pilsen," Selection .... Luders
"Wine, Woman, and Song," .... Strauss
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March .... Woodin

FRIDAY EVENING

Rakoczy March .... Berlioz
"Mignon," Overture .... Thomas
"To a Wild Rose" .... Macdowell
"Faust," Fantasia .... Gounod
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
"The Lost Chord" .... Sullivan
Trumpet solo: Georges Mager
"Prince Igor," Polevetzkian Dances .... Borodin
"Music in the Air," Selection .... Kern
"Humoresque" .... Dvorak
"Strike Up the Band" .... Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING

Pomp and Circumstance .... Elgar
Overture "Zampa" .... Herold
"Whispering of the Flowers" .... Blon
Ballet from "Faust" .... Gounod
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltz .... Strauss
(Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz)
Capriccio Italian .... Tchaikovsky
Victor Herbert Favorites .... Sanford
Prelude in G minor .... Rachmaninoff
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" .... Gershwin

COLONIAL TONIGHT
Telephone Hancock 0166
Benefit Performance CATHOLIC ACTORS
GUILD of America
Galaxy of Stage, Screen & Radio Stars
Seats $1.00--$2.00--$3.00

... CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune
MAY 28 1933

"Pop" Concerts During Summer At Playland, Rye

Musicians Symphony Will Play Nightly; Witek Is To Be Concertmaster

The Musicians Symphony Orchestra, which will complete its second season of concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House on June 2, has opened a subscription campaign for a series of popular summer concerts which it plans to give in the Playland Casino in Rye, N. Y. The series is to be known as the "Playland Pops" and to be modeled along the lines of the noted spring "Pop" concerts in Boston. The audience will sit at small tables and have opportunity to consume seasonable refreshments while overlooking the beach and the Sound.

Anton Witek, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony in the regimes of Max Fiedler and Dr. Muck, will be concertmaster of the orchestra; distinguished conductors and soloists are to appear. The concerts are to be held nightly at 8:45 from the end of June through Labor Day. Prices will range from 25 cents to $1. Books of $1 reserved seat tickets may be obtained in advance at reduced rates.

Checks for contributions for the launching and the support of this series should be made payable to the "Playland Pops" and mailed to the Musicians Symphony Orchestra, 285 Madison Avenue, where further information about this series may be obtained.

Lefa Lavanoff, who appears in Spanish gypsy dances at the Symphony Hall Pops Wednesday evening only.

BOSTON'S HOUSE OF INTERNATIONAL PRIZE FILMS
FINE ARTS
STATE THEA. BLDG.
RE-OPENS TOMORROW
CONTINUOUS DAILY & SUNDAY 1 to 11 P. M.
PRESENTING "The CRY OF THE WORLD"
AUTHENTIC PICTORIAL DOCUMENT OF CIVILIZATION'S STRUGGLE
"Attendance should be made compulsory"
—DELEHANTY, N. Y POST
ADDED FEATURE
"THE DREYFUS CASE"
COMPLETE ORIGINAL VERSION OF THIS FAMOUS FRAME-UP!
BOTH FILMS IN ENGLISH

Trav. May 31

Dancer at Pops

Lefa Lavanoff will appear in Spanish Gypsy dances on the Gypsy Night program tonight at Pops, Symphony hall.

---

something new in ventriloquist acts and the novelty was enjoyed.

Ben Bernie's "Five Sepia Nephews" have some nice harmony and some original dance steps. Sidare, Shields and Lorraine exhibit their dancing skill in tap, whirlwind, toe and novelty numbers, offered with charm and precision. Anderson and Allen have an entertaining balancing act. The feature picture is "Elmer, the Great," that very popular baseball story with a little romance on the side, and Joe E. Brown starring. A show of unusual merit! A. C.

GYPSY NIGHT AT POPS

Gypsy costumes in the audience, gypsy decorations, a gypsy soloist and a dancer with the orchestra, are to be features of the first Gypsy night at the Pops, which will take place tonight. The program follows:

Fifth Hungarian Dance .... Brahms
Gypsy Rondo .... Haydn
Hungarian Gypsy Dance .... Nachez
"The Fortune Teller," selection .... Herbert
"Carmen," suite .... Bizet
Cimbalom solo -
(a) Hungarian airs.
(b) The Two Guitars.
(Elsie Patay.)
Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody .... Liszt
(With cimbalom solo.)
Spanish gypsy dances, with orchestra.
(Lefa Lavanoff, dancer.)
Play, Gypsies, from "Countess Maritza." .... Kalman
Hungarian Czardas:
"Ghost of the Warrior" .... Grossman

Amusements

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Pops

The program of the second of the Sunday Evening Pop Concerts, played last evening in Symphony Hall, was labeled "Russian-Tschaikowsky," thus drawing a large and appreciative audience of those who "just love" Russian music.

The composer thus specifically named was represented by three items —The Fourth Symphony "Finale," the perenially popular waltz from the "Serenade for Strings," and the even more ubiquitous "ouverture Solennelle, 1812." It was in the last-named of this tiro of Tschaikowsky works that Mr Fiedler seemed most at ease. He very definitely underscored the program-piece aspects of this overture, laying particular stress on the "Marseillaise" and Russian national hymn motifs. (Even when worked in by such a master technician as Tschaikowsky, it still remains dubious whether themes of a "current events" nature should ever be used in a work of serious pretensions.) Last night it seemed as if the waltz might have been played with a more supple, clinging grace than it was accorded by the conductor.

Rimsky-Korsakov's wedding march from "Le Coq d' Or" and his "Christmas Eve" suite exhibited, as always, the quiet resplendence of his orchestration. The "Christmas Eve" is definitely atmospheric, yet not offensively so, and was beautifully done by the orchestra.

Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Foundry" was by way of being the most anticipated feature of the evening. Besides affording the orchestra and conductor with what might be called a picnic, the work is of very definite interest. One who has never been there assumes that it is a faithful transcription of one of the more noisy aspects of New Russia. But it seems more than that. There is no gross exaggeration of effects. The composer has not allowed himself to be too enamoured with the rattling of tin and the screech of whistles. The work has the compactness, the rhythmic directness that only a composer of parts can give it.

Other parts of the program included Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla" overture, Weprik's "Dances and Songs of the Ghetto"—very effective orchestral writing—and Ippolitov-Ivanov's "Caucasian Sketches."

Boston Art Notes

Monitor —— May 30

"Pops" Exhibition

In reaching out to stir popular fancy within appropriate bounds, the management of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts have had another bright idea. On Monday evening and for the three subsequent evenings there are being shown in corridors and refreshment rooms paintings, water colors, pastels prints, drawings, small sculptures and even a few textiles made by artists and artisans of Boston. The choice of contributions is not selective and so there is assembled a miscellany consisting of works by professional and amateur, student and experienced artist.

There are two or three ways in which a "Pops" concert can be related to the pictorial arts. One is that of program choice. Mr. Fiedler on Monday played works which were inspired by or which described in musical form pictorical matter. Most famous is the Moussorgsky Suite, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Here is program music which can be followed with eye and ear simultaneously. The Debussy "Nuages" is kin to the impressionistic sketches of the outdoors. The latter is atmospheric not photographic depiction, and accordingly less irksome to the devotee of pure music.

An interesting feature in this display is the frequent occurrence of subjects in which musicians appear, performing upon their instruments, or being portrayed as "interesting types" by painters. Of these there is a considerable number. It was very appropriate for a lady in days of old to be shown, swathed in satins, seated at her harpsichord. Here we see her at the piano. We see men strumming guitars; we see a fiddle resting quietly on a table. We see Mr. Ritter industriously occupied with his tympani. Mr. Kleber Hall has portrayed him in a truly expressionistic manner; the percussion shakes the very canvas, which appears vibrant with tremors. Mr. Piller, of contrabassoon fame, does not manipulate his instrument, but leans upon his ever-present walking stick. Mr. Fiedler is seen in pen, pencil and wood block.

Portraits predominate; many of them are ably made. The Bostonian style prevails; there are no eccentricities, no assymetries, no primitive flatness. Well rounded, provided abundantly with shadow, posing in the grand manner, most of the sitters are seen at their most dignified and radiant moments. Interspersed are a few novel offerings.

Landscapes and still-lifes are in the minority, and we miss them among these innumerable portraits. Thanks to Mr. Hopkinson and Mr. Frank Carson and a few others for some little whiff of the outdoors (a briny whiff, for both have sent pictures of the fisheries).

With patience one may ferret out a number of first-rate pictures. The well-meant effort of amateurs dulls the luster of the display considerably. Once more we mumble our complaint about the lack of selection in art exhibitions. At the "Pops" hundreds of people see this display who never see another in the course of seasons; we wish for the sake of attaining higher standards in the arts that there might be a smaller and more choice menu served up.

The experiment is an excellent one. There should be several displays in the course of the spring concert season. Experience will teach the management how to bring out the best, we feel confident. They are to be complimented for his effort. D. A.

Insanity Plea Declined

MUSIC

POPS CONCERT

Russian music was played last night at Symphony hall by the Pops orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, conductor. The program follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov .. "Le Coq d'Or," Introduction and Wedding March
Glinka .... "Russlan and Ludmilla," Overture
Weprik .... Dances and Songs of the Ghetto
Rimsky-Korsakov .... "Christmas Eve," Suite
Prelude—Minuet of the Stars—Polonaise
Tchaikovsky .... Fourth Symphony, Finale
Tchaikovsky .. Waltz from the Serenade for Strings
Tchaikovsky—Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"
Mossolov .... Soviet Iron Foundry
Volga Bargemen's Song (Arranged by Jacchia)
Ippolitov-Ivanov .... Caucasian Sketches
In the Village—In the Mosque—Procession of the Sardar

It is a little difficult to approve a program of Russian music which omits Moussorgsky, but it must be admitted that last night's concert, despite the absence of Russia's greatest musical genius, was an interesting and charming one. The house was packed, upstairs and down, and the orchestra played to it richly and expressively.

The Pops do more than offer a musical let-down after the university-course of the Symphony winter series. They bring out charming light suites, lesser music of the great composers, divertissements worth hearing, yet not real symphony material.

Last night's concert was distinguished by glowing string tone, especially in the Tchaikovsky waltz, by rhythmic precision and by a well-integrated and blended ensemble. It was one of the most enjoyable of the Pops concerts of the season, and one of the best played. E. B.

Artists to Have Two Nights at Pops With Own Show ---Gypsy Night Wednesday---Programmes of Week

Post May 28

Tomorrow night music and painting will be combined in a special artists' night opening at the Pops, Symphony Hall.

Some people could put a painting on a music rack and play it on a piano or violin, or something, according to Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor.

"Do you doubt it? But you could play a 'blue' note on any instrument—even if you didn't know how to play it, couldn't you?" Fiedler observed.

* * * *

Well, then, there are people who say that there are also red notes, and green ones, and ones in all the other colors and their variations.

For some reason or other, it isn't customary to have art shows in concert halls, but if the color-theorists are right, why not? And so all the artists in Boston have been invited each to send one picture to Symphony Hall, to be exhibited to the Pops patrons on Monday and Tuesday evenings.

According to indications, this art show should range over the entire scale of color—or tonality. In other words, if pictures are playable, this show must be looked at from an orchestral point of view. And the officials have attended to that. In order that the compositions will be harmoniously arranged, a "hanging committee" has been selected from Boston symphony players, and they represent the chief divisions of the orchestra—from strings to percussion.

The committee members are Arthur Fiedler, Charles Deane, Hippolyte Droeghmans, Boaz Piller, Willem Valkenier,and Alford Kaughey. They play, respectively, violin, viola, 'cello, double-bassoon, French horn, and harp—representing the orchestral divisions of strings, wood-winds, brass, and percussion. Yes, a harp—like a piano—is a percussion instrument.

Art critics speak of "vibrant" color. Whatever the degree of vibrancy of a picture in this art show, the symphony committee should be sensitive to it. The violin vibrates as high a 3072 oscillations a second, and the double-bassoon as low as 40. The 'cello ranges from 64 to 682 vibrations a second, the French horn from 106 vibrations a second up to 853, the viola from 128 to 1152.

And finally, the artists may count on the symphony hanging committee for no little artistic discernment, since they are all art show frequenters, or collectors, and Mr. Deane is himself an artist in the pictorial realm as well as with the viola.

* * * *

TONIGHT—Russian-Tchaikovsky programme: Rimsky-Korsakov, "Le Coq d'Or," Introduction and Wedding March; Glinka, "Russlan and Ludmilla," Overture; Weprik, Dances and Songs of the Ghetto; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Christmas Eve," Suite, Prelude—Minuet of the Stars—Polonaise; Tchaikovsky, Fourth Symphony, Finale; Tchaikovsky, Waltz from the Serenade for Strings; Tchaikovsky; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"; Mossolov, Soviet Iron Foundry; Volga Bargemen's Song (Arranged by Jacchia); Ippolitov-Ivanov, Caucasian Sketches, In the Village—In the Mosque—Procession of the Sardar.

* * * *

MONDAY—Artists' night with picture exhibition: "At the Exhibition," March, Fahrbach; "Benvenuto Cellini," Overture, Berlioz; Nocturne: "Nuages", Debussy; "La Boheme," Fantasia, Puccini; "Pictures at an Exhibition," Suite, Moussorgsky-Ravel, Promenade—Bydlo (Polish Ox Cart)—Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells—The Great Gate at Kiev; Konzertstuck, Weber, Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma; "Artist's Life," Waltz, Strauss; "Why Do You Smile, Mona Lisa," Stolz, and "La Gioconda": Ballet of the Hours, Ponchielli.

* * * *

TUESDAY—Pops Favorites: "Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; "Light Cavalry," Overture, Suppe; "Dubinushka," Russian Folk Song, Arranged by Agide Jacchia; "Peer Gynt," Suite, Grieg; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj, (Violin solo, harp, organ and strings); "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "Danube Waves," Waltz, Ivanovici; "Sheep and Goat" (Walkin' to the Pasture) Guion, Cowboy's and Fiddler's Breakdown, and American Fantasy, Herbert.

* * * *

WEDNESDAY — Gypsy night. With colorful decorations and the audience invited to appear in Gypsy dress. There will be prizes for the best table party; there will be a Gypsy cimbalom player, Elsie Patay; and Lefa Lavanoff, Gypsy dancer, will appear to the orchestra's accompaniment. Fifth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; Gypsy Rondo, Haydn; Hungarian Gypsy Dance, Nachez; "The Fortune Teller," Selection, Herbert; "Carmen," Suite, Bizet; Cimbalom Solo, (a) Hungarian Airs; (b) The Two Guitars, Elsie Patay; Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody (With Cimbalom Solo) Liszt; Spanish Gypsy Dances, with Orchestra, Lefa Lavanoff, dancer; "Play, Gypsies" from "Countess Maritza," Kalman, and Hungarian Czardas: "Ghost of the Warrior," Grossman.

THURSDAY — Stein night. Torchlight Dance, Meyerbeer; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; Horn Quartet (Messrs. W. Valkenier, W. MacDonald, M. Lannoye, H. Lorbeer); "Tannhauser," Overture, Wagner; Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Jolly Fellows," Waltz, Volstedt; Songs of the Old Days: Soldier's Farewell—Listen to the Mocking Bird—The Old Oaken Bucket—Old Black Joe—When You and I Were Young, Maggie—Tramp, Tramp, Tramp—Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep—Sweet and Low—Just Before the Battle, Mother—When Johnny Comes Marching Home—Auld Lang Syne; "The Prince of Pilsen," Selection, Luders; "Wine, Woman, and Song," Waltz, Strauss, and "Franklin D. Roosevelt," March, Woodin.

* * * *

FRIDAY—Rakoczy March, Berlioz; "Mignon," Overture, Thomas; "To a Wild Rose," Macdowell; "Faust," Fantasia, Gounod; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "The Lost Chord," Sullivan (trumpet solo: Georges Mager); "Prince Igor," Polovetzkian Dances, Borodin; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Humoresque," Dvorak, and "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

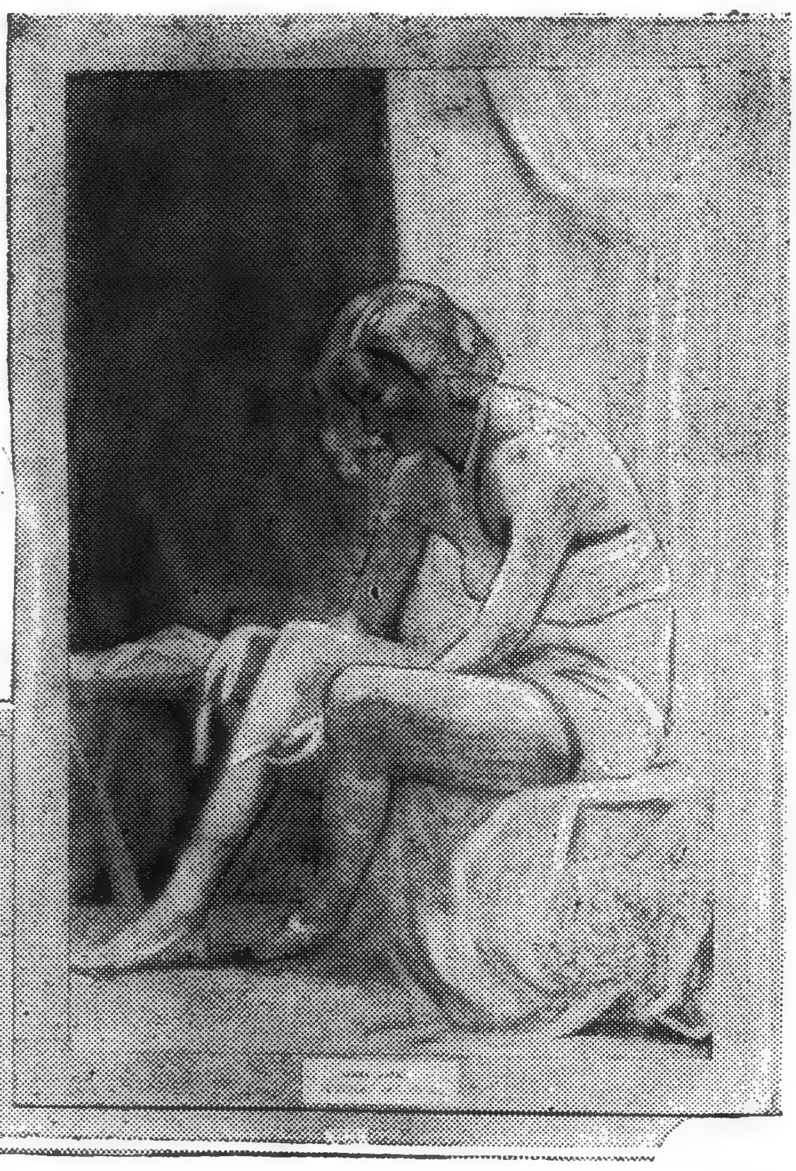
SATURDAY—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture "Zampa," Herold; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; Ballet from "Faust," Gounod; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; Prelude to "The Deluge," Saint-Saens (violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz); "Caprice Italien," Tchaikovsky; Victor Herbert Favorites, Sanford; Prelude in G minor, Rachmaninoff, and "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

Louis Speyer, horn soloist of the Pops.

Among the Pops virtuoso players who are also numbered among the true stars of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter season is Louis Speyer, the distinguished English horn soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1918. Louis Speyer, like Abdon Laus and others, was recruited from the French Military Band. He is another convincing argument for the theory that France produces the finest wood-wind players in the world. The English horn is a close relative of the oboe, being also a double reeded instrument of deeper range, distinguished from its shriller cousin by its bulbous lower end.

Mr. Speyer is an accomplished virtuoso of the oboe as well as the English horn, and indeed is first oboeist at the Pops, yielding the chair of English horn to Henry Stanislaus.



(Daily Record Photo)

"The Dancer" Causes Talk

Record May 31

"In Good Taste"

said committee of painting "The Dancer," by Mark Hayes, after workmen engaged to hang picture for art night at Pops in Symphony Hall engaged in controversy over dancer's scant costume. Ada Weinstein, above, agrees the painting is "a fine study."

GYPSY DANCES FEATURE POPS

Post May 29

Lefa Lavanoff Appears Twice With Orchestra

As a special feature of Gypsy Night at the Pops, in Symphony Hall last evening, Lefa Lavanoff appeared in two gypsy dances. She scored quite a success with the capacity audience.

Miss Lavanoff gave to her dancing that spirit and fire which is usually associated with Spanish dances in one's imagination, but so seldom discovered in actual performance. Both her numbers moved with ingratiating rhythm. Frankly on the side of the physical rather than the spiritual, as such dances should by their nature be, Miss Lavanoff brought a fresh and promising talent to view. The orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, gave its customary fine support.

As another added feature to the programme, a rarely beautiful series of cimbalon numbers, concluding with a masterful performance, with the orchestra, of Liszt's Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody, was played by Elsie Patay.

MUSIC

Globe May 31

SYMPHONY HALL

"Gypsy Night" at "Pops"

Last night was "Gypsy Night" at the "Pops." Mr Fielder gave over his program to gypsy music, chiefly Spanish and Hungarian, although in the case of Bizet's "Carmen" suite what a Frenchman thought Spanish gypsy music might be like. From the balconies and on the lower walls of Symphony Hall hung "gypsy" decorations: bright colored scarfs adorned with likenesses of what are regarded as typically gypsy faces. An audience that came near filling the hall took obvious pleasure in everything about the concert. And a few among the listeners heeded the invitation to appear in gypsy dress. Thus "Gypsy Night" was one of the most stimulating evenings thus far, in a distinctly stimulating season of "Pops."

Perhaps the most unusual features of the evening were some solos of Hungarian music, played on the cimbalon by Elsie Patay. The cimbalon or dulcimer was really a forerunner of the piano, consisting of wires stretched across a sounding board. But the cimbalon, unlike the modern piano, is played by striking the wires with two padded hammers, much as a xylophonist plays his instrument. The tone is more varied from top to bottom of the scale, more substantial and more vibrant than that of the piano.

These pieces—a pot-pourri of tunes from Hungarian Rhapsodies by Liszt, arranged by Miss Patay, and "Two Guitars," a folk song—aroused a great deal of applause. So did Miss Patay's phenomenal dexterity in playing.

Lefa Lavanoff offered two Spanish gypsy dances to orchestral accompaniment. These, performed in gayly colored Spanish dress, likewise pleased the audience much.

No one who attends the "Pops" this week should overlook the extensive exhibit of oil paintings, water colors and black and white drawings in the corridors of Symphony Hall. A large number of artists have loaned specimens of their work for this exhibition, which is a feature of "Artists' Week" at the "Pops." Altogether more than 400 specimens are on view. So great has been the interest in these pictures the time of intermissions at the concerts has had to be doubled. The exhibition continues through this week.

d Players --- Music and Musicians --- Films

"Old Man Eloquent"

Dr. Muck in His Seventy-Fourth Year

From a Photograph Taken Last Winted in Hamburg Where He Still Conducts at the Concerts of the Philharmonic Orchestra mpany of ry to ter

Music in the Land

Trans May 30

Spring Joys

ONCE MORE the champions of the American composer are raising their voices. It is custom of the spring to be annually honored. Nor from year to year does the plaint much vary. The conductors of American orchestras—it appears yet again—neglect the masterpieces regularly put to music-paper by our native sons, for the mediocre work of European composers. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Stokowski are spared this reproach. For it, Mr. Toscanini is now the chosen target. The other day in Minneapolis, Mr. John Tasker Howard, who once wrote a book about American composers, told the receptive ears of the delegates to a convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs that in the seven years through which Mr. Toscanini has been conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts in New York, "he has presented only four American works." Whereas he has not hesitated "to place on his programs some new work by one of his own countrymen which, in the opinion of both reviewers and audiences, was frankly mediocre." Furthermore: "If Mr. Toscanini should adopt a policy of presenting only accepted masterpieces that would be at least consistent. But while he makes it his practice to offer an occasional novelty, a fair proportion of those novelties should be American, as long as the orchestra is supported by Americans."

To these remarks Mr. Henderson retorts gently, but not without wit, in the New York Sun: "Incidentally Mr. Toscanini has been scolded for not producing more American works. We have no apology to make for the famous conductor, but he should not be blamed for presenting music which is sympathetic to him and ignoring that which is not. German conductors know and feel German music; Italian conductors, Italian music. If the Philharmonic would entrust half-a-dozen of its programs to some American conductor perhaps he would introduce native works to us. But, unfortunately, what almost invariably happens when an American conductor is in command is a performance of some composition of his own which no one else will play. Are there not some American conductors who do not compose? Whatever else the dissatisfied ones may say about Mr. Toscanini, they cannot charge him with playing his own music."

In turn, the New York Evening Post lately listed the pieces by American composers played in those seven years by the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky and the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski. First, however, it declined to regard as American composers "those emigrants from Russia and Germany who began their careers in their native lands and came here long past the age of youth." Thereby The Evening Post excluded Mr. Loeffler of the elder generation and Mr. Gruenberg of the younger, both of whom have contributed discoverably to the current American repertory. But, as children say with a winning smile, "Never mind." Furthermore, The Post is distressed when it finds that many of the American works played during those seven years were heard in only a pair of concerts.

In the Boston list, for example, stands Mr. Carpenter's fanciful and amusing "Adventures in a Perambulator." Perish the thought that Dr. Koussevitzky should have included it in one program only. Possibly he believed that three preceding performances—each at a pair of concerts—had done sufficient justice to this idyll of Chicagoan infancy. . . . The Post next grieves for Mr. Hill. From him Dr. Koussevitzky has produced two symphonies, a sinfonietta, a tone-poem suggested by Amy Lowell's "Lilacs"—and repeated not so much as one. But the records at Symphony Hall note two performances of Mr. Hill's First Symphony and as many more of "Lilacs." The Post fondly fancies that Dr. Koussevitzky produced the late Mr. Chadwick's Sinfonietta; whereas Mr. Fiedler first led it into the Symphony Concerts as long ago as 1910. Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason goes into the list as a "Boston composer," though he has lived his working life in New York. So also does the late Blair Fairchild, long an American émigré in Paris. . . . But why disturb these spring pastimes by grouchy comment from the sidelines?

Items of the Day

Mr. Monteux is explaining at some length in Parisian newspapers that he did not go to Berlin in April to replace the banished Bruno Walter, but under invitation and contract made in November last, long before the Nazi revolution. Thereby, since both conductors are Jews, several things become more understandable.

Mr. Gershwin will soon go to Chicago as composer, conductor and pianist in a concert of his own music as incident in the current fair. . . . Mr. Bloch is on his way to the United States again, after two years and more in Switzerland. He brings with him the completed score of his music for the rites of the Reformed Jews. Those that have seen it say that many pages recall the intensities of his earlier symphonic pieces.

Two Novel Pieces At the Sunday Pop

The Ghetto and Christmas Eve From Weprik to Rimsky, Dr. Davison's Leave

ONCE in so often a piece of music goes the round of the principal orchestras in Europe and in America. No one knows who or what propels it along the course. Each successive audience wonders why it should be set before it. After a season or two it disappears as suddenly as it came, "sunk without trace." For the time, however, it is in the air and the fashion; must and shall be played. . . . Alexander Weprik is one of the new generation of Soviet composers; compared with the far-flung Shostokowicz, sits none too high among them. His specialty—we Westerners are told—is a Russo-Jewish music; among other pieces a fantasia on authentic folk-themes, "Dances and Songs of the Ghetto." A year and more ago European conductors were including it in concerts. Last winter Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Toscanini played it to audiences in Philadelphia and New York. Last evening came the turn of Boston, when Mr. Fiedler found place for it on an "all-Russian program" for the second Sunday Pop. The usual audience in the balconies heard. On the floor, the new freedoms with drinks and tobacco did not fill all the tables.

As the event proved, Mr. Weprik's fantasia gave no occasion for either snarling hisses or applausive shouts. The courteous clapping with which the listeners answered fairly measured it. As music, these "Dances and Songs of the Ghetto" are merely there—on paper ruled with staves for the pleasure of conductors and the exercise of orchestras. Mr. Weprik knows how to do his job, and does it. He introduces his folk-melodies and dance-rhythms so that the ear takes immediate note of them. Now and again a solo-instrument gives them pungency. Skillfully he weaves them together or sets them in contrast; colors them with twentieth-century harmonies and timbres. Occasionally the tonal web is over-thickened; oftener the songs and dances emerge so straightforwardly in themselves and so clearly outlined that he who will may sing or whistle them.

Between simple statement and more or less intricate development, Mr. Weprik contrives to keep them remote and racial upon the western ear—his one token of individuality. In the dances one and another rhythm is infectious to hear; while this or that recalls the prancing folk, last week, in Mr. Schwartz's play of Chassidic Jewry. The more dolorous melodies linger for a little in the mind, by a little touch the imagination. As it seems to the Gentile ear, the music of the synagogue now and then haunts them. So came, and also went, Mr. Weprik's fantasia.

Upon the heels of the piece out of the new Russia followed fragments of the old from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Christmas Eve." From a fairy-tale of Gogol, from surviving paganisms among the Ukrainian folk, Rimsky made the text; to each attuned the music. Afterward when the opera proved a failure, he suspected that he had overdone both. Graver obstacle was a mistaken introduction of the great Catherine in full panoply as Tsaritsa—breach of rule and custom resented by as many of the Romanovs and as many of their court as dabbled in the affairs of the State Theaters. Forty years afterward little remains of "Christmas Eve" outside the Suite assembled by the composer for the concert-hall. It begins with the Prelude to the whole opera; continues with the games and the dances of the stars, stolen out of the firmament by the devil and a witch; lingers over the carols that Russian children used to sing in the streets between Christmas and Epiphany; ends with a stately Polonaise for the Tsaritsa and her train.

Dr. Koussevitzky, when he played the Suite at the Symphony Concerts on St. Stephen's Day in 1924, struck out the music for the carols, but kept the music for the sportive stars. Mr. Fiedler spared only their mazurka; parted with the carols as well. What remained suggested the wisdom of a performance of the whole Suite without delay at the Symphony Concerts. The Prelude, designed as music for the Holy Night, gains simplicity and serenity. It moves in calm; the harmonic and instrumental coloring blends in gentle radiance. Through the limpid melody echo the bells that out of numberless churches haunted in Rimsky's time nearly every Russian composer's imagination. . . . The mazurka of the stars, said to be at play in a celestial blind man's buff, beguiles by light rhythm, changeful course and childlike high spirits. . . . The Polonaise sounds at beginning and end with courtly ceremony; in the middle measures suggests the presence also of the folk. Last winter fragments from Rimsky's opera of Tsar Saltan pleased the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts. The full Suite from "Christmas Eve" should delight them.

f the Day

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL NEWS

MAY 29 1933

State and Tioga

By Romeyn Berry

The Pop Concerts and Mr. McGovern

QUITE the nicest way to spend a Saturday night at Boston in May is to go to a Pop Concert with Mr. Terry McGovern.

A Pop Concert is the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its coat and vest off—figuratively speaking—and its suspenders down around its hips. They relax after the regular season is over and play what they feel like playing—Bach, Gershwin, Haydn or Victor Herbert. Nice people, thousands of them, sit around at little tables and sip Budweiser or claret cup—but no gin.

Mr. Terry McGovern is a musician of parts. When he gets intoxicated with Beethoven he reverts to type—the black Irish of the west coast, Lynches of Galway mostly—sees leprachauns and talks in unintelligible parables.

Saturday night they played a program which included Tchaikorsky's third movement of the Fourth Symphony, the preludes to both Lohengrin and the Meistersinger, Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue and much of Jerome Kern's Cat and the Fiddle. During the intermission we went to the Gentlemen's Room where Mr. McGovern gave me a 10-minute lecture on the musical philosophy of Richard Wagner, illustrating the various themes on a peculiar Irish pipe he always carried in his pocket. After he had piped several numbers we had a capacity house in the Gentlemen's Room.

Mr. McGovern was fascinated by the Pop Concerts, the atmosphere, the music, the setting and the spirit. He'd never heard of them before. "Why can't we have something like this in New York," he said, "I think it would work." (A long silence with evidences of profound thought.) "No it wouldn't work there," he went on, "it couldn't stand up against the competition of the rasslin matches."

MT. VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS

MAY 31 1933

Concert Series At Playland

Will Be Modeled After Symphony "Pops"

The Musicians Symphony Orchestra which has recently completed its second successful season at the Metropolitan Opera House announces that it will present a series of popular Summer concerts in Playland Casino, Rye.

The project for these concerts grew out of the desire of the county for great music at depression prices and the concern of certain members of the Musicians Symphony Orchestra committee for the plight of these musicians over the Summer. The concerts are to be modeled after the traditional Summer "Pop" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and are to be called the "Playland Pops."

Sit at Tables

The audience will sit at small tables in this large airy casino and be served cool drinks and ices while they listen to a concert of the world's greatest music from Beethoven to some of the best jazz. The "Playland Pops" will follow the musical policies of their illustrious model the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pops, and this is to take place in an atmosphere and surroundings resembling the continental beer gardens. Published announcement of a free concert series at Playland this Summer was erroneous.

Noted Orchestra

The orchestra itself is no scratch orchestra, but is well known and of high artistic calibre. The concert master will be Anton Witek who has been for several years concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic and under such celebrated conductors as Toscanini and Karl Muck. There will be distinguished guest conductors and soloists.

The concerts are to take place every night throughout the Summer from the end of June through Labor Day. Groups of prominent persons throughout the connty are now at work selling books of reserved seats at a special reduced rate.

---

is better.

Fourth Week of Pops to Feature Dancers Again

HANS WIENER and his group of dancers will give two return performances at the Pops concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings of this week as a result of their successful trio of performances, which were sold out recently. Their dancing will be to music by Debussy, Dvorak, Schubert, Borodin, and Fucik.

The programs for this fourth week of Pops have considerable variety, with rather more emphasis on Russian music than in the past. The list for next Sunday evening, indeed, will be made entirely from works by Russian composers.

The complete programs for the week follow:

May 28 Adv

MONDAY

Procession of the Sardar	Ippolitov-Ivanov
"In the Spring," Overture	Goldmark
The Old Refrain	Kreisler
"Die Meistersinger," Prelude	Wagner
"Peer Gynt" Suite	Grieg
"Scheherazade"—The Prince and the Princess	Rimsky-Korsakov
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection	Greshwin
"Volga Bargeman's Songs"	Arranged by Jacchia
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March	Woodin

TUESDAY

Entrance of the Boyards	Halvorsen
Ballet Suite	Rameau-Mottl
Traumerei	Schumann
Polonaise	Liszt
Virginia, a Southern Rhapsody	Haydn Wood
"Thais," Meditation	Massenet
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem	Ravel

HANS WIENER

Otto Ashermann and Group of Dancers

Golliwog's Cake-Walk	Debussy
The Foolish Virgins	Dvorak
Danse Grotesque	Schubert
Persian Ballet	Borodin

WEDNESDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet"	Meyerbeer
"Fingal's Cave," Overture	Mendelssohn
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango	Gade
"Natchez on the Hill," Virginia Country Dance	Powell
"Tosca," Fantasia	Puccini
Largo	Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky

HANS WIENER

Otto Ashermann and Group of Dancers

The Foolish Virgins	Dvorak
Circus	Fucik
Persian Ballet	Borodin

THURSDAY

Program to be announced

FRIDAY

French Military March	Saint-Saens
"The Marriage of Figaro," Overture	Mozart
Variations on the Austrian National Anthem, from the String Quartet, Op. 76, No. 3	Haydn
"Lohengrin," Finale of Act I	Wagner
Pathetic Symphony, Third Movement	Tchaikovsky
Suite	Corelli
Bolero	Ravel
"Gypsy Love," Selection	Lehar
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann"	Offenbach
El Capitan	Sousa

SATURDAY

March, "Schechenyi Ihdulo"	Fahrbach
"Roman Carnival," Overture	Berlioz
Andante Cantabile	Tchaikovsky
Fourth Symphony, Third Movement	Tchaikovsky
"Lohengrin," Prelude	Wagner
"Rienzi" Overture	Wagner
Rhapsody in Blue Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma	Gershwin
"The Cat and the Fiddle," Selection	Kern
"Congress Dances," Waltz	Haymann
Stein Song March	Bullard

SUNDAY

"La Coq d'Or," Introduction and Wedding March	Rimsky-Korsakov
"Russian and Ludmilla," Overture	Glinka
Dances and Songs of the Ghetto	Weprik
"Christmas Eve," Suite,	Rimsky-Korsakov
Fourth Symphony, Finale	Tuhaikovsky
Waltz from the Serenade for Strings	Tchaikovsky
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
Soviet Iron Foundry	Mossolov
Volga Bargemen's Song	Arranged by Jacchia
Caucasian Sketches	Ippolitov-Ivanov

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

MAY 29 1933

Future Symphony Concerts To Be Held in Metropolitan

Music Associations to Have Greater Seating Capacity in New Arrangement

The Metropolitan Theatre, Broad and Chestnut streets, has been selected by the Providence Community Concert Association, the Providence Symphony Orchestra and the Music Association of Providence, the latter the sponsors of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for presentation of future concerts sponsored by those groups. The new arrangement, providing greater seating capacity, will be inaugurated next fall, it was announced today by the heads of all three organizations.

The acoustics of the Metroiitain are admirably adapted to requirements, a recent demonstration showed. Stage facilities and general arrangements, including those of seating are such as to have influenced the selection of this new central home for the more important musical events of the year in Providence next season.

Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, president of the Providence Community Concert Association, announced the plan at the annual meeting of that organization, held in the lecture room of the Providence Gas Co. At the same time announcements were authorized by Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, president of the Music Association, and William L. Sweet, president of the Providence Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Sharpe, for the artist and program committee of the Community Concert Association, announced a series of four concerts for next season. These include the first apearance in Providence of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, conductor; Serge Lifar, Russian male dancer and his ballet, who will make his American debut in Providence; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, and Lucrezia Bori, Metropolitan Opera star.

Mrs. Brown was re-elected president of the Community Concert association. Other officers elected today are:

First vice president, William S. Innis; second vice president, Mrs. Wilson G. Wing; third vice president, Mrs. Arthur M. Allen; fourth vice president, Mrs. George Hail; treasurer, Robert S. Holding, Jr.; secretary, Hugh F. MacColl; assistant secretary and treasurer, Raymond G. Williams.

The artist and program committee was reappointed as follows: Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, chairman; Mrs. Brown, chairman ex-officio; Mrs. Allen, Prof. Arlan Coolidge MacColl and Mrs. G. Pierce Metcalf.

CUPS ARE AWARDED

Mrs. Brown reported briefly on the activities of the past season. Mrs. Raymond F. Wolcott, chairman of the campaign committee, awarded cups to winners in the recent subscription campaign. Mrs. Ada Holding Miller reported that student tickets have been given to 300 students who are interested in music. Mrs. Edgar B. Shaw, for the resolution committee, thanked various persons and organizations who have helped the association.

A resolution was adopted thanking the public, the team workers, the press, Loew's theatre, the Narragansett Electric Company and Stations WEAN and WJAR for co-operation in the past season.

Regarding the adaptability of the Metropolitan to concerts, either by artists or symphony orchestras, it was said that tests were made by Boston Symphony Orchestra officials and officers of the three associations at a rehearsal of the Providence Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, April 30. All voiced enthusiastic approval of the choice of the new location. Assurance is given to subscribers that they will have full seating accommodations. This is because the seating arrangement of the Metropolitan is similar to that of other Providence theatres which have been used by the associations.

It was also pointed out that there is a considerable amount of available garage and open air parking space adjacent to the Metropolitan.

Trans

JUNE 3, 1933

Musicians --

Considering Koussevitzky In The Round

His Conducting in London As Two Eminent Reviewers Summarize It

AT the London Music Festival, which is being held this week (May 15-20) by the B. B. C., Koussevitzky gave a remarkable demonstration of the art of conducting. He appeared in Manchester [writes Mr. Neville Cardus, the distinguished reviewer for The Guardian] during or just after the war, but the orchestra at his disposal then was intractable, and Koussevitzky had to get his work done by sheer force of will. His crouchings and swayings were so extreme that many musicians thought he was merely a picturesque conductor, a sort of Svengali of the orchestra.

Today Koussevitzky is regarded as one of the few really great conductors of the world; certainly he exercised a power of music which could be felt throughout Queen's Hall. It is true that occasionally he did things which the higher criticism would never dream of condoning in other conductors. For example, there would be a nice how-de-do some Sunday morning if Furtwängler were to break up, as Koussevitzky did, the second main subject of the first movement of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, after suspending activities almost entirely for a moment before introducing it.

But there was no mistaking Koussevitzky's musical sensibility, his proportionate molding of form, subtle yet inevitable, in the great Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. His treatment of the work was thoroughly harmonious, and it brought up the question again as to what is the right view to take of Sibelius's music. For on this occasion, Sibelius was made to sound a composer with an absolutely musical texture, reticent, maybe, but not indifferent to ordinary civilized ideas of beauty. Most interpretations of Sibelius have led us to think of him as a stark, almost brutal, fellow, rather ill-mannered in his indifference to the general conceptions of beauty in music. Koussevitzky gave us a Sibelius who, with all his independence of outlook, was scrupulously concerned with musical sonorities and musical rhythms and musical parts of speech.

The texture was not harsh or grating: the wood-wind did not seem sour; the strings made sufficiently sensitive lines: the brass was poetic and humane in blend and color. In short, Sibelius was revealed to us as a writer of authentic music, elliptical maybe in the processes of his logic, but never unlovely, never insistent on his subject-matter at the risk of endangering the treatment of it as art, as craftsmanship carefully and sympathetically practiced, with a proper regard for what an instrument or group of instruments can achieve without loss of true character.

Koussevitzky is not a man of overnice temperament; and so we may be sure that if he conducts Sibelius in this way it is not because he does not understand the downright psychology of the man. And why should the music of Sibelius ever be regarded as a sort of rough quarrying of tone, dug out and heaved at us rudely? Sibelius is obviously a highly civilized thinker, so much so that he has no patience with the ordinary tautology of symphonic form. In the Seventh Symphony, he concentrates form so finely that he says his say in one continuous movement, which does not last half an hour. He despises display and rhetoric; he weaves his music out of modest scale-figures, repetitive figuration, gradual accumulations of rhythm. His harmony is never fulsome; his climaxes are discreet; compared with those of Wagner they are refined and modest. All these characteristics are surely those of a mind that is abnormally susceptible to the fine shades of the art of music.

Koussevitzky gave us a strong sense of style in Sibelius without once diminishing the power and stature of the music. Mind and sensibility, thinking and feeling—all were blended in proportion. The symphony sounded like a symphony, consummately fashioned—and not like the raw material for a symphony. Usually a work by Sibelius is conducted and played as though the composer had left a lot of the actual music out, after laying down the ground plan. The orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation was admirable. Koussevitzky has the secret of personal magnetism. There is something spellbinding in his presence. His beat is plain and comprehensive; he turns unambiguously to this group of players and that. His gestures seem to get into intimate touch with every instrumentalist; his face is expressive, and he seems inaudibly to sing or speak the music's message. He is restrained even in his most intense moments; his only lack, so I felt in Chaikovsky's symphony, is a certain artlessness. Occasionally his treatment of a melody seemed a little obvious in punctuation. But that was probably an inevitable trait in a generally intense way of feeling and expressing music.

When Koussevitzky last conducted in this country it was said he swore he would never direct another English orchestra; they were so bad. Since those days there has been a vast improvement, thanks partly to the example shown us by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on its first visit here a few years ago, and more to the founding shortly afterwards of the B. B. C. Orchestra. At the London Music Festival this orchestra has been heard at its very best. It is a strong orchestra, a virile orchestra, a masculine orchestra—in short, a man's orchestra, and perhaps Koussevitzky is mainly a man's conductor. His least persuasive moments are his tender moments or when he has to be alluring. His handling of the great climax of the Venusberg Music was magnificent. The frenzies were abandoned enough, but never beyond the scope of music. There was no insignificant noise, but I missed the rosy voluptuousness of the soft section, after the passion has been spent. The woodwind was too precise in outline, the treatment of it all a little unyielding. The interpretation did not compare for poetry with Toscanini's, heard here a few years ago, an interpretation which died down in luscious mists of distance and disillusion. Yet it is a high compliment to Koussevitzky that his conducting in this music inspired the comparison with Toscanini at all.

There is no conductor who is more masterful than Koussevitzky in an intense and tumultuous musical energy. He is an artist in dramatic sonorities. His "Meistersinger" Prelude had a gigantic stature and a crashing climax. Only a conductor of extraordinary power could have controlled with such proportion the bigness of stride of this performance. Maybe it was too hard and taut to be true; we missed the real German ease and geniality. And in the lyrical section Koussevitzky again showed his want of salience; melody does not easily float under his intensely determined beat. The "Siegfried Idyll" also needed a little more charm of the modest, artless kind. It was beautifully put together, with the subtle rhythmical plan (one of the subtlest and most difficult in all music for a conductor to handle) realized in every sequence; yet somehow, despite the exquisite shading of the playing, we felt the end of it all was less a tender serenade than a piece of consummate conducting.

Like every other great artist, Koussevitzky has to pay for his unique qualities. These qualities will surely be revealed at their finest on Friday when Koussevitzky conducts the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. He is unlike most foreign conductors who visit us, not stuck in a routine of hackneyed works. On Monday he gave us the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and on Wednesday the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax, whose music he introduced years ago to audiences in the United States. He could not convince everyone of us that the symphony was the consequence of an inevitable act of the musical imagination. But the work could not well receive a performance of more sustained vitality.

The rare quality in Beecham's conducting is sensibility, a warm musical flow, an unforced and natural tempo. I have felt the lack of this quality in Koussevitzky's conducting at the London Music Festival. Though Koussevitzky is a conductor of exceptional technical mastery, his interpretations lack heart. Russian he may be, but the United States and Boston seem to have taught him a hard efficiency. His idea of the "Siegfried Idyll" was that of the conductor of "big business." In orchestral playing he delivered the goods expertly; he left little to speak for itself. If Cosima Wagner had been wakened from sleep on a Christmas morning by Koussevitzky's version of the "Siegfried Idyll" she might well have said "What a dexterous blending of the parts"—not "What heavenly music."

Koussevitzky has strength and a genius for handling a big canvas. But I would not call him a complete conductor. He lacks charm and ordinarily humane sentiment. His dignity is admirable, but I wish he would occasionally relax. In Sibelius's Seventh Symphony he was magnificent. His "Meistersinger" Overture was entirely without juice. He happens to be the fashionable conductor in London at the moment. He can do nothing wrong, just as Furtwängler can do nothing right. It is strange how these uncritical fashions get about, and stranger still who starts them.

To these scruples of Mr. Cardus, the warm praises of Mr. Newman shall be pendant as set down in The Sunday Times. He also digresses to the Boston Orchestra: "The really great things of the week have been the three concerts conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky for the B. B. C. 'Festival.' The B. B. C. Orchestra is still a longish way behind the Boston Symphony Orchestra both in the quality of some of its personnel and in the matter of style; but under Mr. Koussevitzky it has shown us the great possibilities latent in it. In all its history it has never played so brilliantly as it has done during the past week.

"We have had the most authoritative performances conceivable of two of the finest of modern symphonies—the second of Bax and the seventh of Sibelius. Neither of these is an easy nut for even the experienced listener to crack, and it will take time for either of them to become popular; but at any rate we have now been shown the fine stuff of which they are made. The Seventh is Sibelius at his greatest; here, as in 'Tapiola,' we see him at last taking up again the line he seemed to abandon for so long after touching upon it in the fourth symphony. Textually the work presents no difficulties for any listener. It is in the intensity and the compression of the thinking that the hearer's problem lies.

"Of the more familiar works of the week we have also had some model performances. Never before, in London, has the 'Classic Symphony' of Prokofiev been given with such lightness and grace of touch. In the Wagner pieces (the Venusberg Music, the Siegfried Idyll, and the 'Meistersinger' prelude) we have had the perfect combination of beauty in detail with the architect's sense of the proportions and the build of the works as a whole. The Idyll, with its tranquil flow for the greater part of the time, the steadily growing climax, and the gradual ebbing of the tide at the finish, was particularly beautiful.

"The reading of the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation. It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding. Mr. Koussevitzky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Chaikovsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

* * *

This month, while Max Reinhardt is at Oxford directing an out-of-door performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by the Dramatic Society of the University, he will receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law. For the first time, probably, a university of such rank is bestowing such a degree upon a producer in the theater. (What, what, will the President of Harvard say!) For Reinhardt is neither dramatist nor actor. His international note rests upon the direction of playhouses and the production of plays. Some in London and Oxford associate the degree with his recent expulsion from Germany as a hostile Jew.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

JUN 4 - 1933

DR. SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON
Famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and known to millions of radio listeners, photographed as he arrived to conduct a series of concerts at Queens Hall
London News Agency

NEW YORK TIMES

JUN 4 - 1933

LONDON OI

Beecham Conducts " sifal," "Ring"—Kou

By F. BONAVIA.
LONDON, May 18, 1933.

* * *

Koussevitzky's appearance aroused considerable expectations. The concerts he conducted some eight years ago are still remembered, and we could now give him a much finer instrument to play upon than we could then. These expectations were not disappointed. In the comparatively short time at his disposal he secured absolute control of the orchestra, which followed his indications with utmost fidelity. It was also a pleasure to note that his beat and gestures, without being quite as sedate as Boult's, have the clearness and the dignity of the old classical conductors.

The only opening for criticism was in his programs. Prokofieff's "classical" symphony seems to me important only in so far as it shows what curious notions of classicism some people have. The Fifth is the worst of all Tchaikovsky's symphonies, and even Koussevitzky cannot dim the appalling blatancy of its final peroration. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" retains its freshness, but it has been played so often and improved upon by so many interpreters that it is difficult to find a new personality in any repeated performance. Koussevitzky took it slowly. Robert Heger at Covent Garden did the same thing. But we were grateful to the Boston conductor for a luminous performance of Arnold Bax's Second symphony and a perfectly conceived exposition of Sibelius's Seventh.

N. Y. World-Telegram

JUN 14 1933

Boston Band Chief Hailed by London

Critics Warmly Praise Koussevitzky for His Conducting.

By PITTS SANBORN.

OUR friends, the London critics, have gone quite mad about the conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, who for a large part of the year presides over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Recently he has led three concerts in London as part of the festival organized by the British Broadcasting Co., featuring symphonies by Sibelius, Prokofieff and Tschaikowsky.

Ernest Newman, always a stout champion of the Russian batonist, praises thus his adventure with the last-named composer:—"The reading of the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation.

"It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding: Mr. Koussevitzky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Tschaikowsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

We had the pleasure of hearing this work magnificently performed last season by the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall. It was a remarkable achievement for both the famous orchestra and its conductor.

* * *

Hippodrome Bill Changed.

l Destino," with its nace" f

Trans

, JUNE 3, 1933

Musicians ==

Considering Koussevitzky In The Round

His Conducting in London As Two Eminent Reviewers Summarize It

AT the London Music Festival, which is being held this week (May 15-20) by the B. B. C., Koussevitzky gave a remarkable demonstration of the art of conducting. He appeared in Manchester [writes Mr. Neville Cardus, the distinguished reviewer for The Guardian] during or just after the war, but the orchestra at his disposal then was intractable, and Koussevitzky had to get his work done by sheer force of will. His crouchings and swayings were so extreme that many musicians thought he was merely a picturesque conductor, a sort of Svengali of the orchestra.

Today Koussevitzky is regarded as one of the few really great conductors of the world; certainly he exercised a power of music which could be felt throughout Queen's Hall. It is true that occasionally he did things which the higher criticism would never dream of condoning in other conductors. For example, there would be a nice how-de-do some Sunday morning if Furtwängler were to break up, as Koussevitzky did, the second main subject of the first movement of Chaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, after suspending activities almost entirely for a moment before introducing it.

But there was no mistaking Koussevitzky's musical sensibility, his proportionate molding of form, subtle yet inevitable, in the great Seventh Symphony of Sibelius. His treatment of the work was thoroughly harmonious, and it brought up the question again as to what is the right view to take of Sibelius's music. For on this occasion, Sibelius was made to sound a composer with an absolutely musical texture, reticent, maybe, but not indifferent to ordinary civilized ideas of beauty. Most interpretations of Sibelius have led us to think of him as a stark almost brutal, fellow, rather ill-mannered in his indifference to the general conceptions of beauty in music. Koussevitzky gave us a Sibelius who, with all his independence of outlook, was scrupulously concerned with musical sonorities and musical rhythms and musical parts of speech.

The texture was not harsh or grating; the wood-wind did not seem sour; the strings made sufficiently sensitive lines; the brass was poetic and humane in blend and color. In short, Sibelius was revealed to us as a writer of authentic music, elliptical maybe in the processes of his logic, but never unlovely, never insistent on his subject-matter at the risk of endangering the treatment of it as art, as craftsmanship carefully and sympathetically practiced, with a proper regard for what an instrument or group of instruments can achieve without loss of true character.

Koussevitzky is not a man of overnice temperament; and so we may be sure that if he conducts Sibelius in this way it is not because he does not understand the downright psychology of the man. And why should the music of Sibelius ever be regarded as a sort of rough quarrying of tone, dug out and heaved at us rudely? Sibelius is obviously a highly civilized thinker, so much so that he has no patience with the ordinary tautology of symphonic form. In the Seventh Symphony, he concentrates form so finely that he says his say in one continuous movement, which does not last half an hour. He despises display and rhetoric; he weaves his music out of modest scale-figures, repetitive figuration, gradual accumulations of rhythm. His harmony is never fulsome; his climaxes are discreet; compared with those of Wagner they are refined and modest. All these characteristics are surely those of a mind that is abnormally susceptible to the fine shades of the art of music.

Koussevitzky gave us a strong sense of style in Sibelius without once diminishing the power and stature of the music. Mind and sensibility, thinking and feeling—all were blended in proportion. The symphony sounded like a symphony, consummately fashioned—and not like the raw material for a symphony. Usually a work by Sibelius is conducted and played as though the composer had left a lot of the actual music out, after laying down the ground plan. The orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation was admirable. Koussevitzky has the secret of personal magnetism. There is something spellbinding in his presence. His beat is plain and comprehensive; he turns unambiguously to this group of players and that. His gestures seem to get into intimate touch with every instrumentalist; his face is expressive, and he seems inaudibly to sing or speak the music's message. He is restrained even in his most intense moments; his only lack, so I felt in Chaikovsky's symphony, is a certain artlessness. Occasionally his treatment of a melody seemed a little obvious in punctuation. But that was probably an inevitable trait in a generally intense way of feeling and expressing music.

When Koussevitzky last conducted in this country it was said he swore he would never direct another English orchestra: they were so bad. Since those days there has been a vast improvement, thanks partly to the example shown us by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on its first visit here a few years ago, and more to the founding shortly afterwards of the B. B. C. Orchestra. At the London Music Festival this orchestra has been heard at its very best. It is a strong orchestra, a virile orchestra, a masculine orchestra—in short, a man's orchestra, and perhaps Koussevitzky is mainly a man's conductor. His least persuasive moments are his tender moments or when he has to be alluring. His handling of the great climax of the Venusberg Music was magnificent. The frenzies were abandoned enough, but never beyond the scope of music. There was no insignificant noise, but I missed the rosy voluptuousness of the soft section, after the passion has been spent. The woodwind was too precise in outline, the treatment of it all a little unyielding. The interpretation did not compare for poetry with Toscanini's, heard here a few years ago, an interpretation which died down in luscious mists of distance and disillusion. Yet it is a high compliment to Koussevitzky that his conducting in this music inspired the comparison with Toscanini at all.

There is no conductor who is more masterful than Koussevitzky in an intense and tumultuous musical energy. He is an artist in dramatic sonorities. His "Meistersinger" Prelude had a gigantic stature and a crashing climax. Only a conductor of extraordinary power could have controlled with such proportion the bigness of stride of this performance. Maybe it was too hard and taut to be true: we missed the real German ease and geniality. And in the lyrical section Koussevitzky again showed his want of salience: melody does not easily float under his intensely determined beat. The "Siegfried Idyll" also needed a little more charm of the modest, artless kind. It was beautifully put together, with the subtle rhythmical plan (one of the subtlest and most difficult in all music for a conductor to handle) realized in every sequence yet somehow, despite the exquisite shading of the playing, we felt the end of it all was less a tender serenade than a piece of consummate conducting.

Like every other great artist, Koussevitzky has to pay for his unique qualities. These qualities will surely be revealed at their finest on Friday when Koussevitzky conducts the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. He is unlike most foreign conductors who visit us, not stuck in a routine of hackneyed works. On Monday he gave us the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and on Wednesday the Second Symphony of Arnold Bax, whose music he introduced years ago to audiences in the United States. He could not convince everyone of us that the symphony was the consequence of an inevitable act of the musical imagination. But the work could not well receive a performance of more sustained vitality.

The rare quality in Beecham's conducting is sensibility, a warm musical flow an unforced and natural tempo. I have felt the lack of this quality in Koussevitzky's conducting at the London Music Festival. Though Koussevitzky is a conductor of exceptional technical mastery, his interpretations lack heart. Russian he may be, but the United States and Boston seem to have taught him a hard efficiency. His idea of the "Siegfried Idyll" was that of the conductor of "big business." In orchestral playing he delivered the goods expertly; he left little to speak for itself. If Cosima Wagner had been wakened from sleep on a Christmas morning by Koussevitzky's version of the "Siegfried Idyll" she might well have said "What a dexterous blending of the parts"—not "What heavenly music."

Koussevitzky has strength and a genius for handling a big canvas. But I would not call him a complete conductor. He lacks charm and ordinarily humane sentiment. His dignity is admirable, but I wish he would occasionally relax. In Sibelius's Seventh Symphony he was magnificent. His "Meistersinger" Overture was entirely without juice. He happens to be the fashionable conductor in London at the moment. He can do nothing wrong, just as Furtwängler can do nothing right. It is strange how these uncritical fashions get about, and stranger still who starts them.

To these scruples of Mr. Cardus, the warm praises of Mr. Newman shall be pendant as set down in The Sunday Times. He also digresses to the Boston Orchestra: "The really great things of the week have been the three concerts conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky for the B. B. C. 'Festival.' The B. B. C. Orchestra is still a longish way behind the Boston Symphony Orchestra both in the quality of some of its personnel and in the matter of style; but under Mr. Koussevitzky it has shown us the great possibilities latent in it. In all its history it has never played so brilliantly as it has done during the past week.

"We have had the most authoritative performances conceivable of two of the finest of modern symphonies—the second of Bax and the seventh of Sibelius. Neither of these is an easy nut for even the experienced listener to crack, and it will take time for either of them to become popular; but at any rate we have now been shown the fine stuff of which they are made. The Seventh is Sibelius at his greatest; here, as in 'Tapiola,' we see him at last taking up again the line he seemed to abandon for so long after touching upon it in the fourth symphony. Textually the work presents no difficulties for any listener. It is in the intensity and the compression of the thinking that the hearer's problem lies.

"Of the more familiar works of the week we have also had some model performances. Never before, in London, has the 'Classic Symphony' of Prokofiev been given with such lightness and grace of touch. In the Wagner pieces (the Venusberg Music, the Siegfried Idyll, and the 'Meistersinger' prelude) we have had the perfect combination of beauty in detail with the architect's sense of the proportions and the build of the works as a whole. The Idyll, with its tranquil flow for the greater part of the time, the steadily growing climax, and the gradual ebbing of the tide at the finish, was particularly beautiful.

"The reading of the Fifth Symphony of Chaikovsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation. It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding. Mr. Koussevitzky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Chaikovsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

This month, while Max Reinhardt is at Oxford directing an out-of-door performance of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by the Dramatic Society of the University, he will receive the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law. For the first time, probably, a university of such rank is bestowing such a degree upon a producer in the theater (What, what, will the President of Harvard say?) For Reinhardt is neither dramatist nor actor. His international note rests upon the direction of playhouses and the production of plays. Some in London and Oxford associate the degree with his recent expulsion from Germany as a hostile Jew.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

JUN 4 - 1933

DR. SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY IN LONDON

Famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and known to millions of radio listeners, photographed as he arrived to conduct a series of concerts at Queens Hall

London News Agency

NEW YORK TIMES

JUN 4 - 1933

LONDON OI

Beecham Conducts " sifal," "Ring"—Kou

By F. BONAVIA.
LONDON, May 18, 1933.

* * *

Koussevitzky's appearance aroused considerable expectations. The concerts he conducted some eight years ago are still remembered, and we could now give him a much finer instrument to play upon than we could then. These expectations were not disappointed. In the comparatively short time at his disposal he secured absolute control of the orchestra, which followed his indications with utmost fidelity. It was also a pleasure to note that his beat and gestures, without being quite as sedate as Boult's, have the clearness and the dignity of the old classical conductors.

The only opening for criticism was in his programs. Prokofieff's "classical" symphony seems to me important only in so far as it shows what curious notions of classicism some people have. The Fifth is the worst of all Tchaikovsky's symphonies, and even Koussevitzky cannot dim the appalling blatancy of its final peroration. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" retains its freshness, but it has been played so often and improved upon by so many interpreters that it is difficult to find a new personality in any repeated performance. Koussevitzky took it slowly. Robert Heger at Covent Garden did the same thing. But we were grateful to the Boston conductor for a luminous performance of Arnold Bax's Second symphony and a perfectly conceived exposition of Sibelius's Seventh

---

N. Y. World-Telegram

Boston Band Chief Hailed by London

Critics Warmly Praise Koussevitzky for His Conducting.

By PITTS SANBORN.

OUR friends, the London critics, have gone quite mad about the conducting of Serge Koussevitzky, who for a large part of the year presides over the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Recently he has led three concerts in London as part of the festival organized by the British Broadcasting Co., featuring symphonies by Sibelius, Prokofieff and Tschaikowsky...

Ernest Newman, always a stout champion of the Russian batonist, praises thus his adventure with the last-named composer:—"The reading of the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation.

"It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding: Mr. Koussevitzky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Tschaikowsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

We had the pleasure of hearing this work magnificently performed last season by the visiting Bostonians in Carnegie Hall. It was a remarkable achievement for both the famous orchestra and its conductor.

* * *

Hippodrome Bill Changed.

l Destino," with its 20

Trans

Y, JUNE 1, 1933

s --- Films

British Composers, Wagner Miscellany

Dr. Koussevitzky Continues His Concerts in London Successfully

THE newest mails from London bring the reviewers' comment on the second of Dr. Koussevitzky's concerts with the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. It befell on Wednesday evening, May 17, in Queen's Hall. The program assembled Bax's Second Symphony, in E minor and C major; Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point"; the Venusberg music from the Parisian "Tannhäuser"; the "Siegfried Idyl"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"—all numbers in which the conductor is heard familiarly in Boston. Said Mr. Toye in The Morning Post: "There is this great difference between Mr. Koussevitzky and some of the other distinguished foreign conductors who have recently visited us: he has a large, varied, and progressive repertory. It is comparatively easy to specialize in a dozen classical symphonies and overtures. When, as our own Sir Thomas Beecham so successfully and repeatedly does, or as Koussevitzky did at the B. B. C. Music Festival at the Queen's Hall last evening, a conductor makes a point of introducing his audience to comparatively new or unfamiliar music, he is surely entitled, other things being equal, to be considered the greater artist.

"Two British composers provided the music of what must be considered the more important part of the program; for the Wagnerian excerpts at the end, however well given, are wholly familiar to everybody. Walton was represented by his overture 'Portsmouth Point,' Bax by his Second Symphony. Koussevitzky inspired the magnificent orchestra to give an exceptionally fine rendering of both. The rather hard but breezy swagger of Walton's effective composition stood out in bold relief. Though we had, many of us, heard it several times previously, its fundamental characteristics as an entity were revealed as rarely before. Bax's symphony was no less well handled, but one member of the audience at any rate found some difficulty in discovering a personality in the composition as a whole. . . . It seemed to him an elaborate essay in diverse sonorities, not always ideally differentiated, but never anything but ingenious and interesting. The merit of Koussevitzky's interpretation lay in the mastery with which he isolated each ingredient, yet achieved such a perfect balance, such a translucent clarity in the whole. Which is precisely what is wanted to make Bax's music sound its very best."

As Mr. Colles, reviewing for The Times, had it, "Mr. Koussevitzky devoted half of his second program with the B. B. C. Orchestra to modern composers and half to a nineteenth-century composer, as he did at his first concert on Monday. But last night the modern composers were Englishmen and his romantic composer was Wagner. After a crisp performance of William Walton's 'Portsmouth Point' Overture he gave a thoughtful and forceful performance of Bax's Second Symphony."

After a paragraph debating the composer and his music, the article continues: "Having done ample justice in a self-effacing manner to a living composer, Mr. Koussevitzky felt warranted in showing his own prowess in three pieces of Wagner that are proof against any damage. Nevertheless, in spite of impeccable playing, the heart was not in them. The Venusberg Music was orgiastic enough, and the 'Meistersinger' Overture kept something of its joyful spirit; but the Siegfried Idyll was too painted and powdered for an aubade. Tempo rubato is all very well for nocturnes, but it takes the early-morning freshness out of what is rather an intimate piece of chamber music than a conductor's battle-horse with an orchestra of a hundred players."

According to Mr. Capell in The Daily Telegraph: "Serge Koussevitzky, at the second of his concerts with the B. B. C. Orchestra, conducted Arnold Bax's Second Symphony, which is dedicated to him, and which he was the first to play with his Boston orchestra in 1929. An extraordinarily strong and gripping performance was given of the impressive work, which hitherto has not been so much esteemed in England as the composer's third symphony."

Returning to the conductor after a digression to the composer, Mr. Capell proceeds: "The magnificent performance was acclaimed, and the composer was called to the platform. William Walton's amazingly clever and pungent overture, 'Portsmouth Point,' was likewise wonderfully played. The second part of the evening was all Wagner. Toujours perdrix! The best of this was the Venusberg Music, which indeed could not have been better. One was conscious of some mannerisms in Koussevitzky's 'Meistersinger' overture."

Warren William—"The Mind

Beethoven Played By Koussevitzky

Much Praise, Little Blame, For His Final Concert In London

Trans — June 5

THE Fourth and the Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven filled the program of the last of Dr. Koussevitzky's three concerts in London on May 15, 17 and 19, with the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. "A huge audience" filled Queen's Hall and The Morning Post reports "a remarkable display of enthusiasm." It must be a very long time, it continues, "since London has heard better performances" of these two symphonies.

"Rumor," Mr. Toye continues, "had rather led some of us to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky was inclined to take great liberties with the tempo and expression in order to secure deeper intensity and a higher degree of dynamic power. Rumor was wrong. Mr. Koussevitzky took no liberties, warrantable or unwarrantable; the markings of the score were followed far more faithfully than is usually the case with most of our distinguished visiting conductors. But he achieved the power and the intensity all right, thanks mainly to his beautiful sense of rhythm, which extends not merely to a single passage, but to a movement as a whole." After comment on the work of orchestra, chorus and solo-singers, Mr. Toye ends: "Undoubtedly this concert has put the seal on Koussevitzky's reputation in London as a great conductor; for he has shown us that in addition to his other gifts he possesses nobility of outlook."

In The Times, Mr. Colles was as warm in praise: "Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of Beethoven has grown immeasurably in recent years. In the Fourth Symphony there were a few moments which suggested the virtuoso conductor's love of extremes—the opening Adagio taken excessively slowly in order that the contrast of the Allegro might be the more vivid; a piano turned into a pianissimo that the following crescendo might be the more intense. But if there were details of the same kind in the Ninth Symphony there was little time to notice them. The colossal movements were unfolded in unswerving progress. Those details of the first movement, particularly in the woodwind, which generally sound hazy, all came out with surprising clearness. Throughout the melodic line was sustained and every tempo seemed ideally chosen. For once the symphony was really built up to its inevitable climax of torrential tones in the choral finale, and even the last clashes of the cymbals in the final chords after the voices had ceased escaped the charge of vulgarity. As the singers surmounted their task without effort, the 'Ode to Joy' became the pæan of Beethoven's imagination. . . . All, in fact, combined to produce one of the most inspiring performances of the Ninth Symphony in recent years."

The dissenter was Mr. Capell of the Daily Telegraph, who wrote: "Busoni's view that music of no matter what period should make on a modern audience not a 'classical' effect, but something of the effect it had for contemporaries is said to be Koussevitzky's also. Certainly his Beethoven is not conventional. Last night's performances, to which enormous pains had gone, were magnificent, and also strange. But, then, Beethoven was to his contemporaries stranger than we can imagine.

"The strangeness of this Ninth Symphony lay in a certain angularity, a Byzantine angularity, amounting sometimes almost to distortion, in Koussevitzky's powerful rhythm. It was stark. Perhaps we should not ask for easefulness in Beethoven any more than grace from El Greco. It may be that after Koussevitzky's hacking of the Scherzo a normal performance would seem tame and wrong. He aimed in the slow movement at a kind of restless seriousness, sacrificing charm. Many new details came out in this reading, and mostly the playing was wonderful, but when the violins muffed their garland of triplets three pages before the end of the Adagio one wondered if the cult of the uncomfortable had not been carried a shade too far. Koussevitzky is anyhow a great man."

[illegible] June 1933

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who made us take Sibelius and like him

profundity of its meaning, all its simple majesty.

Music has been served, Boston has been served, Sibelius is appreciated, for those listening were stirred and moved with the realization that the grandeur of a remarkable intellect, the beauty of a lonely soul, had been reve

DID HIS BEST BY SIBELIUS

If you attended many of the Symphony concerts this season, you will remember that Sibelius was a most frequently presented name of the year. It seems that it was Koussevitzky's intention to put forth an entire cycle of Sibelius symphonies in 1932–1933. Seven of them he did present, and eight there would have been had not the Finnish composer cabled in March that he had been unable to complete symphony number eight in time for this season's presentation in Boston. Consequently, the eighth is now scheduled to be heard at one of the first concerts next fall.

Although London audiences are well acquainted with Sibelius, who was born in the year 1865, America knows him but slightly. But Boston always has been called the one 'Sibelius town' in the country. Practically no other orchestra besides the Boston Symphony consistently renders his works. This winter Koussevitzky decided that Sibelius deserved to be even better known here.

Sibelius has always stood apart as a lonely figure who has apparently sought with some difficulty to bring the ideas 'which are immensely real to him' into touch with other minds. His struggle for expression has sometimes been likened to that of Beethoven. With the exception of the 'Valse Triste,' which is so widely popular and which gave at once a wrong version of the composer's genius, Sibelius's contributions have appeared to be as utterly unadorned and unornamented as a Doric column. At least so it appeared until Koussevitzky, through his magnificent orchestra, courageously and boldly laid before Boston audiences the work of a man who in his own impressible way has treated the legends and national epic of Finland as did Wagner the Teutonic.

Koussevitzky penetrated deeply into this music, vibrated in sympathy to what he found there, and in those strange scores brought forth all the

---

LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER
n JUN 1 1933

SUGGESTED BY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been conducting a series of programs in London by the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company. Judging by reports in the London papers he has been warmly received there. In Boston he has an orchestra which he has moulded and developed into an extremely sensitive and responsive group. With the personnel and the characteristics of the British orchestra, of course, he was not familar. Yet the critics—and in London they are exacting—agree that he stimulated it to new excellencies of achievement. That is a tribute in which we of Boston and vicinity may take pride. In the early days of the Koussevitzky musical reign in Boston there were a few who doubted his actual competence. But all doubts of his skill and discernment as a conductor have long been resolved. His place in the front rank is widely acknowledged.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
JUN 11 1933

Boston Symphony, pining for lack of patronage, resorted to a unique form of ballyhoo to attract crowds. "Atmospheric programs were arranged, i. e., a "Stein Night," in which the beer motif prevailed, and a "Gypsy Night," with appropriate musical setting. Patrons were invited to costume themselves accordingly, and the idea clicked handsomely.

* * *

Trans

Y, JUNE 1, 1933

S --- Films

British Composers, Wagner Miscellany

Dr. Koussevitzky Continues His Concerts in London Successfully

THE newest mails from London bring the reviewers' comment on the second of Dr. Koussevitzky's concerts with the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. It befell on Wednesday evening, May 17, in Queen's Hall. The program assembled Bax's Second Symphony, in E minor and C major; Walton's overture, "Portsmouth Point"; the Venusberg music from the Parisian "Tannhäuser"; the "Siegfried Idyl"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"—all numbers in which the conductor is heard familiarly in Boston. Said Mr. Toye in The Morning Post: "There is this great difference between Mr. Koussevitzky and some of the other distinguished foreign conductors who have recently visited us: he has a large, varied, and progressive repertory. It is comparatively easy to specialize in a dozen classical symphonies and overtures. When, as our own Sir Thomas Beecham so successfully and repeatedly does, or as Koussevitzky did at the B. B. C. Music Festival at the Queen's Hall last evening, a conductor makes a point of introducing his audience to comparatively new or unfamiliar music, he is surely entitled, other things being equal, to be considered the greater artist.

"Two British composers provided the music of what must be considered the more important part of the program; for the Wagnerian excerpts at the end, however well given, are wholly familiar to everybody. Walton was represented by his overture 'Portsmouth Point,' Bax by his Second Symphony. Koussevitzky inspired the magnificent orchestra to give an exceptionally fine rendering of both. The rather hard but breezy swagger of Walton's effective composition stood out in bold relief. Though we had, many of us, heard it several times previously, its fundamental characteristics as an entity were revealed as rarely before. Bax's symphony was no less well handled, but one member of the audience at any rate found some difficulty in discovering a personality in the composition as a whole. . . . It seemed to him an elaborate essay in diverse sonorities, not always ideally differentiated, but never anything but ingenious and interesting. The merit of Koussevitzky's interpretation lay in the mastery with which he isolated each ingredient, yet achieved such a perfect balance, such a translucent clarity in the whole. Which is precisely what is wanted to make Bax's music sound its very best."

As Mr. Colles, reviewing for The Times, had it, "Mr. Koussevitzky devoted half of his second program with the B. B. C. Orchestra to modern composers and half to a nineteenth-century composer, as he did at his first concert on Monday. But last night the modern composers were Englishmen and his romantic composer was Wagner. After a crisp performance of William Walton's 'Portsmouth Point' Overture he gave a thoughtful and forceful performance of Bax's Second Symphony."

After a paragraph debating the composer and his music, the article continues: "Having done ample justice in a self-effacing manner to a living composer, Mr. Koussevitzky felt warranted in showing his own prowess in three pieces of Wagner that are proof against any damage. Nevertheless, in spite of impeccable playing, the heart was not in them. The Venusberg Music was orgiastic enough, and the 'Meistersinger' Overture kept something of its joyful spirit; but the Siegfried Idyll was too painted and powdered for an aubade. Tempo rubato is all very well for nocturnes, but it takes the early-morning freshness out of what is rather an intimate piece of chamber music than a conductor's battle horse with an orchestra of a hundred players."

According to Mr. Capell in The Daily Telegraph: "Serge Koussevitzky, at the second of his concerts with the B. B. C. Orchestra, conducted Arnold Bax's Second Symphony, which is dedicated to him, and which he was the first to play with his Boston orchestra in 1929. An extraordinarily strong and gripping performance was given of the impressive work, which hitherto has not been so much esteemed in England as the composer's third symphony."

Returning to the conductor after a digression to the composer, Mr. Capell proceeds: "The magnificent performance was acclaimed, and the composer was called to the platform. William Walton's amazingly clever and pungent overture, 'Portsmouth Point,' was likewise wonderfully played. The second part of the evening was all Wagner. Toujours perdrix! The best of this was the Venusberg Music, which indeed could not have been better. One was conscious of some mannerisms in Koussevitzky's 'Meistersinger' overture."

Warren William—"The [illegible]

Beethoven Played By Koussevitzky

Much Praise, Little Blame, For His Final Concert In London

Trans — June 5

THE Fourth and the Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven filled the program of the last of Dr. Koussevitzky's three concerts in London on May 15, 17 and 19, with the orchestra of the British Broadcasting Corporation. "A huge audience" filled Queen's Hall and The Morning Post reports "a remarkable display of enthusiasm." It must be a very long time, it continues, "since London has heard better performances" of these two symphonies.

"Rumor," Mr. Toye continues, "had rather led some of us to believe that Mr. Koussevitzky was inclined to take great liberties with the tempo and expression in order to secure deeper intensity and a higher degree of dynamic power. Rumor was wrong. Mr. Koussevitzky took no liberties, warrantable or unwarrantable; the markings of the score were followed far more faithfully than is usually the case with most of our distinguished visiting conductors. But he achieved the power and the intensity all right, thanks mainly to his beautiful sense of rhythm, which extends not merely to a single passage, but to a movement as a whole." After comment on the work of orchestra, chorus and solo-singers, Mr. Toye ends: "Undoubtedly this concert has put the seal on Koussevitzky's reputation in London as a great conductor; for he has shown us that in addition to his other gifts he possesses nobility of outlook."

In The Times, Mr. Colles was as warm in praise: "Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of Beethoven has grown immeasurably in recent years. In the Fourth Symphony there were a few moments which suggested the virtuoso conductor's love of extremes—the opening Adagio taken excessively slowly in order that the contrast of the Allegro might be the more vivid; a piano turned into a pianissimo that the following crescendo might be the more intense. But if there were details of the same kind in the Ninth Symphony there was little time to notice them. The colossal movements were unfolded in unswerving progress. Those details of the first movement, particularly in the woodwind, which generally sound hazy, all came out with surprising clearness. Throughout the melodic line was sustained and every tempo seemed ideally chosen. For once the symphony was really built up to its inevitable climax of torrential tones in the choral finale, and even the last clashes of the cymbals in the final chords after the voices had ceased escaped the charge of vulgarity. As the singers surmounted their task without effort, the 'Ode to Joy' became the pæan of Beethoven's imagination. . . . All, in fact, combined to produce one of the most inspiring performances of the Ninth Symphony in recent years."

The dissenter was Mr. Capell of the Daily Telegraph, who wrote: "Busoni's view that music of no matter what period should make on a modern audience not a 'classical' effect, but something of the effect it had for contemporaries is said to be Koussevitzky's also. Certainly his Beethoven is not conventional. Last night's performances, to which enormous pains had gone, were magnificent, and also strange. But, then, Beethoven was to his contemporaries stranger than we can imagine.

"The strangeness of this Ninth Symphony lay in a certain angularity, a Byzantine angularity, amounting sometimes almost to distortion, in Koussevitzky's powerful rhythm. It was stark. Perhaps we should not ask for easefulness in Beethoven any more than grace from El Greco. It may be that after Koussevitzky's hacking of the Scherzo a normal performance would seem tame and wrong. He aimed in the slow movement at a kind of restless seriousness, sacrificing charm. Many new details came out in this reading, and mostly the playing was wonderful, but when the violins muffed their garland of triplets three pages before the end of the Adagio one wondered if the cult of the uncomfortable had not been carried a shade too far. Koussevitzky is anyhow a great man."

Hous Beautiful
June 3 1933

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who made us take Sibelius and like him

profundity of its meaning, all its simple majesty.

Music has been served, Boston has been served, Sibelius is appreciated, for those listening were stirred and moved with the realization that the grandeur of a remarkable intellect, the beauty of a lonely soul, had been reve

DID HIS BEST BY SIBELIUS

If you attended many of the Symphony concerts this season, you will remember that Sibelius was a most frequently presented name of the year. It seems that it was Koussevitzky's intention to put forth an entire cycle of Sibelius symphonies in 1932–1933. Seven of them he did present, and eight there would have been had not the Finnish composer cabled in March that he had been unable to complete symphony number eight in time for this season's presentation in Boston. Consequently, the eighth is now scheduled to be heard at one of the first concerts next fall.

Although London audiences are well acquainted with Sibelius, who was born in the year 1865, America knows him but slightly. But Boston always has been called the one 'Sibelius town' in the country. Practically no other orchestra besides the Boston Symphony consistently renders his works. This winter Koussevitzky decided that Sibelius deserved to be even better known here.

Sibelius has always stood apart as a lonely figure who has apparently sought with some difficulty to bring the ideas 'which are immensely real to him' into touch with other minds. His struggle for expression has sometimes been likened to that of Beethoven. With the exception of the 'Valse Triste,' which is so widely popular and which gave at once a wrong version of the composer's genius, Sibelius's contributions have appeared to be as utterly unadorned and unornamented as a Doric column. At least so it appeared until Koussevitzky, through his magnificent orchestra, courageously and boldly laid before Boston audiences the work of a man who in his own impressible way has treated the legends and national epic of Finland as did Wagner the Teutonic.

Koussevitzky penetrated deeply into this music, vibrated in sympathy to what he found there, and in those strange scores brought forth all the

---

LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER
JUN 1 1933

SUGGESTED BY

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been conducting a series of programs in London by the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company. Judging by reports in the London papers he has been warmly received there. In Boston he has an orchestra which he has moulded and developed into an extremely sensitive and responsive group. With the personnel and the characteristics of the British orchestra, of course, he was not familar. Yet the critics—and in London they are exacting—agree that he stimulated it to new excellencies of achievement. That is a tribute in which we of Boston and vicinity may take pride. In the early days of the Koussevitsky musical reign in Boston there were a few who doubted his actual competence. But all doubts of his skill and discernment as a conductor have long been resolved. His place in the front rank is widely acknowledged.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
JUN 11 1933

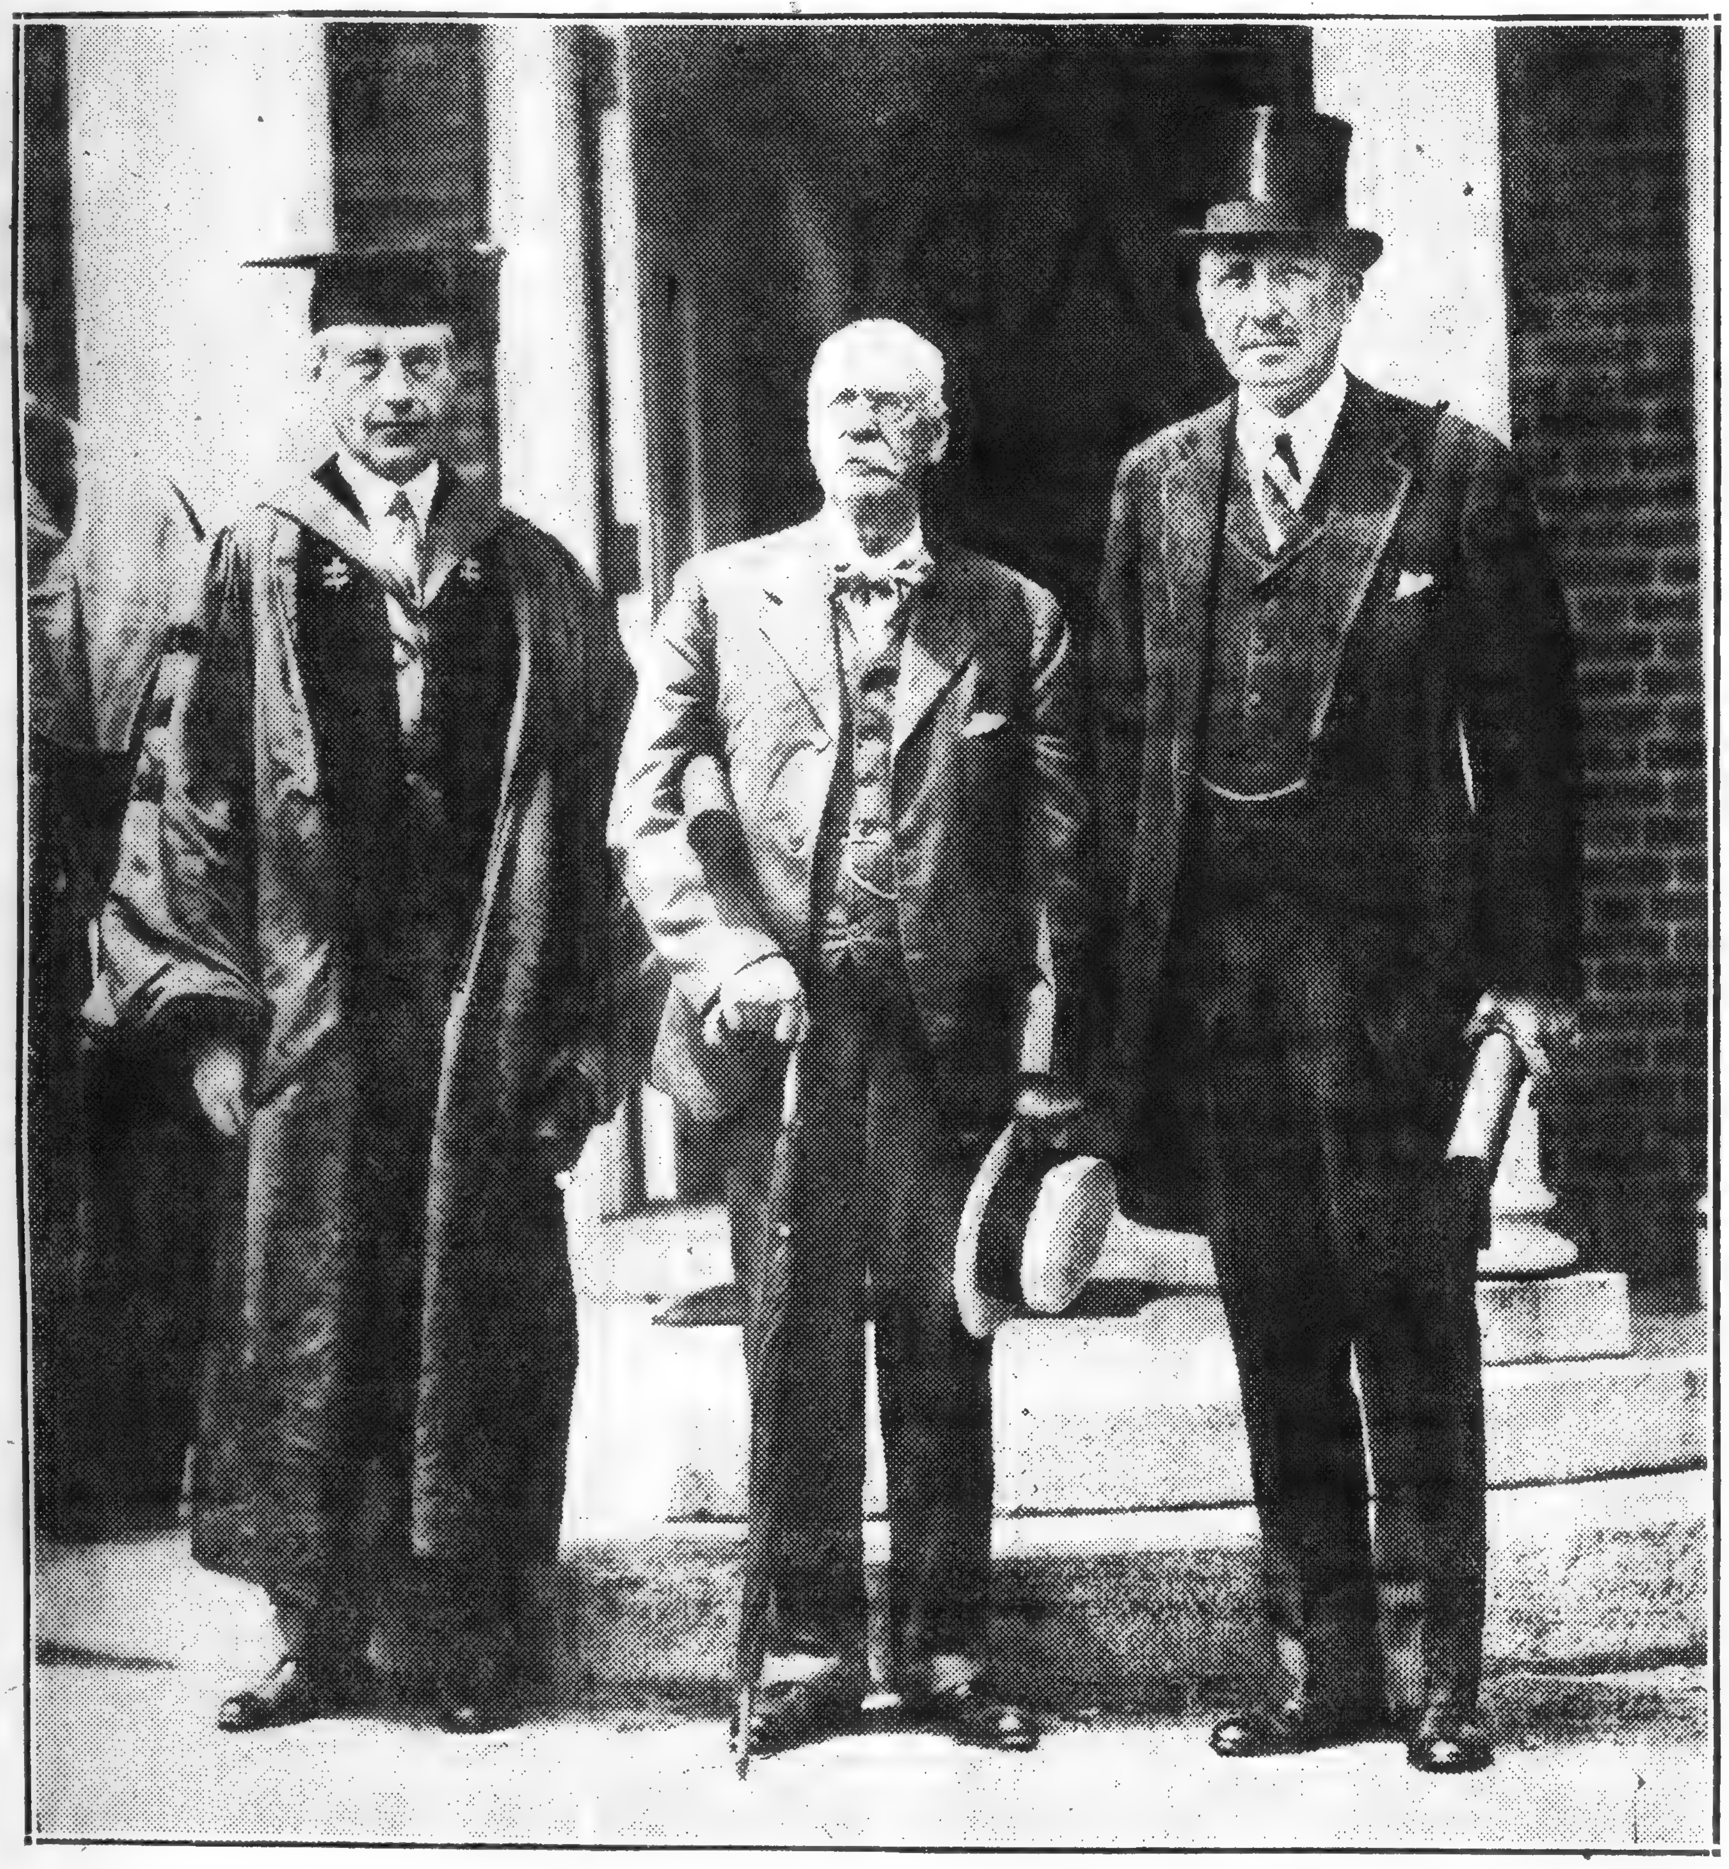
Boston Symphony, pining for lack of patronage, resorted to a unique form of ballyhoo to attract crowds. "Atmospheric programs were arranged, i. e., a "Stein Night," in which the beer motif prevailed, and a "Gypsy Night," with appropriate musical setting. Patrons were invited to costume themselves accordingly, and the idea clicked handsomely.

* * *

210

, JUNE 22, 1933 Trans. Page Nine

ng President, A. Lawrence Lowell



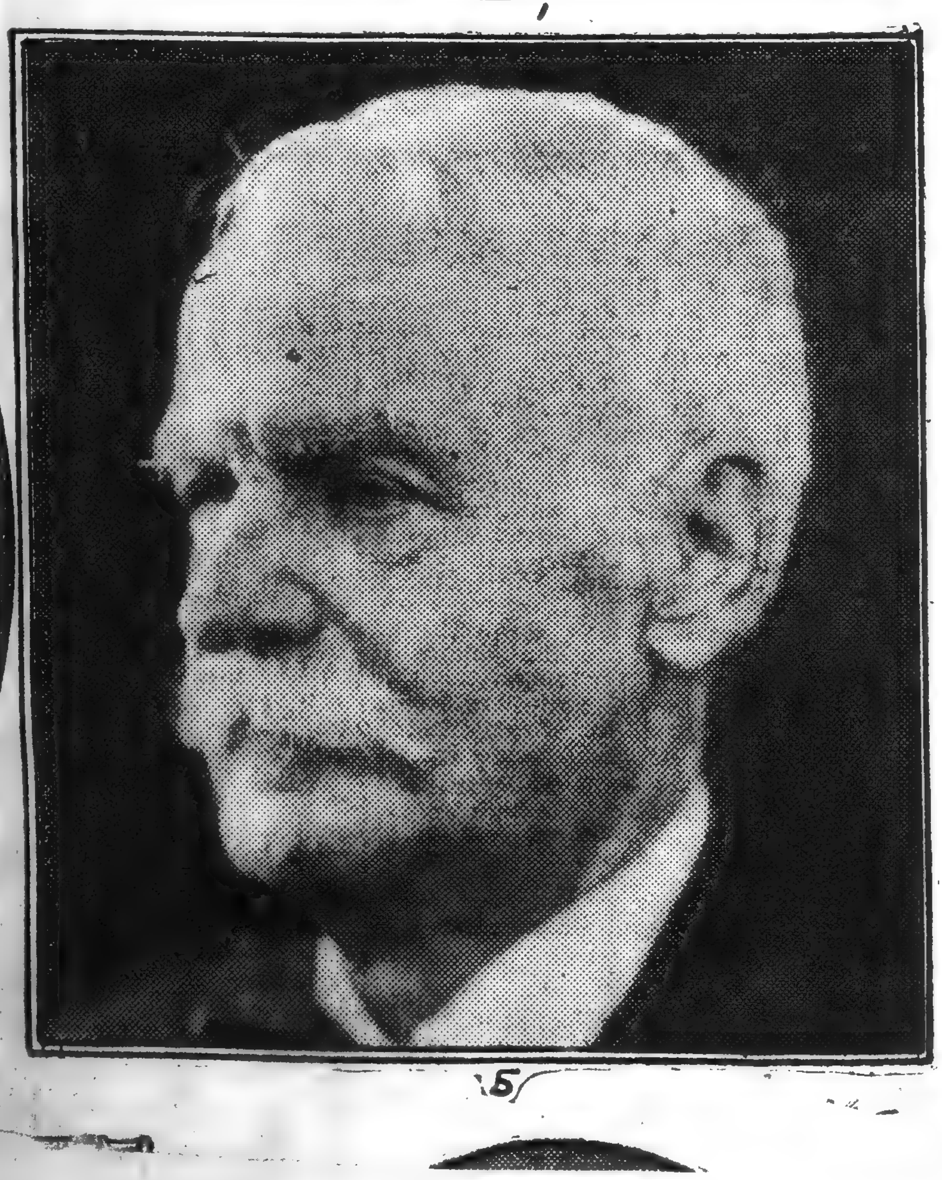
(Transcript Photos by Frank Colby)

Upper Left—The Academic Procession, En Route to Sever Quadrangle, Lead by President A. Lawrence Lowell and the University Marshal, Philip P. Chase

Upper Right—Three Bostonians Who Received Honorary Degrees: (Left to Right)—Francis W. Hunnewell, Philip Hale and Joseph R. Hamlen

Trans June 22

gree Recipients



5

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 25 1933

Philip Hale's Honors

Philip Hale, still active in his 80th year as a journalist, has received an honorary master of arts degree from Harvard five years after Dartmouth made him an honorary doctor of music. A long and brilliant career in musical criticism is thus identified as a public service deserving of academic recognition. Mr Hale is noted as the scholarly editor of the Boston Symphony program books and is known as a dramatic critic and all-round journalist, but it is particularly as a music critic that Mr Hale is honored for his contribution to the betterment of public taste. When Mr Hale began his work in music and journalism there were men of ability and personal distinction similarly engaged in Boston—Dwight, Apthorp, Woolf and Elson, to name those who come first to mind. Boston's musical reputation is still gloriously sustained by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and it is to be hoped that there has been no waning of interest in music in general on the part of press and public.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. EVENING POST

JUN 24 1933

ERNEST NEWMAN, witing in the London Sunday Times on the performances of the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says:

"The really great things of the week have been the three concerts conducted by Mr. Koussevitsky for the B. B. C. 'Festival.' The B. B. C. Orchestra is still a longish way behind the Boston Symphony Orchestra both in the quality of some of its personnel and in the matter of style; but under Mr. Koussevitsky it has shown us the great possibilities latent in it. In all its history it has never played so brilliantly as it has done during the past week. We have had the most authoritative performances conceivable of two of the finest of modern symphonies—the second of Bax and the seventh of Sibelius. Neither of these is an easy nut for even the experienced listener to crack, and it will take time for either of them to become popular; but at any rate we have now been shown the fine stuff of which they are made. The No. 7 is Sibelius at his greatest; here, as in the 'Tapiola,' we see him at last taking up again the line he seemed to abandon for so long after touching upon it in the fourth symphony. Textually the work presents no difficulties for any listener; it is in the intensity and the compression of the thinking that the hearer's problem lies.

"Of the more familiar works of the week we have also had some model performances. Never before, in London, has the 'Symphonie Classique' of Prokovieff been given with such lightness and grace of touch. In the Wagner pieces (the Venusberg music, the Siegfried Idyll, and the 'Meistersinger' overture) we have had the perfect combination of beauty in detail and the architect's sense of the proportions and the build of the works as a whole: the Idyll, with its tranquil flow for the greater part of the time, the steadily growing climax, and the gradual ebbing of the tide at the finish, was particularly beautiful.

"The reading of the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation. It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding: Mr. Koussevitsky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Tchaikovsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUN 25 1933

As Music

BY DR. W. LOU

Review of Past Musical Sea
Has Been Fortunate in Nu
Professional A

A consideration of the concerts given by distinguished visitors to this city shows that we have enjoyed a great variety of splendidly presented programs. When we add a review of the music contributed by our own friends and neighbors it appears that we have had a very large musical season indeed. Certainly music may, in this city, claim a popularity surpassing any other form of creative and interpretative art.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its usual four concerts with its accustomed perfection of technique, absorbing programs and richness of orchestral voice. The most significant of its numbers were "Tod und Verklarung," by Richard Strauss, Sibelius's "Tapiola" and the ever welcome Wagnerian numbers. While we appreciate and partly understand the policy of the orchestra as stated in De Wolf Howe's "History of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," it must be stated that this community would be far richer for an occasional soloist, one who would portray the concerti of Beethoven, Brahms and others, permitting us to hear these notable works and freshening our recollections thereof.

he er
tr
si la
v r i s

New York Herald-Tribune

JUN 8 - 1933

Nazis Enraged By Toscanini's 'No' to Bayreuth

His Sympathy With Jews Is Attributed by Press to 'Anti-Reich Propaganda'

Frau Wagner Gets Letter

Better to Stay Away for Sake of Peace, Says Conductor

By John Elliott

From the Herald Tribune Bureau

Copyright, 1932, New York Tribune Inc.

BERLIN, June 7. — Indignation flamed high in nationalistic Germany today over the news that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, had canceled his contract to conduct "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth Wagnerian Festival this summer because of his opposition to the Nazi anti-Semitic policy.

Many Germans expected to the last that Frau Winifred Wagner, widow of the composer's son and manager of the festival, would issue a denial of this report, as she had repudiated many previous intimations of Toscanini's non-appearance. However, the publication here today—two days after its publication abroad—of the conductor's letter to her blasted all these hopes.

Toscanini's action drew prompt fire from the Nazi "Fighting League for German Kultur," which issued a statement saying: "Toscanini justifies his refusal in such a form as to show that the well known conductor has not escaped the effects of the great and well organized anti-German propaganda."

Declaring that it guaranteed that the Wagner festival would be carried out quietly and in order, the Kultur League's statement continued sarcastically:

"After the refusal of Toscanini we will summon a German conductor. As Germans we are convinced that, from the artistic viewpoint, fully as competent an interpreter of the Wagnerian works can be found."

Toscanini said in his telegram from his native Italy to Frau Wagner, as published in the press here: "As the events inflicting wounds on my inner feelings as artist and man have not experienced any change, as I had hoped, I consider it my duty to break the silence which I have imposed on myself for two months and inform you that it is better for the peace of you, myself and everybody not to think any more about my coming to Bayreuth. With feelings of unalterable friendship for the house of Wagner, Arturo Toscanini."

On this letter the "Vossische Zeitung" comments sadly: "But the house of Wagner and the greater house of Germany will not permit themselves to be separated. A great musician, with incorruptible ears ever mistrustfully and pedantically intent on the last sixteenth note, has picked up only shrill notes of the great orchestra of Germany."

BAYREUTH, Germany, June 7 (AP).—Richard Strauss, noted German composer, agreed today to conduct the opening performance July 21 of "Parsifal" at the Wagner festival here in place of Arturo Toscanini. Karl Elmendorff will take the place of Toscanini in conducting "Die Meistersinger" the following day.

Ban on Toscanini Records Lifted

BERLIN, June 7 (AP).—The Nazi government's ban on the broadcasting of compositions or phonograph records by Arturo Toscanini has been quietly removed, it was learned today, but it remains effective against Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitsky, Artur Bodansky, Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The ban was imposed April 4 in reprisal for an appeal to Chancellor Adolf Hitler by the musicians in behalf of Jewish colleagues in Germany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUN 27 1933

Great Boston Orchestra May Appear in City

Civic Music Members Are Urged to Renew Their Memberships for Season

The possibility of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fall concert of the Civic Music Association to Schenectady was placed before the newly elected board of directors of the organization at its first meeting this month. At that meeting all of last season's officers were re-lected for the ensuing year.

These officers, constituting the executive committee, have urged old members to renew their membership now so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be booked and all bills for dues have been sent out explaining the necessity of immediate action. The option which the association holds expires July 12. As the constitution of the local civic music body requires that no contracts be made for talent until the money needed is in the treasury, action upon this option will depend upon the immediate response of old members, the bills being sent out state.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, one of the finest orchestras in the world, is an attraction which the association's executive committee feels it would be difficult to surpass. The orchestra has not appeared in Schenectady in over a half dozen years, but has offered the Civic Music Association a date late in October on its only trip in upper New York, a concert usually given in Ithaca. Kenneth G. Kelley, vice president, received the offer in Boston earlier this month and presented it to the directors, who were highly enthusiastic.

The annual campaign for members will be held next fall when new members may renew their affiliation at any time before the close of that campaign. No tickets are sold for concerts, admission being by membership or out-of-town guest card only.

On sending out bills for annual dues Mrs. Henry Schauffler, financial secretary, said: "This statement of membership dues comes to you earlier than usual this year. We remind you that no contract for talent may be made until the funds are actually available. We ask your co-operation through payment of dues by July 10 so that our talent committee may have the widest choice of artists and dates. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made available to us an option on an October concert which expires July 12. Acceptance depends upon the response of members at this time."

Officers who were re-elected for this season to constitute the executive committee are John Allen Capp, president; Kenneth G. Kelley, first vice president; Joseph Derrick, second vice president; Earl E. Rice, secretary; Ellis Auer, treasurer; Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, financial secretary.

The Notice Board

Trans.

The Pops

Old Friends' Week—Except a "Request Evening" announced for next Thursday, for which suggestions may now be sent to Mr. Fiedler, there are no "nights" in immediate prospect at The Pops. Instead, programs of familiar, well-liked numbers freshened from time to time by stranger pieces. Thus, on Monday, The Neighbors' Dance and The Miller's Dance will be played out of Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," along with an arrangement for orchestra, by Mr. Seiniger of the violins, of Debussy's piano-piece, "Claire de Lune." . . . The program for Tuesday brings a Spanish rhapsody of Albeniz, "A Night in Seville." . . . The Suite from Bizet's incidental music to Daudet's Provencal tragedy, "The Woman of Arles," will return on Wednesday.

For Thursday, frequenters of "Request Nights" must await a program that by all precedent will satisfy their annual expectations. (Possibly, "Routine Night" would be the fitter name.) . . . On Friday, the Glee Club of Simmons College will add choral pieces. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen, from the first desk of the strings, will play the slow movement of Bach's Concerto in D minor for Two Violins. So runs the week away.

previously recounted. Constance Collier, Crane Wilbur, Ann Andrews, Charles Trowbridge, Jane Wyatt, Paul Harvey and Judith Wood are among the players. To stay through Saturday, June 17.

Tran Jun 21

Part One

Plays and

Concert-Halls, Opera Houses, For The News

Dr. Koussevitzky Talks Again, The Lowest-Priced Opera, Miss Pons in Paris

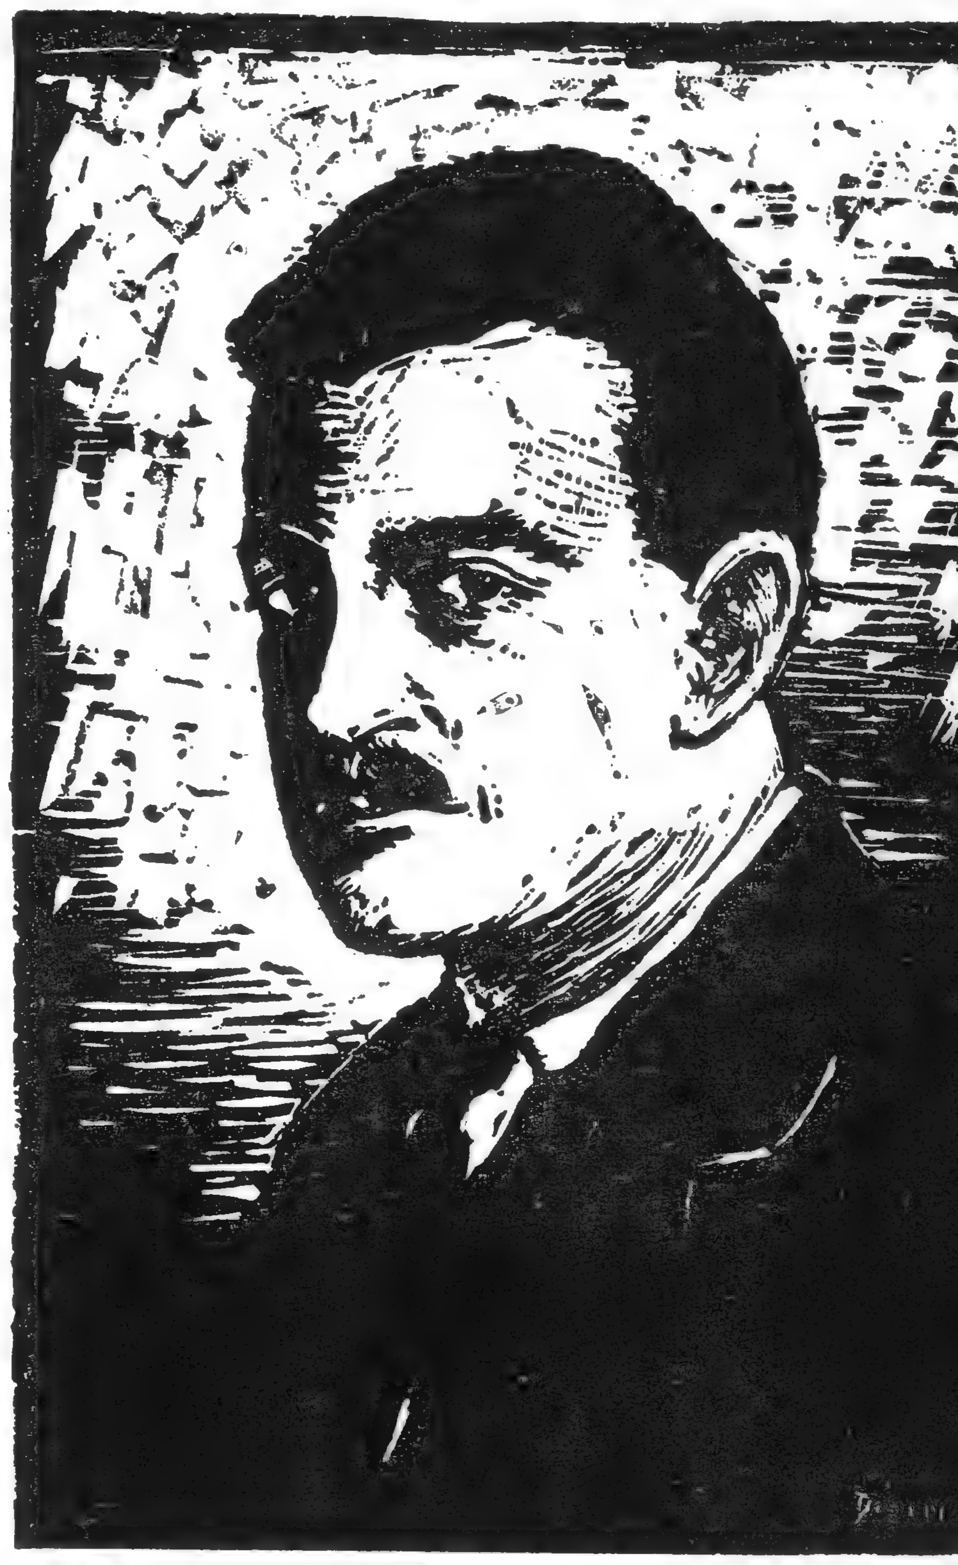
AFTERMATH from Dr. Koussevitzky's visit to London still drifts into this department. Before his return to Paris the conductor was interviewed by a reporter for The Referee—the Sunday newspaper—about his experiences in British and American concert halls. The conversations turned upon the schooling and upbuilding of orchestras. Said Dr. Koussevitzky:

> It is not so easy to train a perfect orchestra. I have had experience; I have made two orchestras. First in Russia; the second, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When I went to Boston in 1924 the orchestra was in poor artistic condition. I began to work. It took me seven years until that orchestra was as good as I wanted it.

Again, apropos the conductor's version of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the playing of the classics to twentieth-century audiences was the topic in hand. "Let me tell you this," said Dr. Koussevitzky gravely, " if some people believe I put something into the score that is not there, that is wrong. Beethoven! I am a slave to Beethoven's ideas! But many conductors have for years misinterpreted those ideas. A wrong tradition has grown up, and so when the critics hear the genuine interpretation they think it is strange. My aim as a conductor is to get as near as I can to the composer's mind, but also to give the music life, not treat it as a dry-as-dus classic. Today there are not many conductors in the world who play the musi as it was conceived by the composer yesterday."

Dr. Koussevitzky's words about the upbuilding of the orchestra into its presen quality should be pondered by the venerable sages and the cheerful chortler who liked to say that it was a "magnificent orchestra" even while poor ol Rabaud was foisted upon it, and wh were not sparing of similar adjective through its vicissitudes under Mr. Monteux. Everyone whose ears heard and whose minds still worked, followed the long and gradual restoration under Dr Koussevitzky until it became again an orchestra of the highest rank. Seven seasons were none too much for this progress. . . . As to the conductor's ability to revitalize the classics, who in Boston that has heard him in Beethoven's or Schumann's or Berlioz's symphonies doubts it?

AS ONE MUSICIAN SEES ANOTHER



Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops," in a woodcut by Charles Deane, viola player in the orchestra, included in the art exhibition arranged for Artists' Night at Symphony Hall.

Course of The Pops

Trans. Jun 1

"Gypsy Night"

SEEMINGLY it must be the Nineties or nothing. Invited to "dress up" for an evening at The Pops, this spring and last spring, an interested public ransacked store-trunks and attics for the dolmans and the leg-o'-mutton sleeves, the "Prince Alberts," and the box-coats, that its mothers and fathers once wore; arranged its hair in Gibsonian coiffures, or clapped square-crowned "derbys" on its head; journeyed to Symphony Hall; took table there observed and observing; after two hours of mutual inspection departed well amused. Quite the contrary, when the invitation suggested "gypsy dress." Few households keep it, male or female, in their store-rooms. Most associate it with "fancy-dress balls" or other pastimes requiring a preliminary visit to the costumer. It is hired in routine; it is worn rather uncomfortably. Scanty is the room for individual touch and ingenuity.

From such reason, from whim, from mere indifference, little enough "gypsy dress" dappled the tables last evening. Here and there it was rich; almost always it was in character, but it was too infrequent either to interest spectators or to warrant prizes. In the longer pauses most of us preferred to troop out and cast a rambling eye over the "works of art" that through the week will hang in the corridors and the ante-rooms of Symphony Hall. For the shorter, there were brightly colored "gypsy decorations" to contemplate—some painted with the sequined head of a gypsy Polyanna; others with the alluring profile of a gypsy youth in the best style of musical comedy made in Manhattan. . . . One suspects a respite from costume-parties at The Pops.

> From the Inside Stuff of the ever timely Variety: "J. P. Morgan has never consciously invested a nickel in show business. He has always high-hatted the film end. There isn't a picture man who ever got within a mile of Morgan's 'ground floor.'"

For his part Mr. Fiedler stocked the program with gypsy and pseudo-gypsy music, oftenest of Hungarian origin. To the inevitable dance from Brahms succeeded one of Haydn's rondos alla Zingarese. From operatic composers came two of the dances in "Carmen," with the Introduction to Act Third as intermezzo. From the composers of operetta, the fat tunes, snapping rhythms and orchestral exuberance of Herbert's "Fortune-Teller"; the genuine, and therefore melancholy, gypsy scene out of Kálmán's "Countess Maritza." Liszt, of course, obliged with one of his Magyar rhapsodies, more than commonly interesting for the addition in solo and ensemble measures of an Hungarian cimbalom. The composer knew the timbres that it would yield and used them to profit. It served also to whip up an orchestra disposed to take its job easefully save when the excerpts from "Carmen" stirred it to fine-grained, warm-colored, keen-rhythmed performance. (Perhaps, with some reason, it believed those three fragments the only real music of the evening.)

Miss Elsie Patay played the cimbalom-part in the Sixth Rhapsody; preceded it by two solo-pieces. Plainly, she was Hungarian, born virtuosa, mistress of her instrument. She smote, pedalled and fingered it as she wore her Hungarian dress—with an air. Even with her skill, a little of the unaccompanied cimbalom goes a long way. . . . Miss Lefa Lavanoff also assisted in two "Spanish gypsy dances." Be it said as briefly and courteously as may be that she is no Argentina, though in an encore piece she did appropriate one of that peerless dancer's familiar tunes. Nor could she replace the lacking art of the theater with the candors and the abandon of Escudero's demoiselles in whom ran the Spanish gypsy blood. . . . Some will say that Mr. Fiedler is more entertaining when he makes less specialized programs.

Next Week

Outside a "Request Program" to be assembled for Thursday evening, June 8, there will be no "nights" next week. Instead a pleasant sprinkling of familiar numbers with fresher items. Thus, Monday's program will include the arrangement for orchestra of Debussy's "Claire de Lune," made by Mr. Seiniger of the violins. On the same evening, Mr. Chardon will play the solo-part in Böllman's Variations for Violoncello. On Tuesday, a Spanish rhapsody of Albéniz, "Night in Seville," will freshen the program. On Saturday, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen at the first desk of the strings will play the slow movement from Bach's Concerto in D minor for Two Violins. At the Sunday Pop of June 11, Mr. Sanromá will be heard in Rakhmaninov's full-bodied and many-voiced Piano-Concerto in C minor.

Memo: At last "by public demand," there is a good dark beer on sale at The Pops.

New Films Friday

Metropolitan—"International House." Musical film with a fanciful background laid in Shanghai and another mythical Chinese town. W. C. Fields, Peggy Hopkins Joyce, Rudy Vallee, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Stuart Erwin, and Stoopnagle and Budd are a few of those who take part. On stage, "Shuffle Along" Review.

State—Laurel and Hardy in "The Devil's Brother," a full-length film, with the two funny men turning bandits when they themselves have been robbed of their life-savings. Before it is over, one of them is condemned to be hanged and the other is appointed his hangman. Dennis King and Thelma Todd are in the cast.

Paramount-Fenway—"Lilly Turner." Ruth Chatterton as a carnival show dancer with innumerable love affairs which return to plague her when she finds the genuine article. George Brent, Frank McHugh and Guy Kibbee are among the players. Also: "Trick for Trick" and Ralph Morgan. Both beginning today.

Orpheum—"Reunion in Vienna." Robert E. Sherwood's amusing play about the complications in the home of a psychiatrist when an archduke returns from exile to claim his former mistress. John Barrymore and Diana Wynyard have the parts done by Mr. Lunt and Miss Fontanne. Vaudeville: Bob Murphy and other turns.

New York Herald-Tribune

JUN 8 - 1933

Nazis Enraged By Toscanini's 'No' to Bayreuth

His Sympathy With Jews Is Attributed by Press to 'Anti-Reich Propaganda'

Frau Wagner Gets Letter

Better to Stay Away for Sake of Peace, Says Conductor

By John Elliott

From the Herald Tribune Bureau
Copyright, 1932, New York Tribune Inc.

BERLIN, June 7. — Indignation flamed high in nationalistic Germany today over the news that Arturo Toscanini, conductor of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra, had canceled his contract to conduct "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" at the Bayreuth Wagnerian Festival this summer because of his opposition to the Nazi anti-Semitic policy.

Many Germans expected to the last that Frau Winifred Wagner, widow of the composer's son and manager of the festival, would issue a denial of this report, as she had repudiated many previous intimations of Toscanini's non-appearance. However, the publication here today—two days after its publication abroad—of the conductor's letter to her blasted all these hopes.

Toscanini's action drew prompt fire from the Nazi "Fighting League for German Kultur," which issued a statement saying: "Toscanini justifies his refusal in such a form as to show that the well known conductor has not escaped the effects of the great and well organized anti-German propaganda."

Declaring that it guaranteed that the Wagner festival would be carried out quietly and in order, the Kultur League's statement continued sarcastically:

"After the refusal of Toscanini we will summon a German conductor. As Germans we are convinced that, from the artistic viewpoint, fully as competent an interpreter of the Wagnerian works can be found."

Toscanini said in his telegram from his native Italy to Frau Wagner, as published in the press here: "As the events inflicting wounds on my inner feelings as artist and man have not experienced any change, as I had hoped, I consider it my duty to break the silence which I have imposed on myself for two months and inform you that it is better for the peace of you, myself and everybody not to think any more about my coming to Bayreuth. With feelings of unalterable friendship for the house of Wagner, Arturo Toscanini."

On this letter the "Vossische Zeitung" comments sadly: "But the house of Wagner and the greater house of Germany will not permit themselves to be separated. A great musician, with incorruptible ears ever mistrustfully and pedantically intent on the last sixteenth note, has picked up only shrill notes of the great orchestra of Germany."

BAYREUTH, Germany, June 7 (AP).—Richard Strauss, noted German composer, agreed today to conduct the opening performance July 21 of "Parsifal" at the Wagner festival here in place of Arturo Toscanini. Karl Elmendorff will take the place of Toscanini in conducting "Die Meistersinger" the following day.

Ban on Toscanini Records Lifted

BERLIN, June 7 (AP).—The Nazi government's ban on the broadcasting of compositions or phonograph records by Arturo Toscanini has been quietly removed, it was learned today, but it remains effective against Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitsky, Artur Bodansky, Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. The ban was imposed April 4 in reprisal for an appeal to Chancellor Adolf Hitler by the musicians in behalf of Jewish colleagues in Germany.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUN 27 1933

Great Boston Orchestra May Appear in City

Civic Music Members Are Urged to Renew Their Memberships for Season

The possibility of bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fall concert of the Civic Music Association to Schenectady was placed before the newly elected board of directors of the organization at its first meeting this month. At that meeting all of last season's officers were re-lected for the ensuing year.

These officers, constituting the executive committee, have urged old members to renew their membership now so that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be booked and all bills for dues have been sent out explaining the necessity of immediate action. The option which the association holds expires July 12. As the constitution of the local civic music body requires that no contracts be made for talent until the money needed is in the treasury, action upon this option will depend upon the immediate response of old members, the bills being sent out state.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky, one of the finest orchestras in the world, is an attraction which the association's executive committee feels it would be difficult to surpass. The orchestra has not appeared in Schenectady in over a half dozen years, but has offered the Civic Music Association a date late in October on its only trip in upper New York, a concert usually given in Ithaca. Kenneth G. Kelley, vice president, received the offer in Boston earlier this month and presented it to the directors, who were highly enthusiastic.

The annual campaign for members will be held next fall when new members may renew their affiliation at any time before the close of that campaign. No tickets are sold for concerts, admission being by membership or out-of-town guest card only.

On sending out bills for annual dues Mrs. Henry Schauffler, financial secretary, said: "This statement of membership dues comes to you earlier than usual this year. We remind you that no contract for talent may be made until the funds are actually available. We ask your co-operation through payment of dues by July 10 so that our talent committee may have the widest choice of artists and dates. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made available to us an option on an October concert which expires July 12. Acceptance depends upon the response of members at this time."

Officers who were re-elected for this season to constitute the executive committee are John Allen Capp, president; Kenneth G. Kelley, first vice president; Joseph Derrick, second vice president; Earl E. Rice, secretary; Ellis Auer, treasurer; Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, financial secretary.

Tran Jun 21

211

Part One

Plays and

Concert-Halls, Opera Houses, For The News

Dr. Koussevitzky Talks Again, The Lowest-Priced Opera, Miss Pons in Paris

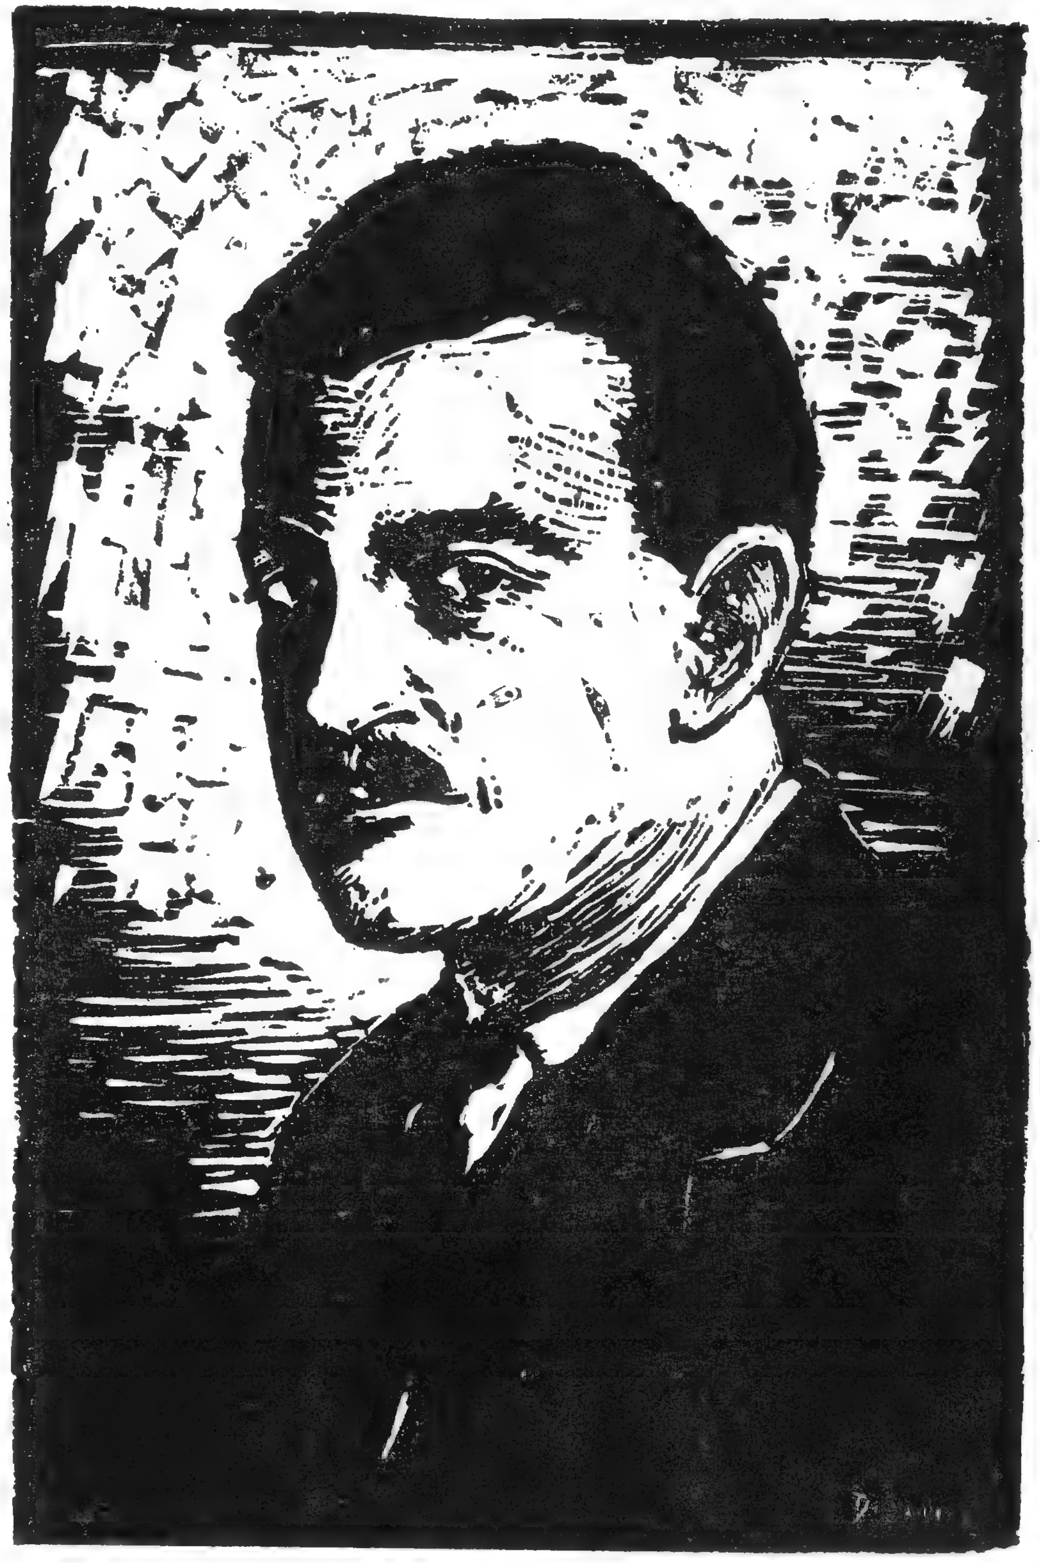
AFTERMATH from Dr. Koussevitzky's visit to London still drifts into this department. Before his return to Paris the conductor was interviewed by a reporter for The Referee—the Sunday newspaper—about his experiences in British and American concert halls. The conversations turned upon the schooling and upbuilding of orchestras. Said Dr. Koussevitzky:

> It is not so easy to train a perfect orchestra. I have had experience; I have made two orchestras. First in Russia; the second, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When I went to Boston in 1924 the orchestra was in poor artistic condition. I began to work. It took me seven years until that orchestra was as good as I wanted it.

Again, apropos the conductor's version of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, the playing of the classics to twentieth-century audiences was the topic in hand. "Let me tell you this," said Dr. Koussevitzky gravely, "if some people believe I put something into the score that is not there, that is wrong. Beethoven! I am a slave to Beethoven's ideas! But many conductors have for years misinterpreted those ideas. A wrong tradition has grown up, and so when the critics hear the genuine interpretation they think it is strange. My aim as a conductor is to get as near as I can to the composer's mind, but also to give the music life, not treat it as a dry-as-dust classic. Today there are not many conductors in the world who play the music as it was conceived by the composers yesterday."

Dr. Koussevitzky's words about the upbuilding of the orchestra into its present quality should be pondered by the venerable sages and the cheerful chortlers who liked to say that it was a "magnificent orchestra" even while poor old Rabaud was foisted upon it, and who were not sparing of similar adjectives through its vicissitudes under Mr. Monteux. Everyone whose ears heard and whose minds still worked, followed the long and gradual restoration under Dr. Koussevitzky until it became again an orchestra of the highest rank. Seven seasons were none too much for this progress. . . . As to the conductor's ability to revitalize the classics, who in Boston that has heard him in Beethoven's or Schumann's or Berlioz's symphonies, doubts it?

AS ONE MUSICIAN SEES ANOTHER



Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops," in a woodcut by Charles Deane, viola player in the orchestra, included in the art exhibition arranged for Artists' Night at Symphony Hall.

---

ist $498,888, or ding fiscal year.
arch 31 shows
gainst $4,922, d surplus of 068. Cash
t $833,159.

Match Co. quarter of $510, der the ares, to 612,000 articl-
o-par at

The Pops

ie Nineties
, "dress up"
ne Pops, this interested pub-
ks and attics for
g-o'-mutton sleeves,
' and the box-coats,
nd fathers once wore:
in Gibsonian coiffures,
re-crowned "derbys" on its ed to Symphony Hall; took bserved and observing: after of mutual inspection departed
sed. Quite the contrary, when tation suggested "gypsy dress."
ouseholds keep it, male or female, eir store-rooms. Most associate it a "fancy-dress balls" or other pastimes quiring a preliminary visit to the costumer. It is hired in routine: it is worn rather uncomfortably. Scanty is the room for individual touch and ingenuity.

From such reason, from whim, from mere indifference, little enough "gypsy dress" dappled the tables last evening. Here and there it was rich; almost always it was in character, but it was too infrequent either to interest spectators or to warrant prizes. In the longer pauses most of us preferred to troop out and cast a rambling eye over the "works of art" that through the week will hang in the corridors and the ante-rooms of Symphony Hall. For the shorter, there were brightly colored "gypsy decorations" to contemplate—some painted with the sequined head of a gypsy Polyanna; others with the alluring profile of a gypsy youth in the best style of musical comedy made in Manhattan. . . . One suspects a respite from costume-parties at The Pops.

For his part Mr. Fiedler stocked the program with gypsy and pseudo-gypsy music, oftenest of Hungarian origin. To the inevitable dance from Brahms succeeded one of Haydn's rondos alla Zingarese. From operatic composers came two of the dances in "Carmen," with the Introduction to Act Third as intermezzo. From the composers of operetta, the fat tunes, snapping rhythms and orchestral exuberance of Herbert's "Fortune-Teller"; the genuine, and therefore melancholy, gypsy scene out of Kálmán's "Countess Maritza." Liszt, of course, obliged with one of his Magyar rhapsodies, more than commonly interesting for the addition in solo and ensemble measures of an Hungarian cimbalom. The composer knew the timbres that it would yield and used them to profit. It served also to whip up an orchestra disposed to take its job easefully save when the excerpts from "Carmen" stirred it to fine-grained, warm-colored, keen-rhythmed performance. (Perhaps, with some reason, it believed those three fragments the only real music of the evening.)

Miss Elsie Patay played the cimbalom-part in the Sixth Rhapsody; preceded it by two solo-pieces. Plainly, she was Hungarian, born virtuosa, mistress of her instrument. She smote, pedalled and fingered it as she wore her Hungarian dress—with an air. Even with her skill, a little of the unaccompanied cimbalom goes a long way. . . . Miss Lefa Lavanoff also assisted in two "Spanish gypsy dances." Be it said as briefly and courteously as may be that she is no Argentina, though in an encore piece she did appropriate one of that peerless dancer's familiar tunes. Nor could she replace the lacking art of the theater with the candors and the abandon of Escudero's demoiselles in whom ran the Spanish gypsy blood. . . . Some will say that Mr. Fiedler is more entertaining when he makes less specialized programs.

Next Week

Outside a "Request Program" to be assembled for Thursday evening, June 8, there will be no "nights" next week. Instead a pleasant sprinkling of familiar numbers with fresher items. Thus, Monday's program will include the arrangement for orchestra of Debussy's "Claire de Lune," made by Mr. Seiniger of the violins. On the same evening, Mr. Chardon will play the solo-part in Böllman's Variations for Violoncello. On Tuesday, a Spanish rhapsody of Albéniz, "Night in Seville," will freshen the program. On Saturday, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen at the first desk of the strings will play the slow movement from Bach's Concerto in D minor for Two Violins. At the Sunday Pop of June 11, Mr. Sanromá will be heard in Rakhmaninov's full-bodied and many-voiced Piano-Concerto in C minor.

Memo: At last "by public demand," there is a good dark beer on sale at The Pops.

From the Inside Stuff of the ever timely Variety: "J. P. Morgan has never consciously invested a nickel in show business. He has always high-hatted the film end. There isn't a picture man who ever got within a mile of Morgan's 'ground floor.'"

The Notice Board

Trans.

The Pops

Old Friends' Week—Except a "Request Evening" announced for next Thursday, for which suggestions may now be sent to Mr. Fiedler, there are no "nights" in immediate prospect at The Pops. Instead, programs of familiar, well-liked numbers freshened from time to time by stranger pieces. Thus, on Monday, The Neighbors' Dance and The Miller's Dance will be played out of Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," along with an arrangement for orchestra, by Mr. Seiniger of the violins, of Debussy's piano-piece, "Claire de Lune." . . . The program for Tuesday brings a Spanish rhapsody of Albeniz, "A Night in Seville." . . . The Suite from Bizet's incidental music to Daudet's Provencal tragedy, "The Woman of Arles," will return on Wednesday.

For Thursday, frequenters of "Request Nights" must await a program that by all precedent will satisfy their annual expectations. (Possibly, "Routine Night" would be the fitter name.) . . . On Friday, the Glee Club of Simmons College will add choral pieces. . . . On Saturday, Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Gundersen, from the first desk of the strings, will play the slow movement of Bach's Concerto in D minor for Two Violins. So runs the week away.

previously recounted. Constance Collier, Crane Wilbur, Ann Andrews, Charles Trowbridge, Jane Wyatt, Paul Harvey and Judith Wood are among the players. To stay through Saturday, June 17.

New Films Friday

Metropolitan—"International House." Musical film with a fanciful background laid in Shanghai and another mythical Chinese town. W. C. Fields, Peggy Hopkins Joyce, Rudy Vallee, George Burns and Gracie Allen, Stuart Erwin, and Stoopnagle and Budd are a few of those who take part. On stage, "Shuffle Along" Review.

State—Laurel and Hardy in "The Devil's Brother," a full-length film, with the two funny men turning bandits when they themselves have been robbed of their life-savings. Before it is over, one of them is condemned to be hanged and the other is appointed his hangman. Dennis King and Thelma Todd are in the cast.

Paramount-Fenway—"Lilly Turner." Ruth Chatterton as a carnival show dancer with innumerable love affairs which return to plague her when she finds the genuine article. George Brent, Frank McHugh and Guy Kibbee are among the players. Also: "Trick for Trick" and Ralph Morgan. Both beginning today.

Orpheum—"Reunion in Vienna." Robert E. Sherwood's amusing play about the complications in the home of a psychiatrist when an archduke returns from exile to claim his former mistress. John Barrymore and Diana Wynyard have the parts done by Mr. Lunt and Miss Fontanne. Vaudeville: Bob Murphy and other turns.

212

Transcript

, JUNE 2, 1933

s --- Films

Steins, Draught Ale And Mr. Fiedler

With Good Song Ringing More Or Less Clear at The Pops

BY way of investigating the preferences and capacity of a Pops audience, the Messrs. Haffenreffer last night distributed, gratis, draught ale to all who brought steins to Symphony Hall. It was "Stein Night," officially; an attempt by the management to inquire into the virtues of draught beverages as compared with the bottled—as if there could be any real questioning of the supremacy of the stein at a Pops Concert or anywhere else.

At any rate, the thousand seated at tables did away with eight half-barrels in the course of a belligerently reminiscent program—128 gallons, or some 1700 eight-ounce flagons of the Haffenreffer brew. No one actually did turn up with an umbrella stand, but some wondrous deep containers did appear. L. C. Prior, with a couple of tap-room properties from one of his hotels, won first prize—a case of Schlitz—for the most spectacular crockery. Dr. George Burgess Magrath, who sponsored a tremendous pitcher filched from the St. Botolph Club, was a worthy second. Other entries ranged from baptismal mugs to a gilt-edged item captioned, "Souvenir of Brownfield, Maine." Miss Rosamund Niemeyer of Melrose bore to the occasion a pewter receptacle presented to Johann Niemeyer by his fellow members of the Kegel Club Abendschule, also a roomy stein, gift of his bowling club on his fiftieth birthday in 1892. One party, on whose table stood a handsome silver mug, capped and adequate of the best in ale, passed the evening sipping Pop punch; sad to relate, there were others who solemnly plied themselves with the pasteurized bottled beer as if such a thing as a keg had never been proffered.

The Haffenreffer kegs, twelve in number and packed in great tubs of ice, were stored in a small room off the main floor corridor on the south side of the building. In the hallway, a small service bar was set up, and two barmen and a score of waiters managed the distribution, supervised by Mr. Claude A. Wilson, for the manufacturers, amid a lush spattering of suds. Phenomenally cold, heading up nobly under ten pounds of carbonic gas pressure, the free ale was passed around the hall in pitchers, and the fact that four barrels of it went unspoken for was due only to the incapacity of the audience and, perhaps, the natural reserve of Bostonians in public places. A good-sized portion of the audience, furthermore, was doubtless unacquainted with the science of drawing beer and consequently unaware of what it was passing up, but suitable educational methods by the management will probably straighten that out before the season closes.

Mr. Fiedler's offerings, with the puns pointed up in determined capitals on the program, included the Saint-Saens BacchanALE, three selections for horn QUARTet, compositions from MeyerBEER and RubinSTEIN, and the Jolly Fellows waltz by VOLSTEDT, this last in complete, unabashed upper case. Admissions were obtained from the management that the responsibility for these was joint, that no single member of the staff was culpable. There was rumor, however, that the QUARTet affair was the work of the librarian. All denied the slightest part in the "T ANNHAUSER" which is the way the program carried the Wagner overture. Typographical error, they brazenly held.

"Songs of the Old Days" were given with a vengeance. Great audience-response was accorded them, perfectly respectable looking people declaring that their heads were "bending low" and that they would all feel gay when Johnny came marching home, as Mr. Fiedler made his way through the Civil War and the dark days of the Reconstruction. It was not without some sense of shock that one heard Bostonians proclaiming, somewhat languidly, it must be admitted, "Thy gleaming sword shall never rust, Maryland, my Maryland!" But sectional bitterness faded when the 1700 eight-ounce glasses of sound draught ale began to take hold along towards the end of the program, and Mr. Fiedler's Stein Song finale was chanted with every indication that the Haffenreffers had not brewed in vain.

C. W. M.

Artists and Music

Trans Jun 3

EARLIER in the week there was held at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall the first of a proposed annual series of "Artists' Night."

Invitation to exhibit a single picture, in any medium and without any restrictions save that size must conform to space and theme to public taste, was broadcast. The response was surprisingly great. Pictures in oils, water colors, pastels, from the printed copper plate, in pen and ink; charcoal and less orthodox media such as ply-wood, cut felt and velvets, continued to pour into Symphony Hall all day, and those in charge of hanging were hard pressed to place them before Mr. Arthur Fiedler took up his baton at 8.30 o'clock that evening. It was no surprise, therefore, to hear it announced from the platform during a pause between musical selections that the exhibition, originally intended for but a brief night's existence, would be continued for several additional evenings. Numerous artists were in the audience, and applauded the bearer of the reprival as he spoke his glad tidings.

In conjunction with the night's event, Mr. Fiedler arranged a program of music inspired by the pictorial arts. There was Fahrbach's "At the Exhibition" march, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a selection from Puccini's passionate and moving "La Boheme," the "Pictures at an Exhibition" suite by Moussorgsky-Ravel, Strauss's "Artists' Life" waltz, and the tuneful theme song, "Why Do You Smile, Mona Lisa?" from Stolz's German film "Der Raub der Mona Lisa," seen and heard on the Boston screen during the winter months.

The pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, gave a solo playing with background accompaniment of Weber's delightful "Konzertstuck," while the symphonic grouping was rounded out with Debussy's nocturne "Nuages" and the "Ballet of the Hours" passage from Ponchielli's familiar "La Gioconda." Encore numbers of accustomed pattern offered lighter moments.

The waitress who brought our beer and other refreshments was appropriately garbed in smock and beret, a charming touch of the Left Bank as the romantic writers delight in picturing it.

During intermissions the audience from all three stratifications crowded into the outer halls and, surging in a mass that would not be denied its incessant forward push, viewed the exhibited pictures. From what one could see in this rush-hour-subway-like jam, the display was typical. Many familiar paintings and drawings were seen, and others were encountered for the first time.

Names of Boston artists either long familiar or newly strange were noted. The water color gallery was most pleasing, and interesting as well the corridor given to pastels, prints, charcoals and the like. The high ceiling restaurant on the second floor housed the oils. The sight was like that of an old-fashioned vernissage night at the academy. Pictures, pyramided one on top of another, crowded the walls; people crowded the floor and overflowed onto the balcony at either end of the hall. They enjoyed the exhibition and each other's company. Comments were serious or amused, depending upon the merits of independent works. And wide enough latitude was guaranteed by the absence of jury or other form of aesthetic-qualifying entrance examination.

While the exhibition was far from brilliant, it was sufficiently representative of all classes and creeds of Boston art to be entertaining, and, in instances, profitable. A goodly group of persons returned to it after the concert, and remained until lowering lights warned them that the attendants wished to lock up for the night.

Mr. Fiedler's arrangement of music was especially interesting in that it endeavored to relate the two arts in compositional theme. A few days previous I had dinner at the home of a friend who is both an accomplished musician and composer. The talk drifted to the age-old discussion of the part that subject-matter, as announced by title, plays in music. A "Moonlight Sonata," said he, could as easily be called by a dozen differing names, and be equally effective under any one of them. It is all a matter of association in the mind of the listener. A passage that tells of spiritual meditation might as well picture the quiet rippling of water on a moonbright lake. The listener would conjure one or the other moods in his mind as the music played, depending only on which he had been taught to interpret it as representing. And it would be difficult to eradicate or revise a mental picture once formed in association with a certain movement. The plaintive notes of a mandolin stealing shoreward from a moonlit expanse of ocean might strike terror to the heart of a person who had never before heard the instrument; for lovers the twanging notes made dulcet by distance would seem celestial and romantic.

Thus it was interesting to listen to Mr. Fiedler's selection of compositions inspired by the pictorial arts. With some of the compositions I was familiar enough, and others not at all. The selections from Puccini's opera "La Boheme" called vividly to mind the tragic, soul-moving events of that most sweetly romantic version of artist life in the garrets of the Paris latin quarter. For story, staging and music were as old friends. And as for Stolz's "Why Do You Smile, Mona Lisa?"—why it seemed as though no better answer to Leonardo's famed enigmatical portrait in the Louvre could be given than this musical composition which turns back upon the young woman of the painting her quizzical, knowing smile. It is as though we were to say to her, "Come now, we know why you smile," while at the same time proffering no explanation. And after a while adding, "Why don't you ask us, how we know," aware that she of the picture will never question in words, continuing only to smile, but from now on in understanding sympathy. Such is the implication of Stolz's music when we have been informed of its story-telling content.

But how is it when no association or personal experience companions the music? Thus I have never danced to Strauss's "Artists' Life" waltz in an atmosphere of artistic life. To me, therefore, Mr. Fielder's rendition was but another Viennese waltz without especial suggestion. Yet it doubtless would have seemed the very embodiment of Bohemian life, had I but once heard it at a colorful artists' ball, such as that held annually at Provincetown, Gloucester or other painter's colony.

Nor did the elaborately composed "Pictures at an Exhibition" suite by Moussorgsky-Ravel convey the significance of its theme, even upon learning that Moussorgsky was inspired to its composition by a visit to a posthumous exhibition of pictures by his dear friend, Victor Hartmann. The musician had endeavored to describe not only the pictures, but his own progression from canvas to canvas. But without title and explanation—and, in this case, even assisted by both—the question remains, to what extent does his music convey his meaning? Would we be able to recognize the story were it offered without identifying title?

Pops Programme for the Week--Thursday for Requests--Boy Violinist at Opera House

Post June 4

For the sixth week of the Pops at Symphony Hall, opening tomorrow evening, but one special night is mentioned in the programme as received. That one is for Thursday evening and is the ever popular "Request Night." As the requests are still being received it is obviously impossible to include the detailed programme for that evening in the attached list, hence the leap from Wednesday to Friday.

* * * *

MONDAY—"Rakoczy March," Berlioz; "The Marriage of Figaro," Overture, Mozart; "Claire de Lund," Debussy; "La Belle Helene," Overture, Offenbach; Dances from "The Three Cornered Hat," de Falla; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "Variations Symphonique," Boellman; violoncello solo, Yves Chardon; "Voices of Spring," Waltz, Strauss; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade, and "Wintergreen for President," Gershwin.

* * * *

TUESDAY—"National Emblem," March, Bagley; "Le Roi d'Ys," Overture, Lalo; "Narcissus," Nevin-Herbert; "La Source," Ballet Suite, Delibes; "Night in Seville," Spanish Rhapsody, Albeniz; "Largo," Handel (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings); "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "Mlle. Modiste," Selection, Herbert; "Serenade," Toselli, and "Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, Wagner.

* * * *

WEDNESDAY—"Semper Fidelis," March, Sousa; "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Overture, Mendelssohn; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Samson and Delilah," Fantasia, Saint-Saens; "L'Arlesienne," Suite No. 1, Bizet; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky, Chorus; "Espana," Waltz, Waldteufel; "At Dawning," Cadman, and "Indian War Dance," Skilton.

* * * *

FRIDAY—"La Sorella," march, Borel-Clerc; "Euryanthe," overture, Weber; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierne; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; "La Goyita," Langendoen; "Tales From the Vienna Woods," waltz, Strauss; Songs by Simmons College Glee Club; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Country Gardens," Grainger, and "Favorite Regiment," march, Ertel.

* * * *

SATURDAY—Marche Militaire, Schubert; "Rosamunde," ballet, Schubert; "Fairy Tales," Nagel; "The Bartered Bride," overture, Smetana; "Madame Butterfly," fantasia, Puccini; Concerto in D minor for two violins, largo, Bach, soloists, Julius Theodorowicz, Robert Gundersen; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Prayer of Thanksgiving" (old Dutch hymn), arranged by Kremser, and "March of Hommage," Wagner.

* * * *

SUNDAY—Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Beethoven; symphony, "From the New World," largo, Dvorak; "Bolero," Ravel; pianoforte concerto No. 2 in C minor, Rachmaninoff; "The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens, and "Espana," rhapsody, Chabriex, soloist, J. M. Sanroma.

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

A. Laus, whose playing of the bassoon has gained him international fame.

Contrary to a popular notion that the orchestra of the Pops consists of a considerably reduced number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra personnel minus its star players, a name for name comparison shows that a number of the soloists of the winter season are also in the Pops Orchestra. As regards the number of players, by actual count there are 95 in the Pops' personnel at this moment as against 110 of the winter list.

One of these star players is Abdon Laus, the illustrious first bassoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who, likewise, leads the bassoon section in the Pops. Mr. Laus is a Frenchman, and with other wood-wind players, first came to the United States in 1918 with the French Military Band from which he was acquired by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Laus was a first prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory in 1910. He played first bassoon in several Paris orchestras before coming to this country. His "patrie" has not forgotten him, for he was given the decoration of Officer of the Academy in 1925.

Mr. Laus has cultivated the saxophone as well as the bassoon, and is the founder and conductor of a presentable saxophone orchestra which has appeared at the Pops on past occasions, but the far more respectable and distinguished bassoon is decidedly this musician's virtuoso instrument. It is capable of the finest shades of expression, and stands out in many virtuoso solo parts which composers have written into their scores.

213

SIXTH WEEK OF THE POPS

Her June

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will open their sixth week tomorrow. Arthur Fiedler and the Pops orchestra will present the following programs:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 5

Rakoczy March .... Berlios
"The Marriage of Figaro," Overture .. Mozart
Claire de Lun .... Debussy
"La Belle Helene," Overture ..... Offenbach
Dances from "The Three Cornered Hat" .... de Falla
The Ride of the Valkyies .... Wagner
Variations Symphonique .... Boellman
Violoncello solo: Yves Chardon
"Voices of Spring," Waltz .... Strauss
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango .... Gade
"Wintergreen for President" .... Gershwin

TUESDAY EVENING

"National Emblem," March .... Bagley
"Le Roi d'Ys," Overture .... Lalo
Narcissus .... Nevin-Herbert
"La Source," Ballet Suite .... Delibes
"Night in Seville," Spanish Rhapsody .... Albeniz
Largo .... Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Invitation to the Dance ...... Weber-Berlioz
"Mlle. Modiste," Selection .... Herbert
Serenade .... Toselli
"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg .... Wagner

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Semper Fidelis," March .... Sousa
"A Midsummer Night's Dream," Overture .... Mendelssohn
"Valse Triste" .... Sibelius
"Samson and Delilah," Fantasia .. Saint-Saens
"L'Arlesienne," Suite No. 1 .... Bizet
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
Chorus
"Espana," Waltz .... Waldteufel
"At Dawning" .... Cadman
Indian War Dance .... Skilton

THURSDAY EVENING

REQUEST NIGHT
(Program to be announced)

FRIDAY EVENING

"La Sorella," March .... Borel-Clerc
"Euryanthe," Overture .... Weber
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers" .. Pierne
"Aida," Fantasia .... Verdi
"Lo Govita" .... Langendoen
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltz .... Strauss
Songs by Simmons College Glee Club
"Music in the Air," Selection .... Kern
Country Gardens .... Grainger
"Favorite Regiment," March .... Ertel

SATURDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire .... Schubert
"Rosamunde," Ballet .... Schubert
"Fairy Tales" .... Nagel
"The Bartered Bride," Overture .... Smetana
"Madame Butterfly," Fantasia ..... Puccini
Concerto in D minor, for Two Violins:
Largo .... Bach
Soloists: Julius Theodorowicz—Robert Gundersen
Soloists: Julius Theodorowicz—Robert Gundersen
"Nutcracker," Ballet Suite .... Tcvhaikovsky
"Of Thee I Sing," Selection ...... Gershwin
Prayer of Thanksgiving (Old Dutch Hymn) .... Arranged by Kremser
March of Homage .... Wagner

SUNDAY EVENING

Overture to "Lenore" No. 3 ..... Beethoven
Symphony, "From the New World": Largo .... Dvorak
Bolero .... Ravel
Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in C minor .... Rachmaninoff
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia .... Saint-Saens
"Espana," Rhapsody .... Chabrier
Soloist: J. M. Sanroma

MUSIC AN

Globe Jun 4

Sixth Week of the "Pops"

The "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall enter a sixth week tomorrow evening.

On June 11 Mr Fiedler will conduct the third Sunday concert of the season. The highlights of a miscellaneous program will be Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the second piano concerto of Rachmaninoff, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. The programs for the week follow:

Monday, June 5—"Rokoczy" March, Berlios; "The Marriage of Figaro" overture, Mozart; "Claire de Luno" (arr by Seiniger), Debussy; "La Belle Helene," overture, Offenbach; Dances from "The Three Cornered Hat," de Falla; "The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; "Variations Symphonique," violoncello solo; Ives Chardon, Boellman; "Voices of Spring," waltz, Strauss; "Jealousy," Gypsy tango, Gade; "Wintergreen for President," Gershwin.

Tuesday—"National Emblem," march, Bagley; "Le Roi d'Ys," overture, Lalo; "Narcissus," Nevin-Herbert; "La Source," ballet suite, Delibes; "Night in Seville," Spanish rhapsody, Albeniz; Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlois; "Mlle Modiste," selection, Herbert; Serenade, Toselli; "Tannhauser," "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg," Wagner.

Wednesday—"Semper Fidelis," march, Sousa; "A Midsummer Night's Dream," overture, Mendelssohn; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; "Samson and Delilah," fantasia, Saint-Saens; "L'Arlesienne," Suite No 1, Bizet; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; chorus; "Espana," waltz, Waldteufel; "At Dawning," Cadman; "Indian War Dance," Skilton.

Thursday, Request night, program to be announced later.

Friday, "La Sorella," march, Borel-Clerc; "Euryanthe," overture, Weber; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierne; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; "La Govita," Langendoen; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltz, Strauss; songs by Simmons College Glee Club, "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "Country Gardens," Grainger; "Favorite Regiment," march, Ertel.

Saturday, "Marche Militaire," "Rosamunde," ballet, Schubert; "Fairy Tales," Nagel; "The Bartered Bride," overture, Smetana; "Madame Butterfly," fantasia, Puccini; concerto in D minor, for two violins, Largo (Bach), soloists, Julius Theodorowicz, Robert Gundersen; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; "Prayer of Thanksgiving" (old Dutch hymn), arranged by Kremser; "March of Hommage," Wagner.

Sunday, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven; symphony, "From the New World," Largo, Dvorak; "Bolero," Ravel; pianofore concerto No. 2 in C minor, soloist J. M. Sanroma, Rachmaninoff; "The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens; "Espana," rhapsody, Chabrier.

Globe June 11

Sanroma Soloist at "Pops"

Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist at the third Sunday "Pop" concert this evening in Symphony Hall. He will be heard with the orchestra in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, in C minor, a work unplayed in Boston for several years. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, will begin an otherwise miscellaneous program.

Boston University has bought out the entire house for tomorrow evening's concert. Hence there will be no public sale. Tuesday will be New England Conservatory night; and Friday "Children's Night," with a program designed to please both youthful and more mature tastes. On this occasion, the first "Children's Night" ever to be observed at the "Pops," the Harmonia Band of the Burroughs Newsboys Foundation will be heard. There will be favors.

The programs for the week follow:

Tonight: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Dvorak, symphony, "From the New World," Largo; Ravel, "Bolero"; Rachmaninoff, pianoforte concerto, 2 in C minor, Opus 18, soloist Jesus Maria Sanroma; Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia, pianos, Jesus Marie Sanroma, Leo Litwin; Chabrier, "Espana," rhapsody.

Monday, Boston University Night, (entire house taken; all other nights open to the public.)

Tuesday, New England Conservatory night: Military Polonaise, Chopin; "Egmont," overture, Beethoven; Suite, "Mother Goose," Ravel; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts, Wagner; "Lohengrin," introduction to Act III, Wagner; "Flivver Ten Million," a joyous epic, Converse; Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, finale, soloist, John F. Gruber, Rachmaninoff; "Roses From the South," waltz, Strauss; "The Music Box," Liadov; "Indian War Dance," Skilton.

Wednesday—"Always Vienna," march, Schrammel; "In the Spring," overture, Goldmark; Cavatina, Raff; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Ave Maria" (strings and organ), Bach-Gounod; "Bolero," Ravel; "The Merry Widow," waltzes, Lehar; "Turkey in the Straw," Guion; "Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman.

Thursday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Orpheus," overture, Offenbach; "Lohengrin," finale, Act I, Wagner; "Tuftonia's Day," E. W. Hayes, '16; Medley-Fantasia on Tufts Airs, J. W. Morton, '11; Fifth Symphony in E minor: Andante Cantabile, Tchaikovsky; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Tufts songs (with orchestra); "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Friday, "Children's Night," "Stars and Stripes Forever, march, Sousa; "Hansel and Gretel," prelude, Humperdinck; "The Swan" (violoncello solo, Jacobus Langendoen), Saint-Saens; "Peer Gynt," suite, Grieg; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; Golliwog's Cakewalk (from "The Children's Corner"), Debussy-Caplet; extra, Newsboys' Harmonica Band (Burroughs Newsboys Foundation); "Espana," waltz, Waldteufel; "The Cuckoo Clock,' del Castillo; "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Rimsky-Korsakov; Song of the Volga Bargemen, arranged by Jacchia; "Up the Street," march, Morse.

Saturday, Marche Militaire, Schubert; "Raymond," overture, Thomas; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakov; Irish Rhapsody, "Indian Summer," an American Idyll, Herbert; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "The Band Wagon," selection, Schwartz; "Night and Day," Porter; "Wintergreen for President" from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

"PROFESSIONAL
RKO KEITH'S

SEVENTH WEEK OF THE POPS

Her. Jn 11

Tonight in Symphony hall at 8:30 the Pop concerts will begin their seventh week with the last but one of the Sunday evening programs. For children's night, to be given next Friday. Arthur Fiedler has made a program designed to appeal to the parent no less than the child. An extra feature will be the Newsboys' Harmonica band and the refreshments, and distribution of favors will add to the occasion. Tomorrow night has been taken over entirely by Boston University but all other nights including New England Conservatory night on Tuesday and Tufts night on Thursday are open to the public and of general interest. Saturday features Herbert and living popular American composers.

The programs of the week follow:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 11

Overture to "Leonore No. 3 ...... Beethoven
Symphony, "From the New World:" Largo .... Dvorak
Bolero .... Ravel
Pianoforte concerto No. 2 in C minor, op. 18 .... Rachmaninoff
Solosist, Jesus Maria Sanroma
"The Animals' Carnival," grand Zoological fantasia .... Saint-Saens
"Espana," rhapsody .... Chabrier

TUESDAY EVENING

Military Polonaise .... Chopin
"Egmont," overture .... Beethoven
From the suite "Mother Goose" ...... Ravel
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts .... Wagner
"Lohengrin," introduction to act III .. Wagner
"Flivver Ten Million," a joyous epic .... Converse Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, Finale .... Rachmaninof
Soloist, John F. Gruber
"Roses from the South," waltz ...... Straus
The Music Box .... Liado
Indian war dance .... Skilt

"College Nights," Children's Party by Pops Performers

Post Jun 11

SEVENTH WEEK OF POPS

The Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall begin their seventh week this evening with the last Sunday concert but one. This symphonic programme will feature Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Mr. Sanroma will also be head as pianist in Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals." The other numbers are Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, the Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, and Ravel's Bolero.

Tomorrow evening the entire house has been taken by Boston University. Friday will bring the first Children's Night, with the Newsboys' Harmonica Band assisting the orchestra and special refreshments and favors. Tuesday night will be New England Conservatory Night and the annual Tufts Night falls on Thursday.

The programmes of the week follow herewith:

TUESDAY EVENING—Military Polonaise, Chopin; "Egmont," overture, Beethoven; from suite "Mother Goose," Ravel; "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," excerpts, Wagner; "Lohengrin," introduction to act 3, Wagner; "Flivver Ten Million," a joyous epic, Converse; Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, finale, Rachmaninoff; soloist, John F. Gruber; "Roses from the South," waltz, Strauss; The Music Box, Liadov; Indian War Dance, Skilton.

* * * *

WEDNESDAY EVENING — "Only One Vienna," march, Schrammel; "In the Spring," overture, Goldmark; Cavatina, Raff; "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Ave Maria, Bach-Gounod; Bolero, Ravel; "The Merry Widow," waltzes, Lehar; "Turkey in the Straw," Guion; "Play Gypsies, Play," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman.

* * * *

THURSDAY EVENING—Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; "Orpheus," overture, Offenbach; "Lohengrin," finale act 1, Wagner; Tuftonia's Day, E. W. Hayes; medley-fantasia on Tufts Air, J. W. Morton; Fifth Symphony in E minor, Andante Cantabile, Tchaikovsky; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Tufts Songs, with orchestra; "Of Thee I Sing," selection, Gershwin; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

* * * *

FRIDAY EVENING (Children's night)—"Stars and Stripes Forever," march, Sousa; "Hansel and Gretel," overture, Humperdinck; "The Swan," Saint-Saens (violoncello solo, Jacobus Langendoen); "Peer Gynt," suite, Grieg; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; Golliwog's Cake Walk, Debussy-Caplet; "Espana," waltz, Waldteufel; The Cuckoo Clock, del Castillo; The Flight of the Bumble Bee, Rimsky-Korsakov; Song of the Volga Bargemen, arranged by Jacchia; "Up the Street," march, Morse.

* * * *

SATURDAY EVENING—Marche Militaire, Schubert; "Raymond," overture, Thomas; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakov; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Indian Summer, and American Idyll, Herbert; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; "The Band Wagon," selection, Schwartz; "Night and Day," Porter; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

Max Kunze, leader of double-basses in both Boston Symphony Orchestra and in orchestra at Pops.

The double bass player in the theatre, seesawing sleepily between the comic and the dormant, has an easy time of it. The double bass in a Symphony orchestra must execute swift runs, they must be at the top and bottom of their unwieldy instrument at once; as often as not their parts are in unison with the 'cellos in the full tide of a principal melody.

Mr. Max Kunze, the leader of the double basses, both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in the orchestra of the Pops, is an artist of high distinction. No one would think of comparing him with Dr. Koussevitzky, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor is a double bass virtuoso beyond analysis or compare. Players of his sort simply do not exist.

That Mr. Kunze is a soloist in a true sense is evident when such episodes as the elephant gracefully waltzing to the tune of Berlioz' "Dance of the Sylphs" is introduced in Saint-Saens' amusing "Carnival of the Animals."

Prominent as a youth in Dresden, Hamburg and Warsaw, Mr. Kunze has devoted his efforts to the double bass since the age of 17. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1894.

Trans.

, JUNE 12, 1933

s --- Films

Concert-Chronicle, Mainly of the Pops

Remarkable Sunday Evening, For "Flivver Ten Million," Koussevitzky's Growth

THE EVENING, in this heat-distorted June, was not inviting for indoor entertainment. Yet the usual audience for a "Sunday Pop" was in presence. It filled both balconies and, little by little, three-quarters of the floor. There—it was again to be noted—the coveted privilege under the new beneficence of the Commissioner of Public Safety, is the opportunity to smoke. The cigarette, rather than the beer-glass, is the solace of mortal men—and mortal women—these summer Sunday evenings at Symphony Hall. But the galleries, however, and not the floor, win and hold the watching eye. Young people fill both and the "jeunes personnes," as Parisians would call them, make them as gay as summer gardens with the multi-colored splashes and the alternating white of summer frocks. Nor do the young gentleman, having blue serge and white flannel at disposal, lag behind. The "conservative" business men may trot about their daily routine in sober garments, uniform-like. We pleasure-seekers on the holiday of the week take the world more lightly and brightly; dress accordingly.

Nor did the evening invite to work indoors, or anywhere else. (In time some "brain trust" may find the way to a moratorium in as many tasks as possible, say from June through September.) Yet in five or six visits to the current Pops, on no occasion has the orchestra, in uncommonly full ranks, played with such sonority and rhythmic life, such precision and animation. Thanks to this zest and to Mr. Fiedler's clear notion and firm will with Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, that inexhaustible classic went surprisingly well. Conductor and orchestra maintained the suspense of the tonal narrative; sang the lyrical measures ardently; wrought the climaxes of the music-drama—for the overture in epitome is nothing less—boldly and with fervor. Mr. Fiedler mishandled no salient measures; sustained the irresistible march and splendor. For the fiftieth time, there were thrills in the most puissant overture that has yet come from composer's hand.

Next the slow movement of Dvorák's symphony "From the New World"—music of songful instinct over against Beethoven's music of passioned mind, the simple poetry of a peasant composer after a master's concentrated music-drama. The years are paling it. Yet the melody of the English horn, when it is played with the skill, the feeling and the tone-quality that Mr. Devergie brought to it, still touches the listening imagination; while the horns echoing across the singing strings weave woodland illusion. . . . For contrast again, Monsieur Ravel's "Bolero" which Mr. Fiedler, after many a repetition, now shapes, paces, reiterates and culminates to full effect as a tour de force rather than as so much sensation-mongering.

There are prigs and prudes of the concert-hall who would have it only a trick to repeat through twelve minutes or more a single dance-motiv—for it is hardly a melody— in unchanging rhythm and uninterrupted cumulation. And all this by no other means than increasing volume, intensified voice, deeper and more glowing instrumental color. To some of us such a piece remains a work of orchestral imagination, while the final modulation—and the moment at which it is made—falls not a whit behind the celebrated retard at the climax of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" as master-stroke of tonal-theater. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra are fortunate too in emphasis of the sensual quality of "Bolero." Warrantably there were shouts of excitement at the end.

For new incident Mr. Sanromá played the piano-part in Rakhmaninov's Concerto in C minor at which he has been working for a full year and upon which, doubtless, he will work for years to come. It deploys the full range and resource of the solo-instrument, keeps the orchestral part rich and warm; runs in romantic vein, ardently, changefully, intensively; cultivates throughout the grand style. By these tokens the first movement might have been played more broadly, spaciously, in larger outline, ampler body, more expressive mood than conductor and pianist chose to give it. The persistent impression was of tentative, scrimped performance. On the other hand Mr. Sanromá sounded the grave, measured, songful beauty of the slow movement in clear sense of its contrast with the turbulence that should have preceded it and the bravura tumult that follows in the finale. In that congenial exercise he not only outdid his virtuoso-self but caught the vein, half-Lisztian, half native-Russian, of romantic rhapsody. In this concerto of Rakhmaninov pianists ripen. For Mr. Sanromá it was only second performance.

That Homage to Ford

"Flivver Ten Million," Mr. Converse's happy and humorous symphonic exercise in American folk-lore to be heard afresh at The Pops tomorrow, is program-music in brief, continuous episodes. Since the Pop program-sheet has no room for notes, here follows the composer's own preface written for the production of the piece at the Symphony Concerts of April 1927: "'The Ten-Millionth Ford is now serving its owner.' . . . This remarkable statement seemed to me to be worthy of celebration in music and verse. What other product of this age has so entwined itself around the lives of our people? The marvel of its success seemed far to outshine the wonders of Aladdin's lamp, or the golden touch of Midas.

"Here was epic poetry right at hand; and as I thought of it, it seemed that the things about us are more vital to us than anything else. The ancients had their Scylla and Charybdis; we have our semaphore and 'traffic cop,' all equally perilous to pass. I believe that the moon shines as tenderly on the roadside in Westwood as ever it did on the banks of Euphrates. Hearing and admiring 'Pacific 231,' I said to myself, 'I too must try something of this kind for the Flivver.' I set about it purely for my amusement, and too seriously; for he who wishes to express American life or experience must include the saving grace of humor. I wondered what Mark Twain would have done with such a theme if he had been a musician. The piece turned out to be quite frankly program-music, and this is the story as it came to me:

"DAWN IN DETROIT. Chanticleer announces the dawn—The city stirs—sunrise.

"THE CALL TO LABOR. Bells—distant factory whistles.

"THE DIN OF THE BUILDERS. Fugal factory noises.

"THE BIRTH OF THE HERO. From the welter emerges the hero, full-fledged, ready for service. He tries his metal. He wanders off into the great world in search of adventure.

"MAY NIGHT BY THE ROADSIDE. America's Romance.

"THE JOY RIDERS. America's Frolic.

"THE COLLISION. America's Tragedy.

"PHŒNIX AMERICANUS. The hero, righted and shaken, proceeds on his way with redoubled energy, typical of the indomitable spirit of America."

Conductor's Progress

The mails are bringing the London weeklies with matured comment on Dr. Koussevitzky's recent concerts with the British Broadcasting Orchestra. Said Mr. Dyneley Hussey in the Week-End Review after the first:

> Altogether he showed himself in this concert a very great conductor, capable of realizing three utterly different styles—the wit of Prokofiev, the serene restraint and grandeur of Sibelius, the unrestrained emotionalism of Chaikovsky. He commands the orchestra without fuss or exaggeration, and I had the impression—though this cannot be confirmed till Friday, when he conducts the Fourth and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven—that his musical perceptions and self-control have enormously increased since he last visited London.

Bostonians who have followed Dr. Koussevitzky through nine years at Symphony Hall will agree, in their turn, to this growth.

At The Pops Tonight

No Admittance

THE Pop Concert, this, Monday, evening, becomes a Commencement fête of Boston University, which has taken the whole of Symphony Hall. No tickets will be sold to the public.

Memo

Says the Pop program-sheet for the concert next Friday evening: "Young people, bring your parents. They will enjoy it as much as you." As it happens, two or three of those interested parents suggest to this department that—for the youngster's sake, of course—Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival" should go into the list, even if the suite from Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt" or Waldteufel's waltz should be thrust out. We can only pass the word to the deciding Fiedler. H. T. P.

214

MUSIC

Globe June 12

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday "Pop" Concert

Along toward the end of last night's "Pops" program, Mr Fiedler took the audience on his annual Sabbath evening tour of the late Camille Saint-Saens tonal zoo, "The Carnival of the Animals, Grand Zoological Fantasia." There the shade of Saint-Saens exhibited to his visitors his wondrous collection of pianists, kangaroos, old musical fossils, and other vertebrate mammals. There were fish and fowl as well.

Saint-Saens was at his lightest and most diverting when he penned this piece, which so amusingly travesties salient characteristics of musicians, beasts, and birds. Incidentally, more numbers from this suite were heard last evening than has been customary in the past. For which all are duly appreciative.

Ravel's "Bolero," which roused the audience to "bravos" as well as handclapping, has become a "popular classic" since it arrived from Paris three years ago. Perhaps some may remember Ravel more by this music than by any other of his glittering, skillfully contrived but emotionless compositions. Nor is it too difficult to imagine a statue erected to Ravel on this account. A statue whereon he stands clutching pen and score paper, at his feet a rapt marble Euterpe on bended knees, pounding the "Bolero" rhythm on her snare drum.

There were two items last evening of special interest, Beethoven's great "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and Rachmaninoff's Second piano concerto, in C minor. Jesus Maria Sanroma played the solo portion of the concerto. Rachmaninoff's work, a thing of dignity and restrained, somewhat melancholy beauty, is in the style and spirit of the 19th century. Though perhaps not of plenary inspiration, it nevertheless is a moving work, of a sort that only a truly fastidious musician could write.

Mr Sanroma, supported by Mr Fiedler's robust yet sensitive accompaniment, played well. He treated his part somewhat impersonally, placing it as one of the orchestral voices, rather than attempting to show it off as a display piece with instrumental background. In this vein, no doubt, Rachmaninoff conceived his music.

The slow movement from Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody completed the program. The last Sunday "Pop" concert comes on June 25.

READ THE
ADVERTISEMENTS IN TODAY'S GLOBE

MUSIC

Herald June 12

POPS SYMPHONIC PROGRAM

The Sunday symphonic program of the Pops last night drew a large and extremely enthusiastic audience. "Bravo" was shouted after Ravel's "Bolero," the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, and the Saint-Saens Zoological Fantasy, and all three were well-deserved. The complete program was as follows:

Overture to Leonore, No. 3	Beethoven
Largo, from "New World" Symphony	Dvorak
Bolero	Ravel
Piano Concerto No. 2 in C Minor	Rachmaninoff
"The Animals' Carnival," Grand Zoological Fantasia	Saint-Saens
Espana	Chabrier

The Rachmaninoff concerto, more than any other work proving Rachmaninoff the true descendant of the Russian classical school, was given a splendid performance. Jesus Maria Sanroma, the soloist, handled the technical difficulties, the complicated rhythmic changes, the pages of sustained introspective Russian melodies, with the dependability and vitality for which he can always be counted on. Bostonians should realize what a unique place the young Porto-Rican holds in the musical life of the city, and how much he should be appreciated. The list of scores he masters and plays from memory brilliantly and accurately with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the Pops orchestra is staggering, besides which he gives a considerable contribution of his time and talents to chamber music organizations during the season. In a more musical age these feats might not be considered outstanding, but in ours, it is extraordinary, and for his gifts as a soloist and ensemble player the music lovers of the city should accord more than passing thanks.

It is amazing how well Ravel's Bolero holds its own, despite the dire prognostications which greeted its debut. It is very hard to outgrow a really strong rhythmic effect, and the Bolero still, when played at top form as it was last night, awakens a whole-souled response.

Chabrier's Espana, none so young any more, has charm and enough still, though it made no high-brow pretensions even in its day. There is again the enchantment of exhilarating rhythm, of an exotic atmosphere always likely to heat the sluggish northern blood which delights in the warming, and of exciting variety of melodic treatment.

The Zoological Fantasy made a great stir, as it always does, especially when a considerable amount of beer has washed down pretzels and Dvorak as a preliminary. The pieces were played with sober care, so that not one of the delightfully satirical sketches missed its full effect.

The orchestra was at its best, and so was Mr. Fiedler, its able and enterprising conductor.

E. B.

Tran Jun 17

The Pops

Make Your Choice—Two weeks more and the current series of Pop Concerts will come to an end. The final evening falls on Saturday, July 1. Meanwhile Mr. Fiedler is diversifying his nightly lists; in tireless fashion, still venturing experiments . . . The "Request Program," first offered a week ago, will be repeated, in deference to more requests next Monday evening . . . Beside Mr. Kern's "Music in the Air" one more musical play of the current season has yielded a "selection" suitable to The Pops—Mr. Ronberg's "Melody." It will be played for the first time next Tuesday, along with Mr. Repper's waltz, "April Yellow," for another freshening item. . . . On Wednesday Mr. Fiedler will invite the audience to song (with orchestral accompaniment) in "familiar favorites," among them "Sweet Adeline" and "Down Where the Wurzburger Flows." . . . Professor Leo Lewis's little poem for orchestra, "Remembrance," will be played on Thursday; when Chaikovsky's waltz, "Briar Rose," will not sound too familiar. . . . On Friday, Mr. Sanroma will be heard for the first time in public in the piano-part in Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia." It will be number in an "Hungarian Program" that assembles items from Sarasate, Brahms, Hubay and Lehar as well as this, that and the other Czardas. . . . Saturday will bring a full repetition, with all the soloists, of Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival."

Trans 14

Fiedler Praises "Be Mine Tonight"

Seldom has a talking motion picture come to this city which merited the praise of Boston's renowned musician, Arthur Fiedler, director of the Pops. This worthy distinction was given to the new film, "Be Mine Tonight," which started its engagement at the Tremont Theatre last Saturday.

In a letter addressed to Mr. Carl Laemmle of Universal Pictures, distributors of the film, Mr. Fiedler wrote, "Thank you very much for the great pleasure you accorded me by your invitation to view a performance of 'Be Mine Tonight.' From an artistic standpoint, musically, I find it flawless and decidedly charming. It should satisfy the most discriminating public and enhance the ever growing interest for the better music in pictures. The sound production technique of Kiepura's beautiful and virile voice is unusually fine."

"Be Mine Tonight" is now in its eighth week in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Minneapolis. It is in its fifth week in Chicago, its third in Seattle and is just starting long runs in other leading cities.

"Be Mine Tonight" is being shown at the Tremont Theatre continuously from 9 A. M. until midnight at popular prices.

Tran Jun 17

Concert-Chronicle Of June Evenings

The Conservatory at The Pops, The Ford of Mr. Converse, Mr. Sessions Returns

THE June evening of the New England Conservatory both lightens and weightens The Pops. It lightens them with the presence at every other table of young women in comely years and pleasing gowns. Between the faces and the frocks the floor of Symphony Hall blossoms as brightly as a summer garden. Even young gentlemen from the University beyond the Charles have admired the spectacle and its concomitants. Last evening none was lacking. On the other hand, with students, teachers and graduates of a school of music in presence, Mr. Fiedler makes bold to include in the program numbers that do not often recur at The Pops. Yesterday the audience heard, for example, Beethoven's overture to Goethe's play about Egmont; was so pleased by a spirited performance that it drew from conductor and orchestra the Turkish March in the incidental music to Kotzebue's "Ruins of Athens"—for another specimen, in very different quality, of Beethoven as theater-composer.

Mr. Fiedler went on to the simple fancies and the subtle instrumental and harmonic dress of three items from Ravel's "Mother Goose," as artful, fantasticated a music as it is safe to risk on a summer evening. Before the concert was ended considerable excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger" came and went, along with the finale of Rakhmaninov's Concerto in C minor. (Mr. Gruber of the Conservatory played the solo-part and drew warm applause from a friendly audience.) Nor could the sensuous melodies in waltz-rhythm of Strauss's "Southern Roses" have had a more congenial setting. Love, youth and a memory or two—the tune for the woodwinds half way along is quite enough to evoke all three.

The event of the evening, however, was the return of Mr. Converse's Fordian epic, "Flivver Ten Million." Six years ago it came into being at Symphony Hall. Though it has since been heard elsewhere in Boston, it was high time that it regain its native seat. Absence, it soon appeared, had not a whit diminished it. As well as Honegger's "Pacific 2-3-1"—"the locomotive piece"—it holds its own from the day in which such pieces were fresh fashion. It gained, besides, by performance under Mr. Fiedler. With the best will in the world Dr. Koussevitzky missed once and again the American humor and sentiment, the homely American fantasy, that pervade this tonal biography of a Ford car. Next to none escaped Mr. Fiedler, American born and bred; while the orchestra answered with unfailing gusto. At the end, Mr. Converse had three times to rise from a modest seat in answer to as many rounds of general applause. No other piece of his music sounds so friendly.

The tonal dawn breaks; the tonal sun rises; but Chanticleer, as Mr. Converse will call his voice from the poultry house, hints more at Detroit than at the haunts of Zarathustra. What with the bells and the whistles and the succeeding factory sounds—yes: Mr. Converse makes a fugue of them—there is soon no mistaking the tonal whereabouts or the birth-pangs of a hero. Out of the din he rolls. His own horn, sounded for once by a virtuoso, proclaims him. A few more pages and he steadies himself for adventures: sentimental when he is parked by the roadside under a June moon; boisterous when he is the means to joy-riding; ominous when collision racks him.

Still he plays the hero's part; rights himself; regains his stride, vanishes down the road, down the ages, through the orchestra, ten millionth, typical, epical Ford! Mr. Converse's music generates and sustains itself as well as unfolds the tonal tale. It is quick with invention and resource, ready with humor or sentiment. From end to end, it is our American scene and temper, our Fordian folk-lore, transfused into symphonic piece. Mr. Converse has done no better work than this exercise in the lighter humors of localized music. But it is doubtful whether his royalties from it have sufficed to buy even a "Model T." So also runs our American world away.

Mr. Sessions's Return

Last week-end Mr. Roger Sessions, the well-reputed and well-remembered composer of the new American generation, landed in New York after long residence in Europe. By report he has in his portfolio, among other pieces, a Concerto for Violin and Orchestra to be produced in Boston at the Symphony Concerts. Intercepted by the pierhead reporter of The Times, Mr. Sessions said there was not an opera house in Germany that had not been adversely affected by the ousting of Jewish conductors and musicians. He added that after the burning of the Reichstag on Feb. 28 he had witnessed beatings of Jews in the streets by brown-shirted mobs.

"The open violence lasted about five days," Mr. Sessions continued, "but it did not stop after that. The outrages were conducted behind doors or in the secrecy of the night. I have heard people compare the Nazis to the Fascisti, but there is no comparison. I lived in Italy for six years and in Germany for the last two years. It is not the single atrocity that matters, but the crude and intolerant spirit of Germany, which is incredible to an American."

Memo.

The "Request Program," recently heard at The Pops, will be repeated next Monday evening. . . . Mr. Fabien Sevitzky of the Metropolitan Theater announces a concert by his orchestral and vocal ensembles of young musicians in Franklin Park, near the Rose Garden, at half-past eight on Tuesday evening, June 27.

H. T. P.

For the Young And the Happy

A 'Children's Evening' Makes A New Point for The Pops

Trans Jun 17

THE oldest frequenters could remember no gayer evening at The Pops. Not only did the children—and the young people—come. They entered in and possessed the length, breadth and heighth of Symphony Hall. Almost every table in the foreground counted one, two or three. In the background they held their own against the curious or the shepherding elders. On every side they fringed the lower and the upper balcony, stretched parti-colored ranks along the walls. For the boys, blue serge and white flannels. For the girls, the first party-dress to toe and heel, or knee-high frocks, both in bright colors. By the time the balloons had been distributed, the paper-caps donned, the false ears and the false noses adjusted, it was a carnival audience out of time. Even the lower and the middle teens, by no means unrepresented, doffed their usual dignity in the presence of the very young.

An audience on its good behavior as well. Uncounted balloons drooped over balcony rails or fluttered above tables. One burst untimely; but not one escaped ceilingward. A penny whistle added an inadvertent note to the orchestral ensemble. Otherwise the eager, quiet listening of interest and of pleasure. After such listening, the liveliest of clapping; once and again young cries and shouts. By half again "extras" lengthened the program. (In one's tenderer years, one does not "stay up" till eleven or go to Mr. Fiedler's party for nothing). Between whiles a consumption of ices, cakes and the milder fluids worthy of the occasion. But these, like the "favors," were no new thing. Rather the wonder and the strangeness was the hearing of music in a public place, as part of an audience. Between numbers and at intermissions rather less chatter than was to be expected. The old spell of music was still upon many a young tongue. Add the absorptions of a very first concert, and there was nothing to be said until one was at home; or, if very sleepy, till today.

Mr. Fiedler, adept and discerning program-maker, had assembled his pieces shrewdly. Not one was so long as to tire young interest and attention. Only one, the Prelude to Humperdinck's opera, "Hänsel and Gretel," was of purpose symphonic and sonorous, but fared none the worse for that. Two were lively marches, Sousa's "Stars and Stripes"; Morse's "Up the Street," foretaste to many an unsuspecting lad of the Harvard College that waits his ripening years. Lightly rhythmed dances—four out of Chaikovsky's ballet of toys and Christmas trees, "Nutcracker." (For the "Sugar-Plum Fairy," Mr. Fiedler himself, with an occasional beat to the orchestra, played the tinkling, sweet-toned celesta to the general delight).

Selected and overt humors from Saint-Saëns's "Animals' Carnival," the elephant, the donkeys—and the pianists—all included. The amiable and amusing tonal trifling of Mr. del Castillo with a cuckoo-clock, of Rimsky-Korsakov with a bumble-bee, of Liadov with a music-box. Possibly the melancholy cake-walking of Debussy's golliwog went over the youngest heads. His "Children's Corner" was rather a subtle place, while the best-stored playroom nowadays boasts hardly a golliwog-doll. So, for another reason, with the Song of the Volga 'Bargemen," as though too weighty and surcharged for boyish and girlish shoulders. Throughout the evening it was rhythm that prevailed, and humor, and light-fingered fancies.

Child-like, the chronicler keeps the novel thing for the last. Half the evening it had lurked under the right-hand corner of the stage around joined tables. It was recognizable by dark, initialed sweaters, by duck trousers below, by occasional glimpses of harmonicas, by a pervading air of expectancy. Midway in the concert, a space on the stage was cleared. To it mounted from the corner aforesaid, the Newsboys' Harmonica Band, say ten or twelve youngsters ascending through the teens.

A march, a gypsy love-song, other numbers unspecified, disclosed their skill with breath and fluttering fingers; tested their composure before the tunnel-like spaces of Symphony Hall suddenly opened before them. Two darkey youths led them—one, left-handed and with a flair for his job; the other with a multiple waving of arms, flapping of hands, and swaying of body, from which the band somehow disengaged a guiding beat. Eminent conductors, rearwardly observed, are not more energetic or bewildering. Tumults of applause made answer. Young and old chortled in their joy. The Burroughs Foundation "pointed with pride." . . . Odds on, there will be a "Children's Night" at The Pops next spring.

H. T. P.

other towns,

LAST TWO WEEKS OF THE POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter upon their last two weeks when the request program is repeated tomorrow night. Arthur Fiedler announces a "singing" program for Wednesday in which the audience is invited to assist the orchestra in reviving favorite songs of the past. Friday will bring a program of Hungarian gypsy music, with noted soloists and appropriate decorations. Next Sunday will be the last Sunday concert of the Pop season, with Jean Bedetti as guest soloist of the evening.

The programs of the week follow:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 19

Request Night

Pomp and Circumstance..........Elgar
"William Tell," overture..........Rossini
Kammenoi Ostrow..........Rubinstein
Soviet Iron Foundry..........Mossolov
Largo..........Handel
Bolero..........Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue..........Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz..........Strauss
"Jealousy," Gypsy tango..........Gade
"Wintergreen for President"..........Gershwin

TUESDAY EVENING

"Queen of Sheba," march..........Gounod
"Der Freischutz," overture..........Weber
"April Yellow," waltz..........Repper
"Sylvia," ballet suite..........Delibes
"In the Pyrenees"..........Cella
Liebestraum..........Liszt-Herbert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tchaikovsky
"Melody," excerpts..........Romberg
Moment Musical..........Schubert
"Faust," bacchanale..........Gounod

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Cruiser Harvard," march..........Strube
"Poet and Peasant," overture..........Suppe
"Chimes of Normandy," selection, Planquette
(Brass ensemble conducted by Georges Mager)
Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford
"Cavalleria Rusticana," intermezzo..........Mascagni
"Jolly Fellows," waltz..........Vollstedt
"Campus Memories"
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," old Dutch hymn..........arranged by Kremser
"Down Where the Wurzburger Flows"..........von Tilzer
"Sweet Adeline"..........Armstrong
Stein song..........Bullard

THURSDAY EVENING

Entrance of the Boyards..........Halvorsen
"Finlandia," symphonic poem..........Sibelius
"Remembrance," for string orchestra..Lewis
"Cavalleria Rusticana," Fantasia..Mascagni
Gems from Gilbert and Sullivan
"Eili Eili"..........Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet solo: Georges Mager
"Merry Wives of Windsor," overture..........Nicolai
"The Cat and the Fiddle," selection...Kern
"Briar Rose," waltz..........Tchaikovsky
"Wedding March," from a Midsummer Night's Dream"..........Mendelssohn

FRIDAY EVENING

Hungarian Gypsy Night

"Schechenyi Indulo," march..........Fahrbach
"Heire Kati," Scene de la Czardas...Hubay
Gypsy Airs, violin solo with orchestra..........Sarasate
Solo: Einar Hansen
Hungarian Dances..........Brahms
No. 5 in G minor No. 6 in D major
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..........Liszt
Hungarian Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra..........Liszt
Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Gypsy Love," selection..........Lehar
"Jealousy," Gypsy tango..........Gade
Hungarian Czardas..........Monti

SATURDAY EVENING

"Blue White," march..........Schmidt
"Il Trovatore," Fantasia..........Verdi
Londonderry Air
Arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty
Caucasian Sketches..........Ippolitov-Ivanov
Carnival of Animals, grand zoological fantasia..........Saint-Saens
Piano solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma and Leo Litwin
Fourth Symphony: finale..........Tchaikovsky
"Estudiantina," waltz..........Waldteufel
Song of India..........Rimsky-Korsakov
Franklin D. Roosevelt March..........Woodin

SUNDAY EVENING

"Tannhauser"—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg..........Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude and Love-Death..........Wagner
"Dreams"..........Wagner
Violin solo: Julius Theodorowiez
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Prelude..........Wagner
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in A minor..........Saint-Saens
Solo: Jean Bedetti
Ritualistic Indian Dance..........Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from string quartet, Op. 11..........Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave..........Tchaikovsky

Herald J. 18

Concert-Chronicle

Dr. Muck's Medal

Trans J 20

AT the close of the celebration last month in Hamburg—Brahms's native city—of the hundredth anniversary of the composer's birth, the Burgomaster, on behalf of the Senate and citizens, hung a Brahms medal, struck in gold, around Dr. Muck's neck, and laid a wreath of laurel on his conductor's stand. In the concert, to which this homage was conclusion, he had conducted in Brahms's Rhapsody after Goethe, "Harzreise in Winter," for orchestra, men's chorus and alto voice. Through all the Nazi "re-adjustments" in Hamburg, Dr. Muck was undisturbed as director of the Philharmonic Concerts.

Mr. Dennée's Fifty Years

Alumni of the New England Conservatory at their reunion and dinner last evening in Brown Hall fêted Mr. Charles Dennée on the completion of fifty years' service in the faculty of the school. In an impromptu concert, Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Robison, for the teachers, joined various students in the performance of compositions by Mr. Dennée—songs, piano-pieces and two movements of a sonata for violin and piano.

Max Fiedler Retires

Word comes from Germany that Max Fiedler, who was conductor of the Boston Orchestra between Dr. Muck's two terms, withdrew last month from active work. Through many years he had been conductor of the Municipal Orchestra at Essen in the Ruhr. He marked his departure by the composition and performance of an overture of his own, named for the city and inscribed to its citizens.

N. B.

Frequenters of The Pops are reminded that there will be no concert in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening of next week. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will then transfer themselves to Mechanics Hall where they will entertain an international convention of Rotarians. There will be no public sale of tickets.

ON SUNDAY POST, JUNE 18, 1933

Singing Programme in Final List of Pops Presentations

With a repetition of the request programme tomorrow night the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall enter upon their last two weeks. The special features of the concerts immediately in prospect include a "singing" programme for next Wednesday, in which the audience is supposed to raise its collective voice, a programme of gypsy music for Friday, and for next Sunday the final Sunday evening concert with Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as soloist.

In detail the programmes run as follows:

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 19

Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; "William Tell," overture, Rossini; Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Soviet Iron Foundry, Mossolov; Largo, Handel; Bolero, Ravel; Rhapsody in Blue, Gershwin; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltz, Strauss; "Jealousy," gypsy tango, Gade; "Wintergreen for President," Gershwin.

TUESDAY EVENING, JUNE 20

"Queen of Sheba," march, Gounod; "Der Freischutz," overture, Weber; "April Yellow," waltz, Repper; "Sylvia," ballet suite, Delibes; "In the Pyrenees," Cella; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "Melody," excerpts, Romberg; Moment Musical, Schubert; "Faust," Bacchanale, Gounod.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JUNE 21

"Cruiser Harvard," march, Strube; "Poet and Peasant," overture, Suppe; "Chimes of Normandy," selection, Planquette; Victor Herbert favorites, arranged by Sanford; "Cavalleria Rusticana," intermezzo, Mascagni; "Jolly Fellows," waltz, Vollstedt; "Campus Memories" (for orchestra, assisted by the audience). "Prayer of Thanksgiving," Kremser; "Down Where the Wurzburger Flows," von Tilzer; "Sweet Adeline," Armstrong; Stein Song, Bullard.

THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 22

Entrance of the Boyards, Halvorsen; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; "Remembrance," for string orchestra, Lewis; "Cavalleria Rusticana," fantasia, Mascagni. Gems from Gilbert and Sullivan. "Eili Eili," arranged by Jacchia; "Merry Wives of Windsor," overture, Nicolai; "The Cat and the Fiddle," selection, Kern; "Briar Rose," waltz, Tchaikovsky; "Wedding March" from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn.

FRIDAY EVENING, JUNE 23

"Schechenyi Indulo," march, Fahrbach; "Heire Kati," scene de la Czardas, Hubay; Gypsy airs, violin solo with orchestra, Sarasate; Hungarian dances, Brahms; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Hungarian Fantasy, for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt (solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma); "Gypsy Love," selection, Lehar; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade; Hungarian Czardas, Monti.

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 24

"Blue White," march, Schmidt; "Il Trovatore," fantasia, Verdi; Londonderry Air (arr. by Sir Hamilton Harty); Caucasian Sketches, Ippolitov-Ivanov; "Carnival of Animals," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens; Fourth Symphony, finale, Tchaikovsky; "Estudiantina," waltz, Waldteufel; Song of India, Rimsky-Korsakov; Franklin D. Roosevelt, march, Woodin.

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 25, AT 8:30

"Tannhauser" (entrance of the guests into the 'Wartburg), Wagner; "Tristan and Isolde" (prelude and love-death), Wagner; "Dreams," Wagner (violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz); "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" (prelude), Wagner; Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A minor, Saint-Saens (solo, Jean Bedetti); Ritualistic Indian Dance, Hadley; Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet, Op. 11, Tchaikovsky; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Men Whom You Hear at the Pops

Jacobus Langendoen, leader of the 'cello section at the Pops. (Horner).

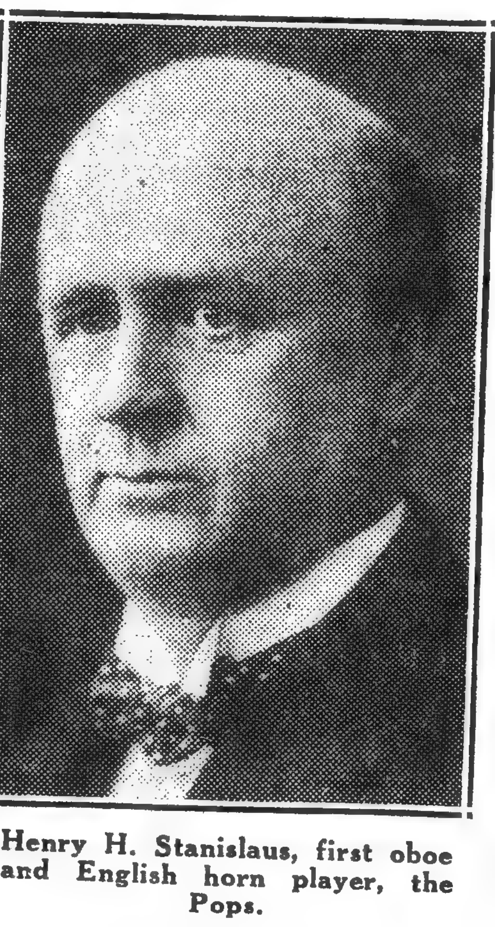
The most distinguished composer among the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Jacobus Langendoen who leads the 'cello section at the Pops. Mr. Langendoen's "La Goyita" is indeed a favorite of the Pops repertory, and is to be heard on Friday next, June 9. This musician's "Variations on a Dutch Theme" have been brought forward in the winter season by Dr. Koussevitzky, and his "Improvisations" for Orchestra may be done in the next regular season of Boston Symphony concerts.

Jacobus Langendoen was born in 1890 in the Hague, Netherlands. As a small boy he was taken by his parents to Capetown, South Africa, where he began a musical training which was completed on his return to Holland. He was first 'cellist at the Royal Opera at the Hague and at Scheveningen, also appearing as soloist in various European cities. He first came to America and this orchestra in 1920, and for a number of seasons has been first 'cellist of the Pops concerts.

Final Week of Pops at Symphony Hall

Pot J 25

The Men Whom You Hear at the Pops



Henry H. Stanislaus, first oboe and English horn player, the Pops.

Henry H. Stanislaus, oboe and English horn player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and English horn soloist at the Pops, has had a varied and distinguished career as a musician which has taken him practically around the world.

Mr. Stanislaus is a graduate of the Royal Academy of Music, London, with the honorary degree of A. R. A. M., which, in translation, reads Associate Royal Academy of Music.

Before coming to Boston to join the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Stanislaus was first oboeist with some of the world's leading orchestral organizations including such widely known bands as Queen's Hall Orchestra, King George's private band; London Symphony; Kaim Orchestra, Munich; Philharmonic, Warsaw; Melba's Opera Company, Australia, and Sir Thomas Beecham Opera Company. He lives in Brookline.

LAST WEEK OF POPS

With this evening's concert the Symphony Hall Pops enter upon the final week of this their 48th season. Among the special events are the solo appearances, this evening, of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and, Wednesday evening, of Elizabeth Travis, pianist. Tomorrow evening will bring a "rival request" programme, made up of second choices in the balloting for the "request" programme proper.

There will be no concert Tuesday. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will be heard that evening in Mechanics' Hall in a special concert for the International Rotary convention. In detail the programmes for the week are as follows:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 25

"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg..........Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death..........Wagner
"Dreams"..........Wagner
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Prelude..........Wagner
Concerto for Violincello and Orchestra, in A minor, Op. 33..........Saint-Saens
Ritualistic Indian Dance..........Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet Op. 11..........Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave..........Tchaikovsky

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 26

"Aida" Triumphal March..........Verdi
"Poet and Peasant," Overture..........Suppe
Valse Triste..........Sibelius
"La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours..........Ponchielli
Ride of the Valkyries..........Wagner
Ave Maria (violin solo, harp, organ and strings)..........Schubert
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"...Tchaikovsky
"The Merry Widow," Waltzes..........Lehar
Prelude in C-sharp minor..........Rachmaninoff
American Patrol..........Meacham

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JUNE 28

"Our Director," March..........Bigelow
"The Bat," Overture..........Strauss
"Whispering of the Flowers"..........Blon
"Rigoletto," Fantasia..........Verdi
Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah"..........Saint-Saens
Pianoforte Concerto No. 2..........Liszt
"Espana," Rhapsody..........Chabrier
Humoresque..........Dvorak
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March...Woodin

THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 29

"Always Vienna," march, Schrammel; "Der Rosenkavalier," waltzes, R. Strauss; Pavane, Ravel; "Scilian Vespers," overture, Verdi; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; To a Wild Rose, Macdowell; To a Water Lily, Macdowell; "Roses From the South," waltz, Strauss; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "March of the Toys," from "Babes in Toyland," Herbert; "Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman.

FRIDAY EVENING, JUNE 30

"On the Mall," march, Goldman; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; Bolero, Ravel; Rhapsody in Blue, piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; Song of the Volga Bargemen, arranged by Jacchia; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 1

Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Oberon," overture, Weber; Praeludium, Jarnefelt; La Boheme," fantasia, Puccini; "Tannhauser," overture, Wagner; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "Girls of Baden," waltz, Komzak; "Jealousy," Gypsy tango, Gade; Prayer of Thanksgiving, old Dutch hymn, arranged by Kremser.

UNASHAMED!

216

ÄDCHEN IN UNIFORM
FINE ARTS

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Last Week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall

Gl. J. 25

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon the last week of their 48th season with the concert tonight. Jean Bedetti will be guest soloist and Henry Hadley's new Ritualistic Indian Dance will have its first performance. Tomorrow there will be a "rival" request program containing the numbers which had the second largest vote on the request ballot. Tuesday there will be no Pop concert, since a special concert will be given in Mechanic's Building for the International Rotary convention.

The closing programs as announced by Arthur Fiedler follow:

Tonight—"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, Wagner; "Tristan und Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death, Wagner; "Dreams," violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz, Wagner; "Die Meistersingr von Nurnberg," Prelude, Wagner; concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, op. 33, Jean Bedetti soloist, Saint-Saens; Ritualistic Indian Dance, Hadley; Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet, op. 11, Tchaikovsky; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Monday, "Rival" Request Night—"Aida," triumphal march, Verdi; "Poet and Peasant," overture, Suppe; Valse Triste, Sibelius; "La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours, Ponchielli; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Ave Maria, Schubert; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "The Merry Widow," waltzes, Lehar; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; American Patrol, Meacham.

Wednesday, "Our Director," march, Bigelow; "The Bat," overture, Strauss; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Rigoletto," fantasia, Verdi; Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, Elizabeth Travis Behnke, soloist, Liszt; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; Humoresque, Dvorak; "Franklin D. Roosevelt," march, Woodin.

Thursday, "Always Vienna," march, Schrammel; "Der Rosenkavalier," waltzes, R. Strauss; Pavane, Ravel; "Sicilian Vespers," overture, Verdi; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; To a Wild Rose, Macdowell; To a Water Lily, Macdowell; "Roses from the South," waltz, Strauss; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "March of the Toys," from "Babes in Toyland," Herbert; "Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman.

Friday, "On the Mall," march, Goldman; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; Song without Words, Tchaikovsky; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; Spanish dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; Bolero, Ravel; Rhapsody in Blue, piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Victor Herbert favorites, arranged by Sanford; Song of the Volga Bargemen, arranged by Jacchia; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Kershwin.

Saturday, Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Oberon," overture, Weber; Praeludium, Jarnefelt; "La Boheme," fantasia, Puccini; "Tannhauser," overture, Wagner; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky; "Girls of Baden," waltz Komzak; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch hymn, arranged by Kremser.

Sevitzky Ens

The Fab

Nancy Carroll and

June 25

THE BOSTON HERAL

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, pianist, snapped by his brother, John B. Sanroma. He is featured in the "Pops" which close their summer season this week, and sails soon for Porto Rico.

(Boston Herald-J. B. Sanroma)

Mon

Music

Jun 26

Sunday Pop Concert

The final Sunday concert of the season opened the last week of the Symphony Hall Pops last night. The first section of the program was devoted to Wagner: the Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser"; the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan"; "Dreams," with Mr. Theodorowicz as soloist, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude. Mr. Jean Bedetti then appeared as soloist in the Saint-Saëns A minor Cello Concerto. Tchaikovsky's Andante Cantabile and Marche Slave closed the program.

Preceding these last two items, first performance was given to a Ritualistic Indian Dance by Dr. Henry K. Hadley. This proved to be a conventional piece, with engaging themes and lively rhythms, which should make an acceptable addition to the Pops repertory. The authenticity of its Indian derivation seemed dubious, but its workmanship is that of a skilled and practiced orchestral composer. Dr. Hadley was present to receive the acclamations of the audience.

Mr. Bedetti achieved the masterly performance that was to be expected of him in the hackneyed Saint-Saëns concerto, and was recalled many times. Mr. Fiedler provided an excellent accompaniment for him, and also secured from his orchestra far better than late-season performances of the other numbers.

L. A. S.

He Jun 25

LAST WEEK OF THE POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter the last week of their 48th season with the Sunday concert of tonight, when Jean Bedetti will be guest soloist, and Henry Hadley's new ritualistic Indian dance will have its first performance. This dance is to be included in incidental music which Mr. Hadley has composed for a coming presentation by the Bohemian Club in San Francisco.

Tomorrow there will be a "rival" request program containing the numbers which had the second largest vote on the request ballot. There will be no Pop concert Tuesday night since a special concert will be given in Mechanics building for the International Rotary convention. On Wednesday, Elizabeth Travis Behnke will be the notable soloist. Thursday will be Rose night, with decorations and appropriate numbers to compliment the Rose Growers' convention.

The closing programs, as announced by Arthur Fiedler, follows:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 25

"Tannhauser"—Entrance of the Guests into Wartburg	Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
"Dreams" Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz	Wagner
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Prelude	Wagner
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A minor, Op. 33 Soloist: Jean Bedetti	Saint-Saens
Ritualistic Indian Dance	Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet, Op. 11	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

MONDAY EVENING

"Rival" Request Night

"Aida," Triumphal March	Verdi
"Poet and Peasant," Overture	Suppe
Valse Triste	Sibelius
"La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours	Ponchielli
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Ave Maria (Violin solo, harp, organ and strings)	Schubert
Overture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
"The Merry Widow," Waltzes	Lehar
Prelude in C-sharp minor	Rachmaninoff
American Patrol	Meacham

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Our Director," March	Bigelow
"The Bat" Overture	Strauss
"Whispering of the Flowers"	Blon
"Rigoletto," Fantasia	Verdi
Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 Soloist: Elizabeth Travis Behnke	Liszt
"Espana," Rhapsody	Chabrier
Humoresque	Dvorak
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March	Woodin

THURSDAY EVENING

"Always Vienna," March	Schrammel
"Der Rosenkavalier," Waltzes	R. Strauss
Pavane	Ravel
"Sicilian Vespers," Overture	Verdi
"Nutcracker," Ballet Suite	Tchaikovsky
To a Wild Rose	Macdowell
To a Water Lily	Macdowell
"Roses from the South," Waltz	Strauss
"Music in the Air," Selection	Kern
"March of the Toys," from "Babes in Toyland"	Herbert
"Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza"	Kalman

FRIDAY EVENING

"On the Mall," March	Goldman
"Mignon," Overture	Thomas
Song without Words	Tchaikovsky
"Aida," Fantasia	Verdi
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve"	de Falla
Bolero	Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma	Gershwin
Victor Herbert Favorites	Arranged by Sanford
Song of the Volga Bargemen	Arranged by Jacchia
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 1

Closing Night

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
"Oberon," Overture	Weber
Praeludium	Jarnefelt
"La Boheme," Fantasia	Puccini
"Tannhauser," Overture	Wagner
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Girls of Baden," Waltz	Komzak
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango	Gade
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn	Arranged by Kremser

LOEW'S ORPHEUM—"When

He

MUSIC

Jun 26

POPS SUNDAY CONCERT

The last Sunday evening concert by the Pops orchestra was given last night to a big audience at Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

"Tannhauser"—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg	Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
"Dreams" Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz	Wagner
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," prelude	Wagner
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in A minor, op. 33 Soloist: Jean Bedetti	Saint-Saens
Ritualistic Indian dance (First performance)	Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from string quartet, op. 11	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

A strong representation of selections from Wagner's work is sure to draw an audience in Boston, a fact which Pops program-makers take advantage of regularly. How amusing a comment this is on the variability of even the most stubborn tastes—for Wagner was hissed in Boston in the early days, even as many a modern is scorned by the "walkers-out" today. The sensuously sorrowful "Love Death," and the sighing languors of "Dreams," were followed by the exuberance of the "Meistersinger" overture, which was played with an authority and zest one would not blame the orchestra for lacking, after so long and arduous a season.

The Saint-Saens concerto for cello and orchestra, played by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is a rather tiresome patchwork of routine cadenzas, and bits of charming melody. Like many another, Saint-Saens requires the impossible of the cello; the instrument should never be asked to jiggle and trill like a fiddle, when its beauty and its dignity lies in the rich expressiveness of tone that can only be drawn with a long bow. But Mr. Bedetti did as much with the work as one could ask, accomplished player that he is.

A "Ritualistic Indian Dance," by Henry Hadley, which was given a first performance, would have been no more than an ordinary pseudo-savage program item, save for the impetuous rhythm lent it by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, who blew into it momentary life.

The program closed with Tchaikovsky at his most tuneful and most popular.

E. B.

sings while [illegible] lively dancing.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Pops

The last Sunday evening of this season's Pops ran true to form, in that the program was of a slightly graver nature than those presented during the week.

Practically the first half of the program was occupied by familiar Wagner excerpts, and the applause greeting each separate item bore witness to the fact that amusing bagatelles are not the only sort of music desired by Pops audiences. The first—the Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg, from the opera "Tannhaeuser"—was played, it seemed, less well than the three remaining works. True, these pages from "Tannhaeuser" are spirited, almost martial, but Mr Fiedler played them, as well, with a decided rigidity of tempo, which resulted in certain portions being too quick, others too slow.

Julius Theodorowicz was violin soloist in "Traeume," founded upon "Tristan und Isolde" motifs. Mr Theodorowicz played with a beautiful, clear tone which especially emphasized the piece's ethereal aspects—a quality not always associated with Wagner, the portrayer of earthly passions. Even while admiring, one must regretfully admit that "Traeume" was a little dimmed by immediate juxtaposition to the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." This latter, fortuitously, marked the apex of the evening, both orchestrally and qualitatively. Mr Fiedler's men, almost seeming to do so without need of a conductor's direction, played the music for all of its magnificent worth. The "Meistersinger" Prelude similarly inspired their best and most enthusiastic efforts, and fell into place only second to the "Tristan und Isolde" bit.

One might say, dourly, that Jean Bedetti gave the Saint-Saens A Minor Violoncello Concerto far better treatment than it deserves. After Wagner's spectacular massiveness, Saint-Saens' music seems even less valid than usual. Its purpose as a vehicle for the display of 'cello virtuosity must remain undisputed, save for a few moments when the demands for excessive agility make a 'cellist of even Mr Bedetti's ability scramble indecorously over the finger board.

Hadley's "Ritualistic Indian Dance"—played for the first time, and with the composer in attendance—seemed, on first hearing, roughly like an American counterpart of the Ravel "Bolero." One listener, at least, was struck with an instant resemblance, both in melodic manner and treatment, and the structure and execution in general.

The program ended with two familiar—shall one say oppressively familiar?—Tchaikovsky bits, "Marche Slave" and the "Andante Cantabile," from the Opus 11 String Quartet.

AMUSEMENTS

SYMPHONY HALL
TONIGHT 8:30—RIVAL REQUEST
LAST 5 NIGHTS
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
Numbers having 2nd largest vote

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUL 31 1933

Boston Concert Series Tickets Taken by 110

Music Lovers Plan to Hear Winter Programs by Dr. Koussevitzky.

One hundred and ten Washington music lovers already have taken boxes and orchestra locations for the tentative series of three matinee concerts to be given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall.

Included are Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. Alexander Rodgers, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. John W. Burke, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts.

Also Dr. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Carl Voegtlin, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Justice and Mrs. Alfred A. Wheat, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Melville Church, Mrs. Louis W. Austin, Mrs. Robert Giles, Mrs. William Fitch Kelley, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. J. A C. Wright, Mrs. Duncan Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warren.

Also Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. J. Marvin Wright, Mrs. H. Clay Browning, Mrs. Charles R. Shepherd,, Mrs. Thomas S. Wiles, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mr. William Phillips, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. Lee Warren, Mr. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. James Berrall, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. H. C. Morris, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. E. Lester Jones, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Mr. George Weckel, Mrs. C. C. Williams, Mrs. Weston P. Chamberlain.

Also Mrs. Leander McCormick-Goodhart, Mrs. J. Davis Broadhead, Mrs. G. C. Lodge, Mrs. A. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Pierre Gaillard, Mrs. Gilbank Twigg, Miss Nannie R. Macomb, Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis

---

MONTREAL, CAN.
STAR

JUL 26 1933

NOTED CONDUCTOR GIVES UP POSITION

BERLIN, July 26.—(Special Cable to The Star; Copyright).—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1912 to 1918, has resigned as director of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra because he opposes the plan of the Hamburg Senate to merge the organization with the orchestra of the Municipal theater. Dr. Muck, who is the Nestor of Bayreuth conductors and one of the greatest living interpreters of Wagnerian scores as Richard Wagner himself played them, declined the suggestion from the Hamburg Senate that he conduct the first five concerts under his direction planned for next winter in return for postponement of the dissolution of the Hamburg Philharmonic.

FINE ARTS

COMMENT CONCERNING MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Gl. J. 23

Last Week of Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon the last week of their 48th season with the concert tonight. Jean Bedetti will be guest soloist and Henry Hadley's new Ritualistic Indian Dance will have its first performance. Tomorrow there will be a "rival" request program containing the numbers which had the second largest vote on the request ballot. Tuesday there will be no Pop concert, since a special concert will be given in Mechanic's Building for the International Rotary convention.

The closing programs as announced by Arthur Fiedler follow:

Tonight—"Tannhauser," Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, Wagner; "Tristan und Isolde," Prelude and Love-Death, Wagner; "Dreams," violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz, Wagner; "Die Meistersingr von Nurnberg," Prelude, Wagner; concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, op. 33, Jean Bedetti soloist, Saint-Saens; Ritualistic Indian Dance, Hadley; Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet, op. 11, Tchaikovsky; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Monday, "Rival" Request Night—"Aida," triumphal march, Verdi; "Poet and Peasant," overture, Suppe; Valse Triste, Sibelius; "La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours, Ponchielli; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Ave Maria, Schubert; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "The Merry Widow," waltzes, Lehar; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; American Patrol, Meacham.

Wednesday, "Our Director," march, Bigelow; "The Bat," overture, Strauss; "Whispering of the Flowers," Blon; "Rigoletto," fantasia, Verdi; Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, Elizabeth Travis Behnke, soloist, Liszt; "Espana," Rhapsody, Chabrier; Humoresque, Dvorak; "Franklin D. Roosevelt," march, Woodin.

Thursday, "Always Vienna," march, Schrammel; "Der Rosenkavalier," waltzes, R. Strauss; Pavane, Ravel; "Sicilian Vespers," overture, Verdi; "Nutcracker," ballet suite, Tchaikovsky; To a Wild Rose, Macdowell; To a Water Lily, Macdowell; "Roses from the South," waltz, Strauss; "Music in the Air," selection, Kern; "March of the Toys," from "Babes in Toyland," Herbert; "Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza," Kalman.

Friday, "On the Mall," march, Goldman; "Mignon," overture, Thomas; Song without Words, Tchaikovsky; "Aida," fantasia, Verdi; Spanish dance from "La Vida Breve," de Falla; Bolero, Ravel; Rhapsody in Blue, piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma, Gershwin; Victor Herbert favorites, arranged by Sanford; Song of the Volga Bargemen, arranged by Jacchia; "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing," Kershwin.

Saturday, Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Oberon," overture, Weber; Praeludium, Jarnefelt; "La Boheme," fantasia, Puccini; "Tannhauser," overture, Wagner; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Marche Slave, Tschaikowsky; "Girls of Baden," waltz Komzak; "Jealousy," Gypsy Tango, Gade; Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch hymn, arranged by Kremser.

Nancy Carroll and Paul Lukas, and "Girl Missing"

HERAL

JESUS MARIA SANROMA, pianist, snapped by his brother, John B. Sanroma. He is featured in the "Pops" which close their summer season this week, and sails soon for Porto Rico.
(Boston Herald-J. B. Sanroma)

Mon Music Jun 26

Sunday Pop Concert

The final Sunday concert of the season opened the last week of the Symphony Hall Pops last night. The first section of the program was devoted to Wagner: the Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhäuser"; the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan"; "Dreams," with Mr. Theodorowicz as soloist, and the "Meistersinger" Prelude. Mr. Jean Bedetti then appeared as soloist in the Saint-Saëns A minor Cello Concerto. Tchaikovsky's Andante Cantabile and Marche Slave closed the program.

Preceding these last two items, first performance was given to a Ritualistic Indian Dance by Dr. Henry K. Hadley. This proved to be a conventional piece, with engaging themes and lively rhythms, which should make an acceptable addition to the Pops repertory. The authenticity of its Indian derivation seemed dubious, but its workmanship is that of a skilled and practiced orchestral composer. Dr. Hadley was present to receive the acclamations of the audience.

Mr. Bedetti achieved the masterly performance that was to be expected of him in the hackneyed Saint-Saëns concerto, and was recalled many times. Mr. Fiedler provided an excellent accompaniment for him, and also secured from his orchestra far better than late-season performances of the other numbers.

L. A. S.

Sevitzky Ens

He Jun 25

LAST WEEK OF THE POPS

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall enter the last week of their 48th season with the Sunday concert of tonight, when Jean Bedetti will be guest soloist, and Henry Hadley's new ritualistic Indian dance will have its first performance. This dance is to be included in incidental music which Mr. Hadley has composed for a coming presentation by the Bohemian Club in San Francisco.

Tomorrow there will be a "rival" request program containing the numbers which had the second largest vote on the request ballot. There will be no Pop concert Tuesday night since a special concert will be given in Mechanics building for the International Rotary convention. On Wednesday, Elizabeth Travis Behnke will be the notable soloist. Thursday will be Rose night, with decorations and appropriate numbers to compliment the Rose Growers' convention.

The closing programs, as announced by Arthur Fiedler, follows:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 25

"Tannhauser"—Entrance of the Guests into Wartburg	Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
"Dreams" Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz	Wagner
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Prelude	Wagner
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, in A minor, Op. 33 Soloist: Jean Bedetti	Saint-Saens
Ritualistic Indian Dance	Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from String Quartet, Op. 11	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

MONDAY EVENING
"Rival" Request Night

"Aida," Triumphal March	Verdi
"Poet and Peasant," Overture	Suppe
Valse Triste	Sibelius
"La Gioconda," Ballet of the Hours	Ponchielli
Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner
Ave Maria (Violin solo, harp, organ and strings)	Schubert
Overture Solennelle, "1812"	Tchaikovsky
"The Merry Widow," Waltzes	Lehar
Prelude in C-sharp minor	Rachmaninoff
American Patrol	Meacham

WEDNESDAY EVENING

"Our Director," March	Bigelow
"The Bat" Overture	Strauss
"Whispering of the Flowers"	Blon
"Rigoletto," Fantasia	Verdi
Bacchanale, from "Samson and Delilah"	Saint-Saens
Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 Soloist: Elizabeth Travis Behnke	Liszt
"Espana," Rhapsody	Chabrier
Humoresque	Dvorak
"Franklin D. Roosevelt," March	Woodin

THURSDAY EVENING

"Always Vienna," March	Schrammel
"Der Rosenkavalier," Waltzes	R. Strauss
Pavane	Ravel
"Sicilian Vespers," Overture	Verdi
"Nutcracker," Ballet Suite	Tchaikovsky
To a Wild Rose	Macdowell
To a Water Lily	Macdowell
"Roses from the South," Waltz	Strauss
"Music in the Air," Selection	Kern
"March of the Toys," from "Babes in Toyland"	Herbert
"Play Gypsies, Dance Gypsies," from "Countess Maritza"	Kalman

FRIDAY EVENING

"On the Mall," March	Goldman
"Mignon," Overture	Thomas
Song without Words	Tchaikovsky
"Aida," Fantasia	Verdi
Spanish Dance from "La Vida Breve"	de Falla
Bolero	Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue Piano Solo: Jesus Maria Sanroma	Gershwin
Victor Herbert Favorites	Arranged by Sanford
Song of the Volga Bargemen	Arranged by Jacchia
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 1
Closing Night

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
"Oberon," Overture	Weber
Praeludium	Jarnefelt
"La Boheme," Fantasia	Puccini
"Tannhauser," Overture	Wagner
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Girls of Baden," Waltz	Komzak
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango	Gade
Prayer of Thanksgiving, Old Dutch Hymn	Arranged by Kremser

LOEW'S ORPHEUM—

He MUSIC Jun 26

MUSIC

POPS SUNDAY CONCERT

The last Sunday evening concert by the Pops orchestra was given last night to a big audience at Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

"Tannhauser"—Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg	Wagner
"Tristan und Isolde"—Prelude and Love-Death	Wagner
"Dreams" Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz	Wagner
"Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," prelude	Wagner
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in A minor, op. 33 Soloist: Jean Bedetti	Saint-Saens
Ritualistic Indian dance (First performance)	Hadley
Andante Cantabile, from string quartet, op. 11	Tchaikovsky
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky

A strong representation of selections from Wagner's work is sure to draw an audience in Boston, a fact which Pops program-makers take advantage of regularly. How amusing a comment this is on the variability of even the most stubborn tastes—for Wagner was hissed in Boston in the early days, even as many a modern is scorned by the "walkers-out" today. The sensuously sorrowful "Love Death," and the sighing languors of "Dreams," were followed by the exuberance of the "Meistersinger" overture, which was played with an authority and zest one would not blame the orchestra for lacking, after so long and arduous a season.

The Saint-Saens concerto for cello and orchestra, played by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is a rather tiresome patchwork of routine cadenzas, and bits of charming melody. Like many another, Saint-Saens requires the impossible of the cello; the instrument should never be asked to jiggle and trill like a fiddle, when its beauty and its dignity lies in the rich expressiveness of tone that can only be drawn with a long bow. But Mr. Bedetti did as much with the work as one could ask, accomplished player that he is.

A "Ritualistic Indian Dance," by Henry Hadley, which was given a first performance, would have been no more than an ordinary pseudo-savage program item, save for the impetuous rhythm lent it by the conductor, Arthur Fiedler, who blew into it momentary life.

The program closed with Tchaikovsky at his most tuneful and most popular.

E. B.

lively dancing.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Sunday Pops

The last Sunday evening of this season's Pops ran true to form, in that the program was of a slightly graver nature than those presented during the week.

Practically the first half of the program was occupied by familiar Wagner excerpts, and the applause greeting each separate item bore witness to the fact that amusing bagatelles are not the only sort of music desired by Pops audiences. The first—the Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg, from the opera "Tannhaeuser"—was played, it seemed, less well than the three remaining works. True, these pages from "Tannhaeuser" are spirited, almost martial, but Mr Fiedler played them, as well, with a decided rigidity of tempo, which resulted in certain portions being too quick, others too slow.

Julius Theodorowicz was violin soloist in "Traeume," founded upon "Tristan und Isolde" motifs. Mr Theodorowicz played with a beautiful, clear tone which especially emphasized the piece's ethereal aspects—a quality not always associated with Wagner, the portrayer of earthly passions. Even while admiring, one must regretfully admit that "Traeume" was a little dimmed by immediate juxtaposition to the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." This latter, fortuitously, marked the apex of the evening, both orchestrally and qualitatively. Mr Fiedler's men, almost seeming to do so without need of a conductor's direction, played the music for all of its magnificent worth. The "Meistersinger" Prelude similarly inspired their best and most enthusiastic efforts, and fell into place only second to the "Tristan und Isolde" bit.

One might say, dourly, that Jean Bedetti gave the Saint-Saens A Minor Violoncello Concerto far better treatment than it deserves. After Wagner's spectacular massiveness, Saint-Saens' music seems even less valid than usual. Its purpose as a vehicle for the display of 'cello virtuosity must remain undisputed, save for a few moments when the demands for excessive agility make a 'cellist of even Mr Bedetti's ability scramble indecorously over the finger board.

Hadley's "Ritualistic Indian Dance"—played for the first time, and with the composer in attendance—seemed, on first hearing, roughly like an American counterpart of the Ravel "Bolero." One listener, at least, was struck with an instant resemblance, both in melodic manner and treatment, and the structure and execution in general.

The program ended with two familiar—shall one say oppressively familiar?—Tchaikovsky bits, "Marche Slave" and the "Andante Cantabile," from the Opus 11 String Quartet.

AMUSEMENTS

SYMPHONY HALL
TONIGHT 8:30—RIVAL REQUEST
LAST 5 NIGHTS
POPS
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
Numbers having 2nd largest vote

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

JUL 31 1933

Boston Concert Series Tickets Taken by 110

Music Lovers Plan to Hear Winter Programs by Dr. Koussevitzky.

One hundred and ten Washington music lovers already have taken boxes and orchestra locations for the tentative series of three matinee concerts to be given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall.

Included are Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. Alexander Rodgers, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. John W. Burke, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts.

Also Dr. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Carl Voegtlin, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Justice and Mrs. Alfred A. Wheat, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Melville Church, Mrs. Louis W. Austin, Mrs. Robert Giles, Mrs. William Fitch Kelley, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. J. A C. Wright, Mrs. Duncan Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warren.

Also Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. J. Marvin Wright, Mrs. H. Clay Browning, Mrs. Charles R. Shepherd,, Mrs. Thomas S. Wiles, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mr. William Phillips, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. Lee Warren, Mr. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. James Berrall, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d, Mrs. H. C. Morris, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. E. Lester Jones, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, Mr. George Weckel, Mrs. C. C. Williams, Mrs. Weston P. Chamberlain.

Also Mrs. Leander McCormick-Goodhart, Mrs. J. Davis Broadhead, Mrs. G. C. Lodge, Mrs. A. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Pierre Gaillard, Mrs. Gilbank Twigg, Miss Nannie R. Macomb, Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis

---

MONTREAL, CAN.
STAR

JUL

NOTED CONDUCTOR GIVES UP POSITION

BERLIN, July 26.—(Special Cable to The Star; Copyright).—Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1912 to 1918, has resigned as director of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra because he opposes the plan of the Hamburg Senate to merge the organization with the orchestra of the Municipal theater. Dr. Muck, who is the Nestor of Bayreuth conductors and one of the greatest living interpreters of Wagnerian scores as Richard Wagner himself played them, declined the suggestion from the Hamburg Senate that he conduct the first five concerts under his direction planned for next winter in return for postponement of the dissolution of the Hamburg Philharmonic.

NEW YORK TIMES

JUL 16 1933

COMMENTS AND VISTAS

Hale's Annotations of Boston Symphony Programs—Composers in Perspective

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE volume of the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, season of 1932-33, with the engrossing annotations of Philip Hale, is at hand and has been with us in many places. Some books make excellent reading on a rainy day, when the weather may put one in the mood to ruminate and digest at leisure their more palatable portions. Others, full of learning, are relegated in the Winter to the summertime, when there will be more leisure and opportunity for concentration, and in the summertime are postponed for perusal till the Winter, when the weather will not be so hot. This one is a standing temptation.

* * *

It is a pity that the twentieth century cannot recapture some of the flavor of the eighteenth, with its passion for ideas and beautiful things. In 1739 such delightful, substantial and entertaining music as the Handel Concerti Grossi were not reserved for performance at symphony concerts, as today. They were widely popular, these pieces for concerted instruments, and the taste of the day needed no connoisseurs or music critics to acquaint the public with that fact. In those days there were, of course, gigantic composers, and our attitude toward music might be different if we had them. The twelve Concerti Grossi were composed in the same year that saw the premières of Handel's two magnificent oratorios, "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt." Walsh wrote that "these concertos * * * are played in most public places with the greatest applause."

Victor Soelcher gives further evidence, if such were needed, of Handel's position in England: a popular composer whose works the people enjoyed and admired. His compositions "were so frequently performed at public concerts and benefits that they seem, during his lifetime, to have quite become public property. Moreover, he did nothing which the other theatres did not attempt to imitate. In the little theatre of the Haymarket, evening entertainments were given in exact imitation of his 'Several Concerts for Different Instruments,' with a variety of chosen airs of the best master, and the famous 'Salve Regina of Hasse.'"

The place of Handel as composer for instruments has been minimized because of his preoccupation with vocal forms. But "Handel in his day and generation was an experimenter in the art of instrumentation, and certain of his innovations in the combination of instruments are of much interest. He had at his disposal the violins, first, second and sometimes third; violas, the violetta marina, the viola da gamba, the violoncello, the double-bass; the lute, the theorbo, and the harp, trumpets, horns, trombones, the old cornet or zinke; three varieties of the flute, oboes, bassoons, double-bassoons, and the drum family; clavecin and organ. He did not disdain the carillon, and it is recorded that he sighed for a cannon."

The speed, indeed the precipitancy, with which Handel usually composed is a matter of common knowledge. Romain Rolland calls attention to the spirit in which he composed. Rolland "insisted that the instrumental music of Handel has the nature of a constant improvisation, music to be served piping hot to the audience, and should reserve this character in performance. 'When you have studied with minute care each detail, obtained from your orchestra an irreproachable precision, tonal purity and finish, you will have done nothing unless you have made the face of the improvising genius rise from the work.'"

* * *

The moral sensitiveness of the public and even of learned commentators when certain performances are given is impressive. On very rare occasions it has been justified. The commotion in Paris when Nijinsky mimed to the music of Debussy's "L'Après Midi d'un Faune" is a matter of comparatively recent history. But hearken to the remark in the "Annales du Théâtre" in 1895, after the second orchestral performance of a most subtle and beautiful score, which is the aroma of the poem that gives it its name: "Written after a poem by Stéphane Mallarmé so sadistic that M. Colonne did not dare to print the text; young girls attend his concerts."

Debussy issued no lengthy description of his epochal tone poem, nor did he insert picturesque verbiage in the fly-leaf of the score. He did not even invoke the famous interpretation of Mallarmé's obscure poem by Edmund Gosse. He merely contrived a masterpiece and contented himself with remarking, according to report, that the music reflected "the successive scenes in which the longings and the desires of the Faun pass in the heat of the afternoon." Then the dancers got hold of the piece. The scandal of the Nijinsky interpretation was the sensation of a Paris season on the part of an audience which would have been thought sufficiently sophisticated. (But M. Pierre Monteux, who conducted that performance, has explained the accident which nearly precipitated a riot, creating a situation not intended or foreseen by Nijinsky.) What did Debussy think of the dancers? A thing more eloquent than much comment was the one word attributed to him after the performance of his "Jeux," which he composed—was it not at Diaghileff's order?—for the ballet. "Pourquoi?" And one hears this word from Debussy's lips and senses a faint grimace and a faint Gallic shrug of the shoulders and a sardonic relinquishment of the topic. He could have said "pourquoi" quite often of the theatre, and probably did so. "Pourquoi" the Nijinsky choreography for "L'Après-midi" at all? It did not have to be indecent, ~~this~~ impudent attempt at visualization of the music of a dream of antiquity, to shock the artistic sensibilities.

* * *

To most of us Brahms's Second symphony is a very lovely and prevailingly joyous score. Other of the Brahms symphonies appear differently, and Mr. Hale himself has spoken of the yew-like melancholy of the Fourth symphony, in E minor. Walter Niemann's reaction to the Second symphony, which he mentions, is of interest. To Niemann the music is anything but a "harmless, pleasing, agreeable, cheerfully 'sunlit' idyl. Nothing could be further from the truth. The period between the Sixties and the Eighties of the last century, which, in spite of all Germany's victorious wars, was so peculiarly languid, inert and full of bourgeois sensibility in art, as well as in politics and human relations, had, none the less, as its artistic ideal a heart-rending pathos and monumental grandeur. Nowadays, regarding things from a freer and less prejudiced point of view, we are fortunately able to detect far more clearly the often oppressive spiritual limitations, moodiness and atmosphere of resignation in such pleasant, apparently cheerful and anacreontic works as Brahms's Second symphony.

Bruckner was priceless. When Richter played Bruckner's "Romantic" symphony in Vienna the face of the simple composer shone with gratitude. That was the moment when he pressed a coin in the conductor's hand. "Take this and drink a glass of beer to my health." "The coin was a Maria Theresa thaler. Richter wore it on his watch chain ever after."

Wagnerisms in Bruckner's music are inescapable. Was he therefore, as a composer, a Wagnerite? Gabriel Engel's translation of the paper written by Max Auer in the "Bruckner-Blätter" disputes this. Bruckner said, "When I hear the tubas in Wagner's music, I am immediately carried away."

"One of the most incredible facts about Bruckner was his lightning-like transformation to a vital composer immediately upon becoming acquainted with the score of 'Tannhäuser.' The only logical explanation seems that the individual note of his giant musical endowment had remained peacefully dormant throughout whole decades of pedantic training in an antiquated tradition, to burst forth in sudden glory at the very first electric touch of a vital production of the surrounding world in which he lived."

As if in rejoinder to Mendelssohn's condescension or direct disparagement of Schumann, Wagner, Berlioz, Debussy wrote that Gounod's relations with Mendelssohn "were more transparent, since he owes to him that method of the developing the melody in sequences which is so convenient when one is not in the mood."

And so forth. Most of the above material is taken from or occasioned by the first of Mr. Hale's odd twenty-four chapters. The curious reader will look through the volume for himself. He will read, in addition to direct disquisitions upon the music scheduled for performance, Mr. Hale's article upon Dostoievsky of the period of "The Gambler," commentary occasioned by reference to Prokofieff's suite so named—commentary, in this instance, more interesting that the music; on Negro minstrel songs; on "Oxford University; Handel, Haydn and degrees."

There are included as "entr'actes" such admirable things as the essays, quoted from The London Sunday Times, of Ernest Newman on "Mendelssohn and Others," and "National and International Interpreters"; William J. Henderson's "Singing and Singers," from The New York Evening Sun, and other excellent writings by Calvocoressi, Neville Cardus, Fox-Strangways, &c. Mr. Hale is not the only brilliant, authoritative, informed writer of notes for orchestral concerts in America, where, on the whole, this work is done much more brilliantly and eclectically than in most places in Europe. But for completeness and interest, indeed fascination, the Boston Symphony program books are incomparable.

Apeda, N. Y.

Leon Barzin, Who Will Conduct the Stadium Concerts, Beginning Thursday Evening and Continuing Through July 26.

Mishkin Studio.

Bernhard Levitow, Guest Conductor With the County Centre Garden Pops Tuesday Evening.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUL 30 1933

Box List Brilliant Feature For Season's Symphony

Washingtonians who have taken boxes and orchestra locations for the tentative series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, at Constitution Hall during the coming Winter, are: Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d; Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. Alexander Rodgers, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. John W. Burke, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr.; Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts, Dr. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Carl Voegtlin, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Justice and Mrs. Alfred A. Wheat, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Melville Church, Mrs. Louis W. Austin, Mrs. Robert Giles, Mrs. William Fitch Kelley, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. J. A. C. Wright, Mrs. Duncan Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warren.

Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. J. Marvin Wright, Mrs. H. Clay Browning, Mrs. Charles R. Shepherd, Mrs. Thomas S. Wiles, Mrs. Edwin B. Barker, Under Secretary of State William Phillips, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. Lee Warren, Mr. Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. James Berrall, Mrs. Armistead Peter, 3d; Mrs. H. C. Morris, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. E. Lester Jones, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mr. George Weckel, Mrs. C. C. Williams, Mrs. Weston P. Chamberlain, Mrs. Leander McCormick-Goodhart, Mrs. J. Davis Brodhead, Mrs. G. C. Lodge, Mrs. A. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Pierre Gaillard, Mrs. Gilbank Twigg, Miss Nannie R. Macomb, Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis, Mrs. Edward Chapman, Mrs. William Holabird, Mrs. Perry Heath, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Mr. E. C. Potter, Mrs. Emory Land, Mrs. Dwight Chester, Mrs. Edward B. Burling, Mrs. B. D. Foulois, Col. H. H. Baily, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mr. S. M. Pilson, Commodore C. H. Harlow, Mrs. Paris Brengle, Mr. C. S. Abell, Miss Harriet C. Winslow, Mrs. Tracy Lay, Miss Helen W. Seymour, Miss Isabel Sedgeley, Miss L. M. Harding, Miss Anna M. Carrere, Mme. Julia E. Roso, Miss I. C. Wells, Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. A. B. Houghton, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Miss Moira Archbold, Mrs. Walter J. Cummings, Mrs. George Morris, Mrs. M. Lewis Clark, Mrs. John L. Proctor and Mrs. Ralph Richards.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

JUL 31 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS ASSURED

So keen is the interest in the series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, ~~which it~~ is proposed to hold at Constitution Hall next winter, that there is every assurance of plans being carried out.

Scores of prominent Washingtonians have already signed up for boxes or groups of seats, among them Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, William Phillips, now Acting Secretary of State; Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts and Mrs. David Aiken Reed.

Other subscribers are: Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. U. S. Grant 3d, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. Alexander Rodgers, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. John W. Burke, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, Mrs. Thomas Holcomb.

The Rev. Dr. and Mrs. F. Ward Denys, Mrs. Carl Voegtlin, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Justice and Mrs. Alfred A. Wheat, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. Melville Church, Mrs. Louis W. Austin, Mrs. Robert Giles, Mrs. William Fitch Kelley, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Henry Leonard,. Mrs. J. A. C. Wright, Mrs. Duncan Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Warren.

John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. William Corcoran Eustis, Mrs. J. Marvin Wright, Mrs. H. Clay Browning, Mrs. Charles R. Shepherd, Mrs. Thomas S. Wiles, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. Lee Warren, Frank B. Noyes, Mrs. Edward G. Walker, Mrs. James Berrall, Mrs. Armistead Peter 3d. Mrs. H. C. Morris, Mrs. Maude L. Whitman, Mrs. E. Lester Jones, Mrs. Hugh Wallace, George Weckel, Mrs. C. C. Williams, Mrs. Weston P. Chamberlain.

Mrs. Leander McCormick-Goodhart, Mrs. J. Davis Brodhead, Mrs. G. C. Lodge, Mrs. A. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Pierre Gaillard, Mrs. Gilbank Twigg, Miss Nannie R. Macomb, Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis, Mrs. Edward Chapman, Mrs. William Holabird, Mrs. Perry Heath, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Chandler Hale, E. C. Potter, Mrs. Emory Land, Mrs. Dwight Chester, Mrs. Edward B. Burling, Mrs. B. D. Foulois, Col. H. H. Baily.

Mrs. Ralph Richards, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. J B. Kendall, S. M. Pilson, Commodore C. H. Harlow, Mrs. Paris Brengle, C. S. Abell, Miss Harriet C. Winslow, Mrs. Tracy Lay, Miss Helen W. Seymour, Miss Isabel Sedgeley, Miss L. M. Harding, Miss Anna M. Carrere, Mme. Julia E. Roso, Miss I. C. Wells, Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. A. B. Houghton, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Miss Moira Archbold, Mrs. Walter J. Cummings, Mrs. George Morris, Mrs. M. Lewis Clark and Mrs. John L. Proctor.

erald-Tribune

AUG 20 1933

THE RECEPTION OF NEW MUSIC

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

ON APRIL 6, 1933, in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first American performance of "Rebus," an "imaginary ballet" by the twenty-year-old Russian composer, Igor Markevich. It was received by the audience with no particular warmth, although there were those who applauded with fervor. A few, if I remember correctly, ventured a little hissing, while a majority offered the polite applause which acknowledges the efforts of the performers without indicating much relish for the work performed.

Opinions of Markevich's music were expressed not only by sound or its absence. One Boston Symphony subscriber of long standing wrote to this department to wonder why music lovers should be subjected to the agony of sitting through a work such as this and to state that, by way of protest he had declined to renew his subscription to Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts next season.

* * *

Some Opinions of 'Rebus'

OUR subscriber was not alone in his dislike of "Rebus." The views of the New York music critics varied to some extent, at least one scribe finding considerable material for praise in the work, while others thought it cleverly wrought and rhythmically effective, if hollow, but the net average of critical opinion found it disappointing, considering the expectations aroused by the lauding of Markevich's music in Paris. Mr. Gilman, in his review for the New York Herald Tribune of April 7, thought that staleness and triteness were the striking characteristics of the work. He noted a virtual absence of musical ideas, apart from a few derived ones, and a dependence upon tricks, clichés and ryhthms which had become old, obvious and outworn in the course of these post-war years.

Having attended this performance, I entertained sentiments very similar to those vividly described by Mr. Gilman. This display of manner without substance, this cool, unemotional cleverness, these rhythmic devices repeated at length with little apparent variety—how often had I heard them! In one section in particular—I forget which—I was reminded of nothing so much as a New Haven express train rhythmically trundling its way between Stamford and South Norwalk—only here we did not have the Connecticut scenery.

Had our correspondent and I had a chance to meet after the concert and compare notes, we would probably have found ourselves holding the same views about the music itself. Both of us might have confessed to resentment against the composer and, perhaps, against the members of the artistic world of Paris who had proclaimed him to be a genius, wondering, inevitably although unjustifiably, whether he and his trans-Atlantic prophets were trying to fool us, or merely fooling themselves. But, unlike our correspondent, those of us who think it advisable to have occasional opportunities to hear representative examples of contemporary music would not extend our resentment to include Mr. Koussevitzky and his excellent orchestra.

* * *

Grounds for Advance Interest

WHILE we might frankly dislike the music, we should be inclined to be grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for giving us a chance to hear it. If neither he, nor any other conductor functioning here had done so, we might have wondered why we were to have no chance to hear some example of the work of a young composer who, according to reports from abroad, was a new luminary in the musical firmament. M. Henri Prunières is one of the most noted of French critics, and his hailing of Markevich as another Mozart or Schubert was cause for no little advance curiosity on the part of those of us who would regard the rise of a new, potent, creative, musical genius as a happy event in the world of music.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave an opportunity to satisfy such curiosity and to form our own opinions about Markevich's music. After the event, we may have felt inclined to consider the musical élite of Paris unduly susceptible to an insufficiently grounded réclame, while the Parisians may have been disposed to regard us as obtuse, unable to discern the true worth of this music, but that is another question, the answer to which may not be known until some years have passed.

* * *

A Question of Tolerance

THE more immediate, if far from novel, question is the degree of tolerance which our audiences can reasonably be asked to extend toward new music of a disaffecting character. If, of course, a conductor devotes a large share of his program to such music, if he clutters program after program up with novelties of little apparent value, he gets only his deserts when his subscribers protest and withdraw their subscriptions. But Mr. Koussevitzky is not that kind of a conductor; toward new music he is receptive, but discriminating. He recognizes that a conductor must seek out and present what he considers to be significant and representative examples of contemporary composition from time to time if the repertoire of his orchestra is not to become narrow and repetitious, and to lead ultimately to boredom and loss of interest on the part of its hearers. After a few seasons of nothing but familiar music, a conductor would probably find many of his hearers observing, "Oh, I don't think I will go to the symphony concert tonight. They are always playing the same things."

It would be absurd to contend that orchestral subscribers should pay liberally for large administrations of music that causes them pain, but the best interests of an orchestra and the ultimate enjoyment by its patrons themselves of its work call for a willingness to listen to, while not necessarily to like, occasional offerings of new works which, at a first hearing, may be unpleasurable.

A music-loving subscriber who protests against such novelties in the manner of our correspondent would probably object warmly to the implication that his attitude is against the best interests of his orchestra, that he desires only familiar masterpieces played over and over again, with the risk this involves of satiating the orchestra's public. He would undoubtedly contend that no one is more opposed than he to a reactionary or standpat attitude in regard to program-making; that no one is more disposed than he to give a warm welcome to new music with a modicum of real value. But this music, he would add, referring to the cause of this particular protest, is beyond the pale; it is not music at all, but an aggregation of distressful, intolerable noise, repellent to every true music lover; to play such music is an insult to the audience. If an orchestra inflicts such stuff upon its hearers, it must have abandoned its formerly high standards and ideals, leaving its music-loving patrons no other course than to withdraw their patronage.

* * *

Changing Views

BUT, as Mr. Gilman observed in his article of June 4 for this section, many works which are now well intrenched in the standard repertoire impressed their hearers, when first introduced, as equally beyond the pale. Subscribers protested with sincerity and warmth against what struck them at the time as the negation of music, but what is now ranked among its most treasurable specimens. I do not believe that "Rebus" will eventually confound its critics and be recognized as a timeless masterpiece, or that more than a small fraction of the novelties offered even by the most discerning of conductors will merit a permanent place in the programs of our orchestras. But when new forms, new harmonies or new artistic conceptions are involved, it may be difficult, at first, to look beyond these possibly repellent innovations and discern the intrinsic value of the work in question; this can be done only by occasional submission to the experience, or the ordeal, of listening to new music. To advocate a willingness to do so is not to ask patrons of music to sacrifice their enjoyment only for the sake of aiding contemporary composers, but to gain a maximum value and reward from their musical experience. At the same time, the subscribers can reasonably ask their conductor to be careful and discerning in his choice of new music, and tactful and tolerant in its presentation.

* * *

The Right to Protest

OF COURSE, a subscriber to a series of orchestral concerts, or to any other brand of musical entertainment, has a right to dislike this or that item in the program; to protest, verbally or in writing, to the management, against its performance, and to withdraw his support. But, if many subscribers should go this far in protest against some number or point of policy which they find objectionable—A, for instance, owing to the performance of a novelty of radical character; B, on account of the iteration of a familiar work which has begun to bore him, and C, a member of the left wing, because of a failure to offer a liberal proportion of modern music—it would soon mean the end of the orchestra.

Meanwhile, a patron of orchestral concerts would have difficulty in finding a series able to afford him absolutely unalloyed pleasure. Supposing that. considering "Rebus" the last straw, he had abandoned the Boston Symphony and tried the Philadelphia Orchestra instead, he would run the risk of hearing several advanced specimens of new music from Mr. Stokowski. He might then turn to the Philharmonic-Symphony and enjoy himself greatly for the time being—until Mr. Toscanini decided that it was time to perform some of the modern Italian works of the kind which have occasioned some protests in the past. He could then, instead of subscribing to any orchestra, buy tickets for single concerts instead, but then he might run the risk of finding a program which he particularly desired to hear sold out.

But I doubt whether most music lovers who, incensed by some particular work, withdraw their patronage from this or that orchestra stay away permanently. The memory of the disaffecting work fades, the initial indignation loses its warmth, and, when the new season opens, many of those who, in the first flush of resentment, meant to forsake the concerts will probably be back in their regular seats. For, on the programs of all our major orchestras, the number of experimental and initially vexatious works is far outnumbered by that of the masterpieces which we know and love.

NEW YORK TIMES

AUG 6 - 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who conducted the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra in London last May, stated in a recent article in The London Radio Times that, judging by the progress in music in England during the last ten years, he felt British music would play a dominant part in the musical world of America in another decade.

He said that while in London "the somewhat timorous and incredulous question was often put to me: Is British music really played and liked in America? Perhaps that lack of faith in their own creative genius lies in the fact that for over a century England produced no epoch-making music. The same attitude of fellow-countrymen was noticeable in Russia toward the music of Mussorgsky, Balakirev and Borodin, which met with such widespread skepticism."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

AUG 1 - 1933

Symphony Series Planned

The series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conductor, which it is proposed to hold at Constitition Hall next winter, is being sponsored by scores of prominent Washingtonians who have already signed up for boxes or groups of seats.

Among them are Mrs. William Howard Taft, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mr. William Phillips, now Acting Secretary of State; Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts and Mrs. David Aiken Reed.

Other subscribers include Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. U. S. Grant, 3d, Mrs. George Hewitt Myers, Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Ridgely Hunt, Mrs. Alexander Rodgers, Miss Mabel Boardman, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Frank C. Baldwin, Mrs. John W. Burke, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. T. H. B. McKnight, and Mrs. Thomas Holcomb.

Others on List

Also Mrs. Leander McCormick-Goodhart, Mrs. J. Davis Brodhead, Mrs. G. C. Lodge, Mrs. A. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Pierre Gaillard, Mrs. Gilbank Twigg, Miss Nannie R. Macomb, Mrs. Franklin H. Ellis, Mrs. Edward Chapman, Mrs. William Holabird, Mrs. Perry Heath, Mrs. James R. Mann, Mrs. Christian Heurich, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Mr. E. C. Porter, Mrs. Emory Land, Mrs. Dwight Chester, Mrs. Edward B. Burling, Mrs. B. D. Foulois, Col. H. H. Baily.

Mrs. Ralph Richards, Admiral and Mrs. W. L. Capps, Mrs. J. B. Kendall, Mr. S. M. Pilson, Commodore C. H. Harlow, Mrs. Paris Brengle, Mr. C. S. Abell, Miss Harriet C. Winslow, Mrs. Tracy Lay, Miss Helen W. Seymour, Miss Isabel Sedgeley, Miss L. M. Harding, Miss Anna M. Carrere, Mme. Julia E. Roso, Miss I. C. Wells, Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. A. B. Houghton, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Miss Moira Archbold, Mrs. Walter J. Cummings, Mrs. George Morris, Mrs. M. Lewis Clark and Mrs. John L. Proctor.

ST. LOUIS
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

AUG 20 1933

A humorous illustration in the Saturday Evening Post recently showed a portly father sitting beside the radio with his violin and the mother is saying to her little boy, "Sh-h-h! Quiet, darling; don't annoy Daddy when he is playing with the Boston Symphony."

This is not as far feteched as you might think. Years ago Walter Damrosch received a letter from a cowboy fiddler in the Far West following a broadcast, which read: "I have achieved a life's ambition; I have at last played with Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

AUG 11 1933

Classic Works Will Survive Despite the Wail of Pessimists

NEWSPAPER cartoons frequently touch vulnerable spots in the none too impregnable armor of musical art. One that we saw a few days ago, slyly poked fun at what is commonly called classical music, yet there are numerous individuals who would see in the drawing a vindication of that old epigram, "Many a true word is spoken in jest."

Some time ago a wrathy soul "broadcast" his views in a none too logical manner in a communication he submitted to a Boston paper. In the communication, questions were raised as to why audiences seem to enjoy classical compositions; if these selections are played merely to allow artists to demonstrate their technique; and why should by far the larger part of an audience be subjected to such uninteresting music for the sake of the 10 per cent that may fully comprehend it? The letter also set forth the idea that the reason for the small attendance at certain recitals was on account of the music offered, suggesting that Americans should give substantial support to native musicians whose works deserve wider recognition.

Attendance at numerous events in the so-called classic category is sufficient to disprove the statement that only about 10 per cent of the audiences really appreciate and enjoy that kind of program. The sale of seats for the regular Boston Symphony seasons became so heavy that a supplementary Monday evening series was added during the past few years. The powers that be report that there is more criticism for Koussevitzky's conservatism than for his ultra-modernism. Even at the Pop concerts, where lengthy works are eschewed—except on a few Sunday evenings—there is always a deeper, more enthusiastic demonstration following a heavy Wagner number than at the close at those calculated to appeal more readily to such an audience. Regarding the small attendance at recitals, we are inclined to believe that that is caused more by the fact that the artists are comparatively unknown than because of the type of program announced. Well known, capable artists will draw large audiences regardless of the music they play or sing. Of course, the wise artist will endeavor to vary his programs so as to reach all his listeners. In the operatic field, recent years has shown a great swing towards the substantial Wagnerian diet. At the Metropolitan last season, the special matinee cycle was given to packed houses, whereas some of the works that the aforesaid letter writer might enthuse over, were partly the cause of the big deficit, when they failed to draw patrons in sufficient numbers.

The individual who knows Bach's, Beethoven's and Wagner's impregnable positions in music and also knows the nature of the bulk of the native product well knows that the surest way to empty a hall and keep it practically empty, is to give too much prominence to music of an inferior quality. Bach and other severely classic writers are heavy and at times perhaps dry, even to many serious music sudents and musicians, so it is not at all surprising to find a spirit of coldness towards them displayed by the general run of concert-goers. The same might be said of the Bible and classic literature, but that does not minimize their greatness and significance. It is all very well and laudable to clamor for American art and demand a hearing for American artists, but in so doing one should not belittle or disregard the giants of other years, whose works should be the guiding stars for all seeking the paths to glory. When the great American symphony or opera comes along it may not at first be recognized or given its just place in the sun, but like all really great things it will eventually be accorded its rightful niche in the hall of fame. Already much good musical material, vocal and instrumental, has been written by American composers as the recent success of Deem's Taylor's operas, "The King's Henchman" and "Peter Ibbetson" and Louis Gruenberg's "The Emperor Jones" have shown. Some of it is gradually finding its way into concert programs, but cheering for everything merely because it is of native origin will not help the cause of American music or the American composer. The classic concert should survive and with such eloquent artists as Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, McCormack and others always drawing capacity audiences, its future seems secure regardless of the wails of those who cannot connect the past with the present.

DEATH OF VETERAN ACTRESS NECESSITATES RETAKES IN PICTURE

While the screen version of Louisa M. Alcott's story, "Little Women," was being made, the veteran and talented actress, Louise Closser Hale, who was playing the part of Aunt March, died suddenly. This necessitated retaking portions of the film and Edna Mae Oliver was given the none too exhiliarating task.

Debussy's "Iber

In "Iberia"—surely one greatest scores—Debussy is on the highways and byways meeting life at first hand, putting his impressions with the recklessn genius and the technical certainty of his past mastery of his medium.

Snatches of song are heard, scraps of melody, coming from here and there, mingling and colliding with each other with the most enchanting effects. A hundred rhythms, and vibrations the most various, are afoot in the orchestra. There is an indescribable sense of the inarticulate gladness of nature; of the poignant beauty of the night; the soughing of the winds and the murmur of a love song; and finally, the noise and blare of a fete day. The orchestra indulges in Rabelaisian laughter. It echoes the shouts of the people, and jibe, songs, marches, the thrumming of guitars—overwhelming life, in which the spirit of an artist immerses itself to give out fresh beauty and joy to the world.

Mr. Monteux was the expert and precise director of all this wonder. The humor of the finale was particularly his. Whether a vaguer outline, a less definite contour, might have obtained in the movement called "Sounds and perfumes of the night," is a question for each hearer to ask himself. Some might say that in this movement a blur of color, a mood, less distinct and definable than that portrayed would have been more native to the composer. The question is one of temperament, opinion, and many practical considerations which confront a conductor. For both conductor and orchestra the concert was a triumph. Mr. Monteux's stay in Boston promises to be brief, but he will remember his welco[illegible] and his audience will gratefully rem[illegible] hi

Tel. WAtkins 9-4586
"SERVES YOU RIGHT"
PUBLIC SERVICE
CLIPPING BUREAU
INC.
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPINGS
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE UTICA, N. Y.
PRESS

(3)

JUN 22 1932

MUSICIANS' FORUM

The stay-at-homes are having an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its "pop" concerts during the month of June, by way of the National Broadcasting Company, which presents the final section of the "pop" direct from Symphony Hall, Boston. This popular concert program, which is a great favorite with Bostonians, may be heard from 9:15 to 10 p. m., D.S.T., over a nationwide WEAF network, on Saturday, June 25 and July 2.

Do you know that Boston is the only city this side of Europe that is privileged to enjoy this kind of "European evening?" Entering, you find Symphony Hall decorated in cool green, the usual orchestra chairs replaced by tables, many of which have been reserved by the club or organization sponsoring the evening's concert. Attractively attired waitresses stand at the sides ready to serve soft drinks, coffee and sandwiches. Imagine yourselves seated with friends about a table listening to Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, as well as those of the modern school. No noise is permitted during the rendition of numbers. The orchestra is liberal in the matter of encores, and the large, enthusiastic, cultured audience watches eagerly for the appearing of the large card announcing the title of the encore.

We quote from the Christian Science Monitor:

"The Pop Concert Orchestra is composed of 85 musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, son of a former conductor and an excellent musician in his own right. A native-born conductor, Mr. Fiedler, in his third season, has been very successful in gauging musical feeling. Whether it be such a trifle as Schubert's 'Traumerei,' Tchaikovsky's 'Fourth Symphony,' Ravel's 'Bolero,' the extremely noisy 'Soviet Iron Foundry,' or music from 'The Cat and the Fiddle,' Mr. Fiedler's concert schedule has been pliable enough to meet all demands.

"Arthur F. Edes, program director and announcer of WEEI, will provide the program notes and announce for the radio audience."

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

26 1932

BOSTON CONDUCTOR PLEASES IN VIENNA

VIENNA, June 25. (Exclusive)—Visitors here for the Haydn bicentenary celebrations and the international festival of contemporary music are giving up their evenings to the enjoyment of the delights afforded them by Sergei Kussevitsky, chief of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is appearing at the head of the philharmonic orchestra for the celebrations.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM BAY CITY, MICH.
TIMES

JUN 30 1932

The Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops"

(Chicago Post)

The radio last week served to demonstrate that the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Pops" are still flourishing in full vigor. Not only concerts delightful in themselves, but recalling to countless numbers scattered over the entire land the joys and days gone by.

For more than forty years these "Pops" have been an essential feature of summer life in Boston. And what national cataclysms have they not survived?

When the U. S. A. went on the water wagon the wise ones shook their mournful heads, saying, "It is all over with the 'Pops.' Cannot run such concerts without beer and pretzels."

Nobody would dispute that beer and pretezls form a joyful addition to the pleasures of summer concerts. But nevertheless Boston continued to make the grade though serving only soft drinks.

Even this present so-called depression has not overwhelmed them in its universal disaster. Over forty years of age—and still going strong despite no beer and no money.

Can be done in effete and tottering East, but seemingly not in the young and lusty West. Now, Watson, what would you make of that?

* * *

Klemperer, Furtwängler, Mengelberg, Monteux, Coates, Kleiber and Beecham, happen to meet by chance on their European guest touring, at the railroad station in Zürich, Switzerland. They are joined unexpectedly by Koussevitzky. After effusive greetings, the conversation runs something like this:

Monteux (to Coates)—"On your way to Moscow?"

Coates—"No, I'm going to do a couple of concerts in Constantinople and Rome. And you?"

Monteux—"Just finished in Berlin and Brussels and hurrying to rehearse in Paris."

Furtwängler—"I appeared there last month. Now I'm off to Helsingfors and Petrograd for a symphonic series."

Klemperer—"I'm engaged for a course in Madrid, to be repeated in Lisbon and Buenos Aires."

Beecham—"And I am going north; concerts in Copenhagen, Stockholm, Spitsbergen; later, Dublin, Bournemouth and London."

Kleiber—"The Amsterdam Concertgebouw is having me for some appearances and then I'm off for Bucharest, Sofia and Zagreb."

Mengelberg—"I've come to Switzerland to direct in Zurich and Geneva, and following that, Vienna, Trieste, Milan and maybe Athens."

Koussevitzky (yawning)—"Well, I'm going to conduct my regular orchestra in Boston, stay there, and like it."

* * *

Jan 4 '32

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM

NY HERALD TRIBUNE
JUL 10 1932

RUSSIAN DRESSING

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

ALL who are interested in Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—and what music lover hereabouts is not interested in that remarkable figure?—will turn with curiosity to the "biographical chronicle" of the Russian maestro by Arthur Lourié, which is now available in an English translation. *In this readable volume one may learn much concerning the eminent director of Boston's Invincibles; for Mr. Lourié traverses the story of Koussevitzky's career from its beginning in the '70s at Vyshny Volochek—"a poor little town in central Russia, now hardly discoverable on the map," where young Serge conducted his first orchestra at the age of fourteen, departing soon after for Moscow with three roubles in his pocket and his entire belongings in a small bundle—to its present climax of "unqualified triumph," with the fortunate virtuoso secure in his position as the admired master of the "finest body of musicians in the world." (Is this phrase of Mr. Lourié's, by the way, quite fair to another conductorial friend of the author, Mr. Leopold Stokowski, who also conducts an orchestra?)

Some may wish, perhaps, that Mr. Lourié had devoted a larger number of his 250 pages to telling us more about the subject of his "biographical chronicle" and less about matters which seem irrelevant. We should prefer to have had Mr. Lourié say more about Mr. Koussevitzky's tastes in music, art, literature, food; about his methods of studying and rehearsing scores (concerning which some very odd stories are afloat); about his habits and convictions; about Koussevitzky the human being—charming, naïve, mysterious. We could have spared, for example, Mr. Lourié's none too contributive remarks on Debussy, Richard Strauss, Schönberg, Stravinsky and other topics which appear to have been dragged in by their tonal heels.

* * *

A Pious Biographer

MR. LOURIE himself is, as one realizes the more strongly after reading his book, an unintegrated and indecisive personality—a composer who has ventured upon many paths, and followed none to its end. He began as a skeptic, a lover of subtle paradox. A man of sensitive culture, he fell in love with the neo-impressionism of western musical Europe and turned sheep's eyes on Debussy. He experimented with quarter tones, wrote music with rather foolish titles in the manner of Erik Satie, went back to Bach. When the Bolshevists came into power, Lourié was made Musical Commissar of the Department of Education. Some years later he went to Paris as a representative of the Soviet government, and seems to have lost his heart to Lutetia, as so many of his compatriots have done. He shook the dust of Russia from his shoes and settled in Paris. Now, they say, the Soviet papers never mention his name; and Mr. Lourié in his book describes with evident satisfaction Mr. Koussevitzky's defiance of the Bolshevist authorities (decidedly, this book will not be indorsed by the Soviet government).

Mr. Lourié is now a bright ornament of the Stravinskyan circle in Paris, a close friend of the great Igor, and his present tendencies are in the direction of what Mr. Nicholas Slonimsky has engagingly called "the new musico-mathematical theology." He has turned from skepticism to belief. The best known of his later works is the "Concerto Spirituale," for double chorus, barytone solo, piano, brass and double basses, which the Schola Cantorum produced here in 1930. Mr. Stokowski conducted in 1931 his "Sinfonia Dialectica," and Mr. Koussevitzky in the same year performed his "Sonata Liturgique en Forme de Quatre Chorales."

Lourié has recently discovered that God is a musical ultra-modernist, and he has elaborated in print a theory of melody as a theological virtue ("our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for good in the religious sense. Melody is organically connected with the three theological virtues").

* * *

Passion and Domesticity

SO MUCH for Mr. Koussevitzky's biographer. What does he tell us concerning Mr. Koussevitzky? Not much that is important or illuminating. It is exciting, of course, to learn that "Koussevitzky's relations with music have never been of the legitimate, normally established, professional type; all his life he has been her infatuated and clandestine lover. He is enamoured of his music with an ardour that nothing has ever quenched, and to this day the strength and vitality of his passion remain unimpaired. The vehemence, folly and audacity of youth may have been replaced by wisdom and experience, but the flame of love burns as strongly as at any time, and will, I think, continue to do so as long as life endures."

But the Boston dowagers of the Friday matinee subscription series need not be disturbed, for in the next paragraph Mr. Lourié is careful to note his subject's allegiance to the tonal hearth and home:

"Koussevitzky, the eternally youthful and insatiable lover of music, has become her lawful spouse, and in this is the key to the comprehension of himself and his activities."

* * *

We learn, a while later, that "an exceptionally emotional pathos underlies Koussevitzky's orchestral conducting. To him it is everything. The professional and technical side of the business of extracting the emotional pathos from the work he is playing and, in direct contact with the listener, communicating it to him. The quality, power and convincingness of the performance depend solely on the emotional element which he obtains from the music and imparts to the audience. The less emotional fire there is in the music, the greater will be the resistance of the latter to his conducting; and, conversely, the more a musical composition is saturated with feeling, the more easily will it submit itself to him, and here he will prove to be in his own sphere."

The impolite may wonder what certain of Mr. Koussevitzky's hard-boiled friends and protégés will think of this alleged absorption of their interpreter in the business of extracting "emotional pathos" from the stony heart of musical modernism.

* * *

Defying the Bolshevists

BUT let us turn from Koussevitzky the "clandestine lover" of Euterpe, Koussevitzky the extractor of "emotional pathos," to Koussevitzky the man, at least so far as we can discover him through the rose-tinted veils with which Mr. Lourié has enveloped his hero. Let us, for instance, observe Mr. Koussevitzky in the act of defying and sassing the Soviet government—a stirring spectacle.

* * *

"From the very first," says Mr. Lourié, "Koussevitzky was irreconcilably opposed to the Soviet government. As evidence of this I reproduce the text of a letter published by him in the press in the early days of the Soviet régime. In it he sets forth as follows the motives which induced him to continue his labors under new rulers:

> Letter to the Editor
>
> I ask you to find space in your esteemed newspaper for the following statement:
>
> In circles closely connected with the State Orchestra and interested in its existence certain persons have spread the report that I, who am in command of the orchestra, am in full accord with the government of the the "People's Commissars." Furthermore, the fact that in the present circumstances I continue to give concerts is held by these persons to be a proof of my readiness to come to terms with the "existing state of things"—that is, to recognize it as lawful and normal.
>
> All this is entirely false. As I definitely stated in the course of the first few days after the recent revolution, there can be no question of any "accord" between myself and the new government; like all sensible citizens, I shall submit only to the government that shall be appointed by a constituent assembly. Until then I shall remain in charge of the State Orchestra on the distinct understanding that no new "powers that be" shall interfere in any way with its affairs.
>
> In regard to the concerts, I shall continue to give them, not, of course, to show my approval of the harshest, most despotic and violent régime that has ever reigned over us, but for the sake of those chosen, sensitive representatives of our suffering society, to whom music is equivalent to daily bread and who seek in it a respite—though it be only brief—from the hideous element of baseness and brutality which has us in its grasp.
>
> SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

* * *

"This letter expressed Koussevitzky's negative attitude toward the Bolsheviks so frankly that one can only be surprised that he was not arrested at the time. That his protest was allowed to go unpunished may be explained, on the one hand, by his great popularity as an artist and, on the other, by the fact that the Bolshevik rule was then very 'young' and had not yet interfered with the liberty of the press; the bourgeois organs, therefore, still continued their brief existence.

"In spite of his protest and rebellion Koussevitzky did not throw in his lot with those who adopted the methods of sabotage against the government. For the reasons stated in his letter he remained at his post as director of the State Orchestra and did not abandon it until he went abroad" [in 1920].

* * *

Fact and Fiction

THIS "biographical chronicle," upon the accuracy of which one should be able to rely, is occasionally slipshod and unveracious. Discussing Mr. Koussevitzky's repertory as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924, we read that "He introduced Brahms to Boston." Bless your heart, Mr. Lourié, music by Brahms appeared on the Boston Orchestra's programs when little Serge was playing the Russian equivalent of marbles as a boy of seven in Vyshny Volochek. Brahms's C minor Symphony was performed by the Bostonians in their first season (December 9, 1881); the D major Symphony was introduced to the subscribers later in the same season (February 24, 1882); the Symphony in F followed two years later (November 7, 1884); and the E minor was heard in the fifth season (January 22, 1886).

Nor is it true that Mr. Koussevitzky "raised the orchestra to a position higher than it had previously attained at any time." The prestige and the technical accomplishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the two years before the war have not yet been excelled, or even equaled, by the present-day organization, brilliant and prosperous though Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra indisputably is.

Mr. Koussevitzky's achievements since he came to America have been noteworthy in various ways. His influence has been a liberal and vitalizing one. He has extended our musical horizons, has quickened our sympathies. But Mr. Lourié should be gently reminded that Boston was an important and experienced capital of music a good many years before Mr. Koussevitzky was born; and there have been greater conductors of her orchestra than the inimitable Serge.

---

*"Serge Koussevitzky and His Epoch—A Biographical Chronicle," by Arthur Lourie. Translated from the Russian by S. W. Pring. Alfred A. Knopf, New York.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

JUL 17 1932

DEATH OF PAUR ENDS CAREER AS NOTED MUSICIAN

Director Led Old Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra for Six Years; Long Illness.

MISTEK, Czechoslovakia, July 15.—(AP.)—The death here recently of Emil Paur, former symphony orchestra conductor in New York, Pittsburgh and other American cities, at 76, after a long illness, ended a distinguished career.

Mr. Paur, who studied music in Vienna, succeeded the late Arthur Nikisch as conductor of the Bostion Symphony Orchestra. While in New York he scored his greatest success in pre-war days. After leaving Pittsburgh, where he conducted the old Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, he lived quietly in this country town.

Emil Paur, who was a violinist and pianist before he became a conductor at Kassel in 1876, was born in Czernowitz, Austria. He showed talent as a boy under the teaching of his father. In 1898 he succeeded Anton Seidl as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. He conducted the Pittsburgh orchestra from 1904 until its dissolution in 1910. He was a conductor for the New York Metropolitan Opera Company during the season of 1899-1900.

When Karl Muck joined the Boston Symphony in 1912, Paur succeeded him at the Royal Opera in Berlin. There he met with the displeasure of the German emperor, who forced his resignation in January, 1913. A few hours before the final production of "The Flying Dutchman," the emperor, as head of the Royal Opera, asked that another conductor be substituted. The emperor had previously objected to Paur's treatment of "Carmen."

In 1881, Paur married Marie Burger, a pianist. They had several children.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

'L 18 1932

OFF THE ANTENNA

Elaborate technical arrangements for the recent broadcasts of Boston Symphony Pop concerts were fully justified by the artistic effects obtained, NBC officials have declared, after reading the critical opinions of many preeminent leaders of musical thought in New England.

At the conclusion of the five-program series by the Boston Pops orchestra officials canvassed the musical community for frank and constructive comments. Criticism was invited on the fidelity of reproduction, tone values and general artistic effect of the broadcast version as compared to a concert performance of the same work.

An almost unanimous consensus pointed to a degree of excellence in the Boston Pop broadcasts hitherto unapproached in the remote pickup of any large musical group, with the possible exception of the NBC broadcasts of Metropolitan opera.

Among the many musicians and teachers who commented on the NBC Pops series were Walter R. Spalding, professor emeritus and former head of the music department of Harvard university; Prof John P. Marshall, dean of the College of Music at Boston university, and Charles Martin Loeffler, distinguished American composer.

Prof Spalding declared, "The reproduction was excellent in every way, with no impairment whatever of the artistic effect of the orchestra. I believe that many people are thus persuaded to become regular listeners to the series of winter concerts."

"It was a first-class broadcast in every respect," Prof Marshall said. "Speaking as one who was closely in touch with the Boston Symphony broadcasts a few years ago . . . I was struck first of all by the great improvement, as regards fidelity of reproduction. The peculiar, and I believe superior, tone of the Boston Symphony strings was easily identified, and the ensemble of the performance very closely approached the ensemble heard in Symphony hall."

Mr Loeffler directed his criticism at kettledrum effects which, he asserted, sometimes destroy the appeal of a symphonic broadcast. "Radio music," he averred, "is apt to suffer from static and we cannot escape nor prevent it, as yet! But equally inimical to broadcasting are the kettledrums of an orchestra. These instruments are beastly survivors that spoil a great deal of the 19th century music."

In the absence of Philip Hale of the Boston Herald, in Europe, Elinor Hughes commended the Pop broadcasts in the following terms: "I can give only the most favorable report. It was possible to obtain an excellent reproduction of the selections, which would seem to bear witness to the skilful placing of microphones. . . . Considering that the broadcasts were made from a hall filled with people, who are by no means invariably silent, considering the size of the orchestra and the difficulty of catching the tonal qualities of the instruments involved, I should say without hesitation that these broadcasts were successful. I can also testify to the large amount of pleasure that they have given to all those who have heard them."

MISSING
PAGE(S)

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Herald-Tribune

JUL 3 1 1932

THE GREAT ARTIST AND HIS PROGRAM

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

THE subject of concert-givers' programs is in need of repeated ventilation—of renewed examination, a fresh approach, a freed mind, and candid speech. It is not only the young and unknown pianists, singers, fiddlers who are in need of advice and admonition. The elderly and famous ones are, indeed, among the worst offenders. Most of the great interpretative artists who appear in our concert halls should be compelled, every once in so often, to give heed to a lesson on the subject of their duty to the art of music.

No truer words on this general subject have been spoken than those uttered some years ago by Mr. Koussevitzky—himself a model of what a responsible program-maker should be. Music, observed Mr. Koussevitzky, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. It is an expression of its period. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. "It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done." The music of the past is basic, as he pointed out. We must keep it alive and warm in our consciousness, vivid to our imaginations. But we have also an imperative duty toward the present.

* * *

Unadventurous Virtuosi

ONE wishes that Mr. Koussevitzky's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would one like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, singers, fiddlers. The young and unknown concert-givers would probably be inclined to take those words to heart. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make its desired contribution to their bank accounts.

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NEW YORK

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

AUG 14 1932

Boston's "Pops" Concerts

In spite of hard times, Boston has had a most outstanding success with its annual series of "Pops." These concerts, a traditional series of long-standing favor, are given by a personnel of 85 players from the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall. The floor of the theater is cleared of opera seats and in their place is put tables and chairs. Patrons are served with soft drinks and have the privilege of smoking.

It is interesting to note, by the way, that the word "Pops" is not the same as the "pop" abbreviation used for popular concerts given by symphony orchestras in many other cities. The Boston "Pops" is both singular and plural in number and is said to be a word coming from the days when champagne bottles were opened during the concerts. The sound of the popping cork is used to describe the concerts rather than an abbreviation for the popular quality of music played on the programs.

The conductor of the "Pops" this season was Arthur Fiedler, also a product of the symphony. When the programs offer symphonic music it is in the form of one movement from one of the symphonies, but otherwise the selections are lighter. Encores are given generously. Sometimes a whole program is devoted to requests. At other times, novelties are introduced, such as the evening called "The Gay Nineties" this year which was so well received that it was repeated. The orchestra and performers all dressed in old costumes and even a well known violinist who had played with the orchestra many years ago was drafted out of retirement to complete the character of the evening.

The orchestra, even though composed of fine musicians and directed by a most talented conductor, is not above playing the current "hits" on the "Pops" programs. Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President" was one of the numbers called for again and again.

Boston's "Pops" have an old world flavor about them. The institution is somewhat reminiscent of the German beer garden and the Italian concerts in the squares. They are said to be very popular with the young people of the city.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
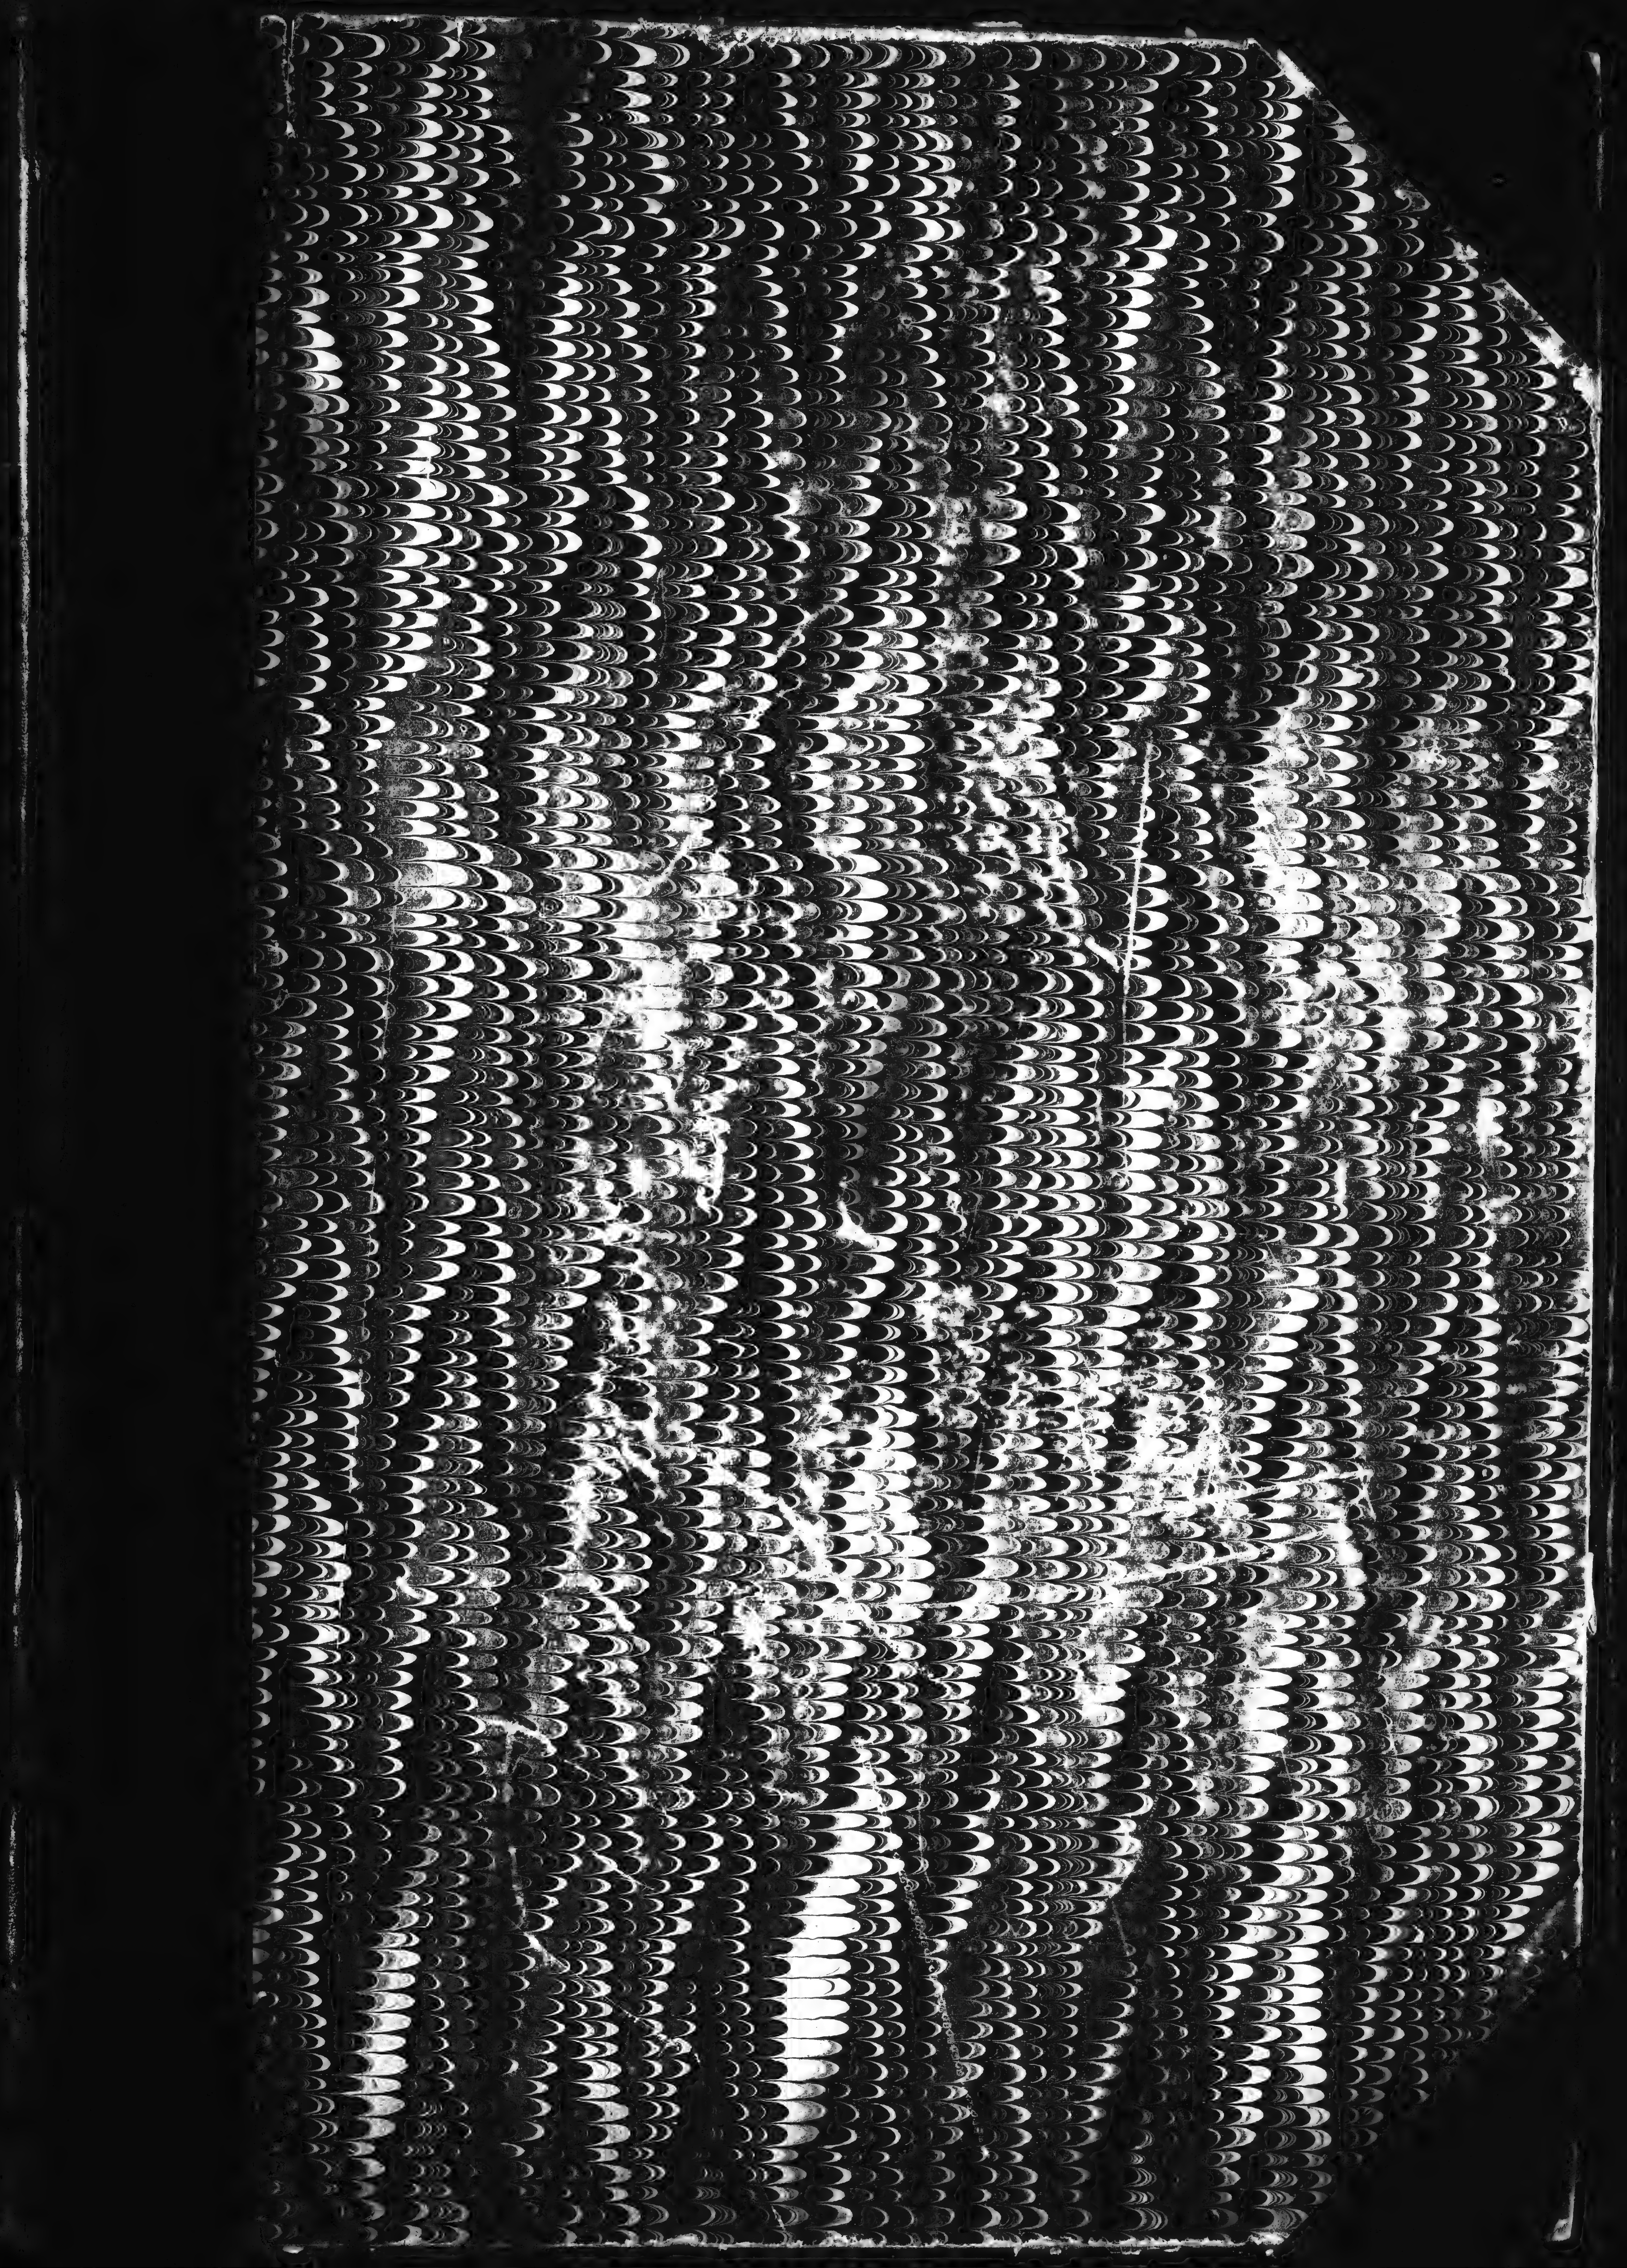
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 56

BSO

1933 - 1934



HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
3 MILK STREET
OLD SOUTH BUILDING BOSTON
Job No. 911
Duplicate this book by sending the above number

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VARIETY

SEP 1 2 1933

Boston Symphony Rights

Broadcast rights to the Boston Symphony concerts have been tagged by NBC for the forthcoming season. Contract stipulates the picking up of a minimum of 14 concerts.

CBS this season will continue to broadcast the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra, with the rights there on an agreement that has three years to go.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Orchestra to Appear in Washington

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP).—For the first time in more than 10 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago.

The western tour also will include Buffalo.

New York Herald-Tribune

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony Plans Tour

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP).—For the first time in more than ten years the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The schedule was extended today to include a visit to A Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Mich.; Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. The season in Boston opens October 6.

NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 1 4 1933

ORCHESTRA TOUR WIDENED

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard in Baltimore, Washington.

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP).—For the first time in more than ten years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season.

The schedule was extended today to include a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago. The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

M. Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

SEP 1 4 1933

OSTON SYMPHONY TO RESUME TOURS

OSTON, Sept. 13. (AP)—For the time in more than 10 years, the ton Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, give a series of concerts in Washon and Baltimore during the comseason. The season schedule was ably extended by the trustees of orchestra who met today and inded a visit to the Century of rogress Exposition at Chicago. It ill be the only symphony orchestra o visit that city during the exposion.

Besides Chicago, the western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city included New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

The orchestra's director, Koussevitsky, will arrive in New York from Europe, September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SEP 1 4 1933

WASHINGTON TO HEAR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, Sept. 13—(AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburg and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitsky will arrive in New York from Europe, the 20th. The season in Boston opens October 6.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony Will Give Washington Concerts

BOSTON, Sept. 13—(AP) For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition. Other appearances outside this city will include Northampton.

---

14 LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER CITIZEN

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony to Play Series in Washington

BOSTON, Sept. 13, (AP).—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts during the coming season in Washington and Baltimore. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra who met today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

Besides Chicago, the western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

The orchestra's director, Koussevitsky, will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston will open Oct. 6.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP 1 4 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS CONCERT TOUR

Will Appear in Washington and Visit Other Cities —To Go to Fair

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP)—For the first time in more than ten years, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra who met today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

Besides Chicago, the western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

The orchestra's director, Koussevitsky, will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 1 4 1933

ORCHESTRA INCLUDES CITY IN SCHEDULE

Special Dispatch to The Gazette

BOSTON, Sept. 14. — The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky will include Worcester in this season's concert schedule. The Worcester program will be presented during the Winter, definite arrangements to be announced after the arrival of Mr. Koussevitzky from Europe. The director will arrive in New York Sept. 20.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

SEP 1 4 1933

Symphony Orchestra to Play at Auditorium

Breaking a precedent of more than 10 years standing in leaving the Hub, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be heard in the Municipal Memorial Auditorium here at a date yet to be announced. Definite assurance that the orchestra will be booked here in the coming season, probably before the beginning of the year, is seen in musical circles of Boston.

It was not possible today to ascertain the sponsorship locally.

A new era in the famed musical history of this city which is said to be unequalled by any other city of its size in the world, is seen with the opening of the memorial auditorium.

Among the projects being talked about in local circles and which are rife in New York especially is that a fine arts course, featuring the greatest artists of the concert stage, John McCormack and others, is being arranged early in the coming year.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 1 4 1933

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY AT WASHINGTON

Also Engaged for Baltimore for First Time in More Than a Decade

Boston, Sept. 13.—(AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

SEP 1 4 1933

HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY AT WASHINGTON

Also Engaged for Baltimore for First Time in More Than a Decade

Boston, Sept. 13.—(AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

Sept 14
Globe

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO VISIT CHICAGO

A concert in Chicago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been decided upon by the trustees, according to announcement from Symphony Hall. This will be the only orchestra, it is said, to visit Chicago during the Exposition. The concert announced for Oct 23 will be part of an extended schedule which will mark the orchestra's 53d season. The Western tour will also include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburg and Schenectady.

For the first time in a dozen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series in Washington and in Baltimore.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 1 4 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TOUR INCLUDES CHICAGO FAIR

Boston, Sept. 14.—(AP)—For the first time in more than ten years, the Boston symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was extended by the trustees of the orchestra. It includes a visit to the Century of Progress exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 1 4 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO MAKE VISIT TO NATION'S CAPITAL

Boston, Sept. 14.—(AP)—For the first time in more than ten years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour will also include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schnectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a series of three concerts in Constitution Hall this season with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The noted director will return from Europe this month to open his tenth year as conductor of one of the country's oldest orchestras on October 6.

The orchestra's concerts here will be November 15, January 30, and April 4.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

SEP 1 4 1933

CAPITAL ON ITINERARY OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concerts to Be Given Here and in Baltimore During Coming Season of Travel.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, September 14.—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The schedule was extended yesterday to include a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago.

The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

Koussevitzky will arrived in New York from Europe September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

The usual visits to New York and other cities, together with the 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Boston, and the shorter series of six each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons in Symphony Hall, will bring the season's schedule to 110 concerts.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

SEP 1 4 1933

Symphonies To Give 15 Concerts In City

Baltimore is to have fifteen symphony concerts during the coming season. It was announced yesterday that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three concerts here, instead of the usual one. Three will be given by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, three by the National Symphony Orchestra, of Washington, D. C., and six by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

Attendance at the Boston organization's concerts has grown in recent years and there has been a steadily increasing demand for more than one performance a season. The orchestra will appear under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, now celebrating his tenth year as conductor. It will stop in Baltimore during an itinerary which includes the Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago.

All the symphony concerts will be held at the Lyric Theater, those of the Boston group on November 14, January 31 and April 3.

The Washington orchestra has been heard here only once, when it made its debut last season under the guidance of Dr. Hans Kindler. Dr, Kindler will conduct all three of the scheduled concerts.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

SEP 1 4 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE 3 CONCERTS

Includes Baltimore in Program For Season

Three concerts will be given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the coming musical season, according to the decision of the truestees anounced today by W. H. Brennan, manager.

The concerts will be given at the Lyric Theater on Nov. 14, Jan. 30 and April 3.

This will be the tenth season of the orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky as conductor. He arrives in New York next week and the orchestra opens its season on Oct. 6 with a concert in Boston.

Chicago is included in the orchestra's autumn itinerary. It will be the only visiting orchestra to play at the Century of Progress Fair, it is said, the concert being scheduled for Oct. 23.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony Coming.

Telegraphic information reaches this desk from W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that the board of trustees of that celebrated organization have determined upon a series of three concerts in Washington this season, under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, serving his tenth year as director of the orchestra.

Up to the present, plans for one or more appearances of the Boston Symphony here this season have been purely tentative, pendnig determination of the attitude of Washington music lovers in the matter. Seat and box reservations already made at the office of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey for the Boston Symphony season now are in sufficient volume to convince the orchestra management that three concerts in the Capital are amply justified.

The Washington concerts will be given in Constitution Hall at 4:40 p. m. on November 15, January 30 and April 4.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony to Visit City for Fair Appearance

Boston, Mass., Sept. 13.—(AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The schedule was extended today to include a visit to A Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

2

HARTFORD, CONN
COURANT

SEP 14 1933

Boston Symphony To Visit Washington

Boston, Sept. 13.—(AP.)—For the first time in more than 10 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitsky will arrive in New York from Europe, September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 14 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT FAIR

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP) — For the first time in more than 10 years the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitsky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 15 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY APPEAR HERE

Negotiations to bring the Boston Symphony orchestra to Worcester this season are under way, it was learned yesterday. The orchestra tentatively had been scheduled to appear at the new Municipal Memorial auditorium Dec. 12, but because of a conflicting convention of the Massachusetts Grange, this date has been canceled. It is expected that another date will be agreed upon shortly.

ARDMORE, PA.
DAILY TIMES

SEP 15 1933

The broadcasting rights to the Boston Symphony concerts have been purchased by NBC and during the coming season they will present four concerts. CBS will shortly resume the Sunday afternoon concerts by the New York Philharmonic and they expect to close the Philadelphia Orchestra-Philco contract shortly. This will include about eight evening concerts under the direction of Leopold Stokowski.

New Bedford, Mass.
MERCURY

SEP 15 1933

Boston Symphony to Play at Washington

BOSTON, Sept. 14 (AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitsky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

SEP 15 1933

MUSIC SEASON IS GETTING UNDER WAY

Announcement is made by trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that that organization will give three concerts in Washington this season. This is Serge Koussevitzky's tenth year as conductor. The orchestra will also give a performance at the Chicago exposition on October 23.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

SEP 15 1933

Boston Symphony Extends Coming Season Itinerary

Washington and Baltimore are to be included in the route of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year. Conductor Serge Koussevitsky also will make a visit with this organization to the Chicago Fair. The Western trip will include Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Dayton, Ann Arbor and Schenectady.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 16 1933

* * *

A TRIUMPHAL road tour has been arranged for the Boston Symphony orchestra next month, opening in Buffalo on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22, at 4 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall. The orchestra will come here in its full strength of 110 men, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who this season enters upon his tenth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Buffalo owes a debt of gratitude to the great Russian conductor, who, in order to make possible a concert here, graciously consented to have an extra concert added to his season's heavy schedule. The orchestra will come by special train, en route to Chicago, where it will play in the closing days of the exposition.

Dr. Koussevitzky arrives in America next Wednesday, after a summer in Europe, in the course of which he found some important music, which will be added to the Boston orchestra's vast reportory.

The Buffalo concert will be under the local management of Marian de Forest.

* * *

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

SEP 16 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS ACTIVE SCHEDULE

An extended schedule is announced for the 53rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 6.

The orchestra will perform in Chicago on Oct. 23. The western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

For the first time in a dozen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series in Washington and in Baltimore.

Series in New York, Brooklyn and Providence, and single appearances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton, will with the Boston and Cambridge concerts, bring the total schedule to 110.

The season will mark Serge Koussevitsky's 10th year in America as the orchestra's conductor. He is returning from Europe on the Ile de France, arriving in New York on Sept. 20.

The Providence series of four concerts will open in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

EP 17 1933

The fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting Symphony Hall, Boston, October 6, includes trips to Chicago (A Century of Progress), Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Mich., Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Schnectady, Washington and Baltimore . . . Series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and single performances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton are scheduled.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

SEP 16 1933

Boston Symphony Series Is Assured

It appears practically certain, since an announcement yesterday, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play three concerts in Washington during the coming season. For some months, the series has been tentative.

Now the Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey Concert Bureau says that there is sufficient interest, that 35 boxes have been subscribed, that the orchestra is willing, even anxious, and that the dates will be Nov. 15, Jan. 30 and April 4. All the concerts are to be played at 4:40 p. m. in Constitution Hall.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

FALL RIVER, MASS
HERALD-NEWS

SEP 14 1933

Boston Symphony To Play in Washington

BOSTON, Sept. 14 (AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was extended by the trustees of the orchestra yesterday and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

The Western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city will include New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

Koussevitzky will arrive in New York from Europe, Sept. 20. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 17 1933

IT it good news that Buffalo will hear at least, one great orchestra this season. Under the management of Marian de Forest, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall at 4 p. m., Sunday, Oct. 22. It will be en route to the Chicago Fair, which makes the Buffalo concert possible.

With a gap of only a few seasons, the tradition of an annual Buffalo visit by this orchestra has spanned 44 years. The earliest record in this writer's possession is a Buffalo program dated 1889, when Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony. This was the orchestra's third road tour. Then came several years under the baton of Nikisch. Other conductors who led their forces in Buffalo were Paur, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux and Koussevitzky, the last named being in charge since 1924. In its early touring days, the orchestra brought with it distinguished soloists like Eugen d'Albert, the Henschels, C. M. Loeffler and others. This custom was abandoned long ago.

Koussevitzky returns next Wednesday from Europe, where he made several appearances as guest conductor of the British Broadcasting orchestra at the London Music festival, and later had a rest period in the Austrian Alps.

NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 17 1933

The fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 6, will have an extended schedule. The orchestra will play in Chicago on Oct. 23, and the Western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. The orchestra will also give a series in Baltimore and Washington. There will be the usual concerts in New York, Brooklyn and Providence, and single appearances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton. With the Boston and Cambridge programs, there will be a total of 110 concerts. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct his tenth season here, will reach New York on Wednesday.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 17 1933

A notably extended schedule is announced for the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 6.

The orchestra will perform in Chicago on October 23, being the only orchestra to visit that city during the Exposition. The Western tour will include, besides Chicago, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

For the first time in a dozen years the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series in Washington and in Baltimore.

Series in New York, Brooklyn, and Providence, and appearances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton, will with the Boston and Cambridge concerts, bring the total schedule to 110.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

SEP 17 1933

KOUSSEVITSKY TOUR EXTENDED

BOSTON, Sept. 16.—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The schedule was extended to include a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago.

The western tour also will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

Koussevitsky will arrive in New York from Europe, September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

P 17 1933

Boston Symphony

After an interchange of letters and cables between Marian de Forest and the conductor and manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the visit to Buffalo by the great orchestra has been arranged. The concert will be given on Sunday afternoon, October 22d, at 4 o'clock in Elmwood Music Hall. The entire orchestra of 110 musicians will stop here en route to Chicago where they are to play in the last days of the exposition.

Dr. Koussevitzky is now returning from Europe on the Ile de France, and will arrive in New York next Wednesday, September 20th. The conductor's summer in Europe included a series of appearances as guest conductor of the British Broadcasting Company orchestra's London Music Festival. Each of these concerts proved a sensational success. Dr. Koussevitzky has otherwise divided his time between a search for new music of importance and a period of rest in the Austrian Alps. The 53d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Dr. Koussevitzky will open on October 6th in Boston will be especially notable in that it will mark the tenth year of the great Russian conductor as leader of the Boston orchestra.

* * *

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS

SEP 14 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO RESUME TOURS

BOSTON, Sept. 13. (AP)—For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The season schedule was notably extended by the trustees of the orchestra who met today and included a visit to the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. It will be the only symphony orchestra to visit that city during the exposition.

Besides Chicago, the western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. Other appearances outside this city included New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton.

The orchestra's director, Koussevitsky, will arrive in New York from Europe, September 20. The season in Boston opens October 6.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

SEP 17 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, for ten years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct three concerts here.

Boston Symphony Announces Three Capital Concerts

The first definite announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give a series of three matinee concerts in Washington at Constitution Hall during the coming 1933-34 music season was made only last Thursday. Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, Washington representative of the Boston Symphony, will locally sponsor the three appearances of the orchestra, on Wednesday, November 15, 1933; Tuesday, January 30, and Wednesday, April 4, 1934, all at 4:40 o'clock.

Early last May tentative plans for a local Boston Symphony series were announced by Mrs. Dorsey, with prices provisionally set at $3, $4, $5, $7 and $9, with boxes at $50 (no tax). The Boston Symphony management, it was stated, was desirous of coming to Washington this season, if possible, but it was made clear that the orchestra's plans in this respect would wholly depend upon the degree of enthusiasm manifested by Washington music lovers, as reflected in the season subscription sale.

Up to the present time, the orchestra's management has held all Washington arrangements to be merely tentative, but in making definite announcement of the prospective series, Mrs. Dorsey indicated that the desire of local concertgoers for a Boston Symphony series has been manifested in unmistakable fashion, with no less than 35 out of a total of 52 available boxes being already reserved for the season.

Mrs. Dorsey's announcement of a Boston Symphony series definitely brings to a total of 14 the number of concerts to be presented under her auspices locally during her first season as an impresario. In addition to the Boston Symphony series, she is sponsoring a Tuesday afternoon series of five concerts, including such artists as Lily Pons, Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Schipa, Lotte Lehmann and Heinrich Schlusnus, the last two in joint recital. Mrs. Dorsey is also presenting at Constitution Hall a Sunday afternoon series, with artists like Tibbett, Iturbi, Heifetz, Cossacks, the Vienna Saengerknaben and Mme. Jeritza on the roster.

The personnel of 110 musicians, Dr. Koussevitzky and managerial staff, will travel to Washington by special train.

3

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

SEP 17 1933

Symphony in Season Here

The first definite announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give a series of three matinee concerts in Washington at Constitution Hall during the coming 1933-34 music season was made yesterday by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, Washington representative of the Boston Symphony, who will locally sponsor the three appearances of the orchestra, on Wednesday, November 15, 1933; Tuesday, January 30, and Wednesday. April 4, 1934 all at 4:40 o'clock.

Early last May, tentative plans for a local Boston Symphony series were announced by Mrs. Dorsey, with prices provisionally set at $3, $4, $5, $7 and $9, with boxes at $50 (no tax). The Boston Symphony management, it was stated, was desirous of coming to Washington this season, if possible, but it was made clear that the orchestra's plans in this respect would wholly depend upon the degree of enthusiasm manifested by Washington music-lovers, as reflected in the season subscription sale.

Up to the present time the orchestra's management has held all arrangements to be merely tentative, but in making definite announcement of the prospective series, Mrs. Dorsey indicated that the desire of local concertgoers for a Boston Symphony series has been manifested in unmistakable fashion, with no less than 35 out of a total of 52 available boxes being already reserved for the season.

All Washington concerts in the Boston Symphony 1933-34 series will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky personally, it is said. Dr. Koussevitzky is at present on the ocean, being due to arrive at New York on Wednesday, from whence he will go at once to Boston to make plans for the opening of the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 8.

Mrs. Dorsey's announcement of a Boston Symphony series definitely brings to a total of 14 the number of concerts to be presented under her auspices locally during her first season as an impresario. In addition to the Boston Symphony series, she is sponsoring a Tuesday afternoon series of five concerts, including such artists as Lily Pons, Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Schipa, Lotto, Lehmann and Heinrich Schlusnus, the last two in joint recital.

HITLER HELPS FRENCH MUSIC

KoussevitzKy Finds German Musicians in Paris

9-19

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 (AP)—Adolf Hitler may be responsible for a musical renaissance in France, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suggested today on his return from Europe.

"Paris is full of the finest musicians of Germany," the Russian said. "I saw innumerable friends from Germany, and all of them were wondering what to do. I suggested that they scatter through the provincial cities of France.

"You see," Koussevitzky said, "Paris is France, politically and musically and in every other way. There is some music in the other cities, of course: Marseilles, Bordeaux, Nice, Lyons and so on. But there is not much first rate music and that is where many of these fine men from Germany can help.

" 'Try the provinces,' I suggested. It will be good for the musicians themselves. Pioneering is, usually, and certainly it will be good for the cities."

With Dr. Koussevitzky were his wife, Mlle. Tatiana Cuchkoff, her sister, and several cases of music, including eight or 10 of new pieces for the winter season in Boston.

BRILLIANT SYMPHONY SEASON PREDICTED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

By ROGER BATCHELDER

Globe Sept 19

NEW YORK, Sept 19—A "brilliant" season may be expected of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, director Serge Koussevitzky confidently predicted on his return here today aboard the Ile De France from his annual trip abroad, the greater part of which he spent this Summer at Aix Les Banes, France, in the preparation of 24 complete programs for the orchestra's Boston appearances and 10 for its New York engagements.

In accordance with his annual custom, Mr Koussevitzky spent considerable time reading scores by numerous unknown composers and said he had brought back with him "about 12 or 14 new compositions" which he will include in the Symphony's programs during the coming season. The director declined to reveal the names of the composers or their works, however, only admitting that he would introduce to America the "Third Symphony" by William Bax, young English composer.

Praises English Music

The "Jupiter" Mozart symphony in C. "Themes and variations from Unknown Composers" and Erahms first symphony will comprise the first Boston program Oct 6, the director said.

Asked whether he had composed anything of his own, Mr Koussevitzky remarked, "I have sketched many things during the Summer, but nothing is ready yet. We will play some of my compositions this season, but I did not complete any scores while abroad."

The conductor said he had not visited Germany this year "because of Hitler." He expressed strong admiration for the "general musical renaissance in England," which he said he observed while he was in London as guest conductor for three concerts of the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra, during the May festival.

Remarking that the many music festivals throughout Europe this year, mostly devoted to Wagnerian compositions, had not been "especially interesting", the director declared, "I must say that England has shown the greatest musical development. Music in England stopped short about 200 years ago, but it is the first country since the war showing a great renaissance of music in great form. In London alone there are three orchestras. Two, the B. B. C. and the philharmonic, are very good."

While at Aix Le Bains, "I read hundreds and hundreds of scores, but not many of them were interesting", said Mr Koussevitzky. He added that he is still interested in obtaining recognition for young unknown composers and said that "a good half" of the novelties he will introduce this season are by young Americans, although one especially fine number is by an old French composer, whose work has never been played in America.

No Changes in Personnel

"Young American and English composers are becoming more competent," said Mr Koussevitzky, who voiced special praise for the young Englishmen Arnold Bax and William Walton.

No changes in the orchestra are contemplated, said the conductor, adding that the N. R. A. "cannot affect musicians since they do not work more than five hours a day. But in three hours we work harder than most do in 20."

The director is looking forward with pleasure, he said, to the week's western trip to be made by the orchestra the latter part of October, when it will appear successively in Buffalo, New York, Chicago, Ann Arbor, Mich, Columbus and Dayton, O; Pittsburg, and in Schenectady, N Y. A second week's trip in November will allow engagements in New Haven, Conn; Washington, D C, and Baltimore, he said.

Mr and Mrs Koussevitzky are stopping overnight at the Hotel Savoy Plaza here, planning to travel to Boston tomorrow. The director said that in all his 21 transatlantic crossings he had never witnessed any storm equalling the one which struck the Ile De France yesterday.

New York Herald-Tribune

SEP 19 1933

Theodore Human

Member of Original Boston Symphony Orchestra, 81, Dies

Theodore Human, violinist and composer, died of pneumonia yesterday at his home, 1019 Prospect Place, Brooklyn. He was eighty-one years old, a native of Russia and made a concert tour of Europe in his childhood. At the age of seventeen years he became an instructor.

Coming to the United States about fifty-five years ago, Mr. Human was an organizer and member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra and, later, of the Beethoven Quintet. Alfred G. Vanderbilt was one of his pupils. Serving as first violinist, he made several tours with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. He was first violinist for ten seasons with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. Three sons and two daughters survive.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 20 1933

SAYS HITLER AIDS MUSIC IN FRANCE

Koussevitzky Asserts Paris Full of Fine Musicians Driven From Germany

NEW YORK, Sept. 20 (AP)—Adolf Hitler may be responsible for a musical renaissance in France, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suggested on his return from Europe yesterday.

"Paris is full of the finest musicians of Germany," the Russian said. "I saw innumerable friends from Germany, and all of them were wondering what to do. I suggested that they scatter through the provincial cities of France.

"You see," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "Paris is France, politically and musically and in every other way. There is some music in the other cities, of course: Marseilles, Bordeaux, Nice, Lyons and so on. But there is not so much first rate music and that is where many of these fine men from Germany can help.

" 'Try the provinces,' I suggesed. It will be good for the musicans themselves. Pioneering is, usually, and certainly it will be good for the cities."

With Dr. Koussevitzky fere his wife, Mlle. Tatiana Cuchkoff, her sister, and several cases of music, including eight or 10 of new pieces for the Winter season in Boston.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SEP 20 1933

SEES HITLER CAUSING MUSICAL RENAISSANCE

Koussevitzky Would Have German Players Leave Paris For the Provinces

New York, Sept. 19—(AP)—Adolf Hitler may be responsible for a musical renaissance in France, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suggested today on his return from Europe.

"Paris is full of the finest musicians of Germany," the Russian said. "I saw innumerable friends from Germany, and all of them were wondering what to do. I suggested that they scatter through the provincial cities of France."

"You see," Koussevitsky said, "Paris is France, politically and musically and in every other way. There is some music in the other cities, of course: Marseilles, Bordeaux, Nice, Lyons and so on. But there is not much first-rate music and that is where many of these fine men from Germany can help.

"Try the provinces, I suggested. It will be good for the musicians themselves. Pioneering is, usually, and certainly it will be good for the cities."

With Dr Koussevitsky were his wife, Tatiana Ouchkoff, her sister, and several cases of music, including eight or 10 of new pieces for the winter season in Boston.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 20 1933

Hitler Helps France to Better Music

NEW YORK, Sept. 19 (AP)—Adolf Hitler may be responsible for a musical renaissance in France, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, suggested today on his return from Europe. "Paris is full of the finest musicians of Germany," the Russian said.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

SEP 21 1933

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to play at the Chicago fair next month. And that is an exhibit of which Massachusetts may justly be proud.

New York Herald-Tribune

SEP 20 1933

Koussevitzky Back for 10th Boston Season

Symphony Conductor, Here on Ile de France, Plans to Offer Several Novelties

Felicitates Schoenberg

Finds 'Extraordinary' Activity in British Music

Promising to offer his audience interesting and important examples of recently composed music, Serge Koussevitzky arrived here yesterday afternoon in the Ile de France on his way to Boston to begin his tenth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That distinguished organization, which will give eleven concerts here during 1933-'34, begins its fifty-third home season on Friday afternoon, October 6, at Symphony Hall, where the Russian conductor's inaugural program will include Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Branms's third symphony, Debussy'c "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Schriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy." The conductor, who passed last night at the Savoy-Plaza, goes on to Boston this afternoon.

To Play Berezowsky Symphony

While implying that the selection of new scores to be offered this season's Boston audience will be liberal and international—"we will," he said," "play everything that is interesting and important composed in the last year"—Dr. Koussevitzky preferred to let the announcement of hte actual items await the time of their performance. He revealed, however, that one novelty would be a new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, the Russian-American composer and violinist who was for several years a member of the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Among other Americans to be represeented by recent works will be Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne. The third symphony of the British composer, Arnold Bax, will be played for the first time in America. Other trans-Atlantic composers who are expected to figure in the Boston list of novelties are Ralph Vaughan Williams, Alfredo Casella, Zoltan Kodaly, Serge Prokofieff, Arthur Lourie, Igor Markevich, Igor Stravinsky and Philip Lazar.

Dr. Koussevitzky was greatly interested in the news that Arnold Schönberg is going to Boston to teach composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music. He had, before learning of Schönberg's visit, planned to give his music some representation in his programs, but now plans to invite Schönberg to conduct a pair of conduct a pair of concerts in the regular schedule at Symphony Hall.

Special Features Studied

Among the special features, with chorus and soloists, to be given during the coming Boston Symphony season, will be Bach's B minor Mass. The third act of Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" may occupy part of another program; other choral works being considered for the Boston concerts are Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" and Serge Prokogieff's "Sept, ils sent seut." Dr. Koussevitzky had heard from Jan Sibelius that the latter's eighth symphony, whose first performance has been promised to the Boston Symphony, is not finished, and may not be in time for performance in 1933-'34.

On leaving Boston last May, Mr. Koussevitzky went to London to conduct the British Broadcasting Company's orchestra in one concert. He had many invitations to conduct elsewhere, but had to decline, owing to the need of a complete rest before his taxing Boston season. From London he went to Aix-les-Bains, in the French Alps, for the rest of the spring and summer. He spoke enthusiastically about the present "extraordinary movement" in British music, citing the three orchestras now active in London. Adrian Boult, who heads the B. B. C. orchestra, he described as a "marvelcus conductor" whom he would welcome as a guest conductor in this country.

In all, the Boston Symphony will give 112 concerts this season, almost as many as the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, while Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be in charge throughout the season except for a three-weeks winter vacation, will have a more arduous task than any of the Philharmonic-Symphony or Philadelphia Orchestra conductors. The New York subscription series will consist of the regular five evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall and five evening concerts at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn. Another Brooklyn concert will be given in Olin Downes's "enjoyment of music" series. G. E. Judd, assistant manager of the orchestra, said that there was unusually great interest in the Brooklyn series, as the Boston Symphony is now the only major orchestra making regular appearances in the borough. During its tour to the Mid-West next month, the Boston Symphony will play in Chicago, being the only out-of-town orchestra to play there during the Century of Progress exposition.

NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 20 1933

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO DO NATIVE MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns With Plans to Perform Works by Four Americans.

SEASON WILL OPEN OCT. 5

Berezowsky, Copland, Harris and Whithorne Novelties to Be Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play "what is important and interesting of the music composed last year" during the coming season, Serge Koussevitzky said yesterday on his arrival from abroad on the Ile de France. Mr. Koussevitzky, who will begin his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, plans his customary long list of new works by contemporary composers of many nations.

Four Americans figured in Mr. Koussevitsky's 1933-34 programs. They are Nicolai Berezowsky, whose Third Symphony will be played; Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne. The English composers represented will be Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Arnold Bax, whose Third Symphony will be performed in this country for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who did not divulge the names of the compositions to be played, revealed that the following composers also would be represented by new works: Arnold Schönberg, Zoltan Kodály, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Lourié, Igor Markevitch, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Filip Lazar.

Mr. Koussevitzky added that he intended to invite Schönberg, who coming to this country next month to teach harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston, to conduct the Boston Symphony in a pair of concerts in the composer's own works. The conductor said also that he plans to repeat Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" this season and possibly William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast." He also will direct the third act of Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" in concert form.

The Boston Symphony's opening program in Symphony Hall will be: Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahms's Third Symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Scriabin's "Poème d'Exstase."

Mr. Koussevitzy conducted only one concert abroad, and that in London. He praised the work of the English composers. Most of his time abroad was spent at Aix-le-Bains. He spent last night in New York and will leave for Boston this afternoon. He arrived yesterday, accompanied by his wife and niece.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

SEP 21 1933

In Balt

— with

Billy B

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has just arrived in this country to begin his tenth season with the Boston Symphony, and his plans for the winter promise no end of interesting programs, three of which will be presented here.

Among American composers to be represented will be Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne.

A novelty will be a new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, the Russian-American violinist, recently a member of the Philharmonic, and the third symphony of Arnold Bax, the British composer, will be given its American premiere, while Dr. Koussevitzky expects to present in Boston "everything interesting and important that has been composed in the past year."

But it is not probable that many of these late works will be

4

N. Y. World-Telegram

SEP 22 1933

Koussevitzky will honor with his attention include Kodaly, Casella, Lourie, Markevitch, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Lazar.

When asked on his return to this country whom he placed in the front rank of modern composers, Mr. Koussevitzky promptly replied: —"Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Hindemith," adding:—"Prokofieff is a very fine musician, too, but I am Russian, and if I add him to the list people will say:—'Oh, yes, but that is just national feeling.'"

Sees Renaissance in England.

Serge Koussevitzky, next Friday in Boston, will begin his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the fifty-third season of the orchestra itself. The customary series of ten Carnegie Hall concerts will open on the evening of November 16, and close on the afternoon of April 7.

As usual, Mr. Koussevitzky spent much of his European summer in the study of new music. England, he says, is now having a musical renaissance. "The musical creative activity there at this moment shows a distinction and in particular a mastery of form which put England in the vanguard of musical Europe," he said.

English works by Vaughan Williams, Arnold Bax and William Walton are on his list for the season, as are American works by Nicolai Berezowsky, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whitborne. Other contemporaries whom Mr.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

SEP 22 1933

ITINERARY OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA EXTENDED

The 53rd season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begins in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 6, will have an extended schedule. The orchestra will play in Chicago on Oct. 23, and the western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. The orchestra will also give a series in Baltimore and Washington. There will be the usual concerts in New York, Brooklyn and Providence, and single appearances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton. With the Boston and Cambridge programs, there will be a total of 110 concerts. Serge Koussevitzky will again conduct for the tenth consecutive season.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

SEP 22 1933

* * *

Philadelphia will not be included in the seasonal concert tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time in 10 years it will visit Washington and Baltimore, and will make a western tour to Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Schenectady and Chicago. The tour will open Oct. 6.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

SEP 23 1933

* * *

WITH the return of Serge Koussevitzky from a summer in Europe and beginning of rehearsals, the Boston Symphony orchestra this week enters upon its 53rd season, which will bring this glamorous organization to Buffalo Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22, for a concert at 4 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall.

In the season now beginning, Dr. Koussevitzky enters upon his tenth year in America, as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in the course of which he has brought to this distinguished body of musicians new and surpassing fame.

The Buffalo concert will be under the local management of Marian de Forest.

N. Y. EVENING POST

SEP 23 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arrived from abroad, and promises a number of compositions of this year in the coming season. The dates for Carnegie Hall are November 16 and 18, January 4 and 6, February 2 and 3, March 1 and 3, April 5 and 7.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

SEP 23 1933

Symphony Is Directed by Koussevitzky

Famous Russian Director to Lead Boston Orchestra Here Next Month

The concert with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the current season of the Civic Music Association on October 28 will mark the first appearance in Schenectady of its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The last performance of the orchestra in Schenectady was 11 years ago when Dr. Koussevitzky's predecessor, Pierre Monteux, concluded his leadership of that body.

Upon his return from Europe this week Dr. Koussevitzky announced many notable features for the coming season. He has spent a considerable part of his European summer in the study of new music, and, although he did not reveal the names of the composers, he stated that whatever music of true importance and interest has been composed within the last year will have a place on the coming programs. Some exceptionally fine scores by American composers are among these.

The conductor spent the latter part of the summer in rest and recreation at Aix-les-Bains, France. May he spent in London where, he said, he greatly enjoyed his experience as guest conductor of the music festival by the B. B. C. orchestra.

"England is now having a musical renaissance," he said. "The musical creative activity there shows a distinction and mastery of form which put England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

This London appearance of Dr. Koussevitzky was the event of the season. Ernest Newman, famous British music critic, wrote of the concert: "Dr. Koussevitzky has shown us the great possibilities latent in it. In all its history it has never played so brilliantly." His power to hypotnize both orchestra and audience was felt abroad also.

In answer to a question about the NRA as affecting the Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky answered: "The NRA cannot affect musicians since they do not work more than five hours a day, but in three hours we work harder than most do in 20". He said he was looking forward with particular pleasure to the western trip of the orchestra in October, which includes Schenectady.

Dr. Koussevitzky was brought to Boston as the orchestra's first Russian conductor after he had achieved widespread fame in Europe as founder and leader of the post-war "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. He also brought the reputation of being the only living virtuoso on the double bass, from which lumbering instrument he coaxes a songfulness, a dignity and grace that no one had dreamt it could possess.

Those desiring to attend the concert of the Boston orchestra or the other five concerts to be given in Schenectady and Albany must join the association before 10 o'clock tonight when books will be closed for the present season. Memberships may be procured at headquarters at the Schenectady Conservatory of Music, 208 State street.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

SEP 23 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

Serge Koussevitzky, back in Boston for the new season, reiterates that "England is now having a musical renaissance." Need we add that the Boston Symphony does not require one?

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

SEP 23 1933

Koussevitsky, Back from Europe, Tells of Plans for New Season

BOSTON (AP) — Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although by no means a "Pollyanna" type, sees at least a small silver lining in the treatment that certain musicians have had at the hands of Hitler.

Really there were two "linings," as Dr. Koussevitsky turned the matter over in his mind on his return from his usual Summer in Europe. One is French and the other American.

"Paris is full of exiled German musicians of the first rank," said Dr. Koussevitsky. "And Paris is France, musically as well as politically."

The second silver lining is that Arnold Schoenberg, famous modernist composer and a Hitler "exile," is to come to Boston to live and teach.

After digesting the news, Dr. Koussevitsky arrived at the conclusion that he most likely would ask Schoenberg to conduct the Boston Orchestra in a program of his own works—some of which have caused riotous scenes in foreign concert halls when first presented, particularly a set of variations for orchestra in which the theme reads the same backward as forward.

The Boston Orchestra, under Koussevitsky one of the most receptive in the world to new music by younger composers, will continue its established course, Dr. Koussevitsky declares.

Among the Americans to be represented on this Winter's program are Nicolai Berezowsky, whose fantasy for two pianos and orchestra was played last Winter in New York and this Summer at the Lewisohn Stadium concerts; Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne. Mr. Berezowsky's third symphony is to be played in Boston.

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted only in London this Summer, and as a result of his London stay has brought back with him works by Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Arnold Bax for use this Winter. Some other distinguished foreign composers, who will furnish new works for the Boston season are Zoltan Kodaly, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Lourie, Igor Markevitch, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Filip Lazar.

The conductor was asked whom he placed at the head of the list of modern composers.

"Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Hindemith," he replied promptly. "Prokofieff is a very fine musician too, but I am Russian and if I add him to the list people will say 'Oh, yes, but that is just national feeling!'"

Music-Memoranda

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns

RETURNING this week from his summer in Europe, Dr. Koussevitzky has made known the program for the first pair of concerts of the coming season, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 6 and 7. It will be as follows: Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Brahms's Third Symphony in F Major; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Contrary to his custom of previous years, Dr. Koussevitzky did not discuss in detail his plans for the coming season. In general, however, he has let it be known that he intends to include in his programs such music of importance and interest as has been composed within the past year, though without specifying the names of the composers. When he was informed in New York that Schönberg will be in Boston during the winter he expressed a desire to have the composer conduct some of his music at Symphony Hall.

Concerning Schönberg

Though the date of arrival of Schönberg in Boston is still uncertain—sometime in October is still the best information available—the fact that he is coming to teach has been a topic of general discussion not only here but in New York. Says the Times in the course of a lengthy article:

"Germany's loss is this country's gain. Arnold Schönberg has agreed to come to Boston next month to teach harmony

Continued on Following Page

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S 10TH SEASON

ON FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 6, the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, will open its tenth season under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction.

During the season of 30 weeks, the Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall two series of 24 concerts each, and two series of 6 concerts each.

THE 24 PAIRS of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts extend from October through April, with approximately three concerts a month for each series. They embrace the entire season's repertory, an impressive list of great music, with occasional soloists and other features.

THE SHORTER SERIES of 6 Monday evening and 6 Tuesday afternoon concerts are arranged to occur in different weeks, averaging one concert a month for each series. Dr. Koussevitzky will choose for each series accepted masterpieces of orchestral music.

SEASON TICKETS are now on sale at the subscription office, Symphony Hall.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

23 1933

SEEING AND HEARING

The question is—and it has been stirring up the readers of the London Times for over a month—whether seeing musicians perform enhances their music. Does seeing Kreisler add to the musical value of his playing? Does seeing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including Dr. Koussevitzky, add anything musically to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony? We're inclined to think that it doesn't.

Not that the sight of an orchestra, or a soloist, or a male choir doesn't add something of a different nature. To watch Kreisler bow is to make an agreeable association between grace and ease of movement and beauty of tone. And to watch an orchestra perform a great symphony is, as Dr. Savill says, to appreciate the intensive work, sensitive feeling and self-forgetfulness entailed in its production.

But that isn't music, no more than an ebony instrument with ivory keys, or a string of black notes, or a golden trumpet, or a slim soloist in white satin is music. These may help to round out a conception, but they are externals. They are externals which only too often get in the way of pure music—lead to overemphasis of craftsmanship and style. Personally, we could do without the sight of Paderewski whamming the ivory and shaking his mane, or even of Dr. Koussevitzky, with all due respect for him as a musician—clutching a handful of nothing.

Music is for the ear alone, "that most discriminating of all the sense organs." Only when we have learned to hear it disembodied of its material trappings will we come to understand it properly. And this, happily, the radio will teach us to do as it grows more and more perfect in its power of reproduction.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

SEP 24 1933

Boxholders At Concerts Announced

With the return to town after summer vacations society again begins to plan for winter amusement, the concerts that are given by the various visiting orchestras, as well as the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, forming an important part of the season's entertainment.

Time was when symphony concerts in our fair city were rather neglected by the socially prominent, but that day is happily past, and milady would as soon consider absenting herself from the Lyric on the night that the stage is occupied by one of the nationally known orchestras, as she would think of staying away from the first Bachelors' Cotillon.

Symphony Boxholders

Among the boxholders for the Philadelphia Symphony series, opening October 18, are Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Cotten, Mr. and Mrs. William Keyser, Mr. and Mrs. Richard N. Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. Felix R. Sullivan, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Robert Bell Deford, Mr. and Mrs. Ral Parr, Mrs. Van Lear Black, Mrs. Eugene Levering, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel R. Randall, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Abell, Mrs. Gustavus Ober, Jr., Mrs. P. Lea Thom, Mrs. George Huntington Williams, Dr. Thomas L. Shearer and Mr. and Mrs. Samuel C. Rowland.

For the National Symphony concerts, the first of which will be November 8, a partial list of boxholders includes Mr. and Mrs. Cotten, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Symington, Mrs. Frank S. Hambleton, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Sloan, Dr. and Mrs. Kemp Malone, Mr. and Mrs. John Cyrus Distler, Jr., as well as a number of those listed for the Philadelphia Symphonies.

Other Days Recalled

The Boston Symphony concerts, beginning November 14, recall the days when Mrs. Henry Barton Jacobs always occupied the fourth box on the left, her wonderful pearls and diamond tiara the cynosure of all eyes. Opposite her was the late Mrs. H. Irvin Keyser and her daughter, Mrs. DeCourcy Wright Thom, while other boxes were occupied by such well-known social leaders of the past as Mrs. James Swan Frick, Mrs. William Graham Bowdoin and Mrs. John Gill.

The young people of the present day show much greater fondness for good music than the youth of yore, and at several, if not all, of the season's symphonies one will see in the audience Dr. Hugh Young's three daughters, Mrs. William F. Rienhoff, Jr., Mrs. Bennett Crain and Miss Elizabeth C. Young; Miss Virginia Barrett, Miss Cary Mason, Miss Margaret W. Whitehead and her younger sister, Miss Joan Whitehead; Miss Hannah Steuart Taylor, Miss Peggy Stewart, Miss Gladys Wight, Mrs. W. W. Lanahan, Mrs. C. Willing Browne, Jr., Mrs. Charles Carroll, Jr., with her sisters-in-law, Miss Mary Lee Carroll and Miss Helen M. Carroll, Miss Patti Edmonston, Miss Anne Gordon Boyce, Miss Mary Clare Cottman and dozens of others.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

SEP 24 1933

For the first time in more than 10 years, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a series of concerts in Washington and Baltimore during the coming season. The schedule includes a visit to A Century of Progress in Chicago where they will give a concert on Oct. 23. This will be the only great symphony orchestra to visit Chicago during the fair. The tour will also include Buffalo, N. Y.; Ann Arbor, Mich.; Columbus and Dayton, Ohio; Pittsburgh and Schenectady. The season in Boston opens Oct. 6 and M. Koussevitzky is expected to arrive home from Europe Sept. 30.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

SEP 24 1933

Boston Orchestra Coming

THE first definite announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra would give a series of three matinee concerts in Washington at Constitution Hall during the coming 1933-4 music season was made recently by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, Washington representative of the Boston Symphony, who will locally sponsor the three appearances of the orchestra, on Wednesday, November 15, 1933; Tuesday, January 30, and Wednesday, April 4, 1934, all at 4:40 o'clock.

Early last May tentative plans for a local Boston Symphony series were announced by Mrs. Dorsey. The Boston Symphony management, it was stated, was desirous of coming to Washington this season, if possible, but it was made clear that the orchestra's plans in this respect would wholly depend upon the degree of enthusiasm manifested by Washingotn music lovers, as reflected in the season subscription sale.

Up to the present time the orchestra's management has held all Washington arrangements to be merely tentative, but in making definite announcement of the prospective series, Mrs. Dorsey indicated that the desire of local concertgoers for a Boston Symphony series has been manifested in unmistakable fashion, with no less than 35 out of a total of 52 available boxes being already reserved for the season.

All Washington concerts in the Boston Symphony 1933-4 series will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky personally, it is said. Dr. Koussevitzky is at present on the ocean, being due to arrive at New York on Wednesday, from whence he will go at once to Boston to make plans for the opening of the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 6. This will be Koussevitzky's tenth season at the helm in Boston.

Mrs. Dorsey's announcement of a Boston Symphony series definitely brings to a total of 14 the number of concerts to be presented under her auspices locally during her first season as an impresario. In addition to the Boston Symphony series, she is sponsoring a Tuesday afternoon series of five concerts, including such artists as Lily Pons, Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Schipa, Lotte Lehmann and Heinrich Schlusnus, the last two in joint recital. Mrs. Dorsey is also presenting at Constitution Hall a Sunday afternoon series, with artists like Tibbett, Iturbi, Heifetz, Cossacks, the Vienna Saengerknaben and Mme. Jeritza on the roster.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been visiting Washington with regularity ever since 1886. Every one of the Boston Orchestra's great conductors except its first, Sir George Henschel, have been seen here in action. For many years an annual season of five concerts was given in Washington, but for the past 12 years it has been possible to give single concerts only, if one excepts the momentous 50th anniversary Beethoven festival that the orchestra gave here at Constitution Hall December 2, 3, 5 and 6, 1930—its first appearance in Constitution Hall.

The orchestra's three appearances in Washington this coming season will constitute Southern extensions of three of its five annual visits to New York. With the exception of its brief tour of Western cities in October, the Washington visits of the Boston Symphony will mark the orchestra's longest trips this season. The personnel of 110 musicians, Dr. Koussevitzky and managerial staff will travel to Washington by special train. It is understood a Baltimore series is also being planned for this season.

New York Herald-Tribu

SEP 24 1933

ORCHI

On Friday afternoon, October 6, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-third home season and its tenth under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who announces for his opening program Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Brahm's third symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase." The Boston concerts in a season which, like that of the Philharmonic-Symphony, extends over thirty weeks, include the usual twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons, and two for the benefit of the pension fund. Eight concerts will be given in the neighboring city of Cambridge and forty outside the Boston district, including the usual five evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts here at Carnegie Hall. At the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be the usual subscription series of five evening concerts, and one on February 28, in Olin Downes's "Enjoyment of Music" series.

During a tour to the mid-West, the orchestra will play in Chicago at Orchestra Hall on October 23, being the only out of town orchestra to play there during the Exposition. On this tour Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady will also be visited. The Boston Symphony will return to Baltimore and Washington, where it has not played for three or four years, for three concerts each. In New England it will be heard in Providence, New Haven, Worcester, Northampton and Hartford.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 24 1933

Sharps a

By PIERR

Already the posters announcing coming concerts stare at one from Carnegie Hall three-sheet boards. Pausing to read you are told that the Philharmonic-Symphony is to have Toscanini, Bruno Walter, and Hans Lange for conductors; that the visiting Philadelphia Orchestra presents its own Leopold Stokowski, Issay Dobrowen, and Eugene Ormandy and that no conductor save Serge Koussevitzky will wave an authoritative stick over the Boston Symphony.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 24 1933

By MARY M. HOWARD

OCT. 6 the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky opens its 53d season, which will include 110 concerts. One of them, fortunately for Buffalo, will be given in Elmwood Music hall on Sunday, Oct. 22, at 4 p. m., under the local management of Marian de Forest. The orchestra plays the next day in Chicago, and its western tour will include also appearances in Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburg and Schenectady. The usual concerts in New York, Brooklyn and Providence will take place, as well as single engagements in several New England cities. Koussevitzky returned from a summer in Europe last Wednesday.

* * *

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

SEP 24 1933

Boston Symphony To Open Season Here

A notably extended schedule is announced for the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 6. The orchestra will perform in Chicago on October 23, being the only orchestra to visit that city during the exposition. The western tour will include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

The season will mark Serge Koussevitzky's tenth year in America as the orchestra's conductor. He returned from Europe on the Ille de France last week, and rehearsals are now in progress in Boston. The symphony season in Pittsburgh will be opened by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque on Friday evening, October 27.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

SEP 24 1933

Musical Treat

Serge Koussevitzky, dazzling conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to America last week from a summer abroad and immediately went to Boston, where rehearsals already have started for the orchestra's 53d season, which will, happily for Buffalo, include a concert in the Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday afternoon, October 22d, at 4 o'clock.

This will be Dr. Koussevitzky's tenth season in America. Since 1924, when this vivid figure among European conductors took over the direction of this world-famous orchestra, he has brought it to a new and surpassing fame. The Boston orchestra comes to Buffalo under the local management of Marian de Forest.

* * *

NEW YORK MIRROR

SEP 25 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

Serge Koussevitzky, arriving in New York last Tuesday in readiness to open his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston Oct. 6, revealed notable plans for this, the 53rd season of the orchestra.

The series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall will open on Thursday evening, Nov. 16, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 18. The remaining dates are: Jan. 4-6, Feb. 2-3, March 1-3 and April 5-7.

Dr. Koussevitzky has spent considerable part of his European summer in the study of new music, and, although he did not reveal the names of the composers, he stated that whatever music of true importance and interest has been composed within the last year will have a place upon the coming program. Some exceptionally fine scores by American composers are among these.

The conductor has spent the latter part of the summer in rest and recreation at Aix-les-Bains, France. The month of May he spent in London where he said he greatly enjoyed his experience as guest conductor of the Music Festival by the B. B. C. Orchestra. The conductor spoke enthusiastically of the orchestras in London.

"England is now having a musical renaissance," he said. "The musical creative activity there at this moment shows a distinction and in particular a mastery of form which puts England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

* * *

Miss Rhea Silberta, composer

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

SEP 25 1933

The Rolling Road

WE would not be at all surprised to hear of a popular movement on the part of the 800 boys and girls of School 13, who are to have their teeth filled, pulled, cleaned, crowned and straightened, to get the number changed to 12½.

—o—

"In our day, music pursued to sheer perfection of expression is the more cherishable because it is so rare. It has long been so with the Boston Symphony Orchestra."—From a Prospectus of the Orchestra Announcing the New Season.

Well, just keep on practicing.

—o—

JOURNAL
Hingham, Mass.

SEP 29 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO VISIT CHICAGO

Extended Schedule Includes New Series in Nation's Capital

Koussevitzky to Open His Tenth Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to open its tenth season under Koussevitzky on October 6th, will visit Chicago in the last week of the Exposition, according to a recent decision of the Trustees. This concert, on October 23, will be part of a western tour. For the first time in a dozen years, the Orchestra will give series in the nation's capital, and in Baltimore.

The usual visits to New York and other cities, together with the usual Boston series of 24 Friday afternoon, 24 Saturday evening, and shorter series of 6 Monday evening and 6 Tuesday afternoon concerts, will bring the season's schedule to 110 concerts.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky arrives from Europe, Wednesday, September 20th, on the Ile de France. Announcement of notable features for the anniversary season of the famous leader is expected on his arrival.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

SEP 30 1933

NEXT Friday in Symphony hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 53d season, which will be the 10th of Koussevitzky in America. The program will include Beethoven's Third Leonore overture; Brahms' Third Symphony, Debussy's nocturnes "Clouds and Festivals," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The illustrious personnel of 110 remains virtually unchanged as it has stood for a number of seasons past. Dr. Koussevitzky, having returned from a summer in Europe, announces that all of the new music of true importance and interest composed within the last year will be included in the season's programs.

The orchestra comes to Buffalo Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22d, at 4 o'clock, under the local management of Marian de Forest, with the cooperation of the Buffalo Musical foundation, of which she is the secretary-manager.

Symphony Season to Open Friday

Next Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8:15 in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 53d season which is the 10th under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The Cambridge series will open on Thursday evening, Oct. 12, at Sanders Theatre; the Tuesday afternoon series in Symphony hall on Oct. 31, and the Monday evening series on Nov. 6.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present the following program for the opening pair of concerts next week: Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture; Brahms' Third Symphony; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

6

New Courses, Old Standards, Lively Season

Symphony Concerts, '33-'34, As Dr. Koussevitzky Outlines Them

Trans Sept. 30

EVIDENTLY—on this Friday afternoon—the New England summer of sultry heat is still at height. Experience teaches that it will continue, intermittently, well into December. Through no more than five months of a year does Boston escape its moist embraces; then do the work and take the pleasures of civilized living in a temperate climate. Nevertheless, custom ordains that concerts shall be resumed at the beginning of October, and resumed they are, however much a wicker chair in the garden is preferable to the plush and leather of Symphony Hall. In point of fact on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next the Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-third season; while the conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, will enter his tenth year in that post. The usual audiences will not be lacking; the usual rites will be observed. "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose"; yet each summer with a perceptible freshness and cheer—the more if the participant, like most around him, has abstained these four months from the hearing of symphonic music.

One of those rites prescribes for the first pair of concerts a program of established numbers—"acknowledged classics," as the phrase goes, with one or two masterpieces among them. Hence Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, which Dr. Koussevitzky was slow to undertake during his first years in Boston; Brahms's Third Symphony, in F major, omitted from the centenary festival last spring; the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Fêtes." (The third, "Sirens," with a humming choir of women's voices, has not been heard of late at Symphony Hall, though singers from Radcliffe once had it ready for performance.) To end, Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." It was final item in the conductor's first program of his first year in Boston. Now it is final item, again, in the first program of his tenth.

There are few changes in the personnel of the orchestra or in the schedule of concerts. Two secondary horn-players have left their chairs and the conductor is now choosing successors. One of the tuba-players, Mr. Sidow, also withdraws, and a newcomer will sit in his place. Otherwise the orchestra—string choir, wind choir, brass choir and percussion—remains the orchestra that Dr. Koussevitzky restored to prestige and has since maintained in his own image. Between the beginning of October, 1933, and the end of April, 1934, it will be heard in 110 concerts, six or seven more than of late has been annual custom. Other cities than Boston profit by this increase: Three concerts, instead of one, to Baltimore and Washington respectively; seven, instead of six, concerts on the journey westward from Oct. 22 through Oct. 28—Buffalo, Chicago, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Schenectady; an additional concert in Brooklyn, now visited by no other major orchestra. Otherwise the usual series in New York and in Providence; the usual visits to college towns in New England. The concert in Chicago will contribute incidentally to the current Fair; but Orchestra Hall in the city, and not an Exhibition Building in the park, will house it. Only once before, in Dr. Koussevitzky's term, has the orchestra revisited Chicago.

At home there is no change in the usual calendar: twenty-four concerts on Friday afternoons, save one on Thursday to avoid the church fast of Good Friday; twenty-four on Saturday evenings, both series undisturbed by Christmas or New Year's; six on Monday evenings; six more on Tuesday afternoons in the usual progress, from the ancients to the moderns; two on Sundays, for the Pension Fund of the orchestra; nine for the University public in Cambridge. To the ancient and honorable "subscription series" of Friday and Saturday, the response of the public is excellent. Only scattered seats remain untaken for the afternoon concerts; more are available at various prices for the evening concerts. Thus early the renewals and the sales for the two short series promise well; while Cambridge remains a model of fidelity with an open purse. All this is not to say that the Boston Orchestra has escaped diminished patronage and revenue in these difficult times. It has, however, suffered less under them than any other major orchestra in America. Current stresses have not lessened its range or lowered its standards. Its prestige holds firm. There have been economies, but economies that impair nothing essential to scope and quality. Hence balance-sheets that invite no wringing of hands in public, no outcry in pained voices. Bostonians still spend for their orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky returns, stimulated by the response to his festival concerts in London last spring, refreshed by a long stay through the summer at Aix-les-Bains. Though for the moment a passing cold hampers him, he is resuming work in high health and spirits; in every readiness, when he begins rehearsals next Monday, for an exacting season. For the while, however, he plans it tentatively rather than explicitly, knowing out of annual experience the changes of circumstance and purpose that seven months of concerts bring. He has in mind, for example, a Chaikovsky Festival to close this fifty-third year of the orchestra, as a Brahms Festival served last April. The programs would include not only the familiar symphonies and fantasias, but less familiar chamber-music and songs, along with considerable excerpts from Chaikovsky's operas, unknown, outside a few isolated airs, to American audiences.

The conductor is also considering eagerly an adventure into Wagner in the concert-hall, such as he used to make in Russia. His present choice is the First Act of "Die Walküre," requiring but three voices—Siegmund's, Sieglinde's and Hunding's; little dependent on visual impressions; leaving much to the orchestra. In mind also is a performance of the choral scene from Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina," in which the priest and prophet of the Old Believers goes to the stake amid the hymns of his devoted following. So would Dr. Koussevitzky repair, as much as possible in the concert hall, the present loss to Boston of opera. So also would he remind his audiences that there are operas, no less than symphonies, to which an orchestra and a conductor of the first rank are essential.

For other choral pieces, a repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor, with the Cambridge choirs, may be counted as certainty—at the spring concert for the Pension Fund. Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" from last season might well be repeated for its graphic power. A revival of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" has long haunted Dr. Koussevitzky; but the present Harvard Glee Club, for chorus, would approach it as new and difficult music; therefore with hardly time to make ready. For similar exigencies in choral preparation Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" has again receded into an indefinite future.

On the symphonic side Dr. Koussevitzky already has in hand a manuscript Symphony from Roy Harris, none of whose music in the larger forms, and little in the smaller, has yet been heard in Boston. Even so, he is distinctive figure among the younger American composers now translating promise into performance. The West, to its advantage knows him better than the East. . . . Mr Copland has also handed to the conductor a Suite for Orchestra to be played in the course of the season. In Boston, Mr Copland has long been embattled composer. Friends and foes may gird themselves accordingly. . . . Emerson Whithorne has also laid a manuscript on the conductor's table, of which he thinks well. Still another comes from Mr Berezovsky, the young Russian settled in New York, whose abilities Dr. Koussevitzky has already fostered.

The newer Europeans will not lack aid and comfort. Those that sneered last April at Mr. Markevitch's "Rebus" will be bidden to another piece from his hands. . . . Mr. Lazar, who has fared better with the "conservative" public, has confided a new piece to Dr. Koussevitzky. . . . Two symphonies from riper hands will also be heard for the first times in Boston—the Third of Prokofiev, variously judged elsewhere; the third of Bax, well liked and frequently played in England. . . . For the elder and established composers Dr. Koussevitzky's choosing eye turns back to Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," unheard at Symphony Hall since Mr. Monteux's day; to Ravel's Piano-Concerto, rather lost in the shuffle at the end of the season of 1930-31, well deserving repetition at Mr. Sanromá's hands. In the alternation of Mahler and Bruckner, it is Mahler's inning, probably with the Ninth Symphony, first heard, impressively, two years ago. . . . Once more the Eighth Symphony of Sibelius awaits the composer's final touches.

As for "personalities"—the all-pervading conductor's aside—Mr. Artur Schnabel, the pianist par excellence of the classic masters, may be expected early in the season. His undimmed prowess in the first Brahms Festival will light his way. . . . Later comes Mr. Kochansky, the violinist, in the concerto that another Pole, Szymanovski, composed for him. Later still, in all probability, Egon Petri, the pianist of Lisztian descent, whom Boston musicians have wished to hear; while Symphony Hall rather strangely overlooked him. And at a pair of concerts in January, while Dr. Koussevitzky is absent, who is so likely to be guest-composer and guest-conductor as Schönberg, if then he is settled in Boston? He is an able conductor. As the public of Symphony Hall has discovered from Dr. Koussevitzky he excels in arrangements from the ancient masters. (The newest comes from Handel.) In the long line of his orchestral works Boston has heard only the early piece for strings, "Verklärte Nacht" and the "Five Pieces" that drew protest in Dr. Muck's day. For all the scandal they then provoked, they are now but milk for babes beside the recent Variations and Music for a Film. Fortunately, it is the way of the public "of these concerts" to smile upon a composer in presence, though it writhe under the work of his hands. Moreover, Schönberg now addresses the mind and not the passions.

H. T. P.

Music-Memoranda

THE program for the first pair of concerts at Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be, as previously announced: Beethoven's Third Leonora Overture; Brahms's Third Symphony; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." . . . The first of the Cambridge series of concerts will be given on Thursday evening, Oct. 12. The Tuesday afternoon series at Symphony Hall starts on Oct. 31, and the Monday evening series on Nov. 6.

The first of the Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall will be given by the Don Cossack Chorus on Oct. 22. Fritz Kreisler will make his first Bostonian appearance of the season in the Sunday afternoon series on Nov. 5.

The first of the free concerts this season in the Lecture Hall of the Public Library is scheduled for tomorrow evening, and will be given by Myrtle Jordan, pianist. . . . The usual lectures on the programs of the Symphony Orchestra will start Thursday afternoon. There will also be a course at the same place on "Music Appreciation" on Tuesday evenings at 6.20, conducted by Alfred H. Meyer.

The annual Worcester Music Festival will begin Monday and will continue through next Saturday evening, instead of concluding as in previous years on Friday. The most interesting event scheduled is the concert of the final evening, when the Juillard School of Music will give "The Secret Marriage," Cimarosa's opera buffa that was heard in the festival at the Library of Congress in Washington last spring.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

SEP 30 1933

The Woolsey Concert Series.

YOUR true New Havenite neither boasts nor hopes, merely states a fact when he remarks that his city's cultural facilities equal those of all and surpass those of the majority of comparable municipalities. Each fall brings the recurrent yet ever stronger evidence of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series prospectus. Each fall brings the prediction that the high standard of the preceding season will not only be maintained but exceeded. And each winter brings proof that the prediction was authentic. The announcement of the 1933-1934 schedule stimulates the usual prophecy. The record number of six major events established last season has been duplicated; and the list as a whole sums an admirably inclusive and neatly balanced musical treat.

The symphony is the summit of musical endeavor. New Haven will play host and appreciative audience to the Boston Symphony Orchestra twice during the winter, near the start and at the close of the season. This is the first time such a dual arrangement has been made here; but past enthusiasm over the superb combination of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and his mighty orchestra indicates that two appearances will not satiate New Haven ears. The individual artists are as pre-eminent in their fields as is the Boston Symphony in its. Fritz Kreisler, who has played before local audiences on more than one occasion but never before in the Woolsey Series, will begin the schedule early in November. The very fact of his acceptance is a guarantee of New Haven's reputation. For Mr. Kreisler, recognized as the world's foremost violinist, has long been accustomed to engage only for concerts which assure him a capacity audience. Lawrence Tibbett, whose initial New Haven concert three years ago was besieged by an overflowing crowd, will follow the Boston Symphony in December. Sound pictures, radio broadcasts, operatic performances culminating with "Emperor Jones" last spring, have increased his already amazing following.

The remaining two concerts are the most interesting in prospect. For the first time the Series brings a two-piano presentation with two artists each of whom alone would have been an acquisition to the schedule. Harold Bauer, Bach player extraordinary, will combine with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, whose excursions into the orchestra directorial field have not dulled his technical and tone brilliance. The final individual performance before the concluding Boston Symphony concert, will be given by Lotte Lehmann, leading soprano of the Vienna Staatsoper. Her original and authoritative interpretations of native lieder rank her among the greatest singers of Europe. This season she makes her Metropolitan debut, but has arranged for several individual recitals. New Haven's fortune in acquiring one of these adds the final fillip to an excellent program.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

OCT 1 - 1933

Philip Hale, veteran dramatic and musical critic of the Boston Herald and author of the best set of program notes in America, those of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is, together with Mrs. Hale, paying a visit to Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Hale will be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Winfield S. Brainerd, 612 Deming place.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

OCT 1 - 1933

Adding to the list of major future events, the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, will come to Orchestra hall for a concert on the evening of Monday, Oct. 23. The program has not as yet been received.

DAYTON, O.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 - 1933

This week marks the opening of "big" music in New York's 1933-34 season . . . with the Philharmonic - Symphony, Bruno Walter conducting. Right on the heels of this concert will come "openings" by the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 1 - 1933

MUCH INTEREST IN WOOLSEY SERIES

That New Haven and its environs are becoming more and more musical-minded is indicated by the interest in the Woolsey Hall Concert Series for the coming series.

The list of events scheduled is an impressive one. Six in number, each is of such merit as to attract a host of auditors. Fritz Kreisler, world's greatest violinist, will open the series on November 2, to be followed on November 13 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance of the season. Then comes Lawrence Tibbett, baritone of the Metropolitan on December 13, with next in order Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch in a two-piano recital. The date of the latter event, one of the real novelties of the series, is January 11.

Lotte Lehmann, Austrian soprano and the finest lieder singer America has heard in years, will on February 13 mark the fifth offering of the season's program, which will conclude on February 27 with the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to conduct both of the orchestral concerts, with the full personnel of 110 men taking part.

NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD

OCT 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra is beginning its fifty-third season with its first concert on Oct. 6th, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky's leadership and he has just returned from a summer abroad and has with him a collection of new music by outstanding foreign composers.

This year the orchestra will visit Chicago on Oct, 23 and its western tour will include Ann Arbor, Buffalo, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. A new series in Washington and Baltimore will be inaugurated and the number of concerts scheduled will total 110. . . .

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

OCT 1 - 1933

Boston Symphony Makes Visit to Cambridge Springs

CAMBRIDGE SPRINGS, Pa., Sept. 30.—(Spl.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, some twenty in number, arrived at the Hotel Bartlett this week in a special bus. While here they visited Edinboro State Teachers College six miles from the Springs, and presented a concert in the auditorium of the school.

Clevelanders registered at the Hotel Bartlett during the past week include:

William P. West and guests, Edward Stage, jr., Mr. and Mrs. Allen Clark, C. P. Kennedy, Lola Phillips, R. A. Gandereer, M. Laforon, M. Valerio, Gaston Eleus, Max Polster, Max Kunze, J. Reichmern, B. Fiedler.

Clevelanders registered at the Hotel Riverside during the week were:

M. Alice Pollock, Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Reese, Thomas H Cullman and guests, E. T. Stainer and family, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Hancock, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Weston, C. A. Albers, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Milner, Dr. and Mrs. R. D. Urbohus, R. R. Weber, Sarah J. Reddy, Eva Harpert, R. F. Edgar, Harry W. Dunlap, Mrs. George F. Felger, Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Phillips, Col. and Mrs. W. R. Dunlop, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Lees, Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Stephcys, Mrs. J. Kennedy Irwin, Annie Thomas Talbott, Gertrude Giese, Florence I. Reddy, Mrs. L. D. Fletcher, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Burton and children,

---

LOWELL, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 1 1933

citizens.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO VISIT CHICAGO

Extended Schedule Includes New Series in National's Capital—Koussevitzky to Open His Tenth Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to open its tenth season under Koussevitzky on October 6th, will visit Chicago in the last week of the exposition, according to a recent decision of the trustees. This concert, on October 23, will be part of a western tour. For the first time in a dozen years, the orchestra will give series in the nation's capital, and in Baltimore.

The usual visits to New York and other cities, together with the usual Boston series of 24 Friday afternoon, 24 Saturday evening, and shorter series of 6 Monday evening and 6 Tuesday afternoon concerts, will bring the season's schedule to 110 concerts.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky arrived from Europe, Wednesday, September 20th, on the Ile de France. Announcement of notable features for the anniversary season of the famous leader will soon be forthcoming.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

SEP 30 1933

Trio Opens Beralde Studio

A background of many years of teaching music, in its connection with theatre, church, and school, is the basis for the recently organized Beralde Studio, 12 Dimmock street, Suite 15. Instruction in violin, 'cello, voice, flute, trombone, and piano is offered by the four teachers of the studio with either class or private instruction optional.

Hildegard Berthold, teacher of 'cello and trombone, coached with the late Alvin Schroeder, solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Previously she studied in the Leipzig Conservatory of Music, Germany, with Julius Klengel, and has taught since in public and private schools of Boston, Arlington, Dedham, Needham, and Quincy.

Mabel Keyes DeWolfe, violin teacher, studied with Walter Loud, well-known arranger and composer, and has had many years experience in private teaching. Agnes Ruggles Allen, vocal coach with the Beralde studio, is well known as organist and choir leader at the Bethany church.

Miss Marietta Canan, piano teacher, is a well-known concert artist, having spent 18 years in study. She has an experience of wide range, including radio broadcasting, theatrical appearances, and for several years and at present accompanist and soloist with Walter M. Smith, nationally known Quincy cornet soloist.

The Beralde group also includes the Beralde Ensemble, concert artists, playing weekly over WBZ, and offering their services for private and other appearances.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 1 - 1933

CHAPMAN CONTINUES SYMPHONY LECTURES

Dr. W. Louis Chapman will again lecture this season on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Through the courtesy of the Providence Public Library, as in previous years, the lectures will be given in the children's room of the library on the Sunday prior to each concert, and are under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. They will be illustrated by music and are free to the public.

The library committee of the club is in charge of arrangements and numbers, Miss Sarah E. Wheelwright, chairman; Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, Miss Margaret Lally and Mrs. Mary Colt Gross, ex-officio.

◆ ◆ ◆

The Pawtucket Civic Music Association will open its membership for one week beginning Oct. 16. The books will be closed on Saturday night, the 21st. An invitation is extended to anyone wishing to take advantage of the opportunity to attend three concerts each in Pawtucket, Fall River and Newport, and four in New Bedford and Worcester during the coming winter. Applications for membership should be made to the treasurer, Ralph E. Kenyon, at the Pawtucket Institution for Savings, 255 Main street.

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS 53RD SEASON

Conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his 10th season and marking the opening of the organization's 53rd year Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the following numbers announced for the initial Symphony Hall concert next Friday: Beethoven's Third "Leonore," Overture, Brahms's Third Symphony, Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The personnel remains virtually unchanged as it has stood for a number of years past.

A considerably extended schedule is announced for the organization this season. It will perform in Chicago Oct. 23, being the only orchestra to visit that city during the exposition. Other cities to be visited on the western tour include Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

For the first time in a dozen years the orchestra will give series in Washington and Baltimore. Series in New York, Brooklyn and this city (opening Dec. 5), and single appearances in Hartford, New Haven, Worcester and Northampton, will, with the Boston and Cambridge concerts, bring the total schedule to 110.

◆ ◆ ◆

Alice Bradlee Pooler, lyric soprano and costume recitalist, has returned from a series of engagements including appearances before the New England Conference of State Federations of Women's Clubs at Manchester, Vt., and the Maine Federation of Women's Clubs Conference at Poland Springs, Me. The accompanist was Louise B. K. Winsor.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

SEP 27 1933

THE Musical World

Opera Concert Company Coming to Lewiston

Lovers of opera in Lewiston and Auburn are having their innings this season, it seems. Close upon the announcement of the Maine State Opera Company's presentation of "Carmen," in October comes the promise of an operatic concert by internationally-noted artists, the Cosmopolitan Opera Co. in November.

L. P. Gagne, Arthur Landry and Fernand Martin comprise the committee in charge of the concert which will be given in Lewiston City Hall. November 16 is the date set. The men of the committee have been actively concerned in the bringing of good music to the Twin Cities for the past few years. They are desirous of carrying on as well as possible the musical undertakings for the community in which the late Alphonse Cote was so keenly interested.

Lucien Beck, director of the Cosmopolitan Opera Co., announces the six artists whom he will bring here as follows

Lorette Athola, dramatic soprano, of the Montreal Opera Co.

Ann Chenee, concert pianist, of the Philadelphia Art club.

Renee Bruyn, cellist, of the Belgian Conservatory.

Lucette Meillord, violinist, of Paris Conservatory.

Pierre Scojean, tenor, from the Brussells Opera House.

Atelio Ruffo, baritone, of the Palermo Opera Association.

They will give two and one-half hours of vocal and instrumental music, solos, duets, trios, quartets and ensembles, a program of standard selections and popular operatic numbers.

The committee feel very fortunate in having secured Mme. Lorette Athola, the Canadian diva, popular not only in Canada and the United States but in many European cities as well. Madame Athola was born in Canada and began her musical studies in Montreal, at the age of 14 years. The beauty of her voice attracted musical people there to the extent that they decided to send her to study in Boston with the celebrated Ramon Blanchart of the Boston Opera Co. When she returned home for a vacation in 1927, she was selected from among 150 aspirants in the Dominion as the possessor of its finest voice and was sent to Paris to complete her vocal training under the masters there.

Mme. Athola appeared on the concert stage in Europe with success and in a recent tour of her native country has proved herself an artist of unusual gifts. She has a stage presence that commands admiration. She is an accomplished linquist, speaking fluently English, French, Italian and Spanish and she sings in German in addition to these languages. She is said to be one of that rare type of singers who endears herself both on and off the stage by her sweet and womanly qualities no less than by her beautiful voice.

Mme. Athola will be featured on the Lewiston program.

* * *

New England Conservatory Music Opens Auspiciously

With eight new members of its faculty of about 100 and with additions to its courses ranging from those leading to the degree "master of music" for advanced students of the collegiate department to classes in pianoforte and voice for children of the normal departments, the New England Conservatory of Music opened Sept. 20 for its 66th year in Boston and the 81st year since the establishment of the conservatory system of teaching at Fall River by Dr. Eben Tourjee, founder of the New England Conservatory.

The new faculty members are George Stewart McManus, instructor in ensemble, lately of the University of California; Georges Fourel of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appointed teacher of quartet classes at the Conservatory; Alfred Zighera, a Boston Symphony violoncellist, who will teach this instrument at the Conservatory; Abdon Laus, Boston Symphony bassoonist, who will instruct in saxophone, Manuel Valerio, newly chosen clarinetist at Symphony Hall and teacher of the clarinet classes at the Conservatory; Victor Polatschek, Symphony clarinetist, who will give private instruction at the Conservatory; Simone Lee, instructor in French language and literature; Maude M. Howes, instructor in high school music.

Of the older members of the faculty several spent the summer in Europe, among these Clement Lenom, of the solfeggio department, who each year renews his contacts with music in Paris, and Francis Findlay, head of the school music department, who has been observing music festivals and methods of conducting abroad. Under Louis Cornell as acting director several of the faculty members and junior teachers gave instruction during July and August at the Eastern Music Camp, Lake Messalonskee, Me.

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and very popular among the younger faculty members of the Conservatory, taught for a second summer at the University of Puerto Rico, of which island he is a native. He will be for a second time one of the major artists of the Worcester Music Festival, Oct. 2-7.

Clayton D. Gilbert, head of the dramatic department, spent August in visiting little theatres and summer stock companies, observing plays that might make good material for the forthcoming season at the Conservatory.

Teaching has been continuous at the New England Conservatory throughout the summer, as usual.

* * *

Portland's Municipal Music Mix-up

Portland's unpleasant municipal music situation is deplored by the musical people of surrounding towns who have much enjoyed and appreciated the benefits of Portland's municipal organ and annual series of concerts.

Since the abolishment of the music commission by unanimous vote of the City Council people are naturally wondering what the result will be and how the community music will be cared for. It seems obvious that the Council's repeal of the ordinance creating the commission was primarily to end the long dispute between Chairman Louis E. White and the Council, beginning with the disagreement over the municipal organist.

The Council promises that "the organ will continue to be maintained and that municipal music in Portland will not suffer despite the necessity of abolishing the Commission. "It commended the conduct of two of the members of the Commission, Dr. Edwin W. Gehring and Philip I. Milliken, as exemplary, and took pointed exceptions to statements of Mr. White that the Kotzschmar Memorial organ was not being properly maintained, saying:

"The organ is very near and dear to the members of the City Council as it is to all the citizens of Portland. This City Council has voted funds sufficient to maintain the organ. The citizens of

.s no open season on them and we are anxious to get them started well enough so as to have an open season in two years. More than 2.000 have already been released. Next year we hope to put out 4,000."

MALDEN, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 28 1933

WOOLSEY HALL

* * *

PRESENTS FINE TALENT.

With the Boston symphony orchestra scheduled for two concerts, solo appearances by Fritz Kreisler, Lawrence Tibbett and Lotte Lehmann, and a two piano recital by Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsche, the Woolsey hall concert series for the coming season sets a mark far greater than any of its predecessors. That music lovers realize this fact is indicated by the interest already shown by mail and advance orders which have reached a number well in excess of any other year.

The Sprague hall box office is open for the renewal of subscriptions of the previous season. Close to two thousand patrons from throughout this vicinity are on this list, but it is hoped that within two weeks the process of recording them for the coming season will be completed. Applications will be received likewise today from new subscribers, and reservations made in the order of receipts as fast as the work will permit.

The new Woolsey hall series presents many features, probably the outstanding one being the first time the great Boston orchestra of 110 musicians has ever been engaged for two appearances in a single season, both to be conducted by the famed Russian leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Fritz Kreisler also presents a decided innovation by playing upon the series for the first time and Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch will make history by giving the initial two-piano of the annual list of musical events that has been for years one of New Haven's cultural high-lights.

Lotte Lehmann, leading soprano of the Vienna Staatsoper and finest lieder singer America has heard in years, and Lawrence Tibbett, famous American baritone, will provide the operatic end of the season's schedule, the former being a newcomer this season and the latter leading baritone of the Metropolitan Opera company.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ARRIVES

MRS. H. E. TALBOTT (LEFT), DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND PATRICIA O'BRIEN

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1933 8

74th Music Festival Opens Monday Night

Program of Beauty and Dignity in Keeping With New Home Week's Fare for Worcester Music Lovers

A new era in the 74 years' existence of the Worcester Music Festival will be heralded when the doors of the new Municipal Memorial auditorium are thrown open tomorrow night for the first of six concerts constituting the 1933 Festival program. The first event following the dedication of the building and the attending celebration, the program has been planned in keeping with the dignity and beauty of the Festival's new home.

With the increased seating capacity afforded by the auditorium, maikng it possible to issue a larger number of lower-priced ticekts, the public rehearsals which usually preceded the Festival proper have been discontinued and the concerts have been spread over five evenings and one afternoon instead of three afternoons and three evenings as in the past. The new plan calls for but one event a day.

Albert Stoessel will direct the Festival for his ninth season, with Walter Howe, festival organist for five seasons, as associate conductor and organist. Both will be represented on the program by works of their own.

Enlarged Chorus

The chorus, an integral part of the Festival, has been enlarged this year to 400 voices and will be heard in all but two of the concerts. Molding of the male section into a smooth co-operative unit has been emphasized for the program by Mr. Stoessel. As in past years, the Festival orchestra will be composed of 75 members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Rosa Ponselle, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., will make her third appearance at the Worcester Music Festival in the Artists' Night program, Friday night. Other artists will be Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, who has been appearing this year with the Chicago Symphony orchestra; Richard Bonelli, baritone, and Rose Bampton, contralto, both of the Metropolitan Opera; Arthur Hackett, tenor, formerly of Worcester, who will appear at the Festival for the fifth time; Olga Averino, Ruth Huddle and Josephine Antoine, sopranos; Grace Leslie and Marion Selee, contraltos; Dan Gridley and Charles Haywood ,tenors, and Roderic Cross and Julius Huehn, baritones.

Sascha Gorodnitzki, who made his debut with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra in 1930, and Jesus Maria Sanroma, who has been heard frequently with the Boston Symphony orchestra the past few years, will be the Festival concert pianists.

Opera Innovation

All of the concerts except the concert for children Wednesday afternoon at 4.15 o'clock will be at 8.15 o'clock in the evening. A new note will be injected in the Festival program by the presentation of an opera, "The Secret Marriage" by Cimarosa Saturday night. Produced by the Juilliard Graduate School of Music, it will serve to demonstrate the facilities for operative performances provided by the new auditorium.

Hamilton B. Wood, president of the Worcester County Musical association, sponsor of the Festival, announced yesterday that while the ticket sale has been the largest in the organization's history, seats still are available for all but the Artists' Night concert.

In expressing his appreciation over the reception and support being accorded the efforts of the association to surpass previous Festivals in scope and talent, Mr. Wood emphasized that like other art projects, the Festival was not self-supporting. In spite of the fact that all records of ticket sales have been broken, he said that support through public subscription is essential to financial success if the institution's purpose of sponsoring the finest concerts with the best artists at the lowest cost to the public is to be upheld.

Continued from Page One

In connection with the Festival, a program book has been issued giving a complete cross section of the Festival idea in addition to listing the program itself. It embodies descriptive and historical notes of the works to be presented, a complete repertoire of the principal works that have been given in the 74 years of the organization, as well as the personnel of the association, the chorus and the orchestra. It will be on sale at the auditorium and at Steinert's.

The concert tomorrow night, inaugurating the 1933 Festival, will have as its first number a dedicatory-fanfare specially composed for the opening of the 74th Festival in the new auditorium by Mr. Stoessel. In its presentation will be heard the organ, the orchestra and the chorus. "Dedicace," a sonata in one movement for organ, will be presented by its composer, Mr. Howe. Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" will complete the program. Soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland soprano; Rose Bampton, contralto; Dan Gridley, tenor, and Richard Bonelli, baritone.

The second concert Tuesday evening, will be devoted to the oratorio, "Elijah," by Mendelssohn. The title role will be sung by Richard Bonelli. The other roles will be carried by Olga Averino and Josephine Antoine, sopranos; Grace Leslie, contralto, and Arthur Hackett, tenor, with the Festival chorus and orchestra assisting.

Children's Concert

A group of choruses by public school children under the direction of Arthur J. Dann, supervisor of music in the public schools, will be heard in the Children's concert Wednesday afternoon at 4.15 o'clock. Josephine Antoine, soprano, will contribute a group of solos, and the festival orchestra will contribute several numbers. Mr. Stoessel will talk informally about the orchestra and its instruments and various members of the orchestra will illustrate his remarks by practical demonstrations of their instruments.

The program follows: "Overture on French Noels," Philip James, orchestra; "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dukas, orchestra; group of soprano solos, "With Verture Clad," Haydn; "The Nightingale," St. Saens," and "Caro Nome," Verdi, Miss Antoine; group of American compositions, "Told at Sunset," MacDowell; "Nodding Mandarins," Stoessel; "Indian Pipes," Marion Bauer, and "Arkansas Traveler," Guion, orchestra; choruses by public school children, and three dances from "The Bartered Bride," Smetana, orchestra.

The Thursday evening concert will be distinguished by the presentation of three later day choral compositions, Brahm's "Song of Destiny," Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes and Vaughan Williams' "Toward the Unknown Region." An innovation at this concert will be the presence of a piano concerto on a program devoted largely to choral music. The piano soloist will be Sascha Gorodnitzki.

Program

The program follows: "Song of Destiny," Brahms, Festival chorus and orchestra; "Symphony No. 2 in D Major," Jan Sibelius, orchestra; "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in E Flat Major," Liszt, Sascha Gorodnitzki, soloist; "Symphony of the Psalms," Stravinsky, Festival chorus and orchestra and "Toward the Unknown Region," Vaughan Williams, chorus and orchestra.

The Artists' Night program Friday night, while containing orchestral and choral numbers, is literally built around Rosa Ponselle. Lambert's "The Rio Grande," a sensation at last year's Festival, will be repeated on this program with Jesus Maria Sanroma, the brilliant Porto Rican pianist, again playing the solo part.

The program follows: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss; aria, "Bel Raggio Lusinghier," from Rossini's opera, "Semiramide," Miss Ponselle; "Willow, Willow," arranged by Bryceson Treharne; "A Lover and His Lass," Albert Stoessel, and "Hymn to Diana," Albert Stoessel, Women's chorus and orchestra; "The Rio Grande," Lambert, Miss Selee and Mr. Sanroma; group of solos with piano, Miss Ponselle; two Negro spirituals for unaccompanied chorus, "Deep River," arranged by Harry Burleigh, and "Go Down Moses," arranged by Noble Cain; coronation scene from the opera, "Boris Godounoff." Moussorgski, Mr. Huehn and the chorus and orchestra.

Taking advantage of the auditorium's stage equipment, this year's Festival will close with a presentation of opera. The opera selected, "The Secret Marriage," has been presented this year at Washington and New York by the Juilliard Opera school, which also will stage it here. It is directed by Albert Stoessel and Alfredo Valenti. The cast gave 30 opera performances in New York, Washington, Detroit and Chautauqua.

The cast will be as follows: Geronima, a rich merchant, Roderic Cross; Elisetta, his elder daughter, betrothed to the count, Ruth Huddle; Carolina, his youngest daughter, the secret wife of Paolino, Josephine Antoine; Fidalma, a sister of Geronimo, a widow, Marion Selee; Count Robinson, Julius Huehn, and Paolino, in Geronimo's employ, Charles Heywood.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 1 - 1933

METHOD OF FINANCE NEW FOR SYMPHONY SUPPORT

Because to Columbus symphony lovers the bare announcement of the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky tells a sufficient story of the opening of the tenth annual symphony season here, Thursday evening, Oct. 26, in Memorial hall, it will be more to the point to recount something of the new developments in the club which has been responsible for maintaining these series through prosperous and difficult seasons alike.

Since the cost of symphony has almost always been beyond the income from any moderate gate, orchestras have visited outlying cities partly, at least, at the personal expense of generous contributors known as guarantors. So it has been with the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

This year for the first time, the club will invite all who will to become contributors for any of three amounts. Ten-dollar contributions will provide one sort of membership; $15 contributions a second, and $25 an "honorary membership" for one year. Contributors' names will be published in the programs. Mrs. Giles Mohler has been placed in charge of the campaign for these memberships.

The box office will open Oct. 18 at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, before which time tickets will be available from Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, or from other members of the Symphony club.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

OCT 1 - 1933

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

by STEWART B. SABIN

"Nomads of the Baton" is the name given to guest conductors of orchestras by Ernest Newman. Recently he speculated on which of those of reputation might conduct London's orchestras during the coming season. It will not be a long time before this same query will be answered as to our Philharmonic Orchestra, which will be conducted by several guest baton wielders, as it has been each season since Eugene Goosens resigned as its permanent conductor.

There are arguments about employment of guest conductors in place of a permanent conductor. Those who believe in the permanent conductor agree that an orchestra benefits by direction by one man; that through constant personal contact individual members of the orchestra improve in performance, sectional work is more carefully supervised, morale and discipline are more secure. Those who believe guest conductors offer the greater advantage argue that fresh viewpoint of the works played, new ideas as to the methods of playing, a series of interpretations introducing novelty as a stimulus to players' interest, are potent factors in providing zest in an orchestra's performance.

Such arguments are on a general premise. Local conditions are an element to be carefully considered in making a decision for a particular orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to supremacy by William Gericke. Under Henschel, its first conductor, its personnel was entirely local, its membership mature, its members more or less routined to what may reasonably be called undisciplined performance. Gericke changed all this; he recruited a personnel including the best of the old, in majority an influx of experienced but younger orchestra experts. This was the orchestra he handed over to Nikisch.

Again after the war debacle of Muck and the Boston symphony Monteux remade that orchestra and brought it to technical excellence; this body of players he surrendered to Koussevitski. The Boston Symphony is an example of an orchestra that owes its achievement almost entirely to permanent conductors. This is likewise true of the Philadelphia and Chicago Orchestras; in Detroit Gabrilowitz has been long in control; Cincinnati had Reiner for nine years and now has Goossens. San Francisco kept Hertz for many years. The New York Symphony was always conducted by Damrosch, father and son. The New York Philharmonic played under many conductors and now has Toscanini, supplemented by others.

It might be inferred that the evidence points to the permanent conductor as the better means to orchestral superiority. But consider conditions in Rochester. Our Philharmonic Orchestra plays 10 concerts each season. The orchestras before mentioned play and have for many years played 60 to more than 100 yearly concerts. A master conductor wants to be heard in many more than 10 concerts each season; he will be ill content with so small an opportunity as is offered at present here. Every orchestra in the country now plays on occasion under guest conductors whose concerts are welcomed by the publics hearing them; the performances are of the standard demanded by the nomads who conduct them. As to orchestral discipline in Rochester, the majority of our Philharmonic is furnished by our Civic Orchestra which plays a long season under a permanent conductor. We have therefore considerable of the benefit of permanent conductorship in maintaining a policy of guest conductors for our Philharmonic. Nor have the conductors of high reputation who have been here found occasion to complain of the orchestra's performance.

The question to debate in Rochester is whether a Philharmonic season of 10 concerts is not more interesting to hear and more enliveningly performed with distinguished nomads than it would be if conducted by a conductor content to conduct a short season or one whose interests would be strongly diverted to securing supplementary work elsewhere. Put in this wise the present policy seems logical. If we come to a longer Philharmonic season, there would be cause for new consideration of the matter.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

SEP 30 1933

MORE THAN 800 SUBSCRIBE FOR CONCERT SEASON

The 800 mark was passed last night in the campaign for subscriptions for the Albany Civic Music Association's concert series, it was announced by Edgar S. Van Olinda, secretary, at the close of the day's enrollment at Cluett and Sons music store. The campaign will close tonight at 10 o'clock, the association's books being open until that hour for new subscribers.

Leo K. Fox, treasurer of the association, will give the last of this week's broadcasts for the enrollment tonight at 6:25 o'clock over WGY.

The artists to appear in this season's concerts will be announced soon after the subscription books close, a large subscription list assuring a finer list of artists than one less numerous. Albany subscribers also have the privilege of attending the concerts of the Schenectady Civic Music Association without extra charge. The first concert in Schenectady will be on Oct. 28, presenting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Kousevitsky.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 1 - 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO VISIT CHICAGO

Extended Schedule Includes New Series in National's Capital—Koussevitzky to Open His Tenth Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to open its tenth season under Koussevitzky on October 6th, will visit Chicago in the last week of the exposition, according to a recent decision of the trustees. This concert, on October 23, will be part of a western tour. For the first time in a dozen years, the orchestra will give series in the nation's capital, and in Baltimore.

The usual visits to New York and other cities, together with the usual Boston series of 24 Friday afternoon, 24 Saturday evening, and shorter series of 6 Monday evening and 6 Tuesday afternoon concerts, will bring the season's schedule to 110 concerts.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky arrived from Europe, Wednesday, September 20th, on the Ile de France. Announcement of notable features for the anniversary season of the famous leader will soon be forthcoming.

YONKERS, N. Y.
Herald-Statesman

SEP 29 1933

Week Of Benefits To Open Monday At Glavin Estate

Series of Daily Festivities Designed To Publicize Work of Social Welfare Groups and Raise Funds for Them—Concert To Be Held Every Night

A "harvest week,' crowded with activity designed to spread information concerning a half dozen aspects of social welfare and adjustment and to raise funds for organizations which deal with such problems begins Monday at Turkey Hollow, the Scarsdale Road estate of Mrs. Elenore D. Glavin.

Each afternoon of the week will be set aside for a benefit and exhibit for different organizations and evenings will be featured by musical programs, culminating in a "Gay Nineties" costume ball Saturday night.

The evening music will be provided by orchestras, made up of unemployed professionals who formerly played in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and others of nationwide reputation. These have been organized under the direction of the State Education Department.

A different orchestra of high caliber will play at the Glavin estate every night next week. Mrs. Glavin, who is personally sponsoring and arranging the entire program and series of benefits, is providing transportation and other necessary facilities for the musicians.

The week opens with a bridge and high tea for the benefit of St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Sherwood Park, which starts at 2 P. M. Monday.

The following women are serving on a cooperating committee: Mrs. Alice Chapman, Miss Clara Trenchard, Mrs. Harry M. Love, Mrs. William Nagle, Mrs. Arthur Lyon, Mrs. Francis Hellenbrand and Mrs. Benjamin Scanlon.

For the evening concert, the New York State Symphony Band, which has 46 pieces, will present a program.

Tuesday afternoon, also beginning at 2 o'clock, will be given over to a benefit for the New York Guild for Jewish Blind. At this time, there will be several booths exhibiting work of the guild in an effort to acquaint the public with its activities.

That night, the Empire String Orchestra, will play.

Speakers from the American Social Hygiene Society, the Yonkers Chapter of the American Red Cross and the NRA will be featured and exhibits of the work of the organizations will be shown on Wednesday afternoon. There will also be chamber music and high tea. At night, the University Concert Orchestra will play.

On Thursday, a bridge for the benefit of unemployed war veterans will be held and speakers engaged in vocational guidance in New York City will deliver addresses.

Among those expected to talk is J. Edward Mayma, who is in charge of guidance at the East Side Continuation School of New York City. Addresses will deal with reeducation of the jobless to restore them to social usefulness by fitting them for new tasks.

A concert will be given Thursday night by the New York Civic Orchestra.

A pet show, in which children from Schools Eight and Fifteen, and others in the neighborhood will exhibit their favorite livestock, will be held Friday afternoon. Officials from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and a humane league will be in attendance.

They will speak on the care and feeding of animals and will serve as judges of the pets. Blue ribbons will be awarded and first, second and third prize takers will be recognized to the number of 21. That night the Knickerbocker Band will play.

On Saturday afternoon, there will be a bridge and high tea for the benefit of the Catholic Boys' Club and at night the "Gay Nineties" costume ball will be held. A special out-door dance floor will be in place for the evening. The Knickerbocker Dance Orchestra will play.

A sedan car will also be given away that night.

Guests will be able to dine at Turkey Hollow each night. Dutch and Italian suppers will be served. In addition, the Elward Social Club, an Eleventh Ward young people's organization, is establishing an "NRA horn of plenty," a project resembling a grab bag.

Boy and Girl Scouts will assist all during the week and the Little Club Orchestra, made of Roosevelt High School students, will play in the afternoons.

Miss Florence Day of Scarsdale and Mrs. Joseph Ringwall of Bronxville are assisting Mrs. Glavin in her arrangements.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

SEP 30 1933

INSTITUTE ARRANGES NEW COURSE IN MUSIC

Afternoon Series of Lecture Recitals Will Begin October 13

A new afternoon course, in addition to the evening course, on "The Enjoyment of Music," conducted by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York "Times," is announced by Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, to begin Oct. 13 at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The course will consist of fifteen lecture-recitals each.

The programs of the afternoon course will include such subjects as "Melody, the Core of Music," with the Hall Johnson Singers; "Evolution of Song Forms," with Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; "The Symphony Before Beethoven," with Georges Barrere and the Barrere Little Symphony, and "Symphonic Music by Living Composers," with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The afternoon courses will be held at 4 o'clock on consecutive Tuesday afternoons.

The evening course will include, among others, the following programs: "The Opera, Its Origin and Influence Upon Song," wih Lucrezia Bori, soprano; "Solo and Chamber Music of J. S. Bach," with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; "The Italian Music Drama," with Rose Ponselle, soprano; "Eighteenth Century Piano Music," with Jose Iturbi, pianist, and "German Lieder," with Greta Stueckgold, soprano. These lecture-concerts are not unduly technical and are designed for both the layman and the student of music and are not interdependent, it was announced.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 1 - 1933

Boston Symphony

Under the local management of Marian de Forest, and with the cooperation of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, of which she is secretary-manager, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give a concert in the Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday afternoon, October 22d, opening a brief road tour. which includes an engagement in Chicago. On Friday of this week, in Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 53d season, which will be the tenth of Koussevitzky in America. The program will include Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture; Brahms' Third Symphony; Dubussy's Nocturnes; Clouds and Festivals, and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy.

The illustrious personnel of 110 musicians remains virtually unchanged as it has stood for a number of seasons past. Dr. Koussevitzy, having returned from a summer in Europe, announces that all of the new music of true importance and interest composed within the last year will be included upon the season's programs.

* * *

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 1 - 1933

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Choral Union Series of concerts in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Tuesday, Oct. 24. The Ann Arbor concert will mark the only Michigan appearance of the noted Eastern organization this season.

N. Y. AMERICAN

OCT 1 - 1933

Latest News About Music And Makers

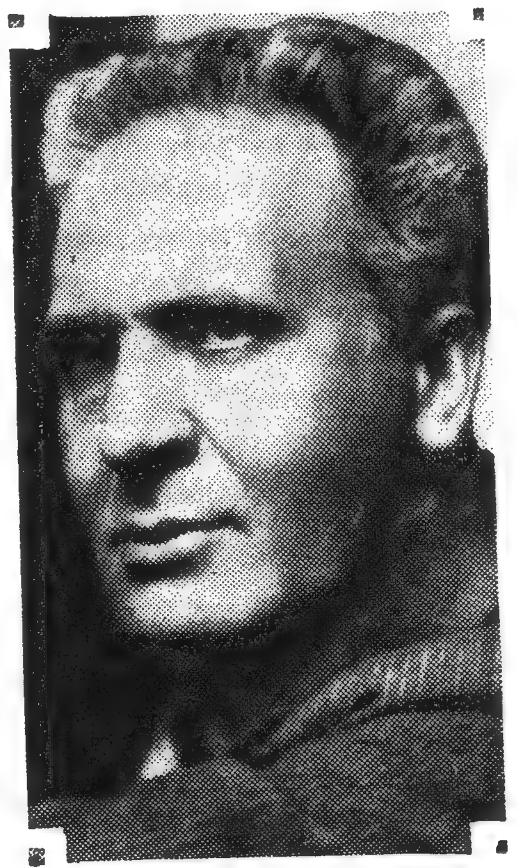
By GRENA BENNETT.

Just about musicians.

Friends of Beniamino Gigli say he is now on the sea coming this way to settle up a few business affairs and perhaps appear with one of the opera companies now functioning in this country . . . Bruno Walter arrived a few days ago to resume his duties as conductor of the Philharmonic Symphony Society. He will direct the opening concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, continuing in that capacity until the return of Arturo Toscanini . . . Maria Jeritza is rumored to arrive in New York early next month. She will begin rehearsals for her American debut in light opera in the Shubert production of "Princess Zita," a transcription of her Viennese success, "A Night in Venice."

An orchestra of baby musicians was introduced last week at the Wanamaker Auditorium when a conductor, two and a half years old, directed an infantry of instrumentalists ranging from two to seven years of age. The program had a classical character . . . Arthur Schnabel will play a program of piano pieces. November 8, at a benefit for the scholarship fund of Bennington College. Alma Gluck-Zimbalist heads the committee in charge . . . Toscha Seidel is announced as the solo violinist at a Spring concert of the People's Symphony . . . At the Chicago Opera Company's production of Montemezzi's "L'Amore dei Tre Re," next week, two members of the original cast at the Metropolitan will participate. These are Eduardo Ferrari-Fontana and Pasquale Amato.

Conductor



Bruno Walter, who will open the ninety-second season of the Philharmonic on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall.

Justice Leopold Prince will conduct a hundred young musicians this evening at the Park Plaza Theatre for the benefit for German-Jewish relief. . . . The Banks Glee Club, now in its fifty-fifth year, will give two concerts this season in Carnegie Hall. Bruno Huhn will begin rehearsals October 6 . . . "Enjoyment of Music' is the subject of a series of sixteen lectures to be delivered by Olin Downs at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences . . . Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will feature works by four Americans this season. These are Emerson Whithorne, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Nicolai Berezowsky.

Carol Lomgone, well known pianist, will give a series of "operalogues" for folks eager to understand the music and story of each opera scheduled for performance at the Metropolitan during the coming Winter... The Frederick A. Stokes Company has published "Gibbon's Magic of Melody," an interesting volume of poems inspired by popular and classic compositions...Several special programs are being prepared by Walter Damrosch and the Musicians' Emergency Aid for concerts in Madison Square Garden, in the effort to raise money for the host of unemployed musicians in this section of the country.

Doris Kenyon, soprano and motion picture star, will devote two months to costume recitals, opening her season in Winnipeg November 30...Charles Wagner announces the New York debut at Town Hall November 13 of Ruth Slenczynski, an eight year old pianist from California... Josef Lhevinne will limit his first piano recital to works by Chopin. The date is October 28. The place, Carnegie Hall . . . Songs from Sweden and Norway will be featured by Margaret Olsen when she makes her debut at the Barbizon-Plaza October 23...The Charlotte Lund Opera Company will give ten operas at its performances for children and young people.

It is rumored that General Director Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan Opera Association has engaged some new foreign baritones to share first honors with the Americans, Lawrence Tibbett, Richard Bonelli and John Charles Thomas...Ruggiero Ricci, violin prodigy, will be the attraction at a concert of the Rochester Civic Music Ass'n in February...Doris Doe, contralto, offers a scholarship for girl singers. Final auditions will take place October 2 in Steinway Hall.

* * *

The Chicago Opera Company announces the first production of "L'Amore dei Tre Re" and "La Favorita" during the coming week. The first named will be sung Tuesday night and the second opera on Friday. The schedule for the entire week follows: Monday, "Carmen;" Tuesday, "L'Amore dei Tre Re"; Wednesday, "Rigoletto"; Thursday, "Otello"; Friday, "La Favorita"; Saturday afternoon, "Hansel and Gretel;" Saturday evening, "Faust"; Sunday, "Andrea Chenier."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 1 - 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the 110 men in the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces that many new works of true importance composed in the last year will be presented on this season's programs. However, at his opening concert in Boston, he will play such favorite classics as the Beethoven Leonore overture No. 3 and Brahms' 3d symphony in F major; the Debussy Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, and Scriabin's Poem of Ectasy. The Buffalo concert of the orchestra in Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday p. m., Oct. 22, under the local management of Marian de Forest, will open the road tour of the Boston Symphony.

N. Y. EVENING POST

SEP 30 1933

Music Season in Brooklyn

Thirty Lecture-Recitals by Olin Downes and Artists in Academy of Music

THIRTY instead of fifteen lecture-recitals will be given by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, by the Department of Music of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences this season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on "The Enjoyment of Music." The evening series begins October 13 with "The Opera, It's Origins and Influence Upon Song," which will be illustrated by Lucrezia Bori, in a program of old songs and operatic arias. Other dates with subjects and illustrating artists will be:

Solo and chamber music of J. S. Bach, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, October 23; folk songs and art songs, John Charles Thomas, baritone, November 7; music for the violin, Mischa Elman, November 21; the Italian music drama, Rosa Ponselle, soprano, December 8; medieval and modern choral music, Vienna Saengerknaben, December 19.

Eighteenth century piano music, Myra Hess, January 9; modern quartet music, Roth Quartet, January 15; German Lieder, Grete Stueckgold, soprano, January 30; chromaticism in piano music, Harold Bauer, February 14; the modern symphony and symphonic poem, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, February 28; classic and modern forms of violin music, Yehudi Menuhin, March 5; song of the classic and modern periods, Maria Olzewska, contralto, March 13; piano music of the modern period, March 27, and the music of Richard Wagner, April 10, artist and orchestra to be announced.

The new course will be held afternoons in the same place, the assisting artists and ensembles being: Hall Johnson Singers, October 17; small orchestra of ancient instruments, October 31; Margarete Matzenauer, contralto, November 14; new English singers, November 28; Egon Petri, piano, December 12; Paris Instrumental Quintet, January 2; Heinrich Schlusnus, baritone, January 16; Myra Hess, piano, January 23; Victor Chenkin, baritone, February 6; Barrere Little Symphony, February 13; Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, two-piano, February 27; Perole String Quartet, March 6; Sophie Braslau, contralto, March 20; Kroll Sextet, March 27, and Boston Symphony Orchestra, April 6 or 8.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 1 - 1933

Exiled Musicians Are German Loss

France Has Welcomed Many, Boston Leader Says

BOSTON, Sept. 30—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although by no means a "Pollyanna" type, sees at least a small silver lining in the treatment that certain musicians have had at the hands of Hitler.

"Paris is full of exiled German musicians of the first rank," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "and Paris is France, musically as well as politically. It also is full of French musicians of the first rank.

"When I talked to my German friends, and they said: 'What shall we do?' I said, 'Go to the provinces. It will be good for the provinces, and it will be good for you as well.'

"It is possible that, musically, Germany's loss may be France's gain."

The second silver lining is that Arnold Schoenberg, the famous modernist composer and a Hitler "exile," is to come to Boston to live and teach.

After digesting the news, Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at the conclusion that he most likely would ask Schoenberg to conduct the Boston Orchestra in a program of his own works. Some of Schoenberg's works have caused riotous scenes in foreign concert halls when first presented.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
SEP 22 1933

THE WEEK IN MUSIC

Edited by H. C. BECK

Stokowski to Open Fall Season Oct. 6

Bach and Beethoven Works to Feature Five Programs of Phila. Orchestra

A "Bach-Beethoven Cycle" will feature the five programs which are to make up the season for the Philadelphia Orchestra, which begins October 6.

Two of the most famous works for chorus and orchestra will be presented, Bach's B Minor Mass, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. It is not known yet who the soloists will be for the two choral concerts.

On March 9, 10 and 12, Yehudi Menuhin, the young genius of the bow, will be heard in the Beethoven Concerto for violin and orchestra. In another program of the cycle, Vladimir Horowitz will appear as piano soloist. The other concerts of the cycle are scheduled for March 2 and 3, March 16 and 17 and April 27 and 28, the closing concerts of the season.

Leopold Stokowski, director of the orchestra, declares it is planned to present "as many as possible of the inspired works of all periods and to include examples of contemporary music.

* * *

The vocal department of the Philadelphia Conservatory of Music, 216 South Twentieth street, resumed teaching on Monday.

Next Monday at 8 p. m. auditions for an opera class will be held, in charge of Mrs. Hendrik Ezerman, managing director. At 11 a. m. Tuesday a contest will be held to decide the recipient of a $400 scholarship in piano with Dr. Olga Samaroff.

* * *

Philadelphia will not be included in the seasonal concert tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time in 10 years it will visit Washington and Baltimore, and will make a western tour to Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Schenectady and Chicago. The tour will open Oct. 6.

* * *

A vocal and piano recital will be given tomorrow at Belmont Mansion, Orthopedic Clinic Department of St. Philadelphia, for benefit of the Christopher's Children's Hospital. Artists will be Helen Kressley Hess, piano; Ruth Weir Miller, soprano, and Wilbur Evans, baritone.

* * *

Rehearsals will be resumed Tuesday at 8:15 p. m., by the Fortnightly Club in the Whittier Chapel, Fifteenth and Cherry streets, Philadelphia, Henry Gordon Thunder conducting. Dr. Thunder announces that application for membership may be made to him.

* * *

A rare treat for music lovers is seen in the announcement that the Philadelphia Bach Choir will give a church performance this year of Bach's B Minor Mass, originally scheduled for last year at the Holy Trinity. The performance was postponed last year due to illness of Dr. Thunder.

LaPorte Joins Staff At Fuhrman School

Manny La Porte, pianist who is heard daily over stations WCAU, Wip and WPEN, has been engaged for instruction in modern piano technique by the Fuhrman School of Music, 581 Stevens street.

Director Clarence Fuhrman also announced that Albert Doyne, well known Russian cellist, would supervise the cello department. Doyne has been cellist at the Hotel Benjamin Franklin, Philadelphia, for the past seven years.

Clarence Cox, composer and violinist, heads the department of theory, and is available for instruction in the harmony, counterpoint and orchestration.

Lively Dance Tunes In RCA Records

RCA Victor record releases this week offer exceptionally captivating tunes out of the popular numbers. That weekend dance party can not improve itself without these foxtrots:

"The Last Round-Up," 24391-A, and "Beloved," 24391-B," by Don Bestor and His Orchestra. Both fit right into Bestor's forte of interpretation. His "Round-Up" is better than any we've heard over the radio.

"Swingy Little Things," 24390-A, and "Time to Go," 24390-B, offers a most popular time with Don Bestor wielding the baton.

"Come Up and See Me Sometime," 24389-A, and "You Excite Me," 24389-B, offers Ramona and her piano, Paul Whiteman's star, in two catchy airs.

"Tomorrow," 24392-B, and "This Time It's Love," 24392-A, assures you more of Isham Jones "bluish" music.

"Jealousy," 24388-A, is another of Jones, and "Seven Years With the Wrong Woman," 24388-B, is a foxtrot with the blues strain predominating and is interpreted by Ray Noble and His Orchestra.

Symphony Opens For New Students

The Symphony Club, 1235 Pine street, Philadelphia, will open its twenty-fifth season during the first week of October, and is still engaged in registering and examining applicants for membership on Tuesday and Thursday evenings.

There is no charge for membership, which is open without qualification to age, creed, sex or color. Studies offered include orchestral training, two piano ensemble work, chamber music work, a two-year theory course and classes in ear training.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS
SEP 29 1933

Hilger Sisters Engaged For Bach Club

One of the pleasantest of our duties is to set forth the plans of the Bach Club, as well as to comment on the results of their efforts.

Hence it is satisfactory to note that the series sponsored by the club at Cadoa Hall is expected to continue this season, opening on Wednesday evening, November 29, when the Hilger sisters will give a program of compositions for piano, cello and violin.

The LeRoy trio, making use of that unusual combination, the flute, cello and piano, are to appear on January 3, the Bach Club ensemble on March 21, all Wednesdays.

Negotiations are under way to bring on April 4 the Harvard Glee Club, the paradoxical name of an outstanding choral group, which has appeared with the leading symphony orchestras of Europe and America, though never in Baltimore. This club is to sing the B Minor mass with the Boston Symphony this season.

As a closing glory, Myra Hess, the great pianist, is to be presented on February 21, a concert not included in the series.

H. A. F. P.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
SEP 30 1933

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its fifty-third season. The personnel of 110 players remains virtually unchanged as it has stood for a number of seasons past. Pittsburgh is one of the few cities to be favored with a Boston Symphony concert outside of their home city, and on Friday evening, October 27, the orchestra under Koussevitzky will give a concert at Syria Mosque.

Other attractions for the early musical season include Fritz Kreisler, who has not been heard in Pittsburgh for three seasons; Paul Kochanski, another violinist; Grete Stueckgold, Metropolitan Grand Opera soprano; the Russian Grand Opera Company of 100 artists, in "Coq D'Or," or "The Golden Cockerel;" and the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.

The Art Society, of which Dr. Thomas S. Arbuthnot is president, is celebrating its sixtieth anniversary this season, and the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president, enters upon the eighteenth year of service to this community next month.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
SEP 26 1933

SINFONIETTA TO APPEAR TONIGHT

Six Composers Represented on Program to Be Given at Hollins

The Boston Sinfonietta, an ensemble of prominent members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and under the direction of Arthur Fielder, will appear in the Little Theatre at Hollins college tonight at 8:30 o'clock under the auspices of the Hollins school of music.

Mr. Fiedler not only is the conductor of the Sinfonietta but also is its founder. Carrying the idea of the need of such an orchestra in his mind for several years, he assembled the group about five years ago. Mr. Fiedler is also conductor of the Cecilia Society chorus, the MacDowell club orchestra and conducts a weekly broadcast with the "Sinfonietta" Sunday evenings over station WEEI, Boston. Last June Mr. Fiedler received the honorary M. A. degree from Tufts college.

Conspicuous Success.

The Sinfonietta, composed of 16 musicians besides the conductor, has appeared with conspicuous success in many of New England's cities and towns, and its concerts in Boston have received praise from the critics and the public.

The concert tour of the Sinfonietta outside New England has been arranged because of persistent requests from music clubs and educational institutions who desire to hear the famous organization. It will be presented by special arrangement with Aaron Richmond and under the management of Demeter Zachareff, of Boston

The program for the concert this evening follows:

I. Arcangelo Corelli (1653-1713)—Suite for Strings.
II. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756-1791)—Symphony in G-minor No. 40 (Kochel 550).
III. Johannes Brahms (1833-1897)—Hungarian Dances in G-minor and in D-major.
IV. Claude Debussy (1862-1918)—Petite Suite.
V. Richard Wagner (1813-1883)—"Traume," a Violin Solo.
VI. Carl Maria von Weber (1786-1826)—Overture to the opera "Der Freischuetz."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
SEP 30 1933

American Music Marks Concerts

Koussevitsky to Conduct Work of Native Composers

THE recent wave of interest in American composers will probably cause a marked reform in the symphonic programs to be heard in Washington this season.

Koussevitsky

The latest well-known conductor to make the general announcement that he will include a number of exceptionally fine scores by native composers is Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. So far he has made no specific announcement of the programs for the three Washington concerts of this orchestra on Nov. 15, Jan. 30 and April 4, all at 4:40 p. m., and all at Constitution Hall.

Koussevitsky opens the Boston's season in its home town next Friday, thus beginning the 53d season of the orchestra. Last May he was guest conductor with the British Broadcasting Co. orchestra, which is rapidly gaining fame for itself, altho heard in this country only thru the medium of Victor recordings. Remarking on his London experience, Koussevitsky said England is now having a musical renaissance, "which puts England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

Before coming to Washington, Koussevitsky will conduct the Boston Symphony on a tour of the Middle West, which includes a concert at the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
SEP 27 1933

MUSIC LOVERS GET ORCHESTRAL TREAT

Boston Sinfonietta Appears to Appreciative Audience at Hollins

Not often are the music lovers of this section privileged to hear a concert like that which opened the season at the Little Theatre at Hollins College last night. The sixteen musicians who compose the Boston Sinfonietta, and their conductor, Arthur Fiedler, gave to an appreciative and enthusiastic audience a program which was indeed an orchestral treat.

The program, which was admirably suited to the size and strength of the orchestra, opened with a suite for strings only by Corelli. The first two pieces of this group were delightful dances of the Seventeenth Century—Sarabanda, and Giga—and the third, a most effective bit called Badineria, was played on muted strings.

In the second number, the Mozart G-minor symphony, the piano was added to the ensemble. Not once was it heard above the other instruments, although its use, except as solo accompanied by orchestra, is rather rare. The four movements of this well known symphony, allegro molto, andante, menuetto and allegro assai, were so well done that any comment, save the applause it so well merited and received, would be superfluous.

After the symphony came two familiar Hungarian dances by Brahms, the first one in G-minor and the second in D-major. Although heard here many times, they were never better played than last night and the long continued applause brought forth an encore, a dainty little minuet for muted strings by Bolzoni.

The program continued with one of the better known suites of Claude Debussy, containing four numbers. The first two were descriptive pieces, En Bateau and Cortege, and the last two dances in the modern manner, a minuet and ballet. These were charmingly done and thoroughly enjoyed.

Gaston Ekus, first violin, played the next number, Traume from Tristan and Isolde by Wagner, with orchestral accompaniment. It is to be regretted that he could not be induced to play more, as his wonderful tone and faultless technique made of this a "dream" to be remembered.

Last on the program came the popular Der Freischuetz overture by Weber. In this the sixteen musicians sounded like a full orchestra so great was the tone volume produced. Much enthusiastic applause induced an encore, the beloved Blue Danube waltzes, which Mr. Fiedler announced had been requested. Still not satisfied, the audience demanded, and were given yet another encore, that realistic and characteristic Rimsky-Korsakof sketch. The Flight of the Bumble Bee. The flutist received a special ovation for his hard work in this difficult little scrap.

Each member of this Sinfonietta is an artist of the first rank, and Mr. Fiedler although unostentatious, a most capable and inspiring leader. This, with the perfect acoustics of the Hollins Little Theatre, left nothing to be desired in an evening of music unless perhaps one mentions the empty seats, which should all have been filled.

The Sinfonietta is composed of 16 musicians in addition to Mr. Fiedler, the organizer and conductor, two being members of his family—a sister Miss Elsa Fiedler, the lone feminine member of the orchestra, who plays the piano, and an uncle, Bernard Fiedler, second violinist. The other instruments represented are three first violins, viola, cello, double bass, flute, clarinet, oboe, bassoon, French horn, trumpet, trombone, and tympani.

An interesting feature of the program, just before the playing of the third group, was the presentation of each instrument in a solo part, and a brief description by Mr. Fiedler of its part in the orchestra. Some of these were greeted with hearty applause.

The concert last night was the first appearance of the Boston Sinfonietta at Hollins college and the first in Virginia this season. It is to be followed by similar appearances at several other Virginia colleges this week. The tour is being made in a charted bus and is under the direction of Demeter Zachareff, of Boston. Mr. Zachareff stated last night that all of the other concerts in Virginia on this tour will be repetitions of last year's tour, and that the orchestra would have played at Hollins last season but for a conflict in dates. He said this is the seventh season the Sinfonietta has been on tour, and that its personnel has not been changed during the past three seasons. The players, being members of the Boston Symphony, rank among the foremost artists in this country, and are selected for the Sinfonietta for their particular fitness in the smaller organization which is the counter part of the full symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ERIE, PA.,
DISPATCH-HERALD
SEP 29 1933

PERFECT RADIO SET IS NEEDED FOR CHILDREN

Gives Them a Correct Knowlege of Music Art

By ANEURIN BODYCOMBE
Director Music, KDKA

Radio has increased music enjoyment by bringing into the home the great music of all times by the greatest of living artists and musical organizations. For example—Walter Damrosch in his Music Appreciation Hour, the concerts of the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony, Grand Opera from Chicago and Metropolitan Opera house, radio orchestras like Frank Black's and Sodero's and such programs as "Words and Music" and others which have served to bridge the gap in the average person's music education between the popular classics and ballads, and the more advanced type of music. The public taste for music has, without question, been improved since the advent of radio.

Radio opportunities have been in proportion to the perfection of the broadcast.

The appreciation of good entertainment has increased, consequently, this condition has its effects on the quality of radio programs.

In the early days the range of frequencies was very limited. We found our music to a great extent imperfect on account of the transmitters and receiving sets.

Radio research engineers have done and are still doing everything possible to bring the art of broadcasting to a state of perfection. Transmitters and receiving sets are constantly improved and the difficulty today is to tell whether you are actually listening to an instrument or voice, or the broadcast of the same instrument or voice.

The studio itself plays an important part in any broadcast. The acoustical properties have been carefully studied and the placing of different instruments or voices is only part of a complete set-up of detail in production. The result of all this careful preparation together with modern equipment at both ends is what we hear in our homes.

It is quite obvious that if a radio listener is to profit by results — these studies he must avail himself of the best in the way of equipment and listen to the stations which have perfected their methods of broadcasting.

Would you give your friends or family imperfectly prepared food? Of course not! Neither should you give your family or guests poor radio programs because of poor or defective receiving sets.

Radio listeners have an obligation to keep their receiving sets at their best, so that radio developments may show in programs received. If everybody had obsolete radio sets the advancement of radio would be greatly retarded. For this reason many people do not get the full value of radio programs. This is particularly deplorable in families where there are growing children, as the result may be to make them unappreciative of good music when the effect should be just the opposite. One might cite an example of a badly tuned piano in a home. It has a tendency to distort a perfectly balanced sense of music appreciation.

We are fast becoming a music loving people and we should encourage every avenue of increasing this growing love for the best in music by keeping our radio sets in perfect order.

11

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

SEP 30 1933

Music

The Season Begins—Pittsburgh Grand Opera Shaping Up—Ralph Lewando to Conduct—Ferdinand Fillion's New String Orchestra — Organists Guild—Caspar Koch Tomorrow—Shapiro Quartet to Be Heard.

By Harvey Gaul.

There is always a thrill to the opening of the fall season. We are almost pathetic in our expectations, we anticipate so much, hope so much, desire so much.

Strange to say this season holds a deal of promise, indeed we can't remember a year when there was more in prospect, and this in the face of current discouragement.

The theater may have the jitters and blind staggers, but the concert world goes on, with new ventures taking shape and old ones taking on a fresh lease of life.

Ever so many things coming, the Pittsburgh Metropolitan Grand Opera, the Pittsburgh String Orchestra, Ferdinand Fillion conducting, the String Ensemble under Oscar Del Bianco, moving into Carnegie Hall, the Shapiro String Quartet offering a season at the Schenley, the recently formed Wachter Quartet, offering a season at Carnegie Lecture Hall, and Ralph Lewando's new organization, a string sinfonietta at P. C. W., Hulda Lefridge has a rich series.

All of the old organizations are continuing and most groups have excellent programs. The Art Society offers an art-season. The "Y" has a stunning course. May Beegle has a galaxy of gilt-edge names and for good measure includes Rimsky's "Coq d'Or," the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association offers Boston and other symphonies, and it is briuted around the Gieseking will again play with the Pittsburgh Symphony, A. Modarelli, batonman. Ernest Lunt has worked his Mendelssonians up to a state of fenzy and they sing this year with the Pittsburgh Symphony, Handel's "Messiah" being the work.

On paper and in the air, Pittsburgh is offered one of its best seasons. What the box office will be remains to be seen. Despite the present qualms the entrepreneurs are not pessimistic. They might well be, but there is a note of courage in every enterprise.

Can it be that the spirit of NRA is working in music?

Pittsburgh Grand Opera.

A few weeks ago Chevalier Antonio Certo invited a few of us down for Italian vino and a round of Roman pattisseries. He laid all his cards on the table, he who doubted opera, could read and understand.

Chevalier Certo is a straight shooter, and there he differs from some opera maestri we might mention. He has put his own money in the Pittsburgh Metropolitan Grand Opera Company, and it is swim or die with him—and we hope he does some fine and fancy floating, and that it is not all up-stream swimming.

Certo is no chisseler, no grafter; he doesn't ask for the earth and the blue cyclorama thrown in; he only wants to produce decent opera for Pittsburgh.

Opera is a quaint old Italian custom, there never was a man born within ear-shot of La Scala, Milan or Rome, who did not say, sometime in his life, go to, I will produce "Il Trovatore." It's in the blood, certo and certi.

Well, Pittsburgh does need opera and we hope the Certo enterprise is a success. He takes over the Mosque October 20, and brings on Giuseppe Creatore (the man with the hair, the Italian wind-mill) to direct Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Saturday matinee will be "Traviat," and at night tuneful "Norma" will be heard.

Karl Heinrich is preparing the ballet (watch for the "Dance of the Hours") and youthful James G. Borrelli is chief d'orchestre. Amato is coming on and several other luminaries.

Salute, Chevalier, and may your lyrics turn to liri—oh, well, expenses anyway.

P. W. C. Strings.

Alice Goodell, M. A., director of music, P. C. W., Woodland Road, announces a string orchestra for her academy. Ralph Lewando, of the violin department, will direct the ensemble, and the orchestra is open to girls and women regardless of school, age, brand of cigarets or chorine affiliations. All that Ralph asks is that a girl be sensible of her first position—or at least bring a letter of recommendation from her last position, the violin being what it is.

Pittsburgh needs just such an organization, the only other woman ensemble is the Tuesday Musical Club string group. Now that Carolyn St. John is considering studying double bass maybe she can tuck her cute little instrument under her arm and go from one ensemble to another.

Mr. Lewando's rehearsals are on Monday afternoons, time 4 to 5:30. Bring your own resin.

Pittsburgh String Orchestra.

The men composing the Pittsburgh String Orchestra are showing unusual zeal. Ferdinand Fillion has chosen the Chausson concerto as his major work, and as soloist he is offering Toscha Seidel. There is great enthusiasm for the project, from Herman Clement to Dr. M. W. Rubinstein, and they expect to sell out Carnegie Hall for their January concert.

The Organists Guild Tuesday.

Harold E. Schuneman, the energetic dean of the American Guild of Organists, Western Pennsylvania Chapter, starts this fall with a dinner at Gammon's, Tuesday night of next week.

After the dinner Madelaine Emrich, student of Fontainbleau, gives a recital at St. Andrew's Church. She took her master's degree at Oberlin under the late and revered George W. Andrews. Her program is formidable and novel and is commended.

The A. G. O. made tremendous strides under Julian Williams and with Harold Schuneman at the helm it should carry on famously.

Caspar Koch Starts Year.

Caspar Petrus Koch, armed with a portfolio of new transcriptions, new works, starts his Northside series tomorrow afternoon. It is the forty-fifth season of free organ recitals over there where the bronze worker studies the market house, and that is a long, honorable and creditable record.

Shapiro Quartet Resames.

Max Shapiro full of ideas, having faith in man, the future and wire E strings, starts his season, and this year he won't take us calling, he'll put us in the Hotel Schenley, where chairs are chairs instead of undertaker's contributions.

Mr. Shapiro spent the summer looking over the string quartet library and comes forth with a desk full of novelties, among them being a Caesar Casadro, a last word in something or other.

Clustered around Maximus the First, are William Loesel, second fiddle; Francis Kleyle, viola, and Samuel Kliachko, cellist, all able men. Big year for the Shapiros.

Schenley Series.

Hulda Lefridge announces a new series at the Schenley Thursday morning musicales. Next Thursday, Samuel Di Primo, tenor, and Samuel Kliachko, cellist, will give the program. Capital talents are featured on the Schenley programs.

Post Oct 1

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As already noted in this place, Dr. Koussevitzky's programme for the first of the season's pairs of Symphony Concerts, which fall upon Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, embraces Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony, Debussy's Nocturnes and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy." This season will be the orchestra's 53d and Dr. Koussevitzky's 10th.

* * * *

Although the conductor has made no statement of his plans since his arrival in Boston, in New York he dropped a few hints of what might be forthcoming. From these New York interviews it could be gleaned that the impending presence in this city, as teacher of composition, of Arnold Schoenberg would be marked by a performance of his comparatively recent Variations, a much discussed work, as yet unknown in this city. Other composers mentioned as likely to be heard through new works were Nicolai Berezowski, Aaron Copland, Charles Koechlin and Arthur Honegger. Mention was made of a festival in the spring designed to mark the completion of Dr. Koussevitzky's first decade in Boston, but no details were disclosed.

BRADDOCK, PA.
NEWS HERALD

SEP 29 1933

Fine Symphonies, Operas In Store For Music Lovers At Syria Mosque

To Present Russian Grand Opera Company.

Of widespread interest is the announcement that the Russian Grand Opera Company, including one hundred artists, has been engaged by May Beegle for a performance of "Le Coq D'Or" at Syria Mosque on Thursday evening, November 30th. The company is under the artistic direction of Max Panteleieff, who also sings the leading baritone role in the opera. The music of "Coq D'Or," or "The Golden Cockerel" is by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and shows the great Russian at the height of his powers. This opera has been in the repertoire of the New York Metropolitan Opera Company for a number of years, and is said to be one of Gatti-Casassa's favorite operas. The costumes and scenery will portray all the richness and picturesqueness of Russian Opera of Imperial Days.

The opera will be presented here with an all-Russian cast, including in addition to Mr. Panteleieff, Michael Schvet, basso of the Petrograd and Moscow opera companies; Boris Belostozsky, tenor of the Moscow Art Theatre; Joseph Kallini, tenor of the Petrograd, Moscow, Kiev and Milan Opera Houses; Nadine Fedora, also of the principal European opera houses, and Thalia Sabanieva of the Petrograd and Moscow Opera, as well as the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York.

Famous Orchestra Leaders To Conduct.

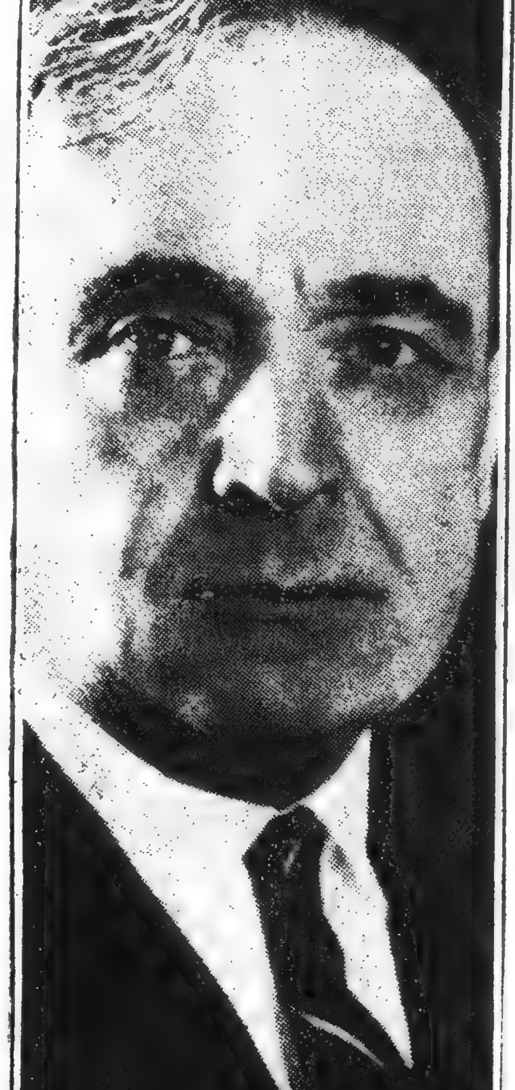
Among the world-famous conductors who have made the summer symphony season the most notable in the history of summer concerts in America are Hans Kindler, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Eugene Ormandy. Mr. Kindley, conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra, of Washington, D. C., proved an outstanding attraction with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at the Stadium Concerts in New York City. Mr. Garilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Orchestra, was acclaimed at the Hollywood Bowl Concerts in Los Angeles, as well as with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra at the open air concerts at the Woodlawn Theatre. While Gabrilowitsch's art with the baton is that of an expert, conducting from memory, he also ranks among the greatest pianists of the generation, and on the occasion of his San Francisco appearance, he appeared in the dual role of conductor and pianist, playing Schubert's charming Rosamunde excerpts and ballet music. Mr. Gabrilowitsch will also appear as piano soloist in the Pittsburgh concert. Eugene Ormandy, of the Minneapolis Orchestra, was the magnet for thousands when he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra at Robin Hood Dell.

Pittsburgh is among the few favored cities who will hear these conductors this season, when they bring their orchestras to Syria Mosque. In addition to the three conductors named, the series will also include the Boston Symphony, with Koussevitzky, who conducted a series of Koussevitzky Concerts in Paris during the early summer. The Boston Symphony will open the Pittsburgh series, which is under the auspices of the Pittsbugh Orchestra Association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., President.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 1 - 1933

Musical Per



DR KOUSSEVITZKY

KOUSSEVITZKY will bring his sterling orchestra, the Boston Symphony, to Columbus

---

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

SEP 30 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY THREE CONCERTS HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play three concerts in Washington this year under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The programs are scheduled for Wednesday afternoons at 4:40 o'clock, November 15, January 30, and April 4. Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey is sponsoring the return of this famous musical group, faithfully carrying on the traditions of her aunt, Mrs. Wilson-Greene, in the same office at Droop's music store.

Dr Koussevitzky reached Boston during the past week from a summer abroad, much of which was spent in the study of new music which the orchestra will give for the first time in America this season. Although Koussevitzky did not reveal the names of the composers, he stated that whatever music of true importance and interest has been composed within the past year will have a place on 1933-34 programs of the Boston Symphony.

Some exceptionally fine scores by American composers are among the music selected by Koussevitzky for the coming year, though it is not known, at this time what music will enter into his three Washington programs.

The conductor spent the latter part of the summer at Aix-le-Bains, France, in rest and recreation for his duties of the winter ahead. He spent the month of May in London, where he greatly enjoyed his experience as guest conductor of the British Broadcasting Company's orchestra during that organization's May music festival.

Koussevitzky's conducting on on that occasion caused the London Times to remark that while "the British Broadcasting Company Orchestra is still a longish way behind the Boston Symphony in the quality of some of its personnel and in the matter of style, under Koussevitzky it has shown us the great possibilities latent in it. In all its history it never has played so brilliantly as it did the past week (under Koussevitzky)."

Remarking on his London experience, Koussevitzky said that England is now having a musical renaissance. "The musical creative activity there at this moment shows a distinction and in particular a mastery of form which puts England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

Koussevitzky to Offer Work of English Composers

Herald Oct 1

By ELIZABETH BORTON

A season of symphony concerts in which rather less modern music and fewer novelties than usual will be played is promised by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for 1933 and 1934, beginning with the pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The greater proportion of standard and accepted works on the programs this season is due by no means to any change in Dr. Koussevitzky's feeling that good contemporary music should be heard, but rather to his judgment, after a careful examination of such music as has been composed during the last year, that this has been a "lean season" for first-rate new work, and that though the body of new compositions produced has been large, he finds relatively few that seem worth the time and interest of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Talking huskily, for he has been ill with a throat affliction for the last week, Dr. Koussevitzky added that he is planning a music festival of major proportions and importance for the coming year, but that since plans for it are not yet entirely completed, no further announcement as to its character can be made at this time.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who conducted a festival in London while in England this summer, and was there received with tremendous enthusiasm, feels that the finest contemporary music today, on the whole, is being written in England.

"A grasp of the larger forms, and a feeling for and trust in the English style of musical expression, characterizes the young British composers," says Dr. Koussevitzky. "The Boston Symphony programs this year will contain much of the best work of British contemporary composers, especially Arnold Bax and Vaughan-Williams." Dr. Koussevitzky promises a performance of Bax's third symphony, not yet heard in America, during the winter.

With a symphony season in store that will please conservative musical tastes by its larger-than-usual proportion of standard works, a season of chamber music also rewards the lovers of those things in music which can and should wear the adjective "classic."

BALTIMORE, MD
AMERICAN

OCT 1 - 1933

Stokowski Names Bill For Concert

By CARROLL DULANEY

Leopold Stokowski has selected as the principal work of the program with which the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra will open its series of four concerts at the Lyric on October 18 Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The opening number will be the popular overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and between this and the symphony two unfamiliar works by Josten and Gliere will be given their Baltimore premiere.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, as usual, will open the Lyric season. Mr. Stokowski will direct the concert on December 20, as well as the first of the series. Eugene Ormandy will direct that of November 22 and Issay Dobrowen, who was so favorably received when he made his Baltimore debut last season, both as director and soloist, will direct the final concert on February 14.

And, as usual, the probabilities are that the house will be sold out for the entire series.

Vienna Singing Boys

Following the first concert of the Philadelphia organization the vocal concert season will be opened October 23, when the Vienna Saengerknabe, or Singing Boys of Vienna, return here. This organization made its local debut at the Lyric last winter and attracted much attention. The program will include chorals, folk songs and operatic airs.

The Vienna Saengerknabe was organized in the Fifteenth Century as an adjunct to the court orchestra and has continued to make harmony till the present day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Friday in Boston, its fifty-third season, and its tenth under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky. The organization will give three concerts at the Lyric this season, on November 14, January 31 and April 3. The personnel of 110 has remained unchanged for several years.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

OCT 1 - 1933

Boston Symphony Will Open Season

Orchestra To Play In Baltimore November 14, January 3 And April 3

BOSTON, MASS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its fifty-third season next Friday evening in Symphony Hall. This will be the tenth season during which the organization will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program will include Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture; Brahms' Third Symphony; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The personnel of 110 remains virtually unchanged, as it has stood for a number of seasons past. Dr. Koussevitzky, having returned from a summer in Europe, has announced that all of the new music of true importance and interest composed within the last year will be included upon the season's programs.

The Boston Symphony will fill its first series of concerts in Baltimore this season in a number of years. All will be directed by Dr. Koussevitzky. The dates are November 14, January 31 and April 3.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

OCT 1 - 1933

Concerts Will Be Given for Twenty-Eight Weeks With Dr. Stock Directing

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will open its forty-first season in Orchestra Hall Thursday evening, under the baton of Frederick A. Stock, who, twenty-nine years ago, succeeded Theodore Thomas as conductor.

For the coming twenty-eight weeks the orchestra will play its subscription concerts Thursday evenings and will repeat these programs Friday afternoons for the socially important audience that assembles then. There also will be matinees on the second and fourth Tuesdays, concerts that vie with the fashionable Friday programs in the matter of social prestige.

The great company of music lovers with little money, discovered by the surprising season of popular-priced opera now current at the Auditorium, have not been overlooked by the directors of the Symphony. They cannot be served so generously as in the past when "pops" have been given at prices of admission that could not possibly pay the expenses, just to stimulate and to satisfy the music hunger of the masses. But an unstated number of "pops" will be given—two this month on Saturday evenings, October 7 and 21.

Chance for Visitors

The management points out that a full month of concerts will be played before A Century of Progress closes its gates, and one ventures the hope that visitors to the fair who have thronged the marvelous exhibition of painting and sculpture at the Art Institute also will be attracted to the equally important exposition of great music. If the cultured stranger within our gates desires a definition of Chicago's attitude toward the fine arts, the Art Institute and Orchestra Hall, facing each other across Michigan av., can supply it.

If, further, the visitor wishes to observe our reaction to first class opera at no-class prices he can observe the sold out houses that take advantage of the San Carlo Company's astonishing brand of "dollar" opera now on display at the Auditorium Theater.

But of that, more later.

Dr. Stock stresses the array of soloists announced for the Symphony's programs, six of whom have not been heard previously with the resident orchestra. There are to be twenty, possibly more, of these visitors, of whom the famous ones have naturally been heard often. As to the newcomers they represent, this season, a departure from the custom that has ruled such engagements in America in the past.

Whereas we formerly made welcome the European artists of established fame, this season we are to make places for some young people from abroad who still must win recognition in their native lands.

Thursday's Program

The program for Thursday night comprises four compositions; Johann Sebastian Bach's third suite, which had its first hearing here under the baton of Theodore Thomas in 1891, the Symphony's first season; Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, played by Thomas in 1892; Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" ballet suite, played by Dr. Stock in 1920 and Debussy's "Iberia" introduced to Chicago by Dr. Stock in 1911.

The San Carlo Opera opens its third week in the Auditorium tonight with a repetition of "Il Trovatore" by the cast that presented it last week. Manager Gallo will add "La Traviata" and "La Tosca" to the repertoire. Rosalinda Morini, celebrated coloratura, will make her first appearance here with the San Carlo forces as the heroine of the Verdi-Dumas work and Bianca Saroya will be the Pucini-Sardou heroine.

The week's important operatic news is concerned with the removal from New York to Chicago of the San Carlo company. Mr. Gallo, who has maintained this first class touring company in New York for twenty years and has directed its journeys across the land from that center of culture, was so impressed with Chicago's reception of his artists—about 30,000 attended the first ten performances of his season—says "the box office decides."

Good Location

But he also is influenced by the geographical location of this city, which stands quite truly at the crossroads of the continent. He can administer his tours far more economically from here than from New York. He will, perhaps, discover that he will come nearer to the pulse of public opinion in this city than in one less centrally placed.

An interesting figure in music in America is Philip Hale, whose program notes on the concerts of the Boston Symphony have been so extensively quoted for the past thirty years. Mr. Hale still holds his post as editor of these programs. He is now in Chicago visiting A Century of Progress and doubtless will be feted by the Bohemians and by the resident symphony.

With his wife he is visiting relatives, Mr. and Mrs. Winfield S. Brainerd of 612 Deming place. Though doubtless not here as advance agent, Mr. Hale's visit preludes that of the distinguished organization which he serves. The Boston Symphony, now in its fifty-second season, will come to Orchestra Hall Monday, October 23, under its distinguished Russian conductor, Serge Koussevitsky. Dr. Koussevitsky has occupied this post for the past ten years. This will be the second appearance of the Boston orchestra in Chicago under his direction.

The Operatic Art Theater, under direction of Edouardo Sacerdote, announces three performances this week in the Goodman Theater. "Don Giovanni" will be repeated Monday evening. "La Traviata" will be presented on Wednesday and the Mozart masterpiece will be offered again on Saturday.

The company is made up of a group of resident artists. All performances are given in English in order that the drama may be stressed. For the same reason the performances take place in a small theater and the staging invokes all the modern aids of lighting and mood suggestion which the equipment of the Goodman is, perhaps, better qualified to supply than any other playhouse in the city.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 5 - 1933

NEWS NOTES

The 53rd year of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 6 and 7, when Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, will begin his 10th year as conductor of the famous organization. His program of "acknowledged classics" will conclude with Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" which was the final number played upon the first program of Dr. Koussevitzky's first year as conductor of the Boston Symphony. There will be 23 Friday afternoon and one Thursday afternoon (to avoid Good Friday) concerts, 24 Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evenings, six Tuesday afternoons, and two Sunday afternoons, in Symphony hall, Boston, the two latter for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. Other cities in which the orchestra will play this year include, Washington, Baltimore, Chicago, Buffalo, Schenectady, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Brooklyn; Providence and New York.

* * * *

The first of the free concerts in the lecture hall of the Boston Public library was given Monday evening, Oct. 2, and the first of the lectures on the Boston Symphony programs, in the same place, Thursday afternoon, Oct. 5.

MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

OCT 1 1933

German Music Loss Termed Gain For France

Boston Conductor Finds Exiled Artists Swarming to Paris.

Boston, Mass., Sept. 30.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although by no means a "pollyanna" type, sees at least a small silver lining in the treatment that certain musicians have had at the hands of Hitler.

Really there were two "linings," as Dr. Koussevitzky turned the matter over in his mind on his return from his usual summer in Europe. One is French and the other American.

"Paris is full of exiled German musicians of the first rank," said Dr. Koussevitzky. And Paris is France, musically as well as politically. It also is full of French musicians of the first rank.

Urges Them to Go to Provinces.

"When I talked to my German friends, and they said: 'What shall we do?' I said, 'Go to the provinces. It will be good for the provinces, and it will be good for you as well.'

"Because, you see, music is too much concentrated in Paris. The other cities, Bordeaux, Nice, Marseilles, Lyons and the like all have some music, it's true, but very little first rate music. And a public exists there, ready to be developed, just as it exists in smaller cities of this country. In Germany the smaller places have proportionately a great deal more than in France.

"It is possible that, musically, Germany's loss may be France's great gain."

The second silver lining is that Arnold Schoenberg, the famous modernist composer and a Hitler "exile," is to come to Boston to live and teach.

Schoenberg to Get Bid.

After digesting the news, Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at the conclusion that he most likely would ask Schoenberg to conduct the Boston orchestra in a program of his own works—some of which have caused riotious scenes in foreign concert halls when first presented.

The Boston orchestra, under Koussevitzky one of the most receptive in the world to new music by younger composers, will continue its established course, Dr. Koussevitzky declares.

Among the Americans to be represented on this winter's programs are Nicolai Berezowcky (whose fantasy for two pianos and orchestra was played last winter in New York and this summer at the Lewisohn stadium concerts), Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne. Mr. Berezowsky's third symphony is to be played in Boston.

Conducts Only in London.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted only in London this summer, and as a result of his London stay has brought back with him works by Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Arnold Bax for use this winter. Some other distinguished foreign composers who will provide new works for the Boston season are Zoltan Kodaly, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Lourie, Igor Markevitch, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Filip Lazar.

The conductor was asked whom he placed at the head of the list of modern composers.

"Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Hindemith," he replied promptly. "Prokofieff is a very fine musician, too, but I am Russian, and if I add him to the list people will say, 'Oh, yes, but that is just national feeling!' "

KOUSSEVITZKY TODAY OPENS 10TH SEASON WITH SYMPHONY

This afternoon Dr Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 10th season in America as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Symphony Hall opens its doors for the first Symphony concert of the year. The conductor has completely recovered from a slight illness and today will lead an orchestra virtually unchanged from the season past.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," which stood upon the conductor's initial program 10 years ago, will again be played this afternoon. The other numbers will be Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No 3; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the Third Symphony of Brahms. The program will be repeated tomorrow night.

AMUSEMENTS

New York Herald-Tribune

OCT 1 - 1933

Downes to Give Two Brooklyn Concert Courses

Critic and Musicians of Prominence to Appear in Series at Academy

The "Enjoyment of Music" course of lecture-concerts given last season by Olin Downes, music critic of "The New York Times," with the collaboration of noted artists and ensembles under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences will be continued and expanded this season, according to an announcement from the institute. There will be an afternoon and an evening course of fifteen programs each at the Brooklyn Academy of Music; the first arranged so as to illustrate the development of musical forms and styles, while the second, supplementing the other, illustrates various phases of music. The schedule for the afternoon course, on Tuesdays at 4 o'clock, is:

October 17, Melody, the Core of Music, Hall Johnson Negro Choir; October 31, instruments and early styles of instrumental music, with a small orchestra of ancient instruments; November 14, evolution of song forms, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; November 28, the combining of melodies, the New English Singers; December 12, the sonata, Egon Petri, pianist; January 2, the transition from polyphonic to homophonic music in the eighteenth century, Paris Instrumental Quintet; January 16, Goethe and the song composers, Heinrich Schlusnus, barytone; January 23, sonatas for the piano, Myra Hess; February 6, folksongs of different nations and periods, Victor Chenkin, barytone-diseur; February 3, the symphony before Beethoven, Georges Barrere's Little Symphony; February 27, music for two pianos, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison; March 6, the string quartet and its predecessors, Perole Quartet; March 20, Russian songs, Sophie Braslau; March 27, the larger forms of chamber music, Kroll Sextet; April 6 (or 8), symphonic music by living composers, Serge Koussevitzky and twenty-four members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The following schedule is announced for the evening series:

Friday, October 13, the opera, its origins and influence upon song, Lucrezia Bori, soprano; Monday, October 23, Bach's solo and chamber music, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist; Tuesday, November 7, folksongs and art songs, John Charles Thomas, barytone; Tuesday, November 21, music for the violin, Mischa Elman; Friday, December 8, the Italian music drama, Rosa Ponselle, soprano; Tuesday, December 19, medieval and modern choral music, Wiener Saengerknaben; Tuesday, January 9, 18th Century piano music, Jose Iturbi; Monday, January 15, modern quartet music, Roth Quartet; Tuesday, January 30, German lieder, Grete Stueckgold, soprano; Wednesday, February 14, chromaticism in piano music from Bach to Cesar Franck, Harold Bauer; Wednesday, February 28, the modern symphony and symphonic poem, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Monday, March 5, classic and modern forms of violin music, Yehudi Menuhin; Tuesday, March 13, song of the classic and modern periods, Maria Olszewska; Tuesday, March 27, piano music of the modern period, Walter Gieseking; Tuesday, April 10, music of Richard Wagner.

The afternoon course will be held in the music hall and the evening course in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OC[illegible] 1933

BOSTON'S BAND OPENS SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its fifty-third season at Symphony Hall, Boston, last night. Dr. Koussevitzky has led the orchestra for 10 years, and has produced an immense repertory. Pittsburgh is one of the few cities to be visited by the Boston Symphony this year. On Friday evening, October 27, the orchestra will give a concert at Syria Mosque.

Other important attractions for the early musical season include Fritz Kreisler, who has not been heard in Pittsburgh for three seasons; Paul Kochanski, another favorite violinist; Grete Stueckgold, Metropolitan Grand Opera soprano; the Russian Grand Opera Company of 100 artists, in "Coq D' Or," or the Golden Cockerel, and the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, which is at present playing to unprecedented crowds in London.

The Art Society, of which Dr. Thomas S. Arbuthnot is president, is celebrating its sixtieth anniversary this season, and the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president, enters upon the eighteenth year of service to this community next month.

(m)

CHRONICLE

Reading Mass.

OCT 6 1933

Sept. 1, 1933.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Visit World Fair

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its 10th season under Koussevitzky on Oct. 6, will visit Chicago in the last week of the Exposition, according to a recent decision of the trustees. This concert on Oct. 23, will be part of a western tour. For the first time in a dozen years, the orchestra will give series in the nation's capital, and in Baltimore.

The usual visits to New York and other cities, together with the usual Boston series of 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evening, and shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts, will bring the season's schedule to 110 concerts.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky arrived from Europe, Wednesday, Sept. 20, on the Ile de France. Announcement of notable features for the anniversary season of the famous leader is expected on his arrival.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

1933

* * *

London Opinion

The only professional engagement which Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, permitted himself during his summer vacation was one to direct three concerts by the British Broadcasting Orchestra in London.

The following comments by Ernest Newman, most distinguished of contemporary English critics, are doubly interesting because they apply to works which we have heard Dr. Koussevitzky read in Columbus:

> "In the Wagner pieces (the Venusberg music, the Siegfried Idyll, and the 'Meistersinger' overture) we have had the perfect combination of beauty in detail and the architect's sense of the proportions and the build of the works as a whole: the Idyll, with its tranquil flow for the greater part of the time, the steadily growing climax, and the gradual ebbing of the tide at the finish, was particularly beautiful.
>
> "The reading of the fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky not only blotted out the memory of the many bad performances we have had of the work during recent years, but raised the composer in our estimation. It is all a matter, seemingly, of proportion and of understanding: Mr. Koussevitzky showed us that, for one thing, the utmost intensity can be given to Tchaikovsky's ardent phrases without their being made to appear hysterical or vulgar, and, for another thing, that the symphony is an organic whole."

The Boston Orchestra will play in Columbus on Oct. 26, as the first of the two concerts to be presented this season by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The box-office will open Oct. 18 at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Mail orders may be sent to Helen Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

OCT 8 - 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance at the Lyric November 14 will mark the return of this famous organization for a regular series of concerts after a long period. Like the Philadelphia and the National Symphony orchestras, the Boston will appear here under the auspices of the Associated Concert Clubs, and all are booked by the T. Arthur Smith Bureau.

All [illegible] of the Boston Orchestra [illegible]rts—the others being Ja[illegible] 31 and April 3—will be di[illegible]d by Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 8 - 1933

* * *

On Friday afternoon Mr. Koussevky, began his tenth season as the der of the Boston Orchestra with a gram which included Beethoven's nore overture, Brahms's Third phony, Debussy's "Nuages" and tes" and Scriabins "Poem Extase."

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

OCT 7 19

Musical Silver Lining Seen in Hitler Stand

Boston Symphony Conductor Says Germany's Loss May Be France's Gain

Boston, Oct. 6 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, although by no means a "Pollyanna" type, sees at least a small silver lining in the treatment that certain musicians have had at the hands of Hitler.

Really there were two "linings," as Dr. Koussevitzky turned the matter over in his mind on his return from his usual summer in Europe. One is French, and the other American.

"Paris is full of exiled German musicians of the first rank," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "And Paris is France, musically as well as politically. It also is full of French musicians of the first rank.

Go to Provinces

"When I talked to my German friends, and they said, 'what shall we do?' I said 'go to the provinces. It will be good for the provinces, and it will be good for you as well.'

"Because, you see, music is too much concentrated in Paris. The other cities, Bordeaux, Nice, Marseilles, Lyons, and the like all have some music, it's true, but very little first rate music. And a public exists there, ready to be developed, just as it exists in smaller cities of this country. In Germany, the smaller places have proportionately, a great deal more than in France.

News Digested

"It is possible that, musically, Germany's loss may be France's great gain."

The second silver lining is that Arnold Schoenberg, the famous modernist composer and a Hitler "exile" is to come to Boston to live and teach.

After digesting the news, Dr. Koussevitzky arrived at the conclusion that he most likely would ask Schoenberg to conduct the Boston orchestra in a program of his own works—some of which have caused riotous scenes in foreign concert halls when first presented, particularly a set of variations for orchestra in which the theme reads the same backward as forward.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 7 - 1933

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the opening concert, Friday, October 27, of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, when the Boston Symphony comes to the Mosque.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 8 - 1933

Koussevitzky to Open Orchestral Season

Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens the Pittsburgh orchestral season on Friday evening, October 27, at Syria Mosque, this year is celebrating his tenth anniversary with this organization.

Other distinguished orchestras to be included in the course of four evenings, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, are the Detroit, under Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will appear in the dual role of conductor and piano soloist; the Minneapolis Orchestra, with the young Hungarian conductor, Eugene Ormandy, and the National Symphony Orchestra, of Washington, with Hans Kindler conducting.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 8 -

Lauded in London Is Koussevitzky

ONE of Serge Koussevitzky's first American appearances since his return from Europe will be made in Memorial Hall Thursday evening, Oct. 26, when he brings his superb Boston Symphony orchestra to Columbus to open the tenth season of the Symphony club of Central Ohio.

When he returned a year ago, after his annual tour of the conti? nent, it was reported that he had obtained the manuscript of the Sibelius Eighth Symphony, at that time not produced, and the hope sprang up among the lover of the great Scandinavian composer that this new symphony would be among Koussevitzky's offerings on tour here.

Again this year the wish has been expressed widely that this number might be heard. So that it is interesting to read from an early summer copy of the London, England, Telegraph, the following:

"To know Sibelius well one must possess the power of divining his thought. Those long climaxes, those curious melodic designs, cannot be realized by systems that respond well in the case of music which has grown out of a long tradition. And Mr. Koussevitzky gave us an interpretation which was not only technically superb, but closely in sympathy with Sibelius mind and emotion."

Evidently the austere ones in London, who welcomed the America orchestra leader and musician with enthusiasm after several years' absence, approved highly of his rendition of the symphony.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 8 - 1933

Koussevitzky Opens Boston Music Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, which will be heard in Washington this coming season in three matinee concerts at Constitution Hall, opened its fifty-third season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday night, October 6, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

This season will be Koussevitzky's tenth with the Boston Symphony, the longest consecutive term of service ever served by a conductor with that organization.

The program of the orchestra's opening concert included Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony, Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fetes," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The Boston Symphony will make its first 1933-34 appearance in Washington at Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon, November 15, at 4:40 o'clock. Two other concerts at the same hour will be given during the winter, on Tuesday afternoon, January 30, and Wednesday afternoon, April 4.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1933

Symphony Orchestra

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, with its full strength of 110 players, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22, at 4 o'clock. Its program will be the same as that of the following night in Chicago. The orchestra has just opened its 53d season in Boston, playing to an audience that packed the hall to the doors and paid a premium for standing room.

While Dr. Koussevitzky was in Europe this last summer he gave some time to his guest appearances, some to a rest at Aix-les-Bains, France, and considerable to a search for worthy new music, not alone recent compositions, but hitherto undiscovered manuscripts, a search to which he has devoted much time during his nine years as head of the Boston Symphony. The orchestra comes to Buffalo under the local management of Marian de Forest.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 8 - 1933

Sch'dy. Club Gets 'Break'

How the Schenectady Civic Music association, through a happy circumstance was able to obtain the Boston Symphony orchestra, notoriously difficult to obtain late in the summer, was revealed this week during an informal conversation on bookings.

A Schenectady member of the association, being in Boston on business and having an idle hour on his hands, dropped into the symphony's office to see an acquaintance. While talking with him the Boston man said:

"See here, how would your association like to have the symphony for an early fall booking?"

"Fine," said the Schenectady man, "How come?"

"We've got one date on our tour across New York state that's been cancelled. If we don't fill it, it will mean an idle night for the whole orchestra. That's expensive. You can have October 28 if you want it."

The Schenectady man got in touch with his association directors at once, with the result that the symphony was signed up. And at a considerable saving in the symphony's usual price.

"Then we could have had it here in Albany if we'd known about it," one of the men listening to the conversation here observed.

"Why not," was the reply. "But what's the difference, you can hear it anyway."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

OCT 8 - 1933 /3

Sunday Concert

With its proud record of more than half a century of artistic supremacy, with a conductor of world-wide renown, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's magnetic leadership, opened its 53d season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday night, appearing before an audience that packed the hall to the doors and paid a premium for standing room. The orchestra in its full strength of 110 musicians, with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in the Elmwood Music Hall, Buffalo, on Sunday afternoon, October 22d, at 4 o'clock, presenting here the same program it will play the next night in Chicago.

The orchestra comes to Buffalo under the local management of Marian de Forest.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 8 - 1933

The Smith College concert series will present the following artists and ensembles this season: Guiomar Novaes, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Albert Spalding, the New English Singers, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard and Smith Glee Clubs in a choral program and Heinrich Schlusnus. The chamber music series will have the Brosa String Quartet and the Aguilar Lute Quartet.

Beethoven Cycle For Tuesday Concerts

Her. Oct

A Beethoven cycle, embracing the principal orchestral works of the composer, is announced for the series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 31. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present all of the nine symphonies, including the final choral symphony. The "Emperor" Concerto for Piano, the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello with orchestra, will be played. A feature will be the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" with soprano and narrator; also the Overtures to "Leonore" No. 2, "Coriolanus," and "Prometheus." The names of the soloists will be announced later. The cycle will be given on the following Tuesday afternoons at three o'clock: Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17. A few season tickets are to be had at the subscription office.

The second pair of regular concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8:15. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 of Beethoven. A new score by Nicolai Tcherepnin, "Three Pieces for Orchestra," after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe, will then have its first performance. The introductory number will be Hayden's Symphony in D major No. 3, known as the symphony "with the horn call."

The Don Cossack Russian Male Chorus is about to open another tour of America and will visit Boston to appear in Symphony Hall on Sunday, Oct. 22, at 3:30, which will be the first of the Sunday afternoon concerts this season. Serge Jaroff will lead his remarkable group through a programme of Russian religious music, peasant songs and soldier songs.

Fritz Kreisler is to give a recital on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 5, at 3:30 in Symphony Hall.

Social and Musical Brooklyn Reward Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony

ORCHESTRA HOLDS BORO SPOTLIGHT ALONE THIS YEAR

By CONSTANCE COGAN.

Social Brooklyn, and musical Brooklyn, too, is in sympathy with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is expressing at the box office approval of the fine artistic tradition which for 46 years has made the Academy of Music a mecca for lovers of the symphonic form.

Subscriptions for the current Boston Symphony season are pouring in faster than ever before. The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and an enlarged Brooklyn committee, an impressive aray of sponsors, will initiate the Boston Symphony series of five concerts Friday evening, Nov. 17.

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIBUTE.

The gay social chatter which always marks the first occasion society gathers in the Academy's Opera House each season, will be hushed that Friday evening in November when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, ascends the podium and with his baton signals the 110 Boston Symphony musicians into action.

Society and other music lovers will have two reasons for welcoming Conductor Koussevitzky so warmly that evening. Other concerts are scheduled for Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

They will acknowledge the tenth year Dr. Koussevitzky has lent his talent to the Boston Symphony. They will pay tribute to his brilliant interpretation of the classics as well as his courage in presenting the symphonic efforts of modern and contemporary composers.

REPLACE PHILHARMONIC.

Musical Brooklyn will have another reason for greeting Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Orchestra.

He will receive some of the acclaim ordinarily reserved for the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. This year the Philharmonic did not deign to come to Brooklyn, suggesting that borough music lovers travel to Carnegie Hall for their symphonic enjoyment.

Many whose first love has always been the Philharmonic have now transferred their affections to the Boston Symphony and have become subscribers for the first time this year. The subscription list however reveals that practically all of the familiar faces may be seen again at Boston symphony concerts.

SAME SEATS KEPT.

For twenty-five years or more several prominent Brooklyn families have been renewing their subscription for the concerts each Fall. They request, and obtain, the same seats year after year. They have become standbys. A perusal of the records reveals this year they are reserving larger blocks of seats.

Many debbies undoubtedly will make "appearances" this season at the Boston concerts.

A Junior League group, organized to work with Adrian Van Sinderen's committee, consists of Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Summer Ford, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Miss Florence E. Read and Miss Elizabeth Paffard.

ORCHESTRA'S HISTORY.

Junior Leaguers and other young music lovers have been learning from older committee members of Boston Symphony's heritage. They have been hearing of Wilhelm Gericke's conductorship 40 years ago when the symphony first bid for world acclaim.

Then followed a long procession of noted conductors, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Bauer, Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck, bringing the symphony up until World War time. Two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, wielded the baton during the turbulent war days until Dr. Koussevitzky, the great Russian, in 1924, brought to America and the Boston Symphony a reputation acquired throughout Europe.

The Russian conductor is credited with developing the Boston Symphony along its present trend. It is now noted among orchestras for the beauty of its stringed instruments.

SPONSORS' COMMITTEE.

Mrs. William H. Good, long a sponsor of both the opera and Philharmonic seasons, has organized the new committee backing the Boston Symphony series in Brooklyn. The members are:

Frank L. Babbott, Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, Jr., Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Henry A. Ingraham, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Symphony Formally

Another Year Under The Leadership of Serge Koussevitzky

By Moses Smith
Music Editor

THIS IS THE TIME for greetings. A new musical season has just begun. Whatever else has preceded has served but as preliminary fanfare for the REAL New Year—the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and yesterday evening.

For Boston's musical culture and entertainment are still centered in the "hundred and ten musicians" at Symphony Hall, led by the eminent Serge Koussevitzky. Nor is this state of affairs a reflection of a provincial attitude, but rather a translation into action and attitude of the calm assurance that we have here one of the world's few great orchestras and great conductors.

More than once Dr. Koussevitzky has said to me that Boston has a far more cosmopolitan musical culture than most other American cities. The inference, I assume, is that the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the nine years of Dr. Koussevitzky's tenure have been largely responsible for this culture.

* * *

TO THIS I subscribe most heartily as most thoughtful persons interested in music do. Largely because of Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and courageous pioneering spirit we have come to learn that the creation of great music did not cease with the death of Johannes Brahms in 1897. The Russian conductor's persistent presentation of new music over the protestations of most of his auditors, has borne fruit in a healthier attitude on the part of the listener. Moreover, the good effects of Koussevitzky's lead have been imitated by other program-builders in various types of concerts here, not necessarily symphonic.

For the present season Koussevitzky will presumably have his usual quota of "novelties." Since he has been reluctant to specify what they are to be, perhaps it would be tactful to be equally reticent in speculating. Naturally the program for the opening pair of concerts was untainted with new color. But at the coming week's concerts there will be a first performance of "Three Pieces for Orchestra" by the Russian composer, Nicolai Tcherepnin. Hadyn's third symphony in D major and Beethoven's third ("Eroica") in E flat will serve as prelude and finale.

* * *

FOR the Tuesday afternoon series of six concerts, which begins on October 31, Dr. Koussevitzky will present a Beethoven cycle, at which all of the nine symphonies, the "Emperor" piano concerto, the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello, and various overtures and incidental music will be heard. This group of programs should be not only enjoyable for the rank and file of concert-goers but instructive for professional musicians It might even serve as an object lesson for aspiring composers.

NEW YORK MIRROR

OCT 9 - 1933

Boston Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead famous orchestra in series here.

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

New Scales.

The limitations of the diatonic scale seem to have worried Mr. Ben Vanasek to a state of inordinate activity. He is convinced that the sterility of "modern" music is due solely to a paucity of colors in the tonal rainbow, and he is determined to do something about it.

So he has segregated and reduced to a proper state of semi-restraint 366 "new scales," which he calls "a synopsis of all diatonic scales, ancient, modern and futuristic, adaptable for all instruments." He explains further:

"Melodies of an unusual and alluring character can be composed from any chosen scale presiding as a syntax-mode; but must be identically transposed into various tonalities, should other accidental alterations be employed, not belonging to the originally chosen scale. The melody may end on any note of the original scale, providing the phrases are correctly and musically constructed. A new chordal system of harmony can be created through the application of these scales and modulations obtained through the same process of applied transpositions. New chords can be built upon ascending or descending thirds, fourths or fifths."

* * *

Miss Myra Hess, English pianist, will be the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, and Friday afternoon, March 2, playing the Mozart concerto in F (Koechel 459)...The Folk Song Festival Council announces a course in "Folk Songs of Many Peoples" at the New School, No. 66 W. 12th St....Concerts and recitals in Carnegie Hall of the new season include Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu dancers, Oct. 21 and 22; National Orchestral Association, Oct. 31, Dec. 12, Jan. 9, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 3; Mr. Artur Schnabel, pianist, Nov. 8, to benefit the scholarship fund of Bennington College; Mr. Isidor Achron, pianist, Nov. 10; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 16 and 18; Jan. 4 and 6; Feb. 2 and 3; March 1 and 3, April 5 and 7, 14

Social and Musical Brooklyn Reward Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony

ORCHESTRA HOLDS BORO SPOTLIGHT ALONE THIS YEAR

By CONSTANCE COGAN.

Social Brooklyn, and musical Brooklyn, too, is in sympathy with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is expressing at the box office approval of the fine artistic tradition which for 46 years has made the Academy of Music a mecca for lovers of the symphonic form.

Subscriptions for the current Boston Symphony season are pouring in faster than ever before. The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and an enlarged Brooklyn committee, an impressive aray of sponsors, will initiate the Boston Symphony series of five concerts Friday evening, Nov. 17.

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIBUTE.

The gay social chatter which always marks the first occasion society gathers in the Academy's Opera House each season, will be hushed that Friday evening in November when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, ascends the podium and with his baton signals the 110 Boston Symphony musicians into action.

Society and other music lovers will have two reasons for welcoming Conductor Koussevitzky so warmly that evening. Other concerts are scheduled for Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

They will acknowledge the tenth year Dr. Koussevitzky has lent his talent to the Boston Symphony. They will pay tribute to his brilliant interpretation of the classics as well as his courage in presenting the symphonic efforts of modern and contemporary composers.

REPLACE PHILHARMONIC.

Musical Brooklyn will have another reason for greeting Dr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Orchestra.

He will receive some of the acclaim ordinarily reserved for the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. This year the Philharmonic did not deign to come to Brooklyn, suggesting that borough music lovers travel to Carnegie Hall for their symphonic enjoyment.

Many whose first love has always been the Philharmonic have now transferred their affections to the Boston Symphony and have become subscribers for the first time this year. The subscription list however reveals that practically all of the familiar faces may be seen again at Boston symphony concerts.

SAME SEATS KEPT.

For twenty-five years or more several prominent Brooklyn families have been renewing their subscription for the concerts each Fall. They request, and obtain, the same seats year after year. They have become standbys. A perusal of the records reveals this year they are reserving larger blocks of seats.

Many debbies undoubtedly will make "appearances" this season at the Boston concerts.

A Junior League group, organized to work with Adrian Van Sinderen's committee, consists of Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Summer Ford, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. Robert M. Winslow, Miss Florence E. Read and Miss Elizabeth Paffard.

ORCHESTRA'S HISTORY.

Junior Leaguers and other young music lovers have been learning from older committee members of Boston Symphony's heritage. They have been hearing of Wilhelm Gericke's conductorship 40 years ago when the symphony first bid for world acclaim.

Then followed a long procession of noted conductors, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Bauer, Max Fiedler, Dr. Karl Muck, bringing the symphony up until World War time. Two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, wielded the baton during the turbulent war days until Dr. Koussevitzky, the great Russian, in 1924, brought to America and the Boston Symphony a reputation acquired throughout Europe.

The Russian conductor is credited with developing the Boston Symphony along its present trend. It is now noted among orchestras for the beauty of its stringed instruments.

SPONSORS' COMMITTEE.

Mrs. William H. Good, long a sponsor of both the opera and Philharmonic seasons, has organized the new committee backing the Boston Symphony series in Brooklyn. The members are:

Frank L. Babbott, Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Walter H. Crittenden, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, Jr., Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Henry A. Ingraham, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. James P. Warbasse and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Symphony Formally E

Another Year Under The Leadership of Serge Koussevitzky

Adv - By Moses Smith Oct 8
Music Editor

THIS IS THE TIME for greetings. A new musical season has just begun. Whatever else has preceded has served but as preliminary fanfare for the REAL New Year—the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and yesterday evening.

For Boston's musical culture and entertainment are still centered in the "hundred and ten musicians" at Symphony Hall, led by the eminent Serge Koussevitzky. Nor is this state of affairs a reflection of a provincial attitude, but rather a translation into action and attitude of the calm assurance that we have here one of the world's few great orchestras and great conductors.

More than once Dr. Koussevitzky has said to me that Boston has a far more cosmopolitan musical culture than most other American cities. The inference, I assume, is that the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the nine years of Dr. Koussevitzky's tenure have been largely responsible for this culture.

* * *

TO THIS I subscribe most heartily as most thoughtful persons interested in music do. Largely because of Dr. Koussevitzky's brilliant and courageous pioneering spirit we have come to learn that the creation of great music did not cease with the death of Johannes Brahms in 1897. The Russian conductor's persistent presentation of new music over the protestations of most of his auditors, has borne fruit in a healthier attitude on the part of the listener. Moreover, the good effects of Koussevitzky's lead have been imitated by other program-builders in various types of concerts here, not necessarily symphonic.

For the present season Koussevitzky will presumably have his usual quota of "novelties." Since he has been reluctant to specify what they are to be, perhaps it would be tactful to be equally reticent in speculating. Naturally the program for the opening pair of concerts was untainted with new color. But at the coming week's concerts there will be a first performance of "Three Pieces for Orchestra" by the Russian composer, Nicolai Tcherepnin. Hadyn's third symphony in D major and Beethoven's third ("Eroica") in E flat will serve as prelude and finale.

* * *

FOR the Tuesday afternoon series of six concerts, which begins on October 31, Dr. Koussevitzky will present a Beethoven cycle, at which all of the nine symphonies, the "Emperor" piano concerto, the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello, and various overtures and incidental music will be heard. This group of programs should be not only enjoyable for the rank and file of concert-goers but instructive for professional musicians It might even serve as an object lesson for aspiring composers.

NEW YORK MIRROR

OCT 9 - 1933

Boston Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead famous orchestra in series here.

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

New Scales.

The limitations of the diatonic scale seem to have worried Mr. Ben Vanasek to a state of inordinate activity. He is convinced that the sterility of "modern" music is due solely to a paucity of colors in the tonal rainbow, and he is determined to do something about it.

So he has segregated and reduced to a proper state of semi-restraint 366 "new scales," which he calls "a synopsis of all diatonic scales, ancient, modern and futuristic, adaptable for all instruments." He explains further:

"Melodies of an unusual and alluring character can be composed from any chosen scale presiding as a syntax-mode; but must be identically transposed into various tonalities, should other accidental alterations be employed, not belonging to the originally chosen scale. The melody may end on any note of the original scale, providing the phrases are correctly and musically constructed. A new chordal system of harmony can be created through the application of these scales and modulations obtained through the same process of applied transpositions. New chords can be built upon ascending or descending thirds, fourths or fifths."

* * *

Miss Myra Hess, English pianist, will be the soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, Feb. 28, and Friday afternoon, March 2, playing the Mozart concerto in F (Koechel 459)...The Folk Song Festival Council announces a course in "Folk Songs of Many Peoples" at the New School, No. 66 W. 12th St....Concerts and recitals in Carnegie Hall of the new season include Uday Shan-Kar and his Hindu dancers, Oct. 21 and 22; National Orchestral Association, Oct. 31, Dec. 12, Jan. 9, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 3; Mr. Artur Schnabel, pianist, Nov. 8, to benefit the scholarship fund of Bennington College; Mr. Isidor Achron, pianist, Nov. 10; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 16 and 18; Jan. 4 and 6; Feb. 2 and 3; March 1 and 3, April 5 and 7.

* 15

Poe into Music: Color into Sound

His 'Masque of the Red Death' From Cherepnin for Koussevitzky

Trans. Oct. 11

FOR his first "novelty" of the new season, to be heard at the Symphony Concerts this week, Dr. Koussevitzky chooses a new work by Nicolas Cherepnin—Cherepnin the Elder, as he is sometimes called to distinguish him from his son who is also a composer. The score, still in manuscript, contains no further title than Three Symphonic Fragments for a Ballad of Edgar Poe. The three numbers have no separate designations; nor is there any hint of the particular tale of Poe. Symphony Hall is able to supply sub-titles: "In the Room of the Ebony Clock"; "A Revel"; "Fate — Specter— Final Struggle — Chimes of Death." Which titles identify the ballad—in prose—as "The Masque of the Red Death." Presumably they come from the composer. He dated his piece "Paris, 1931-1932," and dedicated it to Koussevitzky.

As Poe tells the tale, the Prince Prospero seals himself and his courtiers into one of his castles to escape the ravages of the Red Death. Presently they dance a voluptuous masquerade through a suite of seven rooms. Carefully Poe describes the seven rooms—blue, purple, green, orange, white, violet, and lastly black with blood-red windows. This seventh chamber contains also a "gigantic clock of ebony" and is of such ghastliness that the dancers refrain from entering it. As the revels grow wilder, a figure appears in a disguise that causes misgiving, even in this orgy. "The mummer had gone so far as to assume the type of the Red Death. His vesture was dabbled in blood, and his broad brow, with all the features of the face, was besprinkled with the scarlet horror."

The Prince orders him unmasked, but the courtiers shrink from the command. When the Prince himself tries to strike the specter down, the dagger drops from his hand, and he falls to the ground lifeless. The maskers, now summoning the courage to seize the intruder, find the "grave cerements and corpse-like mask which they handled with so violent a rudeness, untenanted by any tangible form." The Red Death has stolen in "like a thief in the night." The revellers drop "one by one in the blood bedewed halls of their revels." "The life of the ebony clock" goes out "with that of the last of the gay." . . . And "Darkness and Decay and the Red Death" hold "illimitable dominion over all." Thus Poe.

For this tale Cherepnin has written program-music of the most programmatic sort—effect-music pure and simple. Themes and forms give way to attempts at creating effects congruous with Poe's story. To Debussy with his whole-tone scale and his augmented chords growing out of that scale, Cherepnin goes for the grim, forbidding atmosphere of the Black Room with its Ebony Clock. Be the music of the moment the English-horn solo of the beginning, the eerie descending chords in high-muted strings (the principal "material" of the movement), the expansive horn theme which joins the strings a little later, or the melody of self would probably have been less insistent in the use of this device. One further detail: Cherepnin, with all this suggestion of atmosphere, has by no means forgotten the clock. In curiously rhythmed reiterations brasses remember that "its pendulum swung to and fro with a dull, heavy, monotonous clang." Plain as day one finds it in the score.

Continued from Preceding Page

In the "Revel" Cherepnin provides a new music for each of the six rooms through which the revellers dance. Strings with liberal percussion forcefully present the blue room in a descending figure with sharp rhythms. Upleaping brass, with a figure that begins to suggest the dance, serve for the purple. Singing strings with oboe, still more insinuatingly, bring the third, which is green. After a heavy climax, the music is suddenly quiet. First violins without background from other instruments lead us into the orange room with a melody resembling somewhat that for the purple room. Those interested in the curiosities of music will note here the unusual meter signature 18-8! This melody gradually takes on more and more accompaniment, leads eventually into a frank waltz-rhythm (for the white room) in which brasses predominate. The excitement now grows. A swirling whole-tone figure, sounded now and again by virtually all the instruments, brings us to the sixth and last room in violet. (For the black room had its innings in the first movement.) And the movement of revelry ends slowly with many mysterious effects.

"Fate — Specter — Final Struggle — Chimes of Death." While Beethoven announced fate with four hammer-like strokes in a descending third, Cherepnin finds a descending octave more to his purpose. One may assume that the ascending theme which follows, somewhat lyric in character and played by English horn and strings, represents the Specter, or the Red Death. As is to be expected, the music piles excitement upon excitement. After a long pause there are mysterious chords, more mysterious strokes of the bell with percussion choir off-stage; more use of bells, brasses gradually dying down to nothing at all. Thin, ethereal chords float through the air. A final Adagio, somewhat like the beginning of the first movement, includes the rhythm of the Ebony Clock.

If this score presents a curious meter-signature, it presents also a curious orchestration. Cherepnin demands no less than five flutes and a piccolo; five oboes and two English horns; five clarinets and a bass-clarinet; three bassoons and double bassoon; six horns, five trumpets, a small trumpet in D, two cornets, four trombones, two tubas, piano, two harps, organ and the usual strings. The percussion section—Mr. Leslie Rogers, the accomplished librarian at Symphony Hall, assures us—would require thirteen players, if played exactly as Cherepnin planned. He assembles besides all the usual percussion instruments and many that are unusual; then insists on such refinements as two triangles, one large and one small. He asks also a special percussion choir, to be heard off-stage, during the last movement. By careful regrouping of parts, Mr. Rogers has reduced this unwieldy orchestration to manageable proportions without sacrificing a single note —all in the day's work for the librarian of a major symphony orchestra.

A. H. M.

N. Y. World-Telegram

OCT 10 1933

Boston Symphony's Opening.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last week its fifty-third season, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a typical, but by no means radical, program. It consisted of Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, the F major symphony of Brahms, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

This week Mr. Koussevitzky treats his customers to a real novelty when he leads the "first performance" of "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," by Nikolai Tcherepnin. They are entitled, respectively, "In the Room of the Ebony Clock," "A Revel" and "Fate —The Spectre—The Final Struggle —The Chimes of Death."

Before this trilogy there will be heard Ettinger's "Old Dance Suite" (Ater Tremais, an unknown master of the eighteenth century). To follow it, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony is listed.

* * *

Julia Peters' Concert

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

OCT 10 1933

Music and T

MUSIC IN BOSTON—BE CHICAGO OPERA

A Beethoven cycle is announced for the series of Tuesday afternoon Boston Symphony concerts, and the programs for these six concerts, says Warren Storey Smith in the Post, will embrace all the principal orchestral works of that composer, including some rarely heard hereabouts. All the symphonies, not excepting the choral Ninth, will of course be played, together with the "Coriolanus," "Prometheus" and "Leonore No. 2" overtures, and, with soloists yet to be announced, the "Emperor" concerto for piano, the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello with orchestra, and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" with soprano and narrator. The first of these concerts falls on October 31; the succeeding ones on November 21, January 23, February 13, March 27 and April 17.

The Sunday aft-

Concert-Chronicle

Trans Oct 10

When Compared

A SERIES of programs which affords no reflection of music in the modern age, and no new works by contemporaneous composers, falls far short of providing what the more progressive listeners desire, and is remiss in its duty to the living generation. Mr. Walter began the Philharmonic Concerts in New York with a program divided between Beethoven and Brahms. Mr. Koussevitzky in Boston did honor where honor was due to both; but proceeded with Debussy and Skriabin. The Chicago Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, listed a suite of Bach, a symphony of Beethoven, Debussy's "Iberia" and Stravinsky's "Fire Bird." These programs were much better arranged and proportioned than New York's. [The Times

Query

Now, I am not questioning the worth of any of these compositions [by Beethoven and Brahms] but I am questioning the wisdom of combining them into an inaugural program for a new season. The sight of the names, which are only too familiar, dampens our revived ardor at once. Inevitably we ask again the time-worn question: "Is music only for museums?" [Pitts Sanborn in the New York World-Telegram

Stravinsky's Piety

An interviewer who lately sought out Stravinsky at his summer house on the edge of the French Alps, quotes him as saying:

> I have no pride in my gifts as artist. They are abilities that God has bestowed upon me, and there is no reason to be proud of a gift received. But I try to exercise them to my utmost and I defend them, because they are actually the gifts of God.

Nuptial

The engagement is announced of Miss Wanda Toscanini, second daughter of the eminent conductor, to Mr. Vladimir Horowitz, the distinguished pianist, familiar in Boston at the Symphony Concerts and likely to be heard there again.

Concert-Chronicle

Ourselves and Others

FOR the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow Dr. Koussevitzky assembles this program:

Symphony in D major ("With the Horn-Call")	Haydn
Three Pieces for Orchestra after a Tale by Poe (First Performances)	N. Cherepnin
Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica")	Beethoven

In New York Mr. Walter and the Philharmonic Society will be heard in these pieces:

Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 12, in E minor	Handel
Symphony, No. 13, in G major	Haydn
Symphony, No. 1, in D major	Mahler

For the Philadelphia Orchestra Mr. Stokowski puts together this list:

Overture to the Hindu Play, "Sakountala"	Goldmark
Concerto Sacro, No. 1	Josten
Dance of Russian Sailors from the Ballet, "Yablochko"	Glière
Symphony, No. 4, in F minor	Chaikovsky

For the Chicago Orchestra Mr. Stock's program runs:

Introduction, "Roman Carnival," to the Second Act of the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini"	Berlioz
Symphony in D minor	Franck
Spanish Rhapsody	Ravel
Siegfried's Rhine Journey from the Opera, "Götterdammerung"	Wagner

Next Week

Dr. Koussevitzky will begin the third pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 20 and 21, with Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin." The piece will be played to mark the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the eminent French composer on Sept. 12, 1733. Though Couperin left behind no small store of piano-music, none of his few orchestral scores deserves present resurrection. . . . Then follows on the program Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," to be conveyed a little later to Chicago. Finally, to take the bitter taste of Stravinsky from elderly ears, the favorite Second Symphony of Sibelius, likewise useful on a journey westward. Once more "The Rite" bids fair to daw expectant and stirred youth. Both it and Sibelius's symphony were heard at the concerts, last season.

14, 1933

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," was played for the first time anywhere at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The program began with Haydn's delightful little symphony in D major, the one "with the horn call," and ended in a spirit of exaltation with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Mr Tcherepnin—a contemporary Russian composer and conductor now living in Paris—has been represented on Boston Symphony programs in the past. Two seasons ago he himself conducted some of his music at a Symphony concert. The "Three Pieces for Orchestra,' which stands as Opus 59 in the list of his compositions, was inspired by a reading of Edgar Allan Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death" in a translation into French by Baudelaire. It is divided in three parts, with several subsections, as follows: 1. "In the Room of the Ebony Clock"; 2. "A Revel"; 3. "Fate." The score, still in manuscript, is dedicated to Dr Koussevitzky.

In this hard-boiled day it seems peculiar that one of Poe's tales should be selected as the literary basis of contemporary "program" music. Whatever influence Poe may be considered to have had on subsequent American literature, his own works are now a species of museum exhibit. One's hair stood on end when "The Masque of the Red Death" was read in early adolescence; today the bizarre, wholly artificial horrors of Poe's imagination are only amusing. Yet the cool precision and the singular choice of words in Poe's style retain a fascination that might kindle a composer's imagination.

To write "program" music that successfully conveys the creator's ideas is a difficult task; a rare skill for establishing definite moods is required, together with a gift for more or less obvious tone painting. Furthermore, the impressions produced in various persons by music are bound to differ according to individual temperament and strength of imagination.

Mr Tcherepnin commands to a certain extent a power of tone painting, as he has shown in the passages intended to indicate the ticking of the ebony clock and those symbolizing the dance music of the Prince's ball. Yet, had one not been informed that the piece had been inspired by Poe, one would not have realized that he was in musical presence of the Red Death. The turgid, partly ultramodern, partly late 19th Century character of the music, written for a large and elaborate orchestra, lacks the distinction and the saliency to be found in the better "program" music of Richard Strauss, or in Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

From a purely musical point of view Mr Tcherepnin's score suffers from lack of individual style; there are frequent and unmistakable touches of Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky. Despite the orchestral sonority and color, superficiality prevails. There is no more substance in "The Three Pieces" than there is in Poe's tale.

The really "new" music of the program were the Beethoven and Haydn symphonies; "new" because each has that enternal freshness and vigor to be found in all true masterpieces of the tonal art. Each has beauty of structure, melody and harmony which is not confined to the appreciation of any particular time, but which appeals to men of all periods. All three pieces were performed with the splendor to be expected from the Boston Symphony, save for many unaccountable and distressing errors on the part of the horns.

An exhibition of paintings, sculptures, and pictures of Dr Koussevitzky are on view in the foyer of the second floor in Symphony Hall, in observance of the conductor's 10th season with the Boston Symphony. There are also to be seen manuscript and engraved scores, which he has introduced to Boston and the United States, together with medals and other gifts bestowed upon him in recognition of his genius.

The program for next week's Symphony concerts is as follows: Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin;" Stravinsky: "The Rite of Spring;" Sibelius: Symphony in D major, No. 2. C. W. D.

*S Oct 14 Pray

16

Two Classics, A Modern and Koussevitzky

Changes for the New Season, Haydn and Beethoven, Cherepnin and Poe

FOR BEGINNING, a tieing of loose ends around the Symphony Concerts at the outset of the new season. . . . Mr. Roger I. Lee has joined the Board of Trustees which now numbers a full ten. . . . One hundred and seven players are listed in the present orchestra. One violin, one trumpet, one tuba, have gone, leaving three vacancies unfilled. There are two newcomers among the clarinets; two among the horns. Otherwise the personnel is unchanged. . . . His great age and disablements incidental to it have compelled the withdrawal, amid general sympathy, of the editor of the program-book, Mr. Philip Hale.

From his store of notes, which have passed to Symphony Hall, Mr. J. N. Burk of its staff will assemble the descriptions of "standard works" and of other pieces more or less in the repertory. They will gain by his fresh choice among abounding material. Thus "the tradition" of the program-books will be maintained. For new numbers out of the present day, Mr Burk will provide the notes—the weakness in recent years of that same "tradition." He will also choose the diversifying entr'actes, long a distinction of the program-books, but now needing a modernizing hand. Mr. Burk's fitness for the new task stood clear in his handling of Cherepnin's music to a tale of Poe, the "novelty" in the current program. His creditable share in the semi-centennial edition of the history of the orchestra prepared the way for him.

Two classic composers began and ended this second concert, contemporary and contrasting– the one old, the other at young prime—in the Vienna of the turn of the eighteenth into the nineteenth century. Dr. Koussevitzky has enlarged and enriched the active repertory, hereabouts, of Haydn's symphonies. He now returned to the "Symphony with the Horn-Call," first heard at Symphony Hall three years ago. The historically minded could follow the four horns through the four movements. Never before—the symphony dates from 1765—had so many horns sounded from such a piece. The technically minded could also note the frequency of the first violin and the first violoncello as solo-instruments; so debate whether they were hearing a Symphony "as is a symphony," or only a Sinfonia Concertante with virtuoso-parts. So the eighteenth century divided them.

Amateur, dilettante and casual listeners may have taken other pleasures. For them, perhaps, the felicity of Haydn's instrumental texture—his solo-violin or solo-flute, winding its limpid course against the suave background of the accompanying strings; the tang of the oboes against that same background—Sibelius did not invent it; the richness of the four horns, whenever they intervened, in the orchestral fabric. Those same listeners must have heard as agreeably the euphonies of Haydn's instruments and choirs. Fine was his ear and apt his hand with them. For these hearers, too, the finesse of his patterning, as when horns and strings, solo-violin and solo-violoncello, unfold, conduct and embroider the slow movement; or when orchestra and solo-voices are weaving the ever-changing design of the finale. Likely enough eighteenth-century listeners wondered as much at it as at the persistent horns.

We all know the firm-rhythmed, full-voiced Haydn of the Minuet in this rare symphony. We take for granted and for recurring delight his singing voice, say in the slow movement. We are prone to forget the Haydn of a skill and scholarship above most in his day and prime; the Haydn of resource and invention as with these horns and variations; the Haydn who unobtrusively plied these ways and means; yet clothed them with his sensibility and his grace. We rise to his perpetual freshness: for substance and style both preserve him. We clap our hands for good "Papa" Haydn who always pleases and forget the Josef Haydn who was also master-musician. Light and apt or clear and warm were conductor and orchestra with a "little" symphony that is not little.

Beethoven, who was thirty when Haydn was seventy, ended the concert with the "Eroica" Symphony in biennial repetition. The program-book was pat with anecdote. In 1817, when Beethoven had written eight of his nine symphonies, a friend at supper asked him which he preferred. He insisted upon the Third, in E-flat, which is "The Eroica." Not a few listeners, Friday afternoon, found themselves like-minded. The Titan-hand and mind shape and fill and drive the first movement, even if the blows are less heavy, the course less tumultuous, the matter less surcharged and concentrated, than they are in the Fifth. The substance, shape and progress of the Funeral March have none of the moralizing, sticky Beethoven in one and another of the later slow movements. The Scherzo does not overdo repetition; yields only to that of the Fifth because it lacks a like miracle of transition. Not yet in the finale has Beethoven caught the habit of frenzies that a hundred-odd years afterward tend increasingly to sound and fury. Who really treasures the choral close of the Ninth, however much he may thrill at the moment to the surging flood?

To this day "The Eroica" seems to spring fully conceived, fully accomplished, from the mind, hand and heart of Beethoven, at last finding and releasing his mature self. Like Wagner's "Tristan"—agreed that the opera is a very different matter—it might have been written in a single sustained heat of creation. The intensity that deepens each movement according to its kind never flags; the passion throughout is a proclaiming passion of the mind and spirit. Scaling heights or plumbing depths, Beethoven prevails. At every turn there is technical resource and mastery—the form for the substance, the means to the end. Are the horns through the finale a whit inferior to the renowned horns of Strauss's "Don Juan"?

What he wills Beethoven expresses; at need lifts to exaltation; there maintains it. The first public performance was revelation for praise and blame to the listening Viennese. Some heard with unmistakable wonder and awe. A few whispered a word that we next to never use nowadays, which is "sublime." It is the high merit of Dr. Koussevitzky that at each repetition of "The Eroica" he makes it sound as though we also were hearing it for the first time. Listening to him and to his present orchestra we agree to most that devoted tradition asserts. To us also comes the sense of a great spirit; discovered, vitalized, liberated. In none of the classic masterpieces does the conductor more excel.

The middle numbers were the elder Cherepnin's "Three Pieces" after Poe's tale of "The Masque of the Red Death," summarized only the other day in these columns. Believably they are fragments, or the whole, of a ballet for the stage. Ballet-music runs in Cherepnin's blood. He is long practised with it. As mimed or danced fable and spectacle, "The Masque of the Red Death" might have tempted Diaghilev in his imaginative, splendiferous prime. Diaghilev is dead, and there is no money now to spend on the mounting of gorgeous-ghastly ballets. Cherepnin's three pieces emerge as "symphonic fragments" for the concert-hall inscribed to the conductor who yesterday produced them. In tones we traverse the hall of the ebony clock and hear it ticking ominously. In tones we follow the dancing rout from salon to salon and discover the mingled recklessness and malaise with which, in time of plague, they would have their pleasure. In tones the Red Death steals upon them. On the instant they perish and all around is naught. The ebony clock is also stilled and lifeless.

To this scenario from his own hand Cherepnin writes an enhancing, projecting, vivifying music. Here is no question of musical thought or symphonic development. All shall be delineative and effectual. The means: rhythm and color and texture. Rhythms that swing with the pendulum; swirl or languish with the dancers; bite at the crises in the tale. Harmonic and instrumental color that catches each facet of the action from the orgy to the fate, that glows both sumptuous and sinister, with many a gradation between. Texture that is full of interwoven implication. So in the first division we hear the heavy ticking of the clock, insistent, forboding, against a fantasmal splendor. So in the second division the fête waxes now sensuously, now blatantly; halts and is chilled; while underneath, yet piercing through, the clock ticks fatefully. So, in the third division march the horror and the doom to the desolation and the silence.

Cherepnin's will to compose is kindled. Out of the resources and the sureness of full maturity he writes. His theater becomes less a stage for dancers and mimes than a theater for vivid tones. Within his purpose and his field he works with manifest imagination; intensifies as he projects; characters as well as describes. The students of scores will find this "Masque of the Red Death" a multifarious study of ways, means and accomplishment. The effect upon the audience, as most who knew the music foresaw, was instant and complete. Nor was it less upon Dr. Koussevitzky, conducting for his friend—conducting and believing.

H. T. P.

Post

RDAY, OCTOBER 14,

SYMPHONY PERFORMS A NOVELTY

Tcherepnin's Pieces After Tale by Poe Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Relatively unfamiliar Haydn, thrice-familiar Beethoven and a novelty from the pen of Nicolai Tcherepnin made the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a concert on the whole more noteworthy for the superb playing of the orchestra than for the interest of the programme performed.

HORN CALL SYMPHONY

The Symphony of Haydn, that in D major "with the horn call," one of the earlier ones and first introduced here by Dr. Koussevitzky, is distinguished from its fellows by the composer's employment of a second pair of horns, no doubt the first in use in symphonic music of the now customary horn quartet. These instruments lend to the symphony a pleasing robustness. There is a difficult part for the first horn, rising once to a risky F-sharp, and this was handled yesterday in true virtuoso style by Mr. Boettcher. There are solo passages from the 'cello, occasionally quite modern in effect, and in the final variations solos also for flute and violin.

Accordingly, Mr. Koussevitzky, in response to warm applause, bade his four horn players, together with Mr. Bedetti, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Burgin, rise from their places. Haydn makes deft use of these solo instruments, writing for them, as has been suggested, with an almost prophetic sense of effect. But so far as the musical idea per se are concerned, the symphony is not one of his more distinguished creations.

Poe's Tale in Music

Somewhat similar criticism might be made of the Russian composer's Three Pieces for Orchestra after a tale of Edgar Allen Poe "The Mask of the Red Death"). This formidable score is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and yesterday received its first performance. Tcherepnin, an accomplished composer and practiced conductor, here handles expertly an extremely large body of instruments, although actual novelty of instrumental effect can seldom be granted him. Most of the magician's tricks exhibited in yesterday's work bore a familiar aspect. For the most part these orchestral strokes and combinations were, appropriately enough, of the shuddery variety, but whatever evocation of horror the pieces offered was instrumental rather than harmonic and melodic, extrinsic rather than intrinsic.

This music is of enormous technical difficulty and it is not inconceivable that yesterday's hearty applause was in measure a tribute to the skill of conductor and players.

Now Familiar "Eroica"

Finally from Beethoven the "Eroica" Symphony, and again in a masterly performance that seemed now and then to disclose and emphasize a significant detail generally overlooked. This is not the time and place to question or even to assert the long-acknowleged greatness of the "Eroica," but would not the nobility and grandeur of the music become even more apparent if we were not permitted to hear it with such frequency?

A long symphony at the end of a long concert, this Symphony yesterday was deserted by not a few before its course was run, and the applause at the end was less fervent and protracted than that accorded the lesser music of Haydn and Tcherepnin.

KoussevitzKy Show

Pictures, Sculpture and Music Dedicated by Conductor on View in Symphony Hall in Recognition of His 10th Year With Orchestra

In recognition of Dr. Koussevitzky's 10th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is now on view at Symphony Hall an exhibit of pictures, sculpture and music. Of the several likenesses of Dr. Koussevitzky one of the most striking is a portrait in oils by Theodore Stravinsky, son of the composer; another is an excellent bust by Mme. Koussevitzky.

One case of music displays the manuscripts of works by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Honegger, Roussel and other distinguished composers dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, and most of them works given their initial performance under his direction at Symphony Hall. In other cases are the scores of notable works which he has introduced to Boston, among them the Third, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies of Sibelius, Mahler's Ninth Symphony and his "Song of the Earth," and the entr'acte from Strauss' opera "Intermezzo."

PLAY NEW WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Hearing Given of Selection Based on Tale by Poe

Trav. Oct. 14

The first performance anywhere of a new work by Nicholas Tcherepnin—Tcherepnin the Elder as he is oftimes called to distinguish him from his son, also a composer—was given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the second concert of the season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

The selection was entitled "Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," and was based on Poe's sinister story of "The Masque of the Red Death," first published in May, 1842. It took its place on a program the remainder of which comprised Haydn's (Horn Call) symphony in D major, and Beethoven's ("Eroica") symphony in E flat major.

Dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, the Tcherepnin composition was interpreted with a keenness and skill, an insight and understanding that could have been given it by no other conductor and musical group in the world. That it emerged a rather sorry example of real music was the fault of the composer alone.

By no means, however, was the work uninteresting. It was programmic music written obviously for effect and the effect at times was a thing to win whole-hearted applause.

To Debussy went Tcherepnin for his whole-tone scale and his augmented chords growing out of that scale. Equipped thusly he created the grim, deathly atmosphere of Poe's Black Room with its ebony clock. The stringed section particularly was called upon to intensify the thought of the Red Death.

The tale, one of Poe's drug-inflamed brain storms, concerned a Prince Prospero who sealed himself and his courtiers in a castle to escape the Red Death. In the midst of a voluptous dance, carried on in a suite of seven rooms, blue, purple, green orange, white, violet and lastly black with blood-red windows, a mummer suddenly appeared. He fled to the Black Room, killed the Prince and the revellers "one by one dropped in the blood-bedewed halls of their revel . . . And the life of the ebony clock went out with the last of the gay . . . And Darkness and Decay and the Red Death held illimitable dominion over all."

All this and more Tcherepnin pictured musically. In the first movement one distinctly heard in the brasses the pendulum of the ebony clock as it "swung to and fro with a dull, heavy, monotonous clang." Again it came at the end of the score while death was abroad.

The composition was written with the before unheard of musical signature of 18-8 and required an extremely large orchestra with a special percussion choir. Yet withall, it failed to be music in the true sense of the word.

First on the program yesterday was Haydn's symphony, one which Dr. Koussevitzky revived out of the forgotten past. A quartet of horns took prominent part in the first energetic measures. Later there were bits for solo renditions by two of the horns, the first violinist, the first 'cellist and the flutist. Haydn wrote this while still young and decided to give the players "something to do." All performed in a manner come to be expected from them.

As to Beethovan's Third symphony—it was last, and to be trite, best of the material played during the afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky's way of recreating with inimitable justness and delicacy of perception, the moods and emotions of Beethoven left nothing to be desired. His unmistakable devotion brought freshness and life to every development, every accent in the four movements. It was a superb performance of an acknowledged masterpiece. W. T. C., Jr.

VACATION

17

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From Haydn's horns and fiddles, through the varied salaams to Rimsky-Korsakoff and Poe by Tcherepnin, to Beethoven's Eroica, went yesterday afternoon's program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The program, as follows, will be repeated tonight:

Haydn Symphony in D Major
Tcherepnin, N Three Pieces for Orchestra, fter a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe.
I In the Room of the Ebony Clock
II A Revel
III Fate—The Spectre—The Final Struggle—The Chimes of Death
Beethoven Symphony Number 3 in E flat Major, "Eroica."

The terse, geometrical precision of effect so often achieved by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and so miraculously present at last week's concert, although it was the first of the season, was not in evidence yesterday. However, such perfection in handling of dynamics, contrasts, and clean-spun musical line, sometimes carries with it a sense of lost spontaneity in production, of a polish amounting almost to glitter. Yesterday's music was not so clean-cut and perfect, but moving and fresh in flow, and richly satisfying.

The three pieces based on Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," in Baudelaire's French translation, were written by the elder Tcherepnin, who was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. For such atmospheric music, frankly fragmentary and imitative in thematic material, there is nothing to beat an imagination-stirring set of titles and programs. In this case the titles came first; the music is by that much the loser. It is when a composer writes his title and program after he has finished composing, that the best impressionistic music, as music, is likely to be produced.

Although the section entitled "Fate" turns Baudelaire's wording of Poe's thoughts into music, as much as that form of metamorphosis may ever be effected, other sections lose their intended force by lengthiness, repetition of chimes, "tick-tocks," and pauses. The monotony, the madness, and the mixed beauty and terror of Poe and Baudelaire—which obviously inspired the composer—did not carry over sufficiently into his work, despite the brilliant performance it was given by the orchestra.

Beethoven's "Eroica" was solidly and warmly played. The audience left the hall with a noble taste in its mouth.

E. B.

MUSIC

TSCHAIKOVSKY'S Fifth symphony, in E minor, has been chosen for the latter half of the program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in the Elmwood Music hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22, at 4 o'clock, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor has won enduring fame as an interpreter of Tschaikovsky.

The program will open with the Lenore Overture No. 3, of Beethoven, followed by Debussy's two Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals. The first half of the program will end with the Wagner Ride of the Valkyries, one of the Boston Symphony's most brilliant performances.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 15 1933

Serge Koussevitzky will do with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston what Arturo Toscanini plans to do with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on his return: conduct a Beethoven cycle. The Boston orchestra will give a series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts at which three overtures, the "Leonore" No. 2, the "Coriolanus" and the "Prometheus"; the music to Goethe's "Egmont," with soprano and narrator, the Fifth piano concerto, the triple concerto and all the symphonies will be played. The soloists will be announced later. The dates are Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1933 CHICAGO HERALD AND EXAMINER--- A PAPE

Boston's 'European' Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert Here October 23

Opera Sets Record At Auditorium

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

The approaching visit of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the famous European orchestra known as the Boston Symphony is the musical news of the moment. Dr. Koussevitzky brings his renowned organization to Orchestra Hall on the night of Monday, October 23, for the third appearance here during the decade that he has presided over the musical destinies of the city that has adopted him.

The eminent Russian owes his unparalleled popularity in the East to a vivid personality and an artistic vision that has brought the spirit of adventure and of discovery into the staid atmosphere of the symphony concert. Boston has always prided itself on its culture. To prove its superiority to itself in this essentially spiritual attribute it has never permitted the vexed question of Americanism to intrude.

No American has ever conducted Boston's orchestra. Few Americans have played with it as soloists, or in it, as members. It is a nonunion, imported artistic body that has consistently refused to identify itself with this country's musical life during the fifty odd years of its brilliant history.

If the Boston orchestra must adopt a national label—and of all arts, music is the most national and racial—I suppose it must be called Russian, since its leader has never denied the land of his origin, though that land has pointedly and earnestly denied him, together with Rachmaninoff and other famous expatriate converts to the doctrine of capitalism.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 15 1933

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has arranged a splendid program for the Buffalo concert which will take place in Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday, Oct. 22, at 4 p. m. under the local management of Marian de Forest.

The opening number is the Beethoven overture, Leonore No. 3, the greatest of the four overtures to the only opera Beethoven ever wrote. This is followed by Debussy's two nocturnes, subtitled Clouds and Festivities. In the first, the composer paints in tone clouds traversing the sky, and features a theme intoned by the English horn. The second is bright and buoyant in style and exceedingly difficult of performance. Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries will be an electrifying number, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony will complete the program. This is the work which offers for its Andante Cantabile movement that exquisite solo for French horn, one of the most beautiful melolies that mortal ever penned. Dr. Koussevitzky is noted as an interpreter of the great Russian composer. His performance of this symphony was a sensational feature of Koussevitzky's appearance at the London Music Festival last May.

* * *

N. Y. AMERICAN

'T 15 1933

Rochester Band's Music for N. B. C.

The Rochester Civic Orchestra has been added to the N. B. C. music schedules for the 1933-34 radio season. It will open with a one-hour program next Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock over WJZ's network.

Guy Fraser Harrison will direct the symphony organization in 30 weekly broadcasts. The Rochester band makes the second noted symphony orchestra to be signed by the N. B. C., the Boston Symphony being the first.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

OCT 14 1933

Pro Arte Quartet.

Of great musical import are two events to take place the next few days: first are the three concerts by the Pro Arte Quartet, donated by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, to the Friends of Music; and second, the appearance in Orchestra Hall of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The Pro Arte concerts will take place in the Goodman Theater next Wednesday and Friday evenings and Sunday afternoon. The concerts are free to subscribers to the Friends of Music fund collected last Spring.

On Monday evening, October 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Orchestra Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Orchestra was organized in 1881, ten years prior to our own. At that time it consisted of sixty players. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will play here with 110 musicians.

EVANSTON, ILL.
NEWS INDEX

OCT 13 1933

Boston Symphony to Play in Chicago

The Boston Symphony orchestra, long considered one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, under its brilliant conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is to visit Chicago in the last week of A Century of Progress Exposition to give a concert in Orchestra Hall on Monday evening, October 23. This is the 53rd season of the Boston orchestra and the tenth under the leadership of Koussevitsky.

The Russian conductor came to America in 1924 with a reputation as probably the most brilliant and outstanding conductor of Europe at that time. In the past ten years, this remarkable artist has raised the traditionally famous orchestra to new heights of beauty and importance.

Dr. Koussevitsky announces a notable program for the Boston visit. It will consist of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra, and Stravinsky's sensational "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), the score which has influenced the course of musical composition probably more than any other in this century. The Symphony will be the Second in D major of Sibelius, the great living Finnish composer.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

OCT 15 1933

Morning Musicals, Inc. Opens Season With Concert on Oct. 25

BRAMPTON

NOVAES

Rose Brampton, left, Metropolitan Opera Company contralto, and Guiomar Novaes, noted pianist, are among artists engaged for evening concerts on Nov. 6 and Jan. 15, respectively.

Dr. Adolph Frey Will Be Guest Artist at First Morning Program

The Morning Musicals, Inc., 1933-34 concert season will offer five evening concerts to be given, as in previous years, at Lincoln Hall, Central High School, and nine morning concerts which will take place in the ballroom of the Hotel Syracuse The season opens with a morning concert on Oct. 25. The first evening concert is set for Nov. 6 with Rose Brampton as soloist.

On the night of Dec. 12, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitch, will appear. Other evening concerts will be Jan. 15, Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Feb. 12, Nelson Eddy, baritone; March 12, Jeanne Soudekine, soprano.

On Sunday night, Nov. 19, at 5 o'clock the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston under the direction of Russel Ames Cook, will appear in the ball room of the Hotel Syracuse for members and guests of the club. The Ensemble comprises the first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four violins, ~~viola, cello~~, double bass, flute, oboe, English horn, bassoon, clarinet, French horn, trumpet, trombone and percussion instruments. Few cities, save those near Boston, are able to hear this fine ensemble as members are engaged in playing with the Boston Symphony. As the Boston orchestra appears at Troy the preceding night the ensemble comes to Syracuse before rejoining the parent organization in Boston.

The first morning concert will take place at Hotel Syracuse on Wednesday, Oct. 25, at 10:45 o'clock, with Dr. Adolph Frey as guest artist. Dr. Frey will play his own concerto for piano and orchestra with the Morning Musicals Orchestra under the baton of Prof. Conrad L. Becker. It will be Dr. Frey's first public appearance in Syracuse for several years. Ada Shinaman Crouse will be at the second piano.

A new member of the club, Donald Merriam, will be presented at concert. He is a Stuart Gracey pupil and has made several recital appearances elsewhere. Grace Weymer, harpist, and Henry Hambrecht, flutist, will play a Concerto for Harp and Flute, the only work written for the harp by Mozart. Florence Girton Hartman, soprano, will sing a group of songs, accompanied by the Morning Musicals String Ensemble, directed by Prof. Becker. Mrs. Hartman coached last summer with Maude Douglas Tweedy, noted voice teacher, of New York City.

The personnel of the ensemble is composed of Myron Levee, Claude Bortel, Elino Kamri, Aurin Chase, Wendall Hannon and Rudolf Miller. Dena Ferguson, pianist, will open the program. Miss Ferguson passed last winter in New York City studying at the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School. The opening ~~recital also~~ is guest day, each member being privileged to bring one guest.

At the morning concert on Dec. 20, the Ionian Male Quartet will give a recital. Another novelty will be presented on Wednesday morning, Feb. 21, when a young monologuist, Dorothy Crawford, will present a program.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

OCT 15 1933

SIX ATTRACTIONS ON MUSIC LISTS FOR THIS WINTER

Albany, Schenectady Civic Associations Present Choice Attractions

Attilio Baggiore, Noted Operatic Tenor Opens Season in This City

By RAY A. MOWERS

Revelation this week of the six major musical attractions to be staged in Albany and Schenectady this winter by the civic music associations of the two cities easily takes first place in the minds of the Capital District concertgoer today.

The importance of the sextet of concerts scheduled coincides fully with the calibre of the engagement which launched the professional season—the recital last Saturday night in Schenectady by Marcel Dupre, celebrated French organist.

In Albany, the association is bringing Attilio Baggiore, the operatic tenor who made a sensational hit in recital at Schenectady last winter, as its first presentation. The date, however, has not been announced.

Vladimir Horowitz, one of the world's best among pianists, is to play Jan. 17, and the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra with Podzinsky conducting will appear Mar. 22. All three concerts are to be given at Philip Livingston Junior High School.

Interest in the attractions to be offered by the Schenectady Civic Music Association is strong among holders of memberships in the Albany organization, because tickets sold in the two cities are interchangably reciprocal. In other words, Albany's tickets will be good at Schenectady concerts and vice versa.

The Schenectady unit opens its season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevetsky conductor, Oct. 28. The second attraction there is the Don Cossacks, a chorus of 36 former soldiers of the Czar who have created a veritable furore in the vocal world. They come Dec. 6, a date reported likely to clash with that fixed for the appearance of a popular Albany chorus at Chancellors Hall, unless a switch is made by the local management meanwhile.

Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist extraordinary, will end the Schenectady series Mar. 19.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

1 5 1933

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall next Sunday afternoon, October 22d.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From Haydn's horns and fiddles, through the varied salaams to Rimsky-Korsakoff and Poe by Tcherepnin, to Beethoven's Eroica, went yesterday afternoon's program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The program, as follows, will be repeated tonight:

Haydn Symphony in D Major
Tcherepnin, N Three Pieces for Orchestra, fter a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe.
I In the Room of the Ebony Clock
II A Revel
III Fate—The Spectre—The Final Struggle—The Chimes of Death
Beethoven Symphony Number 3 in E flat Major, "Eroica."

The terse, geometrical precision of effect so often achieved by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and so miraculously present at last week's concert, although it was the first of the season, was not in evidence yesterday. However, such perfection in handling of dynamics, contrasts, and clean-spun musical line, sometimes carries with it a sense of lost spontaneity in production, of a polish amounting almost to glitter. Yesterday's music was not so clean-cut and perfect, but moving and fresh in flow, and richly satisfying.

The three pieces based on Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," in Baudelaire's French translation, were written by the elder Tcherepnin, who was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakoff. For such atmospheric music, frankly fragmentary and imitative in thematic material, there is nothing to beat an imagination-stirring set of titles and programs. In this case the titles came first; the music is by that much the loser. It is when a composer writes his title and program after he has finished composing, that the best impressionistic music, as music, is likely to be produced.

Although the section entitled "Fate" turns Baudelaire's wording of Poe's thoughts into music, as much as that form of metamorphosis may ever be effected, other sections lose their intended force by lengthiness, repetition of chimes, "tick-tocks," and pauses. The monotony, the madness, and the mixed beauty and terror of Poe and Baudelaire—which obviously inspired the composer—did not carry over sufficiently into his work, despite the brilliant performance it was given by the orchestra.

Beethoven's "Eroica" was solidly and warmly played. The audience left the hall with a noble taste in its mouth.

E. B.

MUSIC

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S Fifth symphony, in E minor, has been chosen for the latter half of the program in which the Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in the Elmwood Music hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 22, at 4 o'clock, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Russian conductor has won enduring fame as an interpreter of Tschaikowsky.

The program will open with the Lenore Overture No. 3, of Beethoven, followed by Debussy's two Nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals. The first half of the program will end with the Wagner Ride of the Valkyries, one of the Boston Symphony's most brilliant performances.

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 15 1933

Serge Koussevitzky will do with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston what Arturo Toscanini plans to do with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony on his return: conduct a Beethoven cycle. The Boston orchestra will give a series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts at which three overtures, the "Leonore" No. 2, the "Coriolanus" and the "Prometheus"; the music to Goethe's "Egmont," with soprano and narrator, the Fifth piano concerto, the triple concerto and all the symphonies will be played. The soloists will be announced later. The dates are Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1933 'CHICAGO HERALD AND EXAMINER---A PAPE

Boston's 'European' Symphony Orchestra to Give Concert Here October 23

Opera Sets Record At Auditorium

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

The approaching visit of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the famous European orchestra known as the Boston Symphony is the musical news of the moment. Dr. Koussevitzky brings his renowned organization to Orchestra Hall on the night of Monday, October 23, for the third appearance here during the decade that he has presided over the musical destinies of the city that has adopted him.

The eminent Russian owes his unparalleled popularity in the East to a vivid personality and an artistic vision that has brought the spirit of adventure and of discovery into the staid atmosphere of the symphony concert. Boston has always prided itself on its culture. To prove its superiority to itself in this essentially spiritual attribute it has never permitted the vexed question of Americanism to intrude.

No American has ever conducted Boston's orchestra. Few Americans have played with it as soloists, or in it, as members. It is a nonunion, imported artistic body that has consistently refused to identify itself with this country's musical life during the fifty odd years of its brilliant history.

If the Boston orchestra must adopt a national label—and of all arts, music is the most national and racial—I suppose it must be called Russian, since its leader has never denied the land of his origin, though that land has pointedly and earnestly denied him, together with Rachmaninoff and other famous expatriate converts to the doctrine of capitalism.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 15 1933

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has arranged a splendid program for the Buffalo concert which will take place in Elmwood Music Hall on Sunday, Oct. 22, at 4 p. m. under the local management of Marian de Forest.

The opening number is the Beethoven overture, Leonore No. 3, the greatest of the four overtures to the only opera Beethoven ever wrote. This is followed by Debussy's two nocturnes, subtitled Clouds and Festivities. In the first, the composer paints in tone clouds traversing the sky, and features a theme intoned by the English horn. The second is bright and buoyant in style and exceedingly difficult of performance. Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries will be an electrifying number, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony will complete the program. This is the work which offers for its Andante Cantabile movement that exquisite solo for French horn, one of the most beautiful melolies that mortal ever penned. Dr. Koussevitzky is noted as an interpreter of the great Russian composer. His performance of this symphony was a sensational feature of Koussevitzky's appearance at the London Music Festival last May.

N. Y. AMERICAN

T 15 1933

Rochester Band's Music for N. B. C.

The Rochester Civic Orchestra has been added to the N. B. C. music schedules for the 1933-34 radio season. It will open with a one-hour program next Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock over WJZ's network.

Guy Fraser Harrison will direct the symphony organization in 30 weekly broadcasts. The Rochester band makes the second noted symphony orchestra to be signed by the N. B. C., the Boston Symphony being the first.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

OCT 14 1933

Pro Arte Quartet.

Of great musical import are two events to take place the next few days; first are the three concerts by the Pro Arte Quartet, donated by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, to the Friends of Music; and second, the appearance in Orchestra Hall of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

The Pro Arte concerts will take place in the Goodman Theater next Wednesday and Friday evenings and Sunday afternoon. The concerts are free to subscribers to the Friends of Music fund collected last Spring.

On Monday evening, October 23, the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Orchestra Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Orchestra was organized in 1881, ten years prior to our own. At that time it consisted of sixty players. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will play here with 110 musicians.

EVANSTON, ILL.
NEWS INDEX

1 3 1933

Boston Symphony to Play in Chicago

The Boston Symphony orchestra, long considered one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, under its brilliant conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, is to visit Chicago in the last week of A Century of Progress Exposition to give a concert in Orchestra Hall on Monday evening, October 23. This is the 53rd season of the Boston orchestra and the tenth under the leadership of Koussevitsky.

The Russian conductor came to America in 1924 with a reputation as probably the most brilliant and outstanding conductor of Europe at that time. In the past ten years, this remarkable artist has raised the traditionally famous orchestra to new heights of beauty and importance.

Dr. Koussevitsky announces a notable program for the Boston visit. It will consist of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra, and Stravinsky's sensational "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), the score which has influenced the course of musical composition probably more than any other in this century. The Symphony will be the Second in D major of Sibelius, the great living Finnish composer

---

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

Morning Musicals, Inc. Opens Season With Concert on Oct. 25

BRAMPTON

NOVAES

Rose Brampton, left, Metropolitan Opera Company contralto, and Guiomar Novaes, noted pianist, are among artists engaged for evening concerts on Nov. 6 and Jan. 15, respectively.

Dr. Adolph Frey Will Be Guest Artist at First Morning Program

The Morning Musicals, Inc., 1933-34 concert season will offer five evening concerts to be given, as in previous years, at Lincoln Hall, Central High School, and nine morning concerts which will take place in the ballroom of the Hotel Syracuse The season opens with a morning concert on Oct. 25. The first evening concert is set for Nov. 6 with Rose Brampton as soloist.

On the night of Dec. 12, the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitch, will appear. Other evening concerts will be Jan. 15, Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Feb. 12, Nelson Eddy, baritone; March 12, Jeanne Soudekine, soprano.

On Sunday night, Nov. 19, at 5 o'clock the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston under the direction of Russel Ames Cook, will appear in the ball room of the Hotel Syracuse for members and guests of the club. The Ensemble comprises the first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, four violins, ~~viola, cello~~, double bass, flute, oboe, English horn, bassoon, clarinet, French horn, trumpet, trombone and percussion instruments. Few cities, save those near Boston, are able to hear this fine ensemble as members are engaged in playing with the Boston Symphony. As the Boston orchestra appears at Troy the preceding night the ensemble comes to Syracuse before rejoining the parent organization in Boston.

The first morning concert will take place at Hotel Syracuse on Wednesday, Oct. 25, at 10:45 o'clock, with Dr. Adolph Frey as guest artist. Dr. Frey will play his own concerto for piano and orchestra with the Morning Musicals Orchestra under the baton of Prof. Conrad L. Becker. It will be Dr. Frey's first public appearance in Syracuse for several years. Ada Shinaman Crouse will be at the second piano.

A new member of the club, Donald Merriam, will be presented at concert. He is a Stuart Gracey pupil and has made several recital appearances elsewhere. Grace Weymer, harpist, and Henry Hambrecht, flutist, will play a Concerto for Harp and Flute, the only work written for the harp by Mozart. Florence Girton Hartman, soprano, will sing a group of songs, accompanied by the Morning Musicals String Ensemble, directed by Prof. Becker. Mrs. Hartman coached last summer with Maude Douglas Tweedy, noted voice teacher, of New York City.

The personnel of the ensemble is composed of Myron Levee, Claude Bortel, Elino Kamri, Aurin Chase, Wendall Hannon and Rudolf Miller. Dena Ferguson, pianist, will open the program. Miss Ferguson passed last winter in New York City studying at the Institute of Musical Art of the Juilliard School. The opening ~~recital also~~ is guest day, each member being privileged to bring one guest.

At the morning concert on Dec. 20, the Ionian Male Quartet will give a recital. Another novelty will be presented on Wednesday morning, Feb. 21, when a young monologuist, Dorothy Crawford, will present a program.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

OCT 15 1933

SIX ATTRACTIONS ON MUSIC LISTS FOR THIS WINTER

Albany, Schenectady Civic Associations Present Choice Attractions

Attilio Baggiore, Noted Operatic Tenor Opens Season in This City

By RAY A. MOWERS

Revelation this week of the six major musical attractions to be staged in Albany and Schenectady this winter by the civic music associations of the two cities easily takes first place in the minds of the Capital District concertgoer today.

The importance of the sextet of concerts scheduled coincides fully with the calibre of the engagement which launched the professional season—the recital last Saturday night in Schenectady by Marcel Dupre, celebrated French organist.

In Albany, the association is bringing Attilio Baggiore, the operatic tenor who made a sensational hit in recital at Schenectady last winter, as its first presentation. The date, however, has not been announced.

Vladimir Horowitz, one of the world's best among pianists, is to play Jan. 17, and the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra with Podzinsky conducting will appear Mar. 22. All three concerts are to be given at Philip Livingston Junior High School.

Interest in the attractions to be offered by the Schenectady Civic Music Association is strong among holders of memberships in the Albany organization, because tickets sold in the two cities are interchangably reciprocal. In other words, Albany's tickets will be good at Schenectady concerts and vice versa.

The Schenectady unit opens its season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevetsky conductor, Oct. 28. The second attraction there is the Don Cossacks, a chorus of 36 former soldiers of the Czar who have created a veritable furore in the vocal world. They come Dec. 6, a date reported likely to clash with that fixed for the appearance of a popular Albany chorus at Chancellors Hall, unless a switch is made by the local management meanwhile.

Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist extraordinary, will end the Schenectady series Mar. 19.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

1933

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall next Sunday afternoon, October 22d.

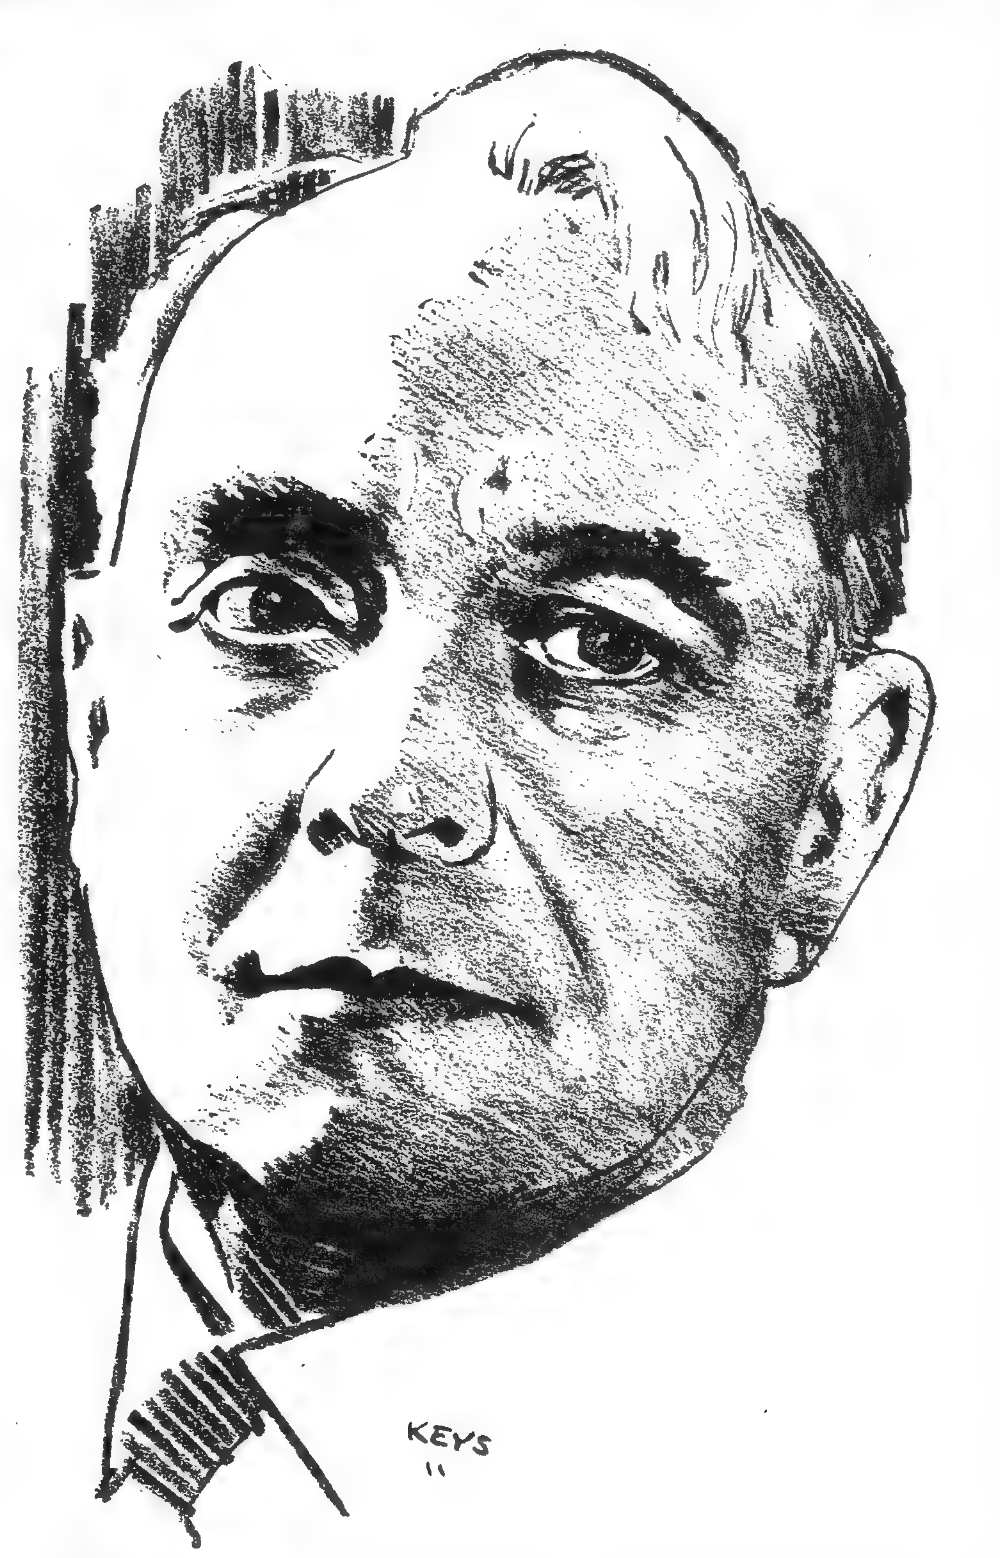
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

18

OCT 13 1933

WORDS AND MUSIC

by R.L.F. McCOMBS



Serge Koussevitzky, just entering his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring that organization for its annual visit to Columbus on Oct. 26. The high reputation of the orchestra and of its distinguished leader are so familiar here that the mere announcement of the name and date should line the patrons up before the Symphony Club's box office.

A COLUMBUS audience has heard Egon Petri before and remembers with pleasure the recital which he shared with an inferior singer two seasons ago. His technical achievements left us gasping while his sincerity and imaginative depth lifted his playing out of the merely bravura class.

His second recital here, next Friday at Mees Hall, comes early in a season of engagements which take him into the important musical centers of the land and which include performances with all the major symphony orchestras. In February he will go to England and Germany for recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Petri had planned to spend the past season in Europe, but instead they spent their time in this country touring about the western states, occasionally pausing for a period of teaching. Mr. Petri conducted master classes in Chicago, Colorado Springs, Albuquerque and Oakland, Calif. They returned to New York by way of Panama.

The Dutch pianist's program for his Columbus recital runs as follows:

Sonata, A major	Mozart
Chaconne	Bach-Busoni
Prelude, Chorale and Fugue	Franck
Ballade, A flat-major; Nocturne, D flat-major; Waltz, A flat-major	Chopin
Two Fairy Tales, Op. 20 (B flat-minor; B-minor)	Medtner
Prelude, C-major; Gavotte, F sharp-minor; March ("The Love of Three Oranges")	Prokofieff
Two Preludes (G-major, G-minor)	Rachmaninoff
Figaro Fantasy	Liszt

Tickets for this recital, which is the first of the series sponsored by the Capital University Conservatory, may be had at the Mees Hall office or at Heaton's.

* * *

Date Settled

MARK Feb. 13 in your calendar as the date on which Eugene Ormandy will conduct the concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra here. In the published schedules of the Women's Music Club series, of which this concert is one, the precise day had been perforce left vague.

* * *

Fruits of Education

IN the past decade we have seen and taken part in a wide-spread movement for the greater popular appreciation of good music, with a justifiable emphasis, perhaps, on orchestral music.

Schools have made a point of courses in such appreciation. Among the young people, bands and orchestras have been organized—good ones, too—of which one object was the encouraging of intelligent listening. Records have made the standard repertory readily available.

Most of all, perhaps, the radio has contributed programs, supplemented by explanations, comments and illustrations, all designed to create a lively interest in the orchestra and its literature. Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Barlow have done yeoman service; all the great orchestras are now and then to be heard in their regular concerts where the enthusiasm of an audience present in the flesh punctuates the progress of the programs.

In many an American city like ours, which has no established professional orchestra, radio and records and discussion fill a more important part than in more fortunate centers where weekly concerts may be heard throughout the season.

But orchestras do come to Columbus, the finest in the land (which is to say the finest in the world). One of the greatest will play at Memorial Hall on Oct. 26, when Serge Koussevitzky again brings the Boston Symphony on its brief westward tour.

Here is the test then. Are the fruits of all this education sour?

If our young people have properly benefited from their "appreciation courses" and their active participation in student orchestras, they will storm the doors of the concert hall. The cost won't be as much as a week's expenditures on the movies.

If adult listeners, who have been more and more willingly exposing themselves to the benison of good music as it has come to them by their loudspeakers, will move themselves out of their arm-chairs for an evening, and sit before the Boston Orchestra where they can see as well as hear (and hear more clearly than by the agency of ever so clever a mechanism) they will find a richly rewarding experience.

Apathy is the enemy of populous concert halls rather than any deep lack of appreciation. When the layman-listener realizes that technical knowledge is not necessary to enjoyment, when he goes to a concert for fun, as he goes to a theater or a football game, he is won. And, in these parlous days, it is the layman-listener rather than a group of wealthy and generous backers upon whom the future of music depends.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio will open its box office next Wednesday at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, for the sale of season tickets to the present concert of the Boston Orchestra and the later one of the Cleveland Orchestra.

* * *

Bori in Recital

OPERATIC performances by Lucrezia Bori are familiar to a number of Columbus people who have seen and heard her at the Metropolitan where she is the reigning favorite. In recital, however, her appearances are quite rare. On this very Friday the 13th there is one. She is singing at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn in the first of a series of lecture-recitals in which the lecturer is Olin Downes. Program and comments trace the history of the operatic aria from its earliest beginnings.

Since she so seldom appears in recital, first-hand comment on those programs is hard to come at. A year or so ago, however, Gertrude Dobson, Columbus soprano, was in the audience at one of those monster benefits for unemployed musicians which the great-hearted Walter Damrosch is always organizing.

Mr. Damrosch himself was master of ceremonies; Ernest Schelling retired to the percussion corner where he played upon no less an instrument than the lawnmower; Harold Bauer conducted.

But the brightest star among all these luminaries was Miss Bori, who sang Spanish songs, cabaret style, seated on the piano. She was the life of the party. Miss Dobson tells me that the performance was exquisite, that she had never been more charmed by any soprano. Besides that Miss Bori was a beautiful apparition, looking like a young sylph in white satin.

When she sings at Memorial Hall a week from Monday evening she will present the last half of her program in special costumes. For a French folk-song group she will wear a French paysanne dress and for a closing Spanish group she will be dressed in a genuine Spanish Goya costume.

This concert is the first of six sponsored by the Women's Music Club. Season tickets are selling in the lobby of the Deshler-Wallick.

* * *

An Irishman in England

AFTER many seasons' absence John McCormack is to return to a Columbus platform on Nov. 4. He comes shortly after a stay in England during which he celebrated the 25th anniversary of his debut there, a celebration which evoked the comment from one critic that "he uses his voice so well that there is no reason why he should not celebrate the 50th anniversary with almost equal success."

But of the sheaf of his English press notices I choose to reprint a passage from that written for the London "Times" by Ernest Newman, a commentator whose taste and judgment, whose scholarship and humanity, can always be trusted, and one who can succeed in making the notice even of a concert that the reader has not heard, vitally interesting.

Says Mr. Newman:

"What is the explanation of John McCormack's immense popularity with the crowd I am not psychologist enough to decide. But the reason for the high esteem in which the connoisseurs hold him is obvious enough. He brings to bear upon the simplest material a sense of beauty and a perfection of style that are the product of the study of the finest models of lyrical art. His faultless diction is, of course, one of his most valuable assets; no book of words is necessary when John McCormack sings. But after all, the greatest service that his easy diction does us is to set our attention completely free for the subtler factors in his singing—the exquisite phrasing, the adroit balancing of the rival claims of the verbal and the melodic line, the art of making it seem that the words are being spoken precisely as they would be by a first-rate reader who had no concert with the notes, while at the same time the notes are woven into a tissue as completely and as delicately musical in itself as if they were flowing from a violin in the hands of a master. The supreme, the flawless, example of all this in last Sunday's recital was perhaps John McCormack's singing of Rachmaninov's 'To the Children.'"

The McCormack recital, offered independent of any of the established courses, by Kline L. Roberts and George G. Whitehead, comes at a time when the artist is much in the public eye. Recently he was the honored singer at the Catholic Charities meeting which was addressed by President Roosevelt in New York. Last Wednesday he began a series of nation-wide broadcasts which will be heard by millions.

Reservations for the recital will be handled at Heaton's starting Monday, Oct. 30, but mail orders may now be sent either to Heaton's or to the office of the management at 66 E. Broad street.

* * *

Operatic Excerpts

MEMBERS of the Columbus Opera Club will be heard in an extensive program of selections from operas, both grand and light, at a "musical tea," scheduled for 2:30 in the afternoon of Oct. 21 at the Lazarus restaurant. The list has been assembled by Virginia Keller, the club's president, and will be announced by David Larrimer.

It includes arias and concerted numbers from "Lucia," "Rigoletto," "The Marriage of Figaro," "Le Prophete," "The Barber of Seville," "Mephistophile," "Tales of Hoffmann," "Katinka," Robin Hood," "Sweethearts" and other operas.

Participants are: Nason Oldham, Paul Hughey, Walter Downey, Gustave Spaeth, Laura Mai Burns, Hertha Laufersweiler, Rozsika Tumbasz, Dorotha Walkmeyer, Ora Coughlin, Gwendolyn Almy, Fred Hoffmann, Edwin Stainbrook, Alice Heiston, Betty McColm, Louis Sittler, Regina Herkenroder, Ramona Berlew, Robert Barr, Louise Yost, Mrs. Melville D. Frank, Robert Williams, Rosalind McNamara, Dorothy Wilson, Lella White, Dorothy Wilson, Jeanette Knapp and Opal Stauffer.

* * *

Philharmonic Broadcast

THE Sunday afternoon programs of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are again being broadcast over the Columbia network. Bruno Walter is conducting during this half of the season; Mr. Toscanini will take up the baton at the first of the year.

For this Sunday at 3 Mr. Walter's program is made up of the Symphony No. 1 in D-major of Gustav Mahler and of excerpts from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" in which Elsa Alsen and Paul Althouse will be the vocal soloists.

* * *

Dotted Notes

HAROLD E. MATTHEWS is to sing the principal tenor role in the forthcoming production of "Cavalleria Rusticana" by the Columbus Civic Opera group, the performance of which is promised for Nov. 1 at Memorial Hall . . . The music group of the Norwester Club will meet Tuesday afternoon at 3 at the home of Mrs. John F. Seidel, 1960 Arlington avenue. Bill Dalton will play both organ and piano music and will discuss the influence of music on movie audiences. Other contributors to the musical program will be Mrs. H. L. Evans, Hazel Reed and Janet Gibbs . . . Pearl Spencer will give the first of the Women's Music Club organ recitals for the season at 7:30 p. m. on Oct. 22 at the North Broadway M. E. Church. Mabel Harris, soprano, and the capella choir of the church, directed by Paul Lawless, will assist . . . The music group of the University Women's Club will honor its new members with a tea at the home of Mrs. Huntley Dupre, 690 Evening street, Worthington, on the afternoon of Oct. 16. Mrs. Earl Baxter will sing and Mrs. Roscoe Eckelberry and Mrs. Allen McManigal will play piano duets . . . The Temple Chapter Choir of the Royal Arch Masons will give a program at 4 o'clock Sunday at the Southern Hotel . . . Maria Jeritza, who is to sing in Columbus later in the season, has arrived in New York to begin rehearsals of a musical comedy, "Jerry," which has been written for her . . . Walter Downey, tenor, is to be soloist with Edwin Stainbrook's trio in the dinner program Sunday evening at the Broad-Lincoln . . . The engagement has been announced of Wanda Toscanini, second daughter of the eminent conductor, to Vladimir Horowitz, Russian pianist . . .

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 15 1933

BOSTON'S OVATIONS

THROUGHOUT the east, where Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his band of 110 outstanding musicians have been enjoying the annual ovations which follow their return from continental engagements, there has been expressed the opinion that the oldest and greatest of America's symphony orchestras is this year greater than ever before. They play Oct. 24 in Columbus for the Symphony club.

To compare the unique performance of the Boston symphony with its own one year ago, and find it changed, would perhaps be impertinent, but that the organization has developed and flowered into something above its by no means lowly beginnings under Koussevitzky nine years ago seems to be an established fact.

"Individually and collectively Dr. Koussevitzky would not have been capable nine years ago of the performance which yesterday they achieved of the Third Symphony of Brahms," wrote Warren Storey Smith of the Boston Post recently, "a performance that made familiar music sound as new, and that accomplished this—not by distortion and caprice, not through the exercise of wayward and wilful individuality—but by sheer divination, and as complete revelation of the music's potential power and beauty."

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 14 1933

Boston Symphony To Be Heard in Dayton

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert in Dayton, O., on Wednesday evening, October 25. The Boston orchestra, composed of 110 musicians, each year makes a tour of one week through the Middle West. Last year they played in Cincinnati in the Artist Series. This year they open the Artist Series in Dayton, which is also under J. T. Thuman's management. Those who desire to hear the concert in Dayton may leave their orders for seats at Mr. Thuman's Cincinnati office in the Baldwin store.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 13 1933

Lively Season For Boston Orchestra

A notably extended schedule is announced for the fifty-third season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which opened in Symphony hall, Boston, on Oct. 6.

The orchestra will perform in Chicago on Oct. 23, being the only orchestra to visit that city during the exposition. The western tour will include, besides Chicago, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

The season will mark Serge Koussevitzky's tenth year in America as the orchestra's conductor. The Columbus date is Oct. 24, under Symphony club direction.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 15 1933

Mrs. F. A. Miller, 2065 East Barton place, will entertain the officers and division chairmen of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at a luncheon at her home Tuesday, October 24, at 1 o'clock. Following the luncheon there will be the annual fall reading of reports. The Boston Symphony orchestra will play at Memorial hall under the auspices of the club the following Thursday.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

OCT 15 1933

Music Notes Up and Down the Scale

THE first performance of music written by an American composer, Roger Huntingdon Sessions, to the drama of Andreyev's "The Black Maskers," will be incorporated by Leopold Stokowski for the third pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Sessions, a graduate of Harvard (1915), was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., but spent his boyhood in Northampton and Hadley, Mass. After leaving Harvard Sessions attended the Yale School of Music where he studied under Horatio Parker. From 1917 to 1921 Sessions was an instructor in the department of music at Smith College. From 1919 to 1922 he was a pupil of Ernest Bloch, later teaching in the Cleveland Institute of Music under Bloch.

Further study took him to Europe; he has twice held the Guggenheim Fellowship, in 1926 and 1928. In the latter year, incidentally, Sessions also won the three-year prize in music at the American Academy in Rome. His works include Three Choral Preludes for Organ, a symphony performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, in 1927, and also in Geneva, Switzerland, and a sonata for pianoforte performed in Rome and Florence in 1930.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 15 1933

BOSTON BAND WILL FEATURE FAVORITE WORK

Koussevitzky to Lead Orchestra at Mosque In Tschaikovsky's Fifth.

Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in Syria Mosque, on Friday evening, October 27, at 8:30. The Russian leader has long held a particular fame as the interpreter of the Russian composer. His performance of the Fifth Symphony was an outstanding feature of Koussevitzky's guest appearance at the London Music Festival last May.

The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." a serenade for small orchestra.

The second number will be the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina."

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" will also be played.

Other orchestras included in the same series, which is under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president, are the Detroit Orchestra, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor and piano soloist; the Minneapolis Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor, and the National Symphony, of Washington, with Hans Kindler, conductor.

ARDMORE, PA.
DAILY TIMES

OCT 16 1933

Gives Piano Recital.

Miss Carol Robinson, concert pianist of New York City, soloist with the Boston Symphony, the Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic orchestras, presented a most delightful concert at Rosemont College, Wednesday evening, October 11. Miss Robinson, who is widely known, has received most enthusiastic praise from the press in all our cities.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

T 14 1933

* * *

The first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in that city, last week, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky. The chief feature of the program was a performance of the Brahms "Third Symphony."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 14 1933

Boston Symphony

Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be a feature of the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, conductor, in Syria Mosque on Friday evening, October 27, at 8:30. The program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for small orchestra. It consists of Allegro, Romanza, Menuetto, Allegretto and Rondo Allegro. The second number will be the Prelude to Mussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina." Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will also be played.

Other orchestras to be heard in the series under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association include the Detroit, with Gabrilowitsch as conductor and piano soloist; the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Eugene Ormany, and the National Symphony of Washington, with Hans Kindler, conductor.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 15 1933

Sharps and Flats

By PIERRE KEY

Old friends generally are best. Bruno Walter may have thought of that the other evening, when he strode out on Carnegie Hall stage where the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra and the Philharmonic-Symphony Thursday night audience awaited the start of this season's opening concert.

Old friends . . . and quite a number of newer ones were there. All greeted him with an enthusiasm which showed how they felt about Hitler and his barbaric practices. It was such a welcome as goes from heart to heart. The gratifying part of it was that the many Jews in the audience did not overdo the demonstration, as they so easily might have done.

I remember my latest visit to the spot outside of Vienna where Beethoven found inspiration for his "Pastoral" Symphony (the sixth). It was brought back during the playing of that composition the other evening as though it were only yesterday, instead of four years ago.

I cannot imagine a more eloquent reading of that lovely score than the one Walter gave it on this particular occasion. Every movement was so perfectly in the mood, in the tempi you felt to be right, and in the quantity of orchestral tone. The quality—since it was the Philharmonic you were hearing—was richly sonorous, polished to sandpaper fineness, and aristocratic.

The "Coriolanus" Overture, which opened the program, was not so perfect; one doesn't do two things as the "Pastoral" was done on the same evening. That is why the Brahms First Symphony, majestic though it is, made less of an impression on me than Beethoven's smaller, tenderer one.

Opera At The Hippodrome.

A good many eyes are focused on New York's Hippodrome, these days. The interest is chiefly on how long the astonishing large patronage is to last. The early summer run of eleven weeks might have been no more than just one of those things. But the second lap of this remarkable experiment is well under way, and so far as externals go the crowds show no signs of diminishing.

Grand opera at from twenty-five cents to a dollar-ten seems to point to a permanent success. One can't say so very much for the quality of what is heard and seen. Manager Salmaggi never has acquired much of a reputation for that. But even though rehearsals are foregone and the orchestra not of the best, the people who pay their money feel they get full value in what they hear.

The explanation rests on two principal points: First, that the price isn't a tax on even thin pocketbooks; second, that a growing public for opera has been created . . . . a public which finds increasing interest in a combination of music, drama, settings, costumes, and lighting effects.

It is this new public which will have a vital influence upon the development of opera. For the oldtime opera must gradually give way to another sort; a kind which not only has a greater consistency than much of that to which we have so long grown accustomed, but a kind having naturalism and a far keener element of interest for us all.

Chicago Says "Yes."

Chicago has said "yes" to Fortune Gallo's San Carlo Opera Company performances. Again—sensing the direction of public taste—Mr. Gallo has put his prices at one dollar for the best seats, with plenty at a quarter. Having leased the Chicago Auditorium Theater, he has available something like 4000 seats. This gave him a gross of $19,000 for the first week, and a figure somewhat in excess of that sum for the second.

Moreover, he has given substantially better opera than New Yorkers have been getting at the Hippodrome. I don't know how long the San Carlo Company will continue in the former home of the original Chicago Opera Company. Nor does Mr. Gallo. He hopes business will hold up . . . and so do many others. Because this second test of responsiveness to genuinely popular-priced opera is quite likely to have a powerful effect upon its future in this country.

Music Lights Glow.

New York's music lights are beginning to glow. Following the brilliant glare of the Philharmonic-Symphony's season opener have come the less powerful ones. Yet just behind them are more of the high candle burners. Almost before we know it the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestras will be offering their introductory programs. In the meantime some admirable concerts and recitals will have taken place.

Today's highlight will be John Charles Thomas's recital of songs, in Town Hall. I met John on the street a few days ago, looking happy in anticipation of three programs . . . of which today's is to be the first. "I've got some songs that are still manuscript," said the baritone, "and they will, I think, get over in a big way."

Julia Peters, who may be remembered for her last winter's concert illustrated with the color lights of the Clavilux, is all ready for her opening recital . . . since she, too, feels that a series of programs offers certain advantages to a singer who wishes to display a full set of resources which a single program limits. And Jascha Heifetz is ready for his first New York program even as I write these lines.

A big season is in prospect, with variety and novelty pretty amply represented. In the near future is the American debut of Julia Nessy, a lyric-coloratura soprano who may duplicate the sensations she has been making in Europe.

Lines-o'-News.

Having concluded its autumn examinations of candidates for fellowships, the Juilliard School of Music faculty will now begin the task of showing these Young Fortunates what's what in the various branches of music they have elected to follow.

The Mannes School, the New York School of Music, and other conservatories report an increase in enrollments . . . with inquiries exceeding the total of a year ago. Which encouraging fact is also reflected in a number of the privately conducted studios.

The Musicians' Emergency Aid Concerts, to be given in Madison Square Garden under Walter Damrosch's direction, promise to be the largest attended of any now on the horizon.

Dots And Dashes.

The music fraternity has begun walking up and down New York's Galleria . . . which is Fifty-seventh Street, from Seventh Avenue to Fifth. Among the dots and dashes of the past few days have been—Lily Pons's arrival from Europe, looking fit and ready for a big concert season, with a liberal sprinkling of opera . . . And Rosa Ponselle, home from opera conquests in Italy and her pet wire-haired terrier who sits under his mistress's piano when she is singing. . . The return of Herbert Witherspoon from points west, to make his headquarters in the town he calls "home" . . . Rumors that Jose Iturbi may be seen as guest conductor of a major orchestra, before spring comes . . . Finally, that Giulio Gatti-Casazza may elect to say "farewell" as general manager of the Metropolitan Opera when he finishes this coming season.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 15 1933

3 NEW OPERAS BY AMERICANS ARE SCHEDULED

Hanson, Erskine, Antheil and Gertrude Stein Contribute to Music Lovers' Delectation

New York, Oct. 14.—(AP)—Look up musical America!—You are going to hear three new American operas this season along with a lot of other compositions by home town boys who known how to make music for the oboe and bull fiddle.

In the operatic field there will be Howard Hanson's "Merry Mount" to a libretto by Richard Stokes of New York. Mr. Hanson's music is written around a dramatic situation in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, and is one of the few American operatic attempts that employs directly American legend and history as material.

The music has had an abridged concert performance at Ann Arbor, Mich., last Spring, but never a stage performance. That has been reserved for this season at the Metropolitan.

"Helen Retires"

January will see the first performances of two other operas, one, "Helen Retires," the libretto by John Erskine, and the music by George Antheil; the other "Four Saints in Three Acts," for which the well known modernist Gertrude Stein has provided the libretto, and Virgil Thomson the score.

Mr. Erskine's libretto is based on an uncanonical legend concerning Helen of Troy and Menelaos, that same Helen he told about in "The Private Life of Helen of Troy," a best seller of some seasons ago. Mr. Antheil is the unpredictable product of Trenton, N. J., whose odd musical exploits have interested or amused the world for 10 years. One has his famous "Ballet Mechanique," which astounded and shocked a Carnegie Hall audience in 1927. The production will be by the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

To Open In Hartford

"Four Saints in Three Acts" is the story of some worthies of the church, reduced to the often astonishing English of Miss Stein, and clothed musically by Thomson, formerly of Kansas City, and now living in Paris. It is to be given in January as the opening performance in the new Model Theater, at Hartford, Conn.

American composers generally are being given considerable attention by the major orchestras of the country this Winter.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernistic stripe: A new suite by Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn; a symphony by Roy Harris, originally of Oklahoma, and a symphony of Emerson Whithorne's. Whithorne hailed from Cleveland, once upon a time.

New Havener's Satire Scheduled

Although Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, a number of new American works are to be done by the New York Philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange. They include "1929—a Satire," by David Stanley Smith of New Haven; a symphony (No. 2) by Randall Thompson; a suite by Walter Piston of Boston; Whithorne's "Fandango," and two poems, "Winter" and "Spring."

Hans Kindler expects to present Lamar Stringfield's "legend of John Henry," and a set of variations on a Hassler chorale by Templeton Strong. Mr. Stringfield, a North Carolinian has interested himself in American folk music for years.

Chicago will hear Philip James' wireless piece "Station WGZBX" under Frederick Stock; Cleveland Whithorne's "The Dream Pedlar" and Carlton Cooley's "Caponsacchi," Mr. Cooley being solo viola in the Cleveland orchestra under Arthur Rorzinski.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 16 1933

STOKOWSKI COMING TO OPEN CONCERTS

Philadelphia Orchestra to Appear Next Week.

The Third Symphony of Brahms will be played at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening of next week by the Philadelphia orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. The coming of the Philadelphia orchestra is the first event of the new Bushnell concert series.

The complete Stokowski program includes the following numbers:

Fugue in C minor, by Bach; Symphony No. 3 in F major, by Brahms; music from the drama of Andreyev, "The Black Maskers," by Roger Huntington Sessions; and "Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel.

The Bach Fugue was orchestrated by Mr. Stokowski, his transcription being first performed by the Philadelphia orchestra in October, 1932. The Sessions music was written to accompany the performance of the Andreyev drama by the class of 1923 at Smith college ten years ago. The Ravel number, a suite in four movements, dates from 1907.

Bernard Wagenaar, celebrated composer and critic, has been engaged to give a series of five talks on the symphony programs to be played at the Memorial this season. His first lecture, covering the Philadelphia orchestra program, will be given Friday evening of this week.

Each Wagenaar lecture will precede a symphony program, but in addition to his comments on the individual programs of the Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, Boston and New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestras, the speaker will make his talks a course in music appreciation. Each of the lectures will take place in the Colonial room. Owing to the limited seating capacity of this room, it will not be possible for the management to accommodate all the subscribers to the course. It has been announced that applications for seats will be filled in the order in which they are received until the limit of the room has been reached.

Both as teacher and composer, Mr. Wagenaar has achieved notable success. His work at the Julliard School of Music quickly created a demand for his appearance elsewhere as a lecturer on music appreciation and contemporary music. His two symphonies have been played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra. Other symphony groups, including those of London, Detroit, Rochester and Cincinnatti, have played his "Sinfonietta," while his songs and sonatas are in the repertoire of many of the great artists.

Once again the Bushnell Concert series is an assured sell-out, not more than fifty season tickets remaining untaken, Mr. Mortensen said to-day. Tickets for the course have been virtually all distributed by the box office, which reported that payments this season were made even more promptly than last year.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An unusual program has been assembled by Dr Koussevitzky for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall at 2:30 Friday afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening. The opening number will be Ravel's suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," in which the contemporary French composer gave evidence of his admiration for the genius of his countryman who lived in the latter 17th and early 18th centuries. The four parts of this suite are a prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon. This score has not been played in Symphony Hall since 1928.

The two remaining numbers are Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" and Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

On Oct 31. the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Tuesday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall in which Dr Koussevitzky is to present a notable cycle of the music of Beethoven. All of the symphonies including the Choral Ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts. Chorus, singers and instrumental soloists will be announced later.

On Monday evening, Nov 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programs Dr Koussevitzky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory. Season tickets are still to be had for each series.

Ossin Gabrilowitsch

Beethoven Is the Concerts---Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As already suggested in these columns, Beethoven will be much honored in and about Boston during the forthcoming concert season. Besides the Beethoven cycle that will fill the six Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra and a performance of the Ninth Symphony at the concerts of the People's Symphony Orchestra, not to mention incidental performances of Beethoven's music at the regular Symphony concerts and elsewhere, there will come from the Chardon String Quartet, playing at Brattle Hall in Cambridge under the auspices of the Longy School of Music, a series of seven concerts, beginning Nov. 9, in which all the 17 string quartets of Beethoven will be performed.

* * * *

As pendant to von Buelow's three B's, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, one might suggest the three S's of modern music, Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky, composers for whom Dr. Koussevitzky has shown an especial partiality and in the interpretation of whose music he excels. Two of them will be paired on the programme which he has made for the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday of this week. As second and third items on that list stand Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," which the conductor successfully revived last season, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, recalling the performance last season of all seven of the Finnish master's works in that form, undoubtedly the most impressive featuring of Sibelius' music in a single season by any American orchestra.

* * * *

LOWELL, MASS.
Telegram

OCT 8 1933

AUSPICIOUS OPENING OF SYMPHONY SEASON

A brilliant audience paid its tribute of enthusiastic applause to Dr. Serge Koussewitzky last evening at Symphony hall in Boston, rising to its feet at the appearance of the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and in tribute to the conductor's beginning of his tenth year as leader of the orchestra. Distinguished men and women of society, business, professional and artistic circles in Boston and surrounding cities, including a number from Lowell, added their personal tribute to the man who, through his genius as a musician and his courage as a conductor, has brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to the high peak of its performance. The program included: Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which stood upon the conductor's initial program 10 years ago, Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals"; and the Third Symphony of Brahms.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

OCT 15 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its series of three concerts at the Lyric on November 14. Although Serge Koussevitsky has added a number of new works to his repertoire, the bulk of his program is bade up of compositions by the old masters.

Edwin Orlando Swain, barytone, who will give a recital with Shura Cherkassky, pianist, at the Lyric on October 30 for the benefit of the Mount Royal Improvement Association is a Southerner by birth. He is a graduate of De Pauw University. Since starting his music career he has been heard in many large cities of the United States.

This concert will be Mr. Cherkassky's first concert appearance in Baltimore for several years, although last season he was soloist with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 15 1933

Dr Serge Koussevitzky

Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Concerts to Be Held at Smith College on February 10

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS

OCT

Dalies Frantz.

St. Cecilia members will enjoy their second artist recital for the season Friday afternoon, Oct. 20, when Dalies Frantz, talented young pianist will be presented.

Dalies Frantz has won an unusual number of important prizes including the combined Schubert Memorial and National Federation of Music clubs award, perhaps the most distinguished and coveted prize in the country; Naumburg Award and the honor of appearing with the Detroit Symphony orchestra. At the time of his most recent appearance with the Detroit orchestra, under direction of Asep Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Frantz received a 10-minute ovation.

Born in Colorado, Mr. Frantz resided for some time in Boston, and later was graduated with high honors from the University of Michigan. Most of his work has been done with Guy Maler, who has appeared before St. Cecilia. In brief visits to Europe Mr. Frantz studied with Arthur Schnabel and Valdimir Horowitz.

The National Broadcasting Co. has taken over the management of Mr. Frantz. In the present season he will appear as soloist with the New York Philharmonic and with the Chicago and Boston Symphony orchestras.

Next season he expects to be presented in his first coast to coast concert tour, which will open in Carnegie hall, New York. Following that he has been engaged as soloist to appear with orchestras in New York, Chicago, Boston and other large cities.

Critics agree that Mr. Frantz has a fine technical foundation, unusual and brilliant personality, rhythmic vitality and exuberance.

The program which he has submitted to the committee is interesting and varied.

Mr. Frantz has been at the National High School Band and Orchestra camp at Interlochen for the last few years and is widely known among the young musicians who attend.

Members of the St. Cecilia will be admitted on the presentation of membership tickets. Non-members may purchase tickets and music students will be admitted at a reduced rate.

Mr. Frantz will be the house guest of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Weinhart of Orchard Hill while in the city.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

OCT 14 1933

Orchestra Due In Chicago

The Boston Symphony orchestra, long considered one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, under its brilliant conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is to visit Chicago the last week of A Century of Progress to give a concert in Orchestra hall on Monday evening, Oct. 23. This is the fifty-third season of the Boston orchestra and the tenth under the leadership of Koussevitzky.

The Russian conductor came to America in 1924 with a reputation as probably the most brilliant and outstanding conductor of Europe at that time. In the last 10 years this remarkable artist has raised the traditionally famous orchestra to new heights.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces a notable program for the Chicago visit. It will consist of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra, and Stravinsky's sensational "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), the score of which has influenced the course of musical composition probably more than any other in this century. The symphony will be the Second in D major of Sibelius, the great living Finnish composer.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

OCT 12 1933

The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach in a concert recital in Montpelier seminary tomorrow night marks the 50th anniversary since the debut of this world famous composer and pianist when she made her debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra. She has been in constant demand at public performances since that time.

The Mothers' club will meet tomorrow afternoon at the home of Mrs. Harold W. Marsett of McKinley street when an address will be given by Dr. Mildred Steele of Waterbury on "Dental Hygiene."

POMONA, CALIF.
PROGRESS-BULLETIN

OCT 1

MUSICAL BODY TO MAKE BOW

Orchestral Arts Society To Be Introduced At Bridge on Monday

CLAREMONT, Oct. 12.—The opening event of the newly formed Orchestral Arts society, Prof. Herbert E. Gray, director, will be given next Monday evening at 8 o'clock in Bridges hall of music, and will include the Mozart Concerto in C major for flute and harp, with orchestral accompaniment.

This work will be presented by Miss Winifred Babcock, flutist, and Miss Lucy Lewis, harpist. The Andantino and the Allegro will be played at this time. Miss Babcock, graduate of Pomona college, has studied flute with Jay Plowe of the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra, and with Georges Laurent, solo flutist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Lewis and Miss Gertrude Peterson, co-artists on the harp, have been heard thruout Southern California in duo-harp concert programs. They started from the Three Arts club in Los Angeles, where they made their home, last spring, taking their harps in a trailer and playing concert programs along their way to New York, where they spent the summer studying with Salzedo.

Other numbers on the opening program will be "In the Tavern" from the suite "Scenes from the South," and "Scenes from the Midi" (Nicode), ballet music from the opera "Faust" (Gounod) and three dances (Edward German) written for the production of Henry VIII at the Lyceum theater in London in 1892.

The Orchestral Arts society includes professional musicians from this region who will be hosts at an informal reception after the concert.

Members are William Winslow, San Bernardino; Miss Skillman, Ontario; Miss Miriam Bruce, Claremont; Prof. Ralph Uniacke, Claremont; M. Mirapolski, Ontario; Miss Margaret Johnston, Ontario; Miss Hazel Sanders, Pomona; Carl Adams, Pomona; Mrs. Evelyn Douglass, Claremont; Miss Emelie Wagner, Claremont; Miss Dorothy Rollins, Ontario; Hobart Alter, Ontario; Orley Weist and Cecil Short, Pomona; Egmont Pohl, Redlands; Ronald Clark, Miss Winifred Babcock, Mrs. Carl Baumann, Claremont; James Guthrie, San Bernardino; Philip Hood, Santa Ana; Robert Williams, La Verne; Fred Ferrey, Tustin; Carroll Manning, Baldwin Park; Albert Norton, Pomona; Elbert Wing, Ontario, Clair Brown, Pomona; Edward Burns, Santa Ana; Mrs. Herbert Gray, Claremont; Lewis Hanson, Santa Ana; Ervin German, Garden Grove, and Miss Lucy Lewis, Redlands.

20

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 16 1933

STOKOWSKI COMING TO OPEN CONCERTS

Philadelphia Orchestra to Appear Next Week.

The Third Symphony of Brahms will be played at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday evening of next week by the Philadelphia orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. The coming of the Philadelphia orchestra is the first event of the new Bushnell concert series.

The complete Stokowski program includes the following numbers:

Fugue in C minor, by Bach; Symphony No. 3 in F major, by Brahms; music from the drama of Andreyev, "The Black Maskers," by Roger Huntington Sessions; and "Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel.

The Bach Fugue was orchestrated by Mr. Stokowski, his transcription being first performed by the Philadelphia orchestra in October, 1932. The Sessions music was written to accompany the performance of the Andreyev drama by the class of 1923 at Smith college ten years ago. The Ravel number, a suite in four movements, dates from 1907.

Bernard Wagenaar, celebrated composer and critic, has been engaged to give a series of five talks on the symphony programs to be played at the Memorial this season. His first lecture, covering the Philadelphia orchestra program, will be given Friday evening of this week.

Each Wagenaar lecture will precede a symphony program, but in addition to his comments on the individual programs of the Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, Boston and New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestras, the speaker will make his talks a course in music appreciation. Each of the lectures will take place in the Colonial room. Owing to the limited seating capacity of this room, it will not be possible for the management to accommodate all the subscribers to the course. It has been announced that applications for seats will be filled in the order in which they are received until the limit of the room has been reached.

Both as teacher and composer, Mr. Wagenaar has achieved notable success. His work at the Julliard School of Music quickly created a demand for his appearance elsewhere as a lecturer on music appreciation and contemporary music. His two symphonies have been played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra. Other symphony groups, including those of London, Detroit, Rochester and Cincinnatti, have played his "Sinfonietta," while his songs and sonatas are in the repertoire of many of the great artists.

Once again the Bushnell Concert series is an assured sell-out, not more than fifty season tickets remaining untaken, Mr. Mortensen said to-day. Tickets for the course have been virtually all distributed by the box office, which reported that payments this season were made even more promptly than last year.

Globe Oct 15

Boston Symphony Orchestra

An unusual program has been assembled by Dr Koussevitzky for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall at 2:30 Friday afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening. The opening number will be Ravel's suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," in which the contemporary French composer gave evidence of his admiration for the genius of his countryman who lived in the latter 17th and early 18th centuries. The four parts of this suite are a prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon. This score has not been played in Symphony Hall since 1928.

The two remaining numbers are Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" and Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Major.

On Oct 31. the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the Tuesday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall in which Dr Koussevitzky is to present a notable cycle of the music of Beethoven. All of the symphonies including the Choral Ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts. Chorus, singers and instrumental soloists will be announced later.

On Monday evening, Nov 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programs Dr Koussevitzky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory. Season tickets are still to be had for each series.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch

Beethoven Is the Concerts---Music

Post Oct 15

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As already suggested in these columns, Beethoven will be much honored in and about Boston during the forthcoming concert season. Besides the Beethoven cycle that will fill the six Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra and a performance of the Ninth Symphony at the concerts of the People's Symphony Orchestra, not to mention incidental performances of Beethoven's music at the regular Symphony concerts and elsewhere, there will come from the Chardon String Quartet, playing at Brattle Hall in Cambridge under the auspices of the Longy School of Music, a series of seven concerts, beginning Nov. 9, in which all the 17 string quartets of Beethoven will be performed.

* * * *

As pendant to von Buelow's three B's, Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, one might suggest the three S's of modern music, Strauss, Sibelius and Stravinsky, composers for whom Dr. Koussevitzky has shown an especial partiality and in the interpretation of whose music he excels. Two of them will be paired on the programme which he has made for the regular Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday of this week. As second and third items on that list stand Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," which the conductor successfully revived last season, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, recalling the performance last season of all seven of the Finnish master's works in that form, undoubtedly the most impressive featuring of Sibelius' music in a single season by any American orchestra.

* * * *

---

(1) LOWELL, MASS.
Telegram
OCT 8 1933

AUSPICIOUS OPENING OF SYMPHONY SEASON

A brilliant audience paid its tribute of enthusiastic applause to Dr. Serge Koussewitzky last evening at Symphony hall in Boston, rising to its feet at the appearance of the popular conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and in tribute to the conductor's beginning of his tenth year as leader of the orchestra. Distinguished men and women of society, business, professional and artistic circles in Boston and surrounding cities, including a number from Lowell, added their personal tribute to the man who, through his genius as a musician and his courage as a conductor, has brought the Boston Symphony orchestra to the high peak of its performance. The program included: Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which stood upon the conductor's initial program 10 years ago, Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals"; and the Third Symphony of Brahms.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

OCT 15 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its series of three concerts at the Lyric on November 14. Although Serge Koussevitsky has added a number of new works to his repertoire, the bulk of his program is bade up of compositions by the old masters.

Edwin Orlando Swain, barytone, who will give a recital with Shura Cherkassky, pianist, at the Lyric on October 30 for the benefit of the Mount Royal Improvement Association, is a Southerner by birth. He is a graduate of De Pauw University. Since starting his music career he has been heard in many large cities of the United States.

This concert will be Mr. Cherkassky's first concert appearance in Baltimore for several years, although last season he was soloist with the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 15 1933

Dr Serge Koussevitzky

Will Direct Boston Symphony Orchestra at Concerts to Be Held at Smith College on February 10

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 14 1933

Dalies Frantz.

St. Cecilia members will enjoy their second artist recital for the season Friday afternoon, Oct. 20, when Dalies Frantz, talented young pianist will be presented.

Dalies Frantz has won an unusual number of important prizes including the combined Schubert Memorial and National Federation of Music clubs award, perhaps the most distinguished and coveted prize in the country; Naumburg Award and the honor of appearing with the Detroit Symphony orchestra. At the time of his most recent appearance with the Detroit orchestra, under direction of Asep Gabrilowitsch, Mr. Frantz received a 10-minute ovation.

Born in Colorado, Mr. Frantz resided for some time in Boston, and later was graduated with high honors from the University of Michigan. Most of his work has been done with Guy Maier, who has appeared before St. Cecilia. In brief visits to Europe Mr. Frantz studied with Arthur Schnabel and Valdimir Horowitz.

The National Broadcasting Co. has taken over the management of Mr. Frantz. In the present season he will appear as soloist with the New York Philharmonic and with the Chicago and Boston Symphony orchestras.

Next season he expects to be presented in his first coast to coast concert tour, which will open in Carnegie hall, New York. Following that he has been engaged as soloist to appear with orchestras in New York, Chicago, Boston and other large cities.

Critics agree that Mr. Frantz has a fine technical foundation, unusual and brilliant personality, rhythmic vitality and exuberance.

The program which he has submitted to the committee is interesting and varied.

Mr. Frantz has been at the National High School Band and Orchestra camp at Interlochen for the last few years and is widely known among the young musicians who attend.

Members of the St. Cecilia will be admitted on the presentation of membership tickets. Non-members may purchase tickets and music students will be admitted at a reduced rate.

Mr. Frantz will be the house guest of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Weinhart of Orchard Hill while in the city.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS

OCT 14 1933

Orchestra Due In Chicago

The Boston Symphony orchestra, long considered one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world, under its brilliant conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, is to visit Chicago the last week of A Century of Progress to give a concert in Orchestra hall on Monday evening, Oct. 23. This is the fifty-third season of the Boston orchestra and the tenth under the leadership of Koussevitzky.

The Russian conductor came to America in 1924 with a reputation as probably the most brilliant and outstanding conductor of Europe at that time. In the last 10 years this remarkable artist has raised the traditionally famous orchestra to new heights.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces a notable program for the Chicago visit. It will consist of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" for string orchestra, and Stravinsky's sensational "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring"), the score of which has influenced the course of musical composition probably more than any other in this century. The symphony will be the Second in D major of Sibelius, the great living Finnish composer.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

OCT 12 1933

The appearance of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach in a concert recital in Montpelier seminary tomorrow night marks the 50th anniversary since the debut of this world famous composer and pianist when she made her debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra. She has been in constant demand at public performances since that time.

The Mothers' club will meet tomorrow afternoon at the home of Mrs. Harold W. Marsett of McKinley street when an address will be given by Dr. Mildred Steele of Waterbury on "Dental Hygiene."

POMONA, CALIF.
PROGRESS-BULLETIN

OCT 1 [illegible] 1933

MUSICAL BODY TO MAKE BOW

Orchestral Arts Society To Be Introduced At Bridge on Monday

CLAREMONT, Oct. 12.—The opening event of the newly formed Orchestral Arts society, Prof. Herbert E. Gray, director, will be given next Monday evening at 8 o'clock in Bridges hall of music, and will include the Mozart Concerto in C major for flute and harp, with orchestral accompaniment.

This work will be presented by Miss Winifred Babcock, flutist, and Miss Lucy Lewis, harpist. The Andantino and the Allegro will be played at this time. Miss Babcock, graduate of Pomona college, has studied flute with Jay Plowe of the Los Angeles Philharmonic orchestra, and with Georges Laurent, solo flutist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Lewis and Miss Gertrude Peterson, co-artists on the harp, have been heard thruout Southern California in duo-harp concert programs. They started from the Three Arts club in Los Angeles, where they made their home, last spring, taking their harps in a trailer and playing concert programs along their way to New York, where they spent the summer studying with Salzedo.

Other numbers on the opening program will be "In the Tavern" from the suite "Scenes from the South," and "Scenes from the Midi" (Nicode), ballet music from the opera "Faust" (Gounod) and three dances (Edward German) written for the production of Henry VIII at the Lyceum theater in London in 1892.

The Orchestral Arts society includes professional musicians from this region who will be hosts at an informal reception after the concert.

Members are William Winslow, San Bernardino; Miss Skillman, Ontario; Miss Miriam Bruce, Claremont; Prof. Ralph Uniacke, Claremont; M. Mirapolski, Ontario; Miss Margaret Johnston, Ontario; Miss Hazel Sanders, Pomona; Carl Adams, Pomona; Mrs. Evelyn Douglass, Claremont; Miss Emelie Wagner, Claremont; Miss Dorothy Rollins, Ontario; Hobart Alter, Ontario; Orley Weist and Cecil Short, Pomona; Egmont Pohl, Redlands; Ronald Clark, Miss Winifred Babcock, Mrs. Carl Baumann, Claremont; James Guthrie, San Bernardino; Philip Hood, Santa Ana; Robert Williams, La Verne; Fred Ferrey, Tustin; Carroll Manning, Baldwin Park; Albert Norton, Pomona; Elbert Wing, Ontario, Clair Brown, Pomona; Edward Burns, Santa Ana; Mrs. Herbert Gray, Claremont; Lewis Hanson, Santa Ana; Ervin German, Garden Grove, and Miss Lucy Lewis, Redlands.

TIME
[illegible]
OCT 16

*

M U S I C

Season's Overtures

Almost in unison last week the country's first four symphony orchestras sounded the overture to a new music season. Limousines lined up for blocks before the concert halls in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago. Dowagers and their escorts pushed their way impatiently through the sidewalk crowds. Music students, shabby and excited, ran up the steps to their top-gallery seats. Out of the wings like ball-players leaving their dug-outs came the big league orchestra players. Oboes sounded A. A buzz of tuning and the big-league captains appeared—Chicago's square old Frederick Stock; Boston's Serge Koussevitzky, aloof and immaculate; Philadelphia's Leopold Stokowski, blond-mopped and mercury-quick as he shot on to the stage; New York's big Bruno Walter who conducts the Philharmonic until Arturo Toscanini returns in January.

International Acme Keystone Acme

CONDUCTORS STOCK, KOUSSEVITZKY, STOKOWSKI, WALTER
The limousines lined up, the oboes sounded A.

The shadow of Adolf Hitler looming over Conductor Bruno Walter aroused the week's big demonstration. Bruno Walter (real name: Schlesinger) was first of the Jewish musicians to lose his job last spring in Germany. A conductor without an orchestra, he has drifted around since then, giving guest performances in Holland, Austria, London. Impressed with his martyrdom Philharmonic subscribers, who usually save their hero-worship for Toscanini, stood up when the big, kindly German came on stage, clapped him louder and longer than they ever clap his sensitive, scholarly performances. Beethoven and Brahms—Walter's program last week—were painstakingly conservative. The other big-league conductors played almost as safe. Koussevitzky added Scriabin and a touch of his favorite Debussy. Stokowski chose Bach, Wagner and Schubert. Stock finished off with a mild dash of Stravinsky.

Economy was the subject in New York where the orchestra's predicament was unpleasantly emphasized by the absence of Critic Lawrence Gilman's authoritative program notes. Economy was the keynote of the Philadelphia concert where Stokowski, almost in a single breath, mourned the passing of the Orchestra's president, Alexander Van Rensselaer, and pleaded for support so that the orchestra might go on. This week at a banquet promoted by William Curtis Bok, the Philadelphia Orchestra's unsold season tickets were auctioned in an attempt to save the players a pay-cut of 19%. With its orchestra at stake Philadelphia is overlooking the excursions of its fair-haired conductor who has just been in Hollywood where he studied sound-reproduction, contracted to write the music for Break of Hearts, a John Barrymore-Katharine Hepburn picture.

With a few unimportant exceptions the big-league orchestras have kept their old lineups and star performers. Squat little Mischa Mischakoff still plays first violin for Chicago, lean young Alfred Wallenstein the 'cello for Manhattan, with Bruno Jaenicke behind him blowing himself red in the face over his French horn. Boston still has Richard Burgin playing first violin, Jean Bedetti first 'cello. In Philadelphia sleek Anton Torello still wields the big bull fiddle; Oscar Schwar, who was a drummer-boy in the Imperial German Army, still presides over the tympani.

Chicago is beginning its season a week early to catch more World's Fair visitors. To the Fair late this month will go the Boston Symphony, taking in its homeward stride Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Schenectady. Three times this winter Boston's orchestra will play in Baltimore and Washington, cities which the New York Philharmonic no longer feels financially able to visit. But before he sets out on tour Conductor Koussevitzky has a private mission to fulfill. Just as Richard Wagner wrote the Siegfried Idyll to serenade his Cosima one birthday morning, so each year on Oct. 14, Mme Koussevitzky's birthday, the Boston conductor gets a group of symphony men to come and play her an early-morning concert.

"In The Beginning"

Footnote to the First Symphony Concert from a Subscriber

THE resounding chord of Leonore,
And "Symphony" has begun.
Yet have they counted without one:
Mrs. Dratt who crashes through the door,
Clutching her ticket by its stub,
A full ten minutes late.
Her sturm-und-drang generate
Odors of camphor balls and Vaporub.
Praiseworthy effort to amalgamate
Perfumes with the mighty score.
T. L.

Time, Oct 16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Ann Arbor Mich
Tribune
10/16/33

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Inaugurate Choral Union Concert Series October 24

The Boston Symphony orchestra which will inaugurate this season's Choral Union Concert series on the evening of October 24, is in its fifty-third season. The period, 1881 to 1884, during which time it was under the conductorship of George Henschel, established the Orchestra as comparable to the great European organizations. After the pioneer work of Conductor Henschel, for five years Wilhelm Gericke presided and carried forward the traditions earlier established. From 1889 to 1898, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur were at the head and traditions by that time had become so firmly established that the organization was recognized as an important permanent feature of music in America.

In 1898 Wilhelm Gericke was recalled and continued to lead the organization until 1906. From 1906 until 1914, the organization was presided over by Dr. Karl Musk and Max Fiedler. From 1914 to 1918 there was an interlude following which two renowned baton, Henry Rabaud and Pierre French conductors tock up the Monteux. In 1924 new enthusiasm was introduced into the orchestra by election of Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor as head of the organization. Dr. Koussevitzky has continued since that time and has carried forwaru the high points of excellence obtained by his predecessors

During these years the Orchestra has been heard in Ann Arbor on nine previous occasions,: May 16, 1890; May 5, 1891; May 7, 1892; May 9, 1893; May 11, 1894. A period of nearly twenty years elapsed before it was again heard in Ann Arbor when it appeared on January 31, 1913. On January 26, 1917, it again gave a program, and October 27, 1931, and Octobtr 25, 1932, it inaugurated the respective Choral Union Concert series.

The organization consists of 110 players and the entire personnel is always included in its out of town trips. This year only a limited number of engagements will be filled including Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh.

Other artists and organizations to be heard in the Choral Union Series, include Lily Pons, soprano; Maria Olszewska, contralto; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncellist; Poldi Mildner and Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianists; The Vienna Boys Choir and the Cincinnati and Detroit Symphony orchestras, under the respective batons of Eugene Goossens and Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 18 1933

Koussevitzky Owns Sensitive Ears

One interesting and quite probable explanation for the extraordinary responses which Serge Koussevitzky appears to invoke consistently from that magnificent 110-piece organization, the Boston Symphony orchestra, is said to lie in his possession of a rarely sensitive ear.

It is this conductor, internationally renowned as a program builder as well as a most impressive interpreter, and this responsive and seasoned orchestra which will open the season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 26.

Wednesday is the date for the opening of the symphony club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third. Season tickets also are to include the post-holiday appearance of the Cleveland Symphony orchestra.

Sins of Omission

The reporter of an exhibition writes in fear that he will seem to readers to be compiling a catalogue. Therefore he is sure to omit, though not of purpose, one or another item that he should have mentioned. For example, in the current exhibition of Koussevitzkiana at Symphony Hall as described in this place last Friday: (1) the remarkable photographs by Mr. J. B. Sanromá of conductor, orchestra and chorus in action at the performance, last spring, of Brahms's "German Requiem"; (2) the gold cup, or vase, given by the members of the Symphony Orchestra to the "founder and sustainer" upon his retirement; subsequently handed by Mrs. Higginson to Dr. Koussevitzky during the celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth year.

Yet Again Beethoven

This Beethoven season once more. . . . During his present visit to the United States Mr. Schnabel will play only pianopieces by Beethoven. Accordingly a concerto from Beethoven at the Symphony Concerts in December and a "Beethoven Program" for his recital in Boston, probably in November.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
OCT 17 1933

On The Firing Line

By R. P. M.

THE LETTERS OF DR. YODKA BODKA PIP.
(Unappreciated.)

Serge Koussevitsky,
Boston Symphony Orchestra,
Boston, ~~Mass.~~

Dear Koussie: I have your letter of the 10th, inst., re suggestions for an all-Beethoven program next month. You ask for "something representing the master in all his moods." That's a big order, S. K., but here goes my suggestion:

I.
Overture, "Cheese Blintz," Schoenberg
Fantasy, "Ferry Street in Autumn," Bogojubow-Dimitroffka
II.
Symphony in E Minor, Shrdlu allegro allegro
allegro allegro
III.
Tone Poem, "Where's Elmer?" Ravel

I think that's a pretty well balanced program. Glad to be of help to you any time.

Yodka "B." Pip.

* * *

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 18 1933

ADMIRED IN ENGLAND

BESIDES the enviable reputation which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the inimitable Boston Symphony orchestra which is to be heard at Memorial hall Thursday evening, Oct. 28, has achieved in this country during his seasons at his present post, he has won the plaudits of European audiences.

During his appearance as guest conductor of the Music Festival in London last May, he was accorded a welcome which belied the traditional British reserve. From reports it is evident that London appreciated Koussevitzky, and he, in turn, appreciated it.

Speaking of the musical situation there, he observes, "England is now having a musical renaissance. The musical creative activity there at this moment shows a distinction and in particular a mastery of form which puts England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

The box office for season tickets for the Symphony club of Central Ohio whose season course the Boston orchestra presents the initial concert, opened today at Carl Koch's, Third and Broad streets.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Ann [illegible]

PROGRAM FOR FIRST CONCERT IS ANNOUNCED

BostonSymphony Orchestra Here Nert Tuesday Night

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has built a program of unusual interest for the orchestra's concert in this season's Choral Union series, Tuesday evening, October 24.

The program will be opened by Mozart's, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade for string orchestra, (Koechel No 525) and in the latter half he will play Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

Of special interest will be the second number, when he will offer for the first time in Ann Arbor, a remarkable work of a great modernist, Stravinsky, entitled "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") a picture of Pagan Russia, which consists of two parts, The Adoration of the Earth—Introduction-Harbingers of Spring-Dance of the Adolescents-Abduction-Spring Rounds Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wsie Man)—Dance of the Earth, and Part 2, The Sacrifice—Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents-Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

TIME

Chicago-Dee

OCT 16 1933

*

MUSIC

Season's Overtures

Almost in unison last week the country's first four symphony orchestras sounded the overture to a new music season. Limousines lined up for blocks before the concert halls in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago. Dowagers and their escorts pushed their way impatiently through the sidewalk crowds. Music students, shabby and excited, ran up the steps to their top-gallery seats. Out of the wings like ball-players leaving their dug-outs came the big league orchestra players. Oboes sounded A. A buzz of tuning and the big-league captains appeared—Chicago's square old Frederick Stock; Boston's Serge Koussevitzky, aloof and immaculate; Philadelphia's Leopold Stokowski, blond-mopped and mercury-quick as he shot on to the stage; New York's big Bruno Walter who conducts the Philharmonic until Arturo Toscanini returns in January.

The shadow of Adolf Hitler looming over Conductor Bruno Walter aroused the week's big demonstration. Bruno Walter (real name: Schlesinger) was first of the Jewish musicians to lose his job last spring in Germany. A conductor without an orchestra, he has drifted around since then, giving guest performances in Holland, Austria, London. Impressed with his martyrdom Philharmonic subscribers, who usually save their hero-worship for Toscanini, stood up when the big, kindly German came on stage, clapped him louder and longer than they ever clap his sensitive, scholarly performances. Beethoven and Brahms—Walter's program last week—were painstakingly conservative. The other big-league conductors played almost as safe. Koussevitzky added Scriabin and a touch of his favorite Debussy. Stokowski chose Bach, Wagner and Schubert. Stock finished off with a mild dash of Stravinsky.

Economy was the subject in New York where the orchestra's predicament was unpleasantly emphasized by the absence of Critic Lawrence Gilman's authoritative program notes. Economy was the keynote of the Philadelphia concert where Stokowski, almost in a single breath, mourned the passing of the Orchestra's president, Alexander Van Rensselaer, and pleaded for support so that the orchestra might go on. This week at a banquet promoted by William Curtis Bok, the Philadelphia Orchestra's unsold season tickets were auctioned in an attempt to save the players a pay-cut of 19%. With its orchestra at stake Philadelphia is overlooking the excursions of its fair-haired conductor who has just been in Hollywood where he studied sound-reproduction, contracted to write the music for Break of Hearts, a John Barrymore-Katharine Hepburn picture.

International Acme Keystone Acme

CONDUCTORS STOCK, KOUSSEVITZKY, STOKOWSKI, WALTER

The limousines lined up, the oboes sounded A.

With a few unimportant exceptions the big-league orchestras have kept their old lineups and star performers. Squat little Mischa Mischakoff still plays first violin for Chicago, lean young Alfred Wallenstein the 'cello for Manhattan, with Bruno Jaenicke behind him blowing himself red in the face over his French horn. Boston still has Richard Burgin playing first violin, Jean Bedetti first 'cello. In Philadelphia sleek Anton Torello still wields the big bull fiddle; Oscar Schwar, who was a drummer-boy in the Imperial German Army, still presides over the tympani.

Chicago is beginning its season a week early to catch more World's Fair visitors. To the Fair late this month will go the Boston Symphony, taking in its homeward stride Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh, Schenectady. Three times this winter Boston's orchestra will play in Baltimore and Washington, cities which the New York Philharmonic no longer feels financially able to visit. But before he sets out on tour Conductor Koussevitzky has a private mission to fulfill. Just as Richard Wagner wrote the Siegfried Idyll to serenade his Cosima one birthday morning, so each year on Oct. 14, Mme Koussevitzky's birthday, the Boston conductor gets a group of symphony men to come and play her an early-morning concert.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

OCT 17 1933

On The Firing Line

By R. P. M.

THE LETTERS OF DR. YODKA BODKA PIP.

(Unappreciated.)

Serge Koussevitsky,
Boston Symphony Orchestra,
Boston, Mass.

Dear Koussie: I have your letter of the 10th, inst., re suggestions for an all-Beethoven program next month. You ask for "something representing the master in all his moods." That's a big order, S. K., but here goes my suggestion:

I.
Overture, "Cheese Blintz," Schoenberg
Fantasy, "Ferry Street in Autumn," Bogojubow-Dimitrovka
II.
Symphony in E Minor, Shrdlu
allegro allegro
allegro allegro
III.
Tone Poem, "Where's Elmer?" Ravel

I think that's a prety well balanced program. Glad to be of help to you any time.

Yodka "B." Pip.

* * *

"In The Beginning"

Footnote to the First Symphony Concert from a Subscriber

THE resounding chord of Leonore,
And "Symphony" has begun.
Yet have they counted without one:
Mrs. Dratt who crashes through the door,
Clutching her ticket by its stub,
A full ten minutes late.
Her sturm-und-drang generate
Odors of camphor balls and Vaporub.
Praiseworthy effort to amalgamate
Perfumes with the mighty score.

T. L.

Trans. Oct 16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Ann Arbor Mich
Tribune
10/16/33

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Inaugurate Choral Union Concert Series October 24

The Boston Symphony orchestra which will inaugurate this season's Choral Union Concert series on the evening of October 24, is in its fifty-third season. The period, 1881 to 1884, during which time it was under the conductorship of George Henschel, established the Orchestra as comparable to the great European organizations. After the pioneer work of Conductor Henschel, for five years Wilhelm Gericke presided and carried forward the traditions earlier established. From 1889 to 1898, Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur were at the head and traditions by that time had become so firmly established that the organization was recognized as an important permanent feature of music in America.

In 1898 Wilhelm Gericke was recalled and continued to lead the organization until 1906. From 1906 until 1914, the organization was presided over by Dr. Karl Musk and Max Fiedler. From 1914 to 1918 there was an interlude following which two renowned baton, Henry Rabaud and Pierre French conductors took up the Monteux. In 1924 new enthusiasm was introduced into the orchestra by election of Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor as head of the organization. Dr. Koussevitzky has continued since that time and has carried forwaru the high points of excellence obtained by his predecessors

During these years the Orchestra has been heard in Ann Arbor on nine previous occasions,: May 16, 1890; May 5. 1891; May 7, 1892; May 9, 1893; May 11, 1894. A period of nearly twenty years elapsed before it was again heard in Ann Arbor when it appeared on January 31, 1913. On January 26, 1917, it again gave a program, and October 27, 1931, and Octobtr 25, 1932, it inaugurated the respective Choral Union Concert series.

The organization consists of 110 players and the entire personnel is always included in its out of town trips. This year only a limited number of engagements will be filled including Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh.

Other artists and organizations to be heard in the Choral Union Series, include Lily Pons, soprano; Maria Olszewska, contralto; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncellist; Poldi Mildner and Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianists; The Vienna Boys Choir and the Cincinnati and Detroit Symphony orchestras, under the respective batons of Eugene Goossens and Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

Sins of Omission

Trans Oct 17

The reporter of an exhibition writes in fear that he will seem to readers to be compiling a catalogue. Therefore he is sure to omit, though not of purpose, one or another item that he should have mentioned. For example, in the current exhibition of Koussevitzkiana at Symphony Hall as described in this place last Friday: (1) the remarkable photographs by Mr. J. B. Sanromá of conductor, orchestra and chorus in action at the performance, last spring, of Brahms's "German Requiem"; (2) the gold cup, or vase, given by the members of the Symphony Orchestra to the "founder and sustainer" upon his retirement; subsequently handed by Mrs. Higginson to Dr. Koussevitzky during the celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth year.

Yet Again Beethoven

This Beethoven season once more. . . . During his present visit to the United States Mr. Schnabel will play only pianopieces by Beethoven. Accordingly a concerto from Beethoven at the Symphony Concerts in December and a "Beethoven Program" for his recital in Boston, probably in November.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 18 1933

Koussevitzky Owns Sensitive Ears

One interesting and quite probable explanation for the extraordinary responses which Serge Koussevitzky appears to invoke consistently from that magnificent 110-piece organization, the Boston Symphony orchestra, is said to lie in his possession of a rarely sensitive ear.

It is this conductor, internationally renowned as a program builder as well as a most impressive interpreter, and this responsive and seasoned orchestra which will open the season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, Oct. 26.

Wednesday is the date for the opening of the symphony club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third. Season tickets also are to include the post-holiday appearance of the Cleveland Symphony orchestra.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 18 1933

ADMIRED IN ENGLAND

BESIDES the enviable reputation which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the inimitable Boston Symphony orchestra which is to be heard at Memorial hall Thursday evening, Oct. 28, has achieved in this country during his seasons at his present post, he has won the plaudits of European audiences.

During his appearance as guest conductor of the Music Festival in London last May, he was accorded a welcome which belied the traditional British reserve. From reports it is evident that London appreciated Koussevitzky, and he, in turn, appreciated it.

Speaking of the musical situation there, he observes, "England is now having a musical renaissance. The musical creative activity there at this moment shows a distinction and in particular a mastery of form which puts England in the vanguard of musical Europe."

The box office for season tickets for the Symphony club of Central Ohio whose season course the Boston orchestra presents the initial concert, opened today at Carl Koch's, Third and Broad streets.

Ann Arbor Mich
Tribune
10/18/33

PROGRAM FOR FIRST CONCERT IS ANNOUNCED

BostonSymphony Orchestra Here Nert Tuesday Night

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has built a program of unusual interest for the orchestra's concert in this season's Choral Union series, Tuesday evening, October 24.

The program will be opened by Mozart's, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" serenade for string orchestra, (Koechel No. 525) and in the latter half he will play Brahms' "Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68.

Of special interest will be the second number, when he will offer for the first time in Ann Arbor, a remarkable work of a great modernist, Stravinsky, entitled "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") a picture of Pagan Russia, which consists of two parts, The Adoration of the Earth—Introduction-Harbingers of Spring-Dance of the Adolescents-Abduction-Spring Rounds Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men—The Adoration of the Earth (The Wsie Man)—Dance of the Earth, and Part 2, The Sacrifice—Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents-Glorification of the Chosen One—Evocation of the Ancestors—Ritual of the Ancestors—The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

ater Department of The Transcri

Concert-Chronicle

Oct. 18

Wagner at Symphony Hall

AMONG the stimulating announcements of Dr. Koussevitzky for the Symphony Concerts of the current season was the probable performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre," less, of course, setting, costumes and stage-action, but with able singers, an orchestra and a conductor of the first rank. When such a departure from recent custom was debated last spring, it was urged in favor that Boston had now become nearly an opera-less city; that in his music-dramas Wagner wrote an essentially symphonic music; that it asked an orchestra of the largest and the finest eloquence; that in no American opera house, but often in American concert-halls, such an orchestra had been its instrument. Therefore, long scenes or whole acts of Wagner's later operas might be heard desirably and profitably at symphony concerts.

New York is by no means an opera-less city. Wagner is, indeed, the staple composer of the Metropolitan Opera House. Yet here is Mr. Gilman, from his pulpit in The Herald Tribune, urging and justifying Wagner "in concert performance" with the very arguments used in Boston a few months ago. His text was scenes from "Götterdämmerung," as heard at a Philharmonic Concert last Sunday under Mr. Walter. He writes:

"In those American lyric theaters whose repertories include the later works of Wagner, one scarcely ever hears the essential portions of the scores; not because those portions are unperformed, but because they are performed, as a rule, so inadequately that the music as Wagner conceived it does not reach our ears. The things that matter supremely in a typical Wagner score are intrusted to the orchestra, which has the immensely responsible and difficult task of discoursing that intricate and marvelous tonal commentary which is the very heart of the music. And that heart is seldom laid bare to us in an American opera house.

"This is because of the singular and regrettable fact that whereas the great Continental opera houses employ orchestras comparable in rank with their symphony orchestras (sometimes they are the same players), our great American opera houses have never made a practice of assembling orchestras of first-rate quality. . . . They have preferred, as an almost invariable rule, to spend their money on great singers rather than—or in addition to—great orchestras. In many works of the standard repertory, the results of this policy are not disastrous. But in such works as 'Tristan' or 'Götterdämmerung' the policy of blowing oneself to the finest living Isolde or Siegfried, and confiding Wagner's surpassingly important and complex orchestral score to a second-rate orchestra, is an unsatisfactory one from the point of view of those who have at heart the best interests of operatic art in this country. . . .

"It is only when such a body of instrumentalists as the Philharmonic Society takes in hand a score like 'Götterdämmerung,' under the control of a conductor of genius, that one realizes all that is lacking in the average opera-performance of these incomparable works, with their exhaustless beauty and subtlety of texture, their shattering magnificence, their infinite loveliness of line and sound."

Enter Dubensky

Though Mr. Arcady Dubensky's "Fugue for Violins in Nine Parts," to be played for the first time in Boston by the People's Symphony Orchestra at its concert next Sunday, has been heard on five occasions from the Philadelphia Orchestra, little information about him or it may be gained from the program-books. As composers go, he is surprisingly reticent about himself and his work. He agrees that he is a Russian now settled in New York; but he will not tell the number of his years. As violinist, he played in the dear departed orchestra of Walter Damrosch. He has written an opera and various symphonic pieces; but the only work he specifies is "'Gossips' recorded for the phonograph." He affirms himself "one of the American composers who have followed the traditions and forms of the old classical school." As for the impending Fugue, "it was written very recently (1932) for nine stands of first violins. It is dedicated to Mr. Stokowski as it was composed for him."

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

3

OCT 19 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Unusual Program in Ann Arbor Concert Oct. 24

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has built a program of unusual interest for the orchestra's concert in this season's Choral Union series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 24.

The program will be opened by Mozart's, "Eine Klein Nachtmusik" Serenade for String orchestra, (Koechel No. 525) and in the latter half he will play Brahm's "Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68." Of special interest will be the second number, when he will offer for the first time in Ann Arbor, a remarkable work of a great modernist, Stravinsky, entitled "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") a picture of Pagan Russia, which consists of two parts, The Adoration of the Earth—Introduction-Harbingers of Spring-Dance of the Adolescents-Abduction-Spring Rounds-Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men-The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise man)-Dance of the Earth, and Part 2, The Sacrifice—Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents-Glorification of the Chosen One-Evocation of the Ancesters-Ritual of the Ancesters-The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

This work is so remarkable and has attracted such wide attention that the following analyses from the program book of the Boston Symphony orchestra series, will be of interest to music lovers in general:

"Le Sacre Du Printempts" ("The Rite of Spring"). Pictures of Pagan Russia, in two parts—Igo Stravinsky. (Born at Oranienbaum, near Leningrad, Russia, on June 5, 1822: now living).

"The Rite of Spring" or more literally according to the Russian "Spring Consecration" scenery and costumes designed by Nicolas Roerich, choreography by W. Nijinsky, was produced at the Theater des Champs Elysees on May, 29, 1913, by the Diaghiley Ballet Russe. Mr. Monteux conducted. The chief dancers were M. Nijinsky and Mlle. Piltz. The performance, while it delighted some, incited howls of protest. The hissing was violent, mingled with counter cheers, so that M. Astruc ordered the lights turned up. The late Alfred Capu wrote a bitter article published in Le Figaro, in which he said:

"Bluffing the idle rich of Paris through appeals to their snobbery is a delightfully simple matter. The process works out as follows: Take the best society possible, composed of rich, simple-minded, idle people. Then submit them to an intense regime of publicity. By pamphlets, newspaper articles, lectures, personal visits and all other appeals to their snobbery, persuade them that hitherto they have seen only vulgar spectacles, and are at last to know what is art and beauty. Impress them with cabalistic formulae. They have not the slightest notion of music, literature, painting, and dancing; still, they have heretofore seen under these names only a rude imitation of the real thing. Finally assure them that they are about to see the real dancing and hear real music. It will then be necessary to double the prices at the theater, so great will be the rush of shallow worshippers at this false shrine."

Carl Van Vechten describes the scene in his book: "Music After the Great War":

"I attended the first performance in Paris of Starvinsky's an archistic (against the canons of academic art) ballet, "The Rite of Spring" in which primitive emotions are both depicted and aroused by a dependence on barbarous rhythm and harmony, as even so late a composer as Richard Strauss understands them, do not enter. A certain part of the audience, thrilled by what is considered to be a blashphemous attempt to destroy music as an art, and swept away with wrath, began very soon after the rise of the curtain to whistle, to make cat-calls, and to offer audible suggestions as to how the performance should proceed. Others of us, who liked the music and felt that the principles of free speech were at stake, bellowed defiance. It was war over art for the rest of the evening, and the orchestra played on unheard, except occasionally when a slight lull occurred. The figures on the stage danced in time to music that they had to imagine they heard, and beautifully out of rhythm with the uproar in the auditorium. It was sitting in a box, in which I had rented one seat. Three ladies sat in front of me, and a young man occupied the place behind me. He stood up during the course of the ballet to enable himself to see more clearly. The intense excitment under which he was laboring, thanks to the potent force of the music, betrayed itself presently when he began to beat rhythmically on the top of my head with his fists. My emotion was so great that I did not feel the blows for some time. They were perfectly synchronized with the beat of the music. When I did, I turned around. His apology was sincere. We had both been carried beyond ourselves."

There were five performances in Paris that season.

When this ballet was brought out at Drury Lane, London, on July, 11, 1913, with Mr. Monteux conductor, it was thought advisable to send a lecturer, Edwin Evans, in front of the curtain, to explain the ideas underlying the ballet. At the end of the performance there was greater applause than hissing. The music of this ballet was performed for the first time in concert form by an orchestra conducted by Mr. Monteux at one of his concerts at the Casino de Paris on April 5, 1914, when it was enthusiastically applauded.

And now "The Rite of Spring" is acclaimed by many as Stravinsky's "greatest work."

The first performance of the music in this country was by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia on March 3, 1922..

The first performance in Boston was at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. 25, 1924.

On April 11, 12, 1924, "The Rite of Spring" was performed in Boston by the Boston Symphony orchestra as an "extra" number, "by general request." This being interpreted meant that the per- nce was in addition to the concert, and those who sh to hear it were free plete resources of musical sound and sound combination to a diatonic system (which is in reality only one of many musical modes), and are only applicable to and capable of the necessarily limited range of expression obtainable from that system." That is to say, the chords sufficient to the artistic purposes of the great majority of preceding composers no longer sufficed for Stravinsky, who as Henry says "percieves all aspects of life that impinge upon his consciousness with such clarity and penetration of vision that he is aware of a myriad of subtle facts undiscerned by his musical forerunners. Stravinsky himself is reported as saying, "I want not to suggest situations or emotions, but simply to manifest, to express them. I think that there is in what are called 'Impressionist' methods a certain amount of hypocrisy, or at least a tendency toward vagueness and ambiguity. That I shun above all things, and that perhaps is the reason why my methods differ as much from those of the impressionists as they differ from academic conventional methods. Though I find it extremely hard to do so, I always aim at straightforward expression in its simplest form. I have no use for 'working-out' in dramatic or lyric music. The one essential is to feel and to convey one's feelings.

Stravinsky's conception of rhythm, its independence was made the deep sadness pervades it, but this sadness is physical, not sentimental. It is gloomy with the oppression of the vast forces of Nature, pitiful with the helplessness of living creatures in their presence. This Prelude leads to the Mystic Circle of the Adolescents. Girls dance and play. One must be sacrificed to Spring. The victim is chosen. Her Glorification. Evocation of Ancestors. Ritual Performance of the Ancestors. The chosen victim begins her sacrificial act. She must dance herself to death.'

The score calls for two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn; three carinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet), clarinet in E flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchangeable with second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas, four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrum, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam rape guero (scratcher) and strings.

We now quote from a long article about Stravinsky by Mr. Leigh Henry (Musical Times, London, 1919): "The ordinary academic classifications of chors are negated by him; he realized that academic dogmas of harmony are all based on an arbitrary delimitation of the com-mentality of primitive man evoked by a Russian, rather, Scythian barbarian." He insists that in Russia the Negro-American elements, as syncopation, would be at once recognized. The work is not an impressionistic evocation; it is "the direct transposition of a certain act on a sonorous plane" a symmetrical constrution.

Stravinsky worked on "The Rite of Spring" in 1912-1913, completing it at Clarens. Boris de Schloezer, discussing the question of Russian folk-song infouence, states that the two melodies in "Mysterious Circles of Youths" and the second motive in "Ritual Action" are Russian folk-Tunes; the other themes, while they have Russian character—rythmic accentuation, preciseness of melodic lines, harmonic harshness, a diatonic nature—are of Stravinsky's invention.

The first part of the work is "The Fertility of the Earth." The second part is "The Sacrifice."

Part I

There is a slow introduction, which, according to commentators, portrays "the mystery of the physical world in Spring." It is said that Stravinsky here uses wood-wind instruments, whose "dryness conveys a more austere expression of truth;" he "mistrusts the facile expressiveness" of the strings.

The curtain rises. Omens of Spring. Dances of the Youths and Maidens: a rite of incantation with vigorous stamping on the ground. Dance tune for flutes, while trumpets chant a harmonized theme used later. A mock abduction is part of this ritual.

Then come the Spring Rounds, introduced by a tune for clarinet. The main portion of the dance is based on the theme already announced by the trumpets. Another Ceremony: Games of Rival Towns. An old man, wise, white-haired, bearded, enters. He is the Celebrant. He prostrates himself. All kiss the ground. A sacred dance follows. When this ballet was performed early in 1914 at Moscow, this first section was entitled "The Kiss to the Earth."

Part II

At the introduction, "The Pagan Night," Mr. Evans has said: "A subject of comment by C. Stanley Wise in an article published in the Musical Quarterly. (New York, April, 1916).

"It should be noticed that in his compositions he (Stravinsky) holds himself free to express just what he feels to be the essence of his subject—leaving to his interpreters the task of conveying his meaning to his hearers. I remarked especially that feature of his artistic production three years ago, when he was busy with the composition of 'Le Sacre du Printemps.'

"Looking through the first sketch of the great solo dance in the second act, where the rhythm varies continually, the bars being marked 3-8, 2-4, 5-4, 4-4, 5-4, 6-8, 7-8, and so on, in an order that at first strikes one as purely fortuious, I am impressed by the great difficulties presented therein for dancer and conductor. I could not resist asking him therefore, whether during its composition he had consulted Nijinsky or his premiere danseuse, with regard to its effective execution.

"His reply was most decided and something to this effect: 'Surely not! A musician must write in accordance with his own ideas. It would be impossible for two persons to compose a work.' Some weeks later he hastened to tell me that he was 'just back from the first rehearsals of the "Sacre" and he must say that the dance that had been evolved was the most beautiful that he had ever seen."

DENVER, COLO.
POST

OCT 19 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernist stripe: A new suite by Aaron Copland, born in Brooklyn; a symphony by Roy Harris, originally of Oklahoma, and a symphony of Emerson Whithorne's. Whithorne hailed from Cleveland, once upon a time.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

OCT 19 1933

Great Conductors Praise St. Louis for Backing Symphony

Assurance of Orchestra Season Hailed by Damrosch and Others.

Walter Damrosch, dean of American symphonic conductors; Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra; Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Frederick Stock and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, respectively conductors of the Chicago and Detroit orchestras, are among the great musical leaders and orchestra executives who have congratulated St. Louis Symphony Society on its courage and plans for the orchestra's greatest season, since the announcement of its assurance a week ago.

"I could not imagine the great city of St. Louis without a symphony orchestra," wired Dr. Damrosch, who has been familiar with the orchestra here for many years. "Nothing can contribute so much to the finer feelings and pleasures of a community than a finely trained body of musicians playing the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. Congratulations to St. Louis upon the splendid decision it has made. I was confident that no matter what else might be sacrificed because of economic conditions, St. Louis would not give up its splendid orchestra."

A Splendid Triumph.

"St. Louis' triumph is splendid," wired Leopold Stokowski, "especially since it comes at a time when all the orchestras of this country are having difficulty. But if those great orchestras should cease to exist, a powerful factor for recreation and inspiration will be lost and the orchestras will be difficult to build up again. There is a slight but definite improvement in conditions all over the country. I believe now is the time to build up to a better type of civilization in which every man will have a more equal share in the things which give deep and lasting satisfaction and develop those faculties in ourselves through which to find the greatest joys in life. I am delighted that St. Louis in the courage of its policy and in its splendid symphony concert course this season is leading the way."

"Dr. Koussevitzky sends congratulations to St. Louis and the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra," wired the conductor through W. H. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "St. Louis without an orchestra would be a city of darkness. We of Boston rejoice that you are keeping together your splendid body of musicians and find encouragement ourselves in the policy you have launched to make this season more brilliant than ever."

"Splendid News."

"News from St. Louis is splendid," wired Dr. Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. "The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra has always been an organization of high repute, and one which has done much to enhance the esteem in which your city is held as a center of culture. It is encouraging to find that its work will not only continue, but its brilliant plans for the coming season assure an even finer scale. Serious times like the present convince us how urgent it is that we should preserve for the cultural welfare of our communities those organizations which tend to uplift and stimulate our sense of the beautiful in life."

E. L. Carpenter, founder and president of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, wired: "Rejoice to learn that your people will not allow your great organization to be lost to St. Louis and the world. The forward note in your programs for this season is most encouraging. Money difficulties have threatened us, but we have almost reached our goal. News from St. Louis gives us courage."

"Let me join in the rejoicing over St. Louis' success," wired Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, "and in the hope that it may continue to conquer all obstacles and carry on its brilliant career under the gifted leadership of Golschmann. Certainly we need our cultural institutions, such as orchestras, museums and libraries, more now than at any other time in our history."

HERALD

Concord Mass.

OCT 19 1933

Tickets Are On Sale For Annual Concert Series

The annual series of fall and winter concerts has been announced for the eighth successive season, with three unusually brilliant programs promised.

These concerts are given in the Concord Academy gymnasium through the generosity of the school and are planned primarily for young people. They are of interest, however, to all ages and are a very inexpensive and accessible means of hearing the best of music and musicians.

The first concert this year is to be on Wednesday, Nov. 22, when Concord will have an opportunity to hear the famous singer and student of folk songs, Dorothy Gordon of New York.

Her book of songs are well known to many of us. Mrs. Seabury Short has used selections from them often in her repertoires.

On Wednesday, January 17, the Chardon Quartette under the leadership of Yves Chardon will play. Mr. Chardon, in addition to being a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the faculty of Wellesley College and a member of the staff of the Longy School. The Chardon quartette in its series of concerts last year maintained such a standard of artistic and musical performance that the newspapers and audiences were agreed in their enthusiastic appreciation.

After the Concert of Chamber Music, we will have on Wednesday, February 14, the very unusual and interesting pianist, Katherine Gorin of New York.

Tickets for these concerts are now available through Mrs. Roger B. Swaim, telephone Concord 1016. The price for the season ticket for adults has been reduced to $2.75 this year. For children it will be $2.00 as heretofore. Single tickets will sell for $1.00 and 75c.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 24 1933

CONCERT PLANNED BY N. J. ORCHESTRA

Sophie Braslau Will be Soloist at Recital Here December 5.

The first concert by the New Jersey Orchestra here this season will be given on Tuesday December 5, in Mount Hebron Junior High School. The soloist will be Sophie Braslau, contralto. The orchestra will be under direction of Rene Pollain, who has led the organization to the degree of technical proficiency that in the opinion of qualified metropolitan critics justly entitles it to rank among the first dozen of this country's symphony orchestras. Comprised of a large percentage of professional musicians, with a small number of amateurs who are the peers of many professional players, the orchestra has a concert enrolment of about 90 performers, in full symphonic complement.

The concert master is Remo Bolognini, a solo violinist of international reputation, who this year succeeds the late Anton Witek, formerly concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the works to be performed at the first concerts under Mr. Pollian's direction will be Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The schedule of the orchestra for this season includes concerts in Montclair February 5 and April 17. Mischa Levitski, pianist, appears at the February concerts and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, has been engaged for the April dates.

San Francisco Examiner

OCT 20 1933

Beethoven Ranked First In Musicians' Test Vote

By GOBIND BEHARI LAL,
Universal Service Science Editor.

NEW YORK, Oct. 19.—Beethoven stands first in music in a scientific voting test.

So declares Emil E. E. Folgman of Pennsylvania University, who applied a psychological method for measuring comparative judgments, devised by Prof. L. L. Thurstone of Chicago University.

The problem was, how are the various famous musical composers rated by professional musicians? Nineteen great composers were listed.

A jury of 308 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, Boston, Philadelphia and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras was chosen.

Each person was asked to fill out a written form, asking for preference ranks under various combinations. Altogether these 308 musicians rendered 58,520 written judgments.

The total judgment of all the four orchestras gave to Beethoven the first rank. Eighteen other composers stood respectively as follows: Brahms, Wagner, Mozart, Bach, Schubert, Haydin, Debussy, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky, Berlioz, Cesar Franck, Chopin, Verdi, Stravinsky, Grieg, McDowell and Victor Herbert.

The various orchestras showed remarkable agreement in rating Herbert and McDowell as the lowest on the list of great musicians.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN

OCT 21 1933

RECALLING A NOTED SINGER

By WILLIAM A. DOBBYN

In the Sunday edition of The Asheville Citizen of October 9, 1927, appeared an article on the life of the celebrated opera singer, Mme. Alexandra Human Blum, who was then living with her daughter, Mrs. Louis Fuldner, in Tryon. One of the most interesting pictures which illustrated the story was a photograph of Mme. Blum, in her old age, standing by the side of her brother, the great musician, Theodore Human. It was the last picture taken of them together, as Mme. Blum died in 1929 and her brother four years later. In looking at it now and in thinking of their eventful lives, one is impressed by the close tie of affection which existed between this distinguished brother and sister, bound together as they were by memories of an unusual and glamorous past. Mr. Human died on the 18th of last September, in Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Metropolitan papers on the following day carried many stories of his life, the article in The New York Times of September 19 reading in part as follows:

"Mr. Human was one of the members of the original Boston Symphony orchestra, which he helped to organize in 1879, and of the Beethoven Quintet, formed a little later. He served as first violinist of the symphony orchestra for 18 years. He was a protege of George Henschel.

"Born in Leningrad, then St. Petersburg, Russia, on Jan. 1, 1851, son of Dr. Basilius Human and Lady Aggripina Chererǘhina Cherybacha Human of the Imperial court, he was proficient in music even in childhood and toured Europe and part of the Orient as a child prodigy. He won a scholarship at a musical school in Budapest and at 17 became a professor. He came to this country in the late 'seventies with his wife, the former Harriet Beatrice d'Utassy.

"He taught music in this country and numbered persons prominent socially among his pupils, including the late Alfred G. Vanderbilt. He lived in various parts of this country, including Newport, R. I.; New Haven, Conn.; Jacksonvillé, Fla., and Mobile, Ala.

"He made several tours as first violinist with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra, and played for ten seasons with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra as first violinist.

"He also composed music, his 'Dramatic Prelude' having been played at the Buffalo World's Fair just at the time when President McKinley was shot, outside the Temple of Music."

Mr. Human on several occasions came to Tryon to visit his sister, who spent the last years of her life at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Fuldner. What thoughts of the past must have come to them as they sat together, under the shadow of the Blue Ridge, and recalled the days of their youth in that distant Russia of the Czars, when with their father and another sister they were members of the Imperial Opera Company of Alexander II, in St. Petersburg, and the years of their later successes in Budapest, in Imperial Vienna, and in Berlin, Paris, and New York.

October 21, 1933, will be the fourth anniversary of the death of Mme. Blum, her famous brother having survived her nearly four years. So great was the love of this brother for his sister, that when Mme. Blum passed away no announcement of her death was made in the Metropolitan papers as Mr. Human was at that time very ill, and the family feared that the news of his bereavement would prove fatal to him. Later on, when he no longer received letters from his sister, he, of course, realized the truth, but he never referred to her death in any of his correspondence with his niece, Mrs. Fuldner. His soul could not bear the sound of the dread word, and his genius was oblivious of its significance, until he finally had to surrender.

The story of Mme. Blum's life has been printed in many papers, in many languages. As a concert and operatic star, she appeared in the principal cities of Europe and the United States. Born in St. Petersburg, daughter of Dr. Basilius Human, member of the Imperial Opera, and of Lady Aggripina Cheremihina Cherybacha Human of the Imperial court, she, her brother Theodore, and her sister Olga, later coloratura with the Imperial Opera in Budapest, were as children celebrated as the musical prodigies of their day. They traveled in a great coach drawn by eight horses through Russia, Serbia, Roumania, Turkey and Austria-Hungary, giving concerts in the principal cities, under the direction of their father. Later, Mme. Blum was sent to Vienna where she studied under Marchesi, the great teacher who later numbered among her pupils Mme. Melba and Mme. Nordica. Mme. Blum's first appearance in this country was in the old Academy of Music, New York, in 1880, with the New York Opera Company, which was then bringing over some of the first artists of the European operatic stage. It was while a member of this organization that she married the celebrated baritone, Alcuin Blum, of the same company, and one of the best known opera singers in the world. During the years following her marriage, Mme. Blum sang principally in Europe, both as concert artist and as visiting star. She returned to America three times for her husband's special engagements with Damrosch, and after his death lived with her devoted daughter, Mrs. Fuldner, at whose home she peacefully passed away on the 21st of October, 1929.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

OCT 19 1933

ASSOCIATION TO SPONSOR THREE CONCERTS HERE

Backs Tuesday Evening Musicales; Soloists Are Announced.

Formation of the "Little Symphony Orchestra Association of Davenport," to assume the sponsorship of the second season of Tuesday evening musicales presenting the Little Symphony orchestra of Davenport, Herbert Silberstein, conductor, and noted soloists, was announced today.

Officers elected to head the organization are, Otis Gilbrech, president; Mrs. H. G. Lohmiller, vice president; Mrs. Martin Silberstein, secretary; P. N. Lesser, treasurer, and Herbert Silberstein, general musical and managing director. A series of three Tuesday evening concerts will again be given in the Sunday school auditorium of the First Presbyterian church at Kirkwood boulevard and Iowa street on the dates of Nov. 28, Jan. 9, and Feb. 27.

Gunn One of Soloists.

Outstanding figures in the musical world will appear in Davenport this winter as soloists with the orchestra.

The group is headed by the celebrated pianist, conductor, music critic and educator, Glenn Dillard Gunn, who will be heard here on Feb. 27. In addition to his appearances with notable success as soloist with the Chicago, New York, Boston, Minneapolis and Milwaukee symphony orchestras, Mr. Gunn is known thruout the middle west as the music editor of the Chicago Herald and Examiner, a post which he has occupied for many years. He is also at present the vice president of the Chicago Musical college.

Frederic Jencks Nov. 28.

Soloist at the concert on Nov. 28 is the young American baritone, Frederic Jencks. Fittingly acclaimed as "a singer of America today" Mr. Jencks has to his credit five appearances with the Apollo Musical club of Chicago, two appearances with the Detroit symphony and Kalamazoo symphony orchestras and among others a re-engagement as baritone soloist for the Lindsborg Messiah Festival for 1934.

Equally at home in opera, oratorio and on the concert platform, Frederic Jencks will offer a diversified program here.

Cellist for Second Concert.

Jan. 9 will mark the appearance here of one of the most colorful figures on the concert stage, Ennio Bolognini, an outstanding cello virtuoso of this generation. Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, after only four years of study he won first honors in an international contest over 38 competitors. His early success has expanded with the years. He has played under such world famous conductors as Arturo Toscanini, Frederick Stock, and has been solo cellist at the Teatre Colon in Buenos Aires, and the Chicago symphony orchestra. He is now solo cellist of the National Broadcasting company musical staff in Chicago, and is frequently heard in recital and with orchestra.

The Little Symphony orchestra, composed of the finest professional talent in this vicinity will again play a prominent part in each program. Mr. Silberstein has already scheduled several new compositions which will receive their local premier performance at these concerts.

ERIE, PA.,
DISPATCH-HERALD

OCT 22 1933

ORCHESTRA AT BUFFALO

Erie music lovers who want to journey to Buffalo today, can hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, when the organization of 110 musicians plays this afternoon at 4 o'clock, in the Elmwood Music hall.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 21 1933

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in his tenth year in America as the conductor of this orchestra. Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh for the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series Friday night, October 27.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 2 1933

WODELL IS NAMED TO DIRECT CHORUS

FORMER CONVERSE COLLEGE CONDUCTOR TO HEAD PRESBYTERIAN CHORUS

Frederick W. Wodell, formerly of Converse college, Spartanburg, S. C., will become choral conductor of the First Presbyterian church Nov. 1, it was announced today at the church. Mrs. A. D. Glascock, present conductor, will continue as organist.

Wodell conducted the famous May Festivals at Spartanburg and gained a national reputation through the annual performances, as a teacher of voice, impresario, choral conductor and organizer. For 11 years he conducted the choral union chorus of 350 voices at Boston; the Philharmonic choir of 250 selected voices with 40 members of the Boston symphony orchestra; the Philadelphia symphony and the Detroit symphony.

Many famous soloists have sung in concerts he has directed. His book on "Choir and Choral Conducting" is in the library of most every conductor of note in the country.

He will train the senior and junior choirs of the First Presbyterian church. Those interested in receiving training under Wodell are requested to communicate with Mrs. Glascock or Mrs. J. B. Girardeau at the church office.

Mrs. Raymond K. O'Brien will be the soloist at the morning service tomorrow. In the evening Miss Myrtle Purcell, alto soloist,, will sing. At both services Mrs. Glascock will play special organ numbers.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES-JOURNAL

OCT 1

Leading Educator To Address Music Teachers Meeting

The Minnesota Music Teachers association will hear John Thompson of Kansas City at the convention to be held in St. Paul on October 24 and 25.

Mr. Thompson is one of the leading music educators of today and has the unusual combination of excellent musicianship and executive ability. When the Horner institute and Kansas City conservatory merged, he built one of the finest piano departments in America.

A well known pianist, Mr. Thompson has toured this country from coast to coast, giving recitals and holding teachers classes in nearly every important city. Besides many European engagements, he has appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Philadelphia orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony orchestra, the Kansas City Symphony orchestra, and the Verdi Italian Symphony orchestra of Philadelphia.

As a lecturer he has appeared before state music teachers' conventions in Washington, Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Virginia, and at the National Music Teachers' convention in Washington, D. C. In 1931 Simmons university of Texas conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on Mr. Thompson for outstanding work in piano pedagogy.

HERALD

Concord - Mass

OCT 19 1933

Tickets Are On Sale For Annual Concert Series

The annual series of fall and winter concerts has been announced for the eighth successive season, with three unusually brilliant programs promised.

These concerts are given in the Concord Academy gymnasium through the generosity of the school and are planned primarily for young people. They are of interest, however, to all ages and are a very inexpensive and accessible means of hearing the best of music and musicians.

The first concert this year is to be on Wednesday, Nov. 22, when Concord will have an opportunity to hear the famous singer and student of folk songs, Dorothy Gordon of New York.

Her book of songs are well known to many of us. Mrs. Seabury Short has used selections from them often in her repertoires.

On Wednesday, January 17, the Chardon Quartette under the leadership of Yves Chardon will play. Mr. Chardon, in addition to being a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is on the faculty of Wellesley College and a member of the staff of the Longy School. The Chardon quartette in its series of concerts last year maintained such a standard of artistic and musical performance that the newspapers and audiences were agreed in their enthusiastic appreciation.

After the Concert of Chamber Music, we will have on Wednesday, February 14, the very unusual and interesting pianist, Katherine Gorin of New York.

Tickets for these concerts are now available through Mrs. Roger B. Swaim, telephone Concord 1016. The price for the season ticket for adults has been reduced to $2.75 this year. For children it will be $2.00 as heretofore. Single tickets will sell for $1.00 and 75c.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 24 1933

CONCERT PLANNED BY N. J. ORCHESTRA

Sophie Braslau Will be Soloist at Recital Here December 5.

The first concert by the New Jersey Orchestra here this season will be given on Tuesday December 5, in Mount Hebron Junior High School. The soloist will be Sophie Braslau, contralto. The orchestra will be under direction of Rene Pollain, who has led the organization to the degree of technical proficiency that in the opinion of qualified metropolitan critics justly entitles it to rank among the first dozen of this country's symphony orchestras. Comprised of a large percentage of professional musicians, with a small number of amateurs who are the peers of many professional players, the orchestra has a concert enrolment of about 90 performers, in full symphonic complement.

The concert master is Remo Bolognini, a solo violinist of international reputation, who this year succeeds the late Anton Witek, formerly concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the works to be performed at the first concerts under Mr. Pollian's direction will be Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The schedule of the orchestra for this season includes concerts in Montclair February 5 and April 17. Mischa Levitski, pianist, appears at the February concerts and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, has been engaged for the April dates.

San Francisco Examiner

OCT 20 1933

Beethoven Ranked First In Musicians' Test Vote

By GOBIND BEHARI LAL,
Universal Service Science Editor.

NEW YORK, Oct. 19.—Beethoven stands first in music in a scientific voting test.

So declares Emil E. E. Folgman of Pennsylvania University, who applied a psychological method for measuring comparative judgments, devised by Prof. L. L. Thurstone of Chicago University.

The problem was, how are the various famous musical composers rated by professional musicians? Nineteen great composers were listed.

A jury of 308 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, Boston, Philadelphia and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras was chosen.

Each person was asked to fill out a written form, asking for preference ranks under various combinations. Altogether these 308 musicians rendered 58,520 written judgments.

The total judgment of all the four orchestras gave to Beethoven the first rank. Eighteen other composers stood respectively as follows: Brahms, Wagner, Mozart, Bach, Schubert, Haydin, Debussy, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky, Berlioz, Cesar Franck, Chopin, Verdi, Stravinsky, Grieg, McDowell and Victor Herbert.

The various orchestras showed remarkable agreement in rating Herbert and McDowell as the lowest on the list of great musicians.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN

OCT 21 1933

RECALLING A NOTED SINGER

By WILLIAM A. DOBBYN

In the Sunday edition of The Asheville Citizen of October 9, 1927, appeared an article on the life of the celebrated opera singer, Mme. Alexandra Human Blum, who was then living with her daughter, Mrs. Louis Fuldner, in Tryon. One of the most interesting pictures which illustrated the story was a photograph of Mme. Blum, in her old age, standing by the side of her brother, the great musician, Theodore Human. It was the last picture taken of them together, as Mme. Blum died in 1929 and her brother four years later. In looking at it now and in thinking of their eventful lives, one is impressed by the close tie of affection which existed between this distinguished brother and sister, bound together as they were by memories of an unusual and glamorous past. Mr. Human died on the 18th of last September, in Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Metropolitan papers on the following day carried many stories of his life, the article in The New York Times of September 19 reading in part as follows:

"Mr. Human was one of the members of the original Boston Symphony orchestra, which he helped to organize in 1879, and of the Beethoven Quintet, formed a little later. He served as first violinist of the symphony orchestra for 18 years. He was a protege of George Henschel.

"Born in Leningrad, then St. Petersburg, Russia, on Jan. 1, 1851, son of Dr. Basilius Human and Lady Aggripina Cheremihina Cherybacha Human of the Imperial court, he was proficient in music even in childhood and toured Europe and part of the Orient as a child prodigy. He won a scholarship at a musical school in Budapest and at 17 became a professor. He came to this country in the late 'seventies with his wife, the former Harriet Beatrice d'Utassy.

"He taught music in this country and numbered persons prominent socially among his pupils, including the late Alfred G. Vanderbilt. He lived in various parts of this country, including Newport, R. I.; New Haven, Conn.; Jacksonville, Fla., and Mobile, Ala.

"He made several tours as first violinist with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra, and played for ten seasons with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra as first violinist.

"He also composed music, his 'Dramatic Prelude' having been played at the Buffalo World's Fair just at the time when President McKinley was shot, outside the Temple of Music."

Mr. Human on several occasions came to Tryon to visit his sister, who spent the last years of her life at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Fuldner. What thoughts of the past must have come to them as they sat together, under the shadow of the Blue Ridge, and recalled the days of their youth in that distant Russia of the Czars, when with their father and another sister they were members of the Imperial Opera Company of Alexander II, in St. Petersburg, and the years of their later successes in Budapest, in Imperial Vienna, and in Berlin, Paris, and New York.

October 21, 1933, will be the fourth anniversary of the death of Mme. Blum, her famous brother having survived her nearly four years. So great was the love of this brother for his sister, that when Mme. Blum passed away no announcement of her death was made in the Metropolitan papers as Mr. Human was at that time very ill, and the family feared that the news of his bereavement would prove fatal to him. Later on, when he no longer received letters from his sister, he, of course, realized the truth, but he never referred to her death in any of his correspondence with his niece, Mrs. Fuldner. His soul could not bear the sound of the dread word, and his genius was oblivious of its significance, until he finally had to surrender.

The story of Mme. Blum's life has been printed in many papers, in many languages. As a concert and operatic star, she appeared in the principal cities of Europe and the United States. Born in St. Petersburg, daughter of Dr. Basilius Human, member of the Imperial Opera and of Lady Aggripina Cheremihina Cherybacha Human of the Imperial court, she, her brother Theodore, and her sister Olga, later coloratura with the Imperial Opera in Budapest, were as children celebrated as the musical prodigies of their day. They traveled in a great coach drawn by eight horses through Russia, Serbia, Roumania, Turkey and Austria-Hungary, giving concerts in the principal cities, under the direction of their father. Later, Mme. Blum was sent to Vienna where she studied under Marchesi, the great teacher who later numbered among her pupils Mme. Melba and Mme. Nordica. Mme. Blum's first appearance in this country was in the old Academy of Music, New York, in 1880, with the New York Opera Company, which was then bringing over some of the first artists of the European operatic stage. It was while a member of this organization that she married the celebrated baritone, Alcuin Blum, of the same company, and one of the best known opera singers in the world. During the years following her marriage, Mme. Blum sang principally in Europe, both as concert artist and as visiting star. She returned to America three times for her husband's special engagements with Damrosch, and after his death lived with her devoted daughter, Mrs. Fuldner, at whose home she peacefully passed away on the 21st of October, 1929.

ERIE, PA.,
DISPATCH-HERALD

OCT 22 1933

ORCHESTRA AT BUFFALO

Erie music lovers who want to journey to Buffalo today, can hear the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, when the organisation of 110 musicians plays this afternoon at 4 o'clock, in the Elmwood Music hall.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

OCT 19 1933

ASSOCIATION TO SPONSOR THREE CONCERTS HERE

Backs Tuesday Evening Musicales; Soloists Are Announced.

Formation of the "Little Symphony Orchestra Association of Davenport," to assume the sponsorship of the second season of Tuesday evening musicales presenting the Little Symphony orchestra of Davenport, Herbert Silberstein, conductor, and noted soloists, was announced today.

Officers elected to head the organization are, Otis Gilbrech, president; Mrs. H. G. Lohmiller, vice president; Mrs. Martin Silberstein, secretary; P. N. Lesser, treasurer, and Herbert Silberstein, general musical and managing director. A series of three Tuesday evening concerts will again be given in the Sunday school auditorium of the First Presbyterian church at Kirkwood boulevard and Iowa street on the dates of Nov. 28, Jan. 9, and Feb. 27.

Gunn One of Soloists.

Outstanding figures in the musical world will appear in Davenport this winter as soloists with the orchestra.

The group is headed by the celebrated pianist, conductor, music critic and educator, Glenn Dillard Gunn, who will be heard here on Feb. 27. In addition to his appearances with notable success as soloist with the Chicago, New York, Boston, Minneapolis and Milwaukee symphony orchestras, Mr. Gunn is known thruout the middle west as the music editor of the Chicago Herald and Examiner, a post which he has occupied for many years. He is also at present the vice president of the Chicago Musical college.

Frederic Jencks Nov. 28.

Soloist at the concert on Nov. 28 is the young American baritone, Frederic Jencks. Fittingly acclaimed as "a singer of America today" Mr. Jencks has to his credit five appearances with the Apollo Musical club of Chicago, two appearances with the Detroit symphony and Kalamazoo symphony orchestras and among others a re-engagement as baritone soloist for the Lindsborg Messiah Festival for 1934.

Equally at home in opera, oratorio and on the concert platform, Frederic Jencks will offer a diversified program here.

Cellist for Second Concert.

Jan. 9 will mark the appearance here of one of the most colorful figures on the concert stage, Ennio Bolognini, an outstanding cello virtuoso of this generation. Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, after only four years of study he won first honors in an international contest over 38 competitors. His early success has expanded with the years. He has played under such world famous conductors as Arturo Toscanini, Frederick Stock, and has been solo cellist at the Teatre Colon in Buenos Aires, and the Chicago symphony orchestra. He is now solo cellist of the National Broadcasting company musical staff in Chicago, and is frequently heard in recital and with orchestra.

The Little Symphony composed of the finest professional talent in this vicinity will again play a prominent part in each program. Mr. Silberstein has already scheduled several new compositions which will receive their local premier performance at these concerts.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 21 1933

Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in his tenth year in America as the conductor of this orchestra. Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh for the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series Friday night, October 27.

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 21 1933

WODELL IS NAMED TO DIRECT CHORUS

FORMER CONVERSE COLLEGE CONDUCTOR TO HEAD PRESBYTERIAN CHORUS

Frederick W. Wodell, formerly of Converse college, Spartanburg, S. C., will become choral conductor of the First Presbyterian church Nov. 1, it was announced today at the church. Mrs. A. D. Glascock, present conductor, will continue as organist.

Wodell conducted the famous May Festivals at Spartanburg and gained a national reputation through the annual performances, as a teacher of voice, impresario, choral conductor and organizer. For 11 years he conducted the choral union chorus of 350 voices at Boston; the Philharmonic choir of 250 selected voices with 40 members of the Boston symphony orchestra; the Philadelphia symphony and the Detroit symphony.

Many famous soloists have sung in concerts he has directed. His book on "Choir and Choral Conducting" is in the library of most every conductor of note in the country.

He will train the senior and junior choirs of the First Presbyterian church. Those interested in receiving training under Wodell are requested to communicate with Mrs. Glascock or Mrs. J. B. Girardeau at the church office.

Mrs. Raymond K. O'Brien will be the soloist at the morning service tomorrow. In the evening Miss Myrtle Purcell, alto soloist,, will sing. At both services Mrs. Glascock will play special organ numbers.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES-JOURNAL

OCT 1 [illegible]

Leading Educator To Address Music Teachers Meeting

The Minnesota Music Teachers association will hear John Thompson of Kansas City at the convention to be held in St. Paul on October 24 and 25.

Mr. Thompson is one of the leading music educators of today and has the unusual combination of excellent musicianship and executive ability. When the Horner institute and Kansas City conservatory merged, he built one of the finest piano departments in America.

A well known pianist, Mr. Thompson has toured this country from coast to coast, giving recitals and holding teachers classes in nearly every important city. Besides many European engagements, he has appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Philadelphia orchestra, the St. Louis Symphony orchestra, the Kansas City Symphony orchestra, and the Verdi Italian Symphony orchestra of Philadelphia.

As a lecturer he has appeared before state music teachers' conventions in Washington, Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Virginia, and at the National Music Teachers' convention in Washington, D. C. In 1931 Simmons university of Texas conferred the degree of Doctor of Music on Mr. Thompson for outstanding work in piano pedagogy.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

4

OCT 22 1933

National Symphony November 8

John Charles Thomas To Be Soloist—Hans Kindler Will Direct Three Concerts Here

Serge Koussevitzky Will Lead Boston Symphony At Lyric Theater On November 14

WITH the first orchestral event of the season, the appearance of the Philadelphia Orchestra, directed by Leopold Stokowski, past musically-minded Baltimoreans are turning their attention to the first of the National Symphony's three concerts, which will take place at the Lyric on the evening of Wednesday, November 8.

Hans Kindler will be the director and John Charles Thomas will be the soloist.

Although Mr. Thomas is generally regarded as a Baltimoreans, he is a native of Pennsylvania. The son of a Methodist minister, he came here at an early age with his parents and forsook the study of medicine to study singing at the Peabody Conservatory. He soon won his way to light opera stardom and his performances in "Maytime," "Apple Blossoms" and other Broadway hits are still vivid memories.

WENT TO EUROPE

Intent upon a more serious career, he went to Europe for further study and made his grand opera debut at the Royal Opera in Brussels, where he is known as the American Ambassador of Music. Guest appearances in Covent Garden, London, Berlin and Vienna followed. For the last few years he has been heard frequently throughout the United States in concert, opera and radio programs. He sang leading roles with the Chicago Civic, Philadelphia, San Francisco and Los Angeles opera companies and this season will sing at the Metropolitan.

The next orchestral date is November 14, when Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony in the first of its series of three performances to be given in this city. Koussevitzky, who is one of the most outstanding conductors of the time, made his Berlin debut at the Singakademie in 1898, played the bass part of Bach's "Phœbus and Pan" under Richard Strauss' direction in Dusseldorf in 1900, and later played his own transcriptions of 'cello music in recitals in London, Paris and other foreign cities. He composed a concerto for the instrument and played it at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, with Nikisch conducting.

Having gone as far as possible with "the ugly duckling of instruments," he stepped into the limitless field of the conductor's art. He served his apprenship in Berlin, organized his own orchestra in Moscow and won a new fame.

SECURES VIOLINIST

Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, has announced that he has secured Sascha Jacobson, first violinist of the Musical Art Quartet as soloist for the first concert to be given by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, on December 14.

Sascha Jacobson is no stranger to Baltimore, for he has been appearing with the Musical Art Quartet at the private concerts sponsored by Mrs. John W. Garrett at Evergreen, her estate on Charles Street Extended. Here, Mr. Jacobson and the other members of the quartet have been playing in the private theater designed by the late Russian artist Leon Bakst, of Russian ballet fame.

The approaching Baltimore Symphony Orchestra concert, however, will afford the general public of Baltimore its first opportunity to hear Jacobson since his solo engagement at the Lyric with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Jacobson achieved wide acclaim when with that organization through his renditions of the Mendelssohn and Vivaldi concertos.

LANSING, MICH.
~~CAPITAL NEWS~~
② Journal

OCT 20 1933

Three New American Operas Are To Have Premieres This Season

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 (AP)—Look up musical America.—you are going to hear three new American operas this season along with a lot of other compositions by home town boys who know how to make music for the oboe and bull fiddle.

In the operatic field there will be Howard Hanson's "Merry Mount" to a libretto by Richard Stokes of New York. Mr. Hanson's music is written around a dramatic situation in the Massachusetts Bay colony, and is one of the few American operatic attempts that employs directly American legend and history as material.

The music has had an abridged concert performance at Ann Arbor, Mich., last spring, but never a stage performance. That has been reserved for this season at the Metropolitan.

January will see the first performances of two other operas, one, "Helen Retires," the libretto by John Erskine, and the music by George Antheil; the other "Four Saints in Three Acts," for which the well-known modernist Gertrude Stein has provided the libretto, and Virgil Thomson the score.

Mr. Erskine's libretto is based on an uncanonical legend concerning Helen of Troy and Menelaos, that same. Helen he told about in "The Private Life of Helen of Troy," a best seller of some seasons ago. Mr. Antheil is the unpredictable product of Trenton, N J., whose odd musical exploits have interested or amused the world for 10 years. One was his famous "Ballet Mechanique," which astounded and shocked a Carnegie hall audience in 1927. The production will be by the Julliard School of Music in New York.

"Four Saints in Three Acts" is the story of some worthies of the church, reduced to the often astonishing English of Miss Stein, and clothed musically by Thomson, formerly of Kansas City, and now living in Paris. It is to be given in January as the opening performance in the new Model theater at Hartford, Conn.

U. S. Composer in Spotlight

American composers generally are being given considerable attention by the major orchestras of the country this winter.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernist stripe: a new suite by Arron Copland, born in Brooklyn; a symphony by Roy Harris, originally of Oklahoma, and a symphony of Emerson Whithorne's. Whithorne hailed from Cleveland, once upon a time.

Although Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, a number of new American works are to be done by the New York philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange. They include "1929—a Satire" by David Stanley Smith of New Haven; a symphony (No. 2) by Randall Thompson, a suite by Walter Piston of Boston; Whithorne's "Fandango" and two poems, "Winter" and "Spring."

Hans Kindler expects to present Lamar Stringfield's "Legend of John Henry," and a set of variations on a Hassler chorale by Templeton Strong. Mr. Stringfield, a North Carolinian, has interested himself in American folk music for years.

Chicago will hear Philip James' wireless piece "Station WGZBX" under Frederick Stock; Cleveland Whithorne's "The Dream Pedlar" and Carlton Cooley's "Caponsacchi," Mr. Cooley being solo viola in the Cleveland orchestra under Artur Rodzinski.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

OCT 22 1933

* * *

Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it opens its local season at the Lyric on November 14.

It is not generally known that Mr. Koussevitzky in his early days played the bass part of Bach's "Phoebus and Pan," under the direction of Richard Strauss. That was in Dusseldorf in 1900. Later he organized his own orchestra in Moscow and won fame. He is entering his tenth season as leader of the veteran Boston organization.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 23 1933

Series to Be Opened by Boston Symphony

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 22—An audience numbering 4,500, the largest in three years, is expected to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it opens the Choral Union Series for the third successive year, Tuesday night. The orchestra of 110 pieces will play in Hill Auditorium, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Its program will be as follows:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" Serenade for string orchestra (Koechel No. 525), four movements—Mozart.

"Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring), a picture of pagan Russia, in two parts, the Adoration of the Earth and The Sacrifice—Stravinsky.

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, Brahms.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 22 1933

Michigan will have its only opportunity of the year to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, when the noted organization appears in concert in Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, Tuesday night. The program will include a Mozart Serenade for string orchestra, the First Symphony in C minor, of Brahms, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring).

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

OCT 21 1933

Beethoven First of All Musicians By Philharmonic Society Ballot

By GOBIND BEHARI LAL
Universal Service Science Editor

NEW YORK, Oct. 20—Beethoven stands first in music in a scientific voting test.

So declares Emil E. E. Folgman of Pennsylvania university, who applied a psychological method for measuring comparative judgments, devised by Prof. L. L. Thurstone of Chicago university.

The problem was, how are the various famous musical composers rated by professional musicians. Nineteen great composers were listed. A jury of 308 members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society, Boston, Philadelphia and Minneapolis Symphony orchestras was chosen.

Each person was asked to fill out a written form, asking for preference ranks under various combinations. Altogether these 308 musicians rendered 58,520 written judgments.

The total judgments of all the four orchestras gave to Beethoven the first rank. The rest of the 18 musical composers stood respectively as follows: Brahms, Wagner, Mozart, Bach, Schubert, Haydn, Debussy, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky, Berlioz, Cesar Franck, Chopin, Verdi, Stravinsky, Grieg, McDowell and Victor Herbert.

Apart from upholding Beethoven as the best, the various orchestras showed remarkable agreement in rating Herbert and MacDowell as the lowest.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 22 1933

Development Of Musical Taste Here Astounding

Radio Plays Important Role In Its Growth, Says Koussevitsky

Radio has a share in the amazing development of musical appreciation in this country, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declared in a recent interview in the Microphone, New England radio newssheet

"The development of musical taste in America within the last decade has surpassed that of any other country," Dr. Koussevitzky said.

"Americans support and patronize the three outstanding orchestras of the world. They listen to music with more genuine understanding and enthusiasm than do any other peoples with whom I am familiar.

"Radio plays an important part in this development because it now brings the concerts of these three outstanding orchestras into homes which would not otherwise be able to hear them. Naturally, hearing the best in music raises the taste of listeners.

"However, I do not believe that radio ever will replace the concert hall. Overtones are lost in radio broadcasts, also the intangible, electric impulse that passes through an audience assembled in a concert hall."

Dr. Koussevitzky recently returned from a vacation in Europe to begin his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He told of plans for the ensuing season, adding, "I have under consideration a number of works by American composers, among them a new symphony by the Californian, Roy Harris and a suite by Aaron Copland, one of your ablest composers."

ST. LOUIS, MO.,
STAR & TIMES

OCT 19 1933

MUSIC LEADERS PRAISE SYMPHONY SOCIETY HERE

Walter Damrosch, dean of American symphonic conductors; Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra; Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Frederick Stock of the Chicago orchestra, are among the music leaders who have congratulated the St. Louis Symphony Society on its plans for the orchestra's greatest season.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 20 1933

TO GIVE LECTURE ON MUSIC PROGRAM

Bernard Wagenaar, Composer, Speaks at Bushnell To-Night.

Bernar Wagenaar, distinguished American composer and commentator on music, will be presented by the Horace Bushnell Memorial hall in a lecture this evening on the program to be played next Wednesday by the Philadelphia orchestra. Mr. Wagenaar's lecture, which will be illustrated by him at the piano and by means of orthophonic recordings, will be held in the Colonial room, starting at 8:15 p. m.

This is the first of five lectures to be given by Mr. Wagenaar. He will speak a few days before each of the symphony programs on the Bushnell concert series. These programs include those to be given by the Boston, Detroit, Cleveland and New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestras.

In addition to his comments on the individual programs, the lecturer will make his five talks a course on the appreciation of music. The last part of each lecture will be devoted to questions and answers, it has been announced.

Mr. Wagenaar, whose symphonies have been played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under Toscanini and others, and by London Symphony, as well as by several other world-famous orchestras, is known also for his ability to analyze and describe music. He has had much success in his lectures which are designed for the cultured layman who wishes to enhance his appreciation and enjoyment of symphony music.

The response from Bushnell concert series subscribers to the announcement of Mr. Wagenaar's engagement indicates a capacity audience for tonight's lecture.

The program of the Philadelphia orchestra which he will discuss tonight includes Bach's "Fugue in G minor,"; "Symphony No. 2 in D major," by Brahms; "Concerto Sacro, No. 1," by Werner Josten and "Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

To Lecture Here

BERNARD WAGENAAR

Mr. Wagenaar, famous composer and commentator, will give a series of talks on the symphony programs to be presented in the Bushnell concert series this season.

Wagenaar Will Give Five More Lectures

So successful have been the explanatory lectures given by Olin Downes at the Bushnell memorial preceding the various operas which have been presented, that the management has announced that Bernard Wagenaar, famous composer and commentator, has been engaged for a series of five lectures on the symphony programs to be presented at the hall this season. The first talk by Mr. Wagenaar which took place Friday evening, October 20, drew a capacity audience in the Colonial room. Many subscribers expressed gratification that the lectures have been arranged to afford a more intelligent appreciation of the symphony programs.

Mr. Wagenaar illustrates his lectures at the piano and by means of orthophonic recordings. His future lectures will concern the individual symphony programs to be played by the Detroit, Cleveland, Boston and New York Philharmonic orchestras, and will also include a course in the appreciation of music.

Born in the Netherlands in 1894, Mr. Wagenaar has become an American citizen and now lives in New York. He studied at the Muziekschool van de Maatschappij tet Beverdering der Toonkunst in Utrecht; violin with Gerard Veerman; harmony, counterpoint and composition with Dr. Johann Wagenaar who is now director of the Royal conservatory at The Hague.

In 1920 he came to this country, joining the New York Philharmonic as a violinist a year later. Shortly afterward he became a member of the faculties of the Juillard Graduate school and the Institute of Musical Art of the Juillard foundation, meantime lecturing extensively.

As a composer, he is known for a number of songs and sonatas; two symphonies, the first of which was performed by the New York Philharmonic Symphony in 1928 and the second by the same orchestra under Toscanini last year; a sinfonietta for small orchestra which Mengelberg and the Philharmonic played in 1930. Later this work was performed by the London Symphony. His symphony works have also been played by the Detroit, Cincinnati, Rochester and other orchestras.

Recently Mr. Wagenaar has been lecturing extensively upon the subject of music appreciation and contemporary music for the cultured layman, notably to the New School for Social Research in New York; during the past summer his six weeks' course dealing with those subjects which was given in Edgartown, Mass., was received enthusiastically.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 19 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Present Unusual Program in Ann Arbor Concert Oct. 24

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has built a program of unusual interest for the orchestra's concert in this season's Choral Union series, Tuesday evening, Oct. 24.

The program will be opened by Mozart's, "Eine Klein Nachtmusik" Serenade for String orchestra, (Koechel No. 525) and in the latter half he will play Brahm's "Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68." Of special interest will be the second number, when he will offer for the first time in Ann Arbor, a remarkable work of a great modernist, Stravinsky, entitled "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") a picture of Pagan Russia, which consists of two parts, The Adoration of the Earth—Introduction-Harbingers of Spring-Dance of the Adolescents-Abduction-Spring Rounds-Games of the Rival Cities—The Procession of the Wise Men-The Adoration of the Earth (The Wise man)-Dance of the Earth, and Part 2, The Sacrifice—Introduction—Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents-Glorification of the Chosen One-Evocation of the Ancesters-Ritual of the Ancesters-The Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One.

This work is so remarkable and has attracted such wide attention that the following analyses from the program book of the Boston Symphony orchestra series, will be of interest to music lovers in general:

"Le Sacre Du Printempts" ("The Rite of Spring"). Pictures of Pagan Russia, in two parts—Igo Stravinsky. (Born at Oranienbaum, near Leningrad, Russia, on June 5, 1822; now living).

"The Rite of Spring" or more literally according to the Russian "Spring Consecration" scenery and costumes designed by Nicolas Roerich, choreography by W. Nijinsky, was produced at the Theater des Champs Elysees on May, 29, 1913, by the Diaghiley Ballet Russe. Mr. Monteux conducted. The chief dancers were M. Nijinsky and Mlle. Piltz. The performance, while it delighted some, incited howls of protest. The hissing was violent, mingled with counter cheers, so that M. Astruc ordered the lights turned up. The late Alfred Capu wrote a bitter article published in Le Figaro, in which he said:

"Bluffing the idle rich of Paris through appeals to their snobbery is a delightfully simple matter. The process works out as follows: Take the best society possible, composed of rich, simple-minded, idle people. Then submit them to an intense regime of publicity. By pamphlets, newspaper articles, lectures, personal visits and all other appeals to their snobbery, persuade them that hitherto they have seen only vulgar spectacles, and are at last to know what is art and beauty. Impress them with cabalistic formulae. They have not the slightest notion of music, literature, painting, and dancing; still, they have heretofore seen under these names only a rude imitation of the real thing. Finally assure them that they are about to see the real dancing and hear real music. It will then be necessary to double the prices at the theater, so great will be the rush of shallow worshippers at this false shrine."

Carl Van Vechten describes the scene in his book: "Music After the Great War":

"I attended the first performance in Paris of Starvinsky's anarchistic (against the canons of academic art) ballet, "The Rite of Spring" in which primitive emotions are both depicted and aroused by a dependence on barbarous rhythm and harmony, as even so late a composer as Richard Strauss understands them, do not enter. A certain part of the audience, thrilled by what is considered to be a blashphemous attempt to destroy music as an art, and swept away with wrath, began very soon after the rise of the curtain to whistle, to make cat-calls, and to offer audible suggestions as to how the performance should proceed. Others of us, who liked the music and felt that the principles of free speech were at stake, bellowed defiance. It was war over art for the rest of the evening, and the orchestra played on unheard, except occasionally when a slight lull occurred. The figures on the stage danced in time to music that they had to imagine they heard, and beautifully out of rhythm with the uproar in the auditorium. It was sitting in a box, in which I had rented one seat. Three ladies sat in front of me, and a young man occupied the place behind me. He stood up during the course of the ballet to enable himself to see more clearly. The intense excitment under which he was laboring, thanks to the potent force of the music, betrayed itself presently when he began to beat rhythmically on the top of my head with his fists. My emotion was so great that I did not feel the blows for some time. They were perfectly synchronized with the beat of the music. When I did, I turned around. His apology was sincere. We had both been carried beyond ourselves."

There were five performances in Paris that season.

When this ballet was brought out at Drury Lane, London, on July, 11, 1913, with Mr. Monteux conductor, it was thought advisable to send a lecturer, Edwin Evans, in front of the curtain, to explain the ideas underlying the ballet. At the end of the performance there was greater applause than hissing. The music of this ballet was performed for the first time in concert form by an orchestra conducted by Mr. Monteux at one of his concerts at the Casino de Paris on April 5, 1914, when it was enthusiastically applauded.

And now "The Rite of Spring" is acclaimed by many as Stravinsky's "greatest work."

The first performance of the music in this country was by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia on March 3, 1922..

The first performance in Boston was at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Jan. 25, 1924.

On April 11, 12, 1924, "The Rite of Spring" was performed in Boston by the Boston Symphony orchestra as an "extra" number, "by general request." This being interpreted meant that the performance was in addition to the regular concert, and those who did not wish to hear it were free to leave the hall.

There was a performance conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston on Dec. 26, 1924.

Much has been written about this remarkable ballet. Some have gone to Sir J. G. Frazer's "Golden Bough" and talked about the mystical adoration of Spring "as the sign of fertility culminating in a propitiatory sacrifice;" how the decay of vegetation in winter is the weakening, of the impulse of fertility and must be brought to life in a younger form. Edwin Evans finds behind the pretext of a rite the marvellous power inherent in all nature to grow, develop, and assume new forms. "This power is so great that it affects Nature herself with a tremor, expressing itself in uneasiness at the critical period of adolescence in all living things. It is that tremor, that inner disturbance, which is the underlying thought of 'The Rite of Spring.'" And Edith Sitwell has this to say; "Life is energy, and the very fact of that life will eventually push us over the abyss into the waiting and intolerable darkness. In "The Rite of Spring" he (Stravinsky) gives us the beginning of energy, the enormous and terrible shaping of the visible and invisible world through movement."

Thus might Capt. Lemuel Gulliver have heard learned professors discussing at the Academy of Legado.

But some have quoted Stravinsky as saying that this work is to be regarded as abstract music in all but name, a modern symphony. The answer to this is that descriptive titles for the various sections are in the score.

First of all, the ballet is a succession of scenes. Let us hear what Stravinsky himself told Michel Georges-Michel about it. The embryo is a theme that came to me when I had completed the "Fire Bird." As this theme, with that which followed, was conceived in a strong, brutal manner, I took as a pretext for developments, for the evocation of this music, the Russian prehistoric epoch, since I am a Russian. But note well that this idea came from the music: the music did not come from the idea. My work is architeconic, not anecdotical: Objective, not descriptive construction.

And so Boris de Schloezer in an elaborate study of Stravinsky published in La Revue Musicale for December, 1823, is inclined to smile at those who speak of the "religious, mystical element" in the ballet, and philosophize over "the mentality of primitive man evoked by a Russian, rather, Scythian barbarian." He insists that in Russia the Negro-American elements, as syncopation, would be at once recognized. The work is not an impressionistic evocation; it is "the direct transposition of a certain act on a sonorous plane" a symmetrical constrution.

Stravinsky worked on "The Rite of Spring" in 1912-1913, completing it at Clarens. Boris de Schloezer, discussing the question of Russian folk-song infouence, states that the two melodies in "Mysterious Circles of Youths" and the second motive in "Ritual Action" are Russian folk-Tunes; the other themes, while they have Russian character—rythmic accentuation, preciseness of melodic lines, harmonic harshness, a diatonic nature—are of Stravinsky's invention.

The first part of the work is "The Fertility of the Earth." The second part is "The Sacrifice."

Part I

There is a slow introduction, which, according to commentators, portrays "the mystery of the physical world in Spring." It is said that Stravinsky here uses wood-wind instruments, whose "dryness conveys a more austere expression of truth;" he "mistrusts the facile expressiveness" of the strings.

The curtain rises. Omens of Spring. Dances of the Youths and Maidens: a rite of incantation with vigorous stamping on the ground. Dance tune for flutes, while trumpets chant a harmonized theme used later. A mock abduction is part of this ritual.

Then come the Spring Rounds, introduced by a tune for clarinet. The main portion of the dance is based on the theme already announced by the trumpets. Another Ceremony: Games of Rival Towns. An old man, wise, white-haired, bearded, enters. He is the Celebrant. He prostrates himself. All kiss the ground. A sacred dance follows. When this ballet was performed early in 1914 at Moscow, this first section was entitled "The Kiss to the Earth."

Part II

At the introduction. "The Pagan Night." Mr. Evans has said: "A deep sadness pervades it, but this sadness is physical, not sentimental. It is gloomy with the oppression of the vast forces of Nature, pitiful with the helplessness of living creatures in their presence. This Prelude leads to the Mystic Circle of the Adolescents. Girls dance and play. One must be sacrificed to Spring. The victim is chosen. Her Glorification. Evocation of Ancestors. Ritual Performance of the Ancestors. The chosen victim begins her sacrificial act. She must dance herself to death."

The score calls for two piccolos, two flutes, flute in G, four oboes (one interchangeable with a second English horn), English horn, three carinets (one interchangeable with a second bass clarinet), clarinet), clarinet in E flat, bass clarinet, four bassoons (one interchangeable with second double-bassoon), double-bassoon, eight horns (two interchangeable with Bayreuth tubas, four trumpets, trumpet in D, bass trumpet, three trombones, two tubas, four kettledrums, small kettledrum, bass drum, tambourine, cymbals, antique cymbals, triangle, tam-tam rape guero (scratcher) and strings.

We now quote from a long article about Stravinsky by Mr. Leigh Henry (Musical Times, London, 1919): "The ordinary academic classifications of chors are negated by him; he realized that academic dogmas of harmony are all based on an arbitrary delimitation of the complete resources of musical sound and sound combination to a diatonic system (which is in reality only one of many musical modes), and are only applicable to and capable of the necessarily limited range of expression obtainable from that system." That is to say, the chords sufficient to the artistic purposes of the great majority of preceding composers no longer sufficed for Stravinsky, who as Henry says "percieves all aspects of life that impinge upon his consciousness with such clarity and penetration of vision that he is aware of a myriad of subtle facts undiscerned by his musical forerunners. Stravinsky himself is reported as saying, "I want not to suggest situations or emotions, but simply to manifest, to express them. I think that there is in what are called 'Impressionist' methods a certain amount of hypocrisy, or at least a tendency toward vagueness and ambiguity. That I shun above all things, and that perhaps is the reason why my methods differ as much from those of the impressionists as they differ from academic conventional methods. Though I find it extremely hard to do so, I always aim at straightforward expression in its simplest form. I have no use for 'working-out' in dramatic or lyric music. The one essential is to feel and to convey one's feelings.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 20 1933

Orchestra Program to Be Discussed by Dr. Moore

Dr. Earl V. Moore, musical director of the University School of Music, will speak on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which includes an important number by the great modern composer, Stravinsky, entitled "Le Sacre du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring), a picture of pagan Russia, in room 315, Hill auditorium, Monday morning, at 9 o'clock and again at 10 o'clock, and Tuesday at 10 o'clock. All interested in an analytical discussion of Stravinsk's work are admitted without admission charge.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 23 1933

MUSIC MISCELLANY

Great Music for Greater Numbers

A large number of representative musicians whose sincerity is unquestioned are engaged in concerted effort to give larger numbers of persons the great music of the world with the hope of promoting greater musical activity among the present generation.

There is a dearth of young singers and "pianists" and "piano players" are at a premium. Participation in music by those of this era must increase. At the piano, the hub of the wheel of music education, is the place for one to begin whatever other instrument he may intend to study or whatever his line of daily activity.

From this group of daily music participants will develop the true music lovers and appreciators of the best in music, that will support concerts and opera by great musicians for cultural gain and artistic satisfaction and not as "an excuse to parade in evening dress."

Told in Headlines

New Blood in American music. Younger creative figures show promise and vitality. London inaugurates plans for record symphonic year. Over 6000 take part in New York performance for benefit of Nazi refugees in Palestine. Permanent orchestra for Kansas City. Col. Higgins arranges extensive musical events in Texas. Spring Bach festival planned by Los Angeles joint choirs. State-wide competitive festival projected. Cleveland receives San Carlo opera series with enthusiasm. Audiences for performances average 7000. Mussolini's radical plans aim to solve opera problem. Bringing the theatre to the masses. Heroic celebrations versus representation of mediocre life. Musical events in Sydney include recitals and opera. Sunday concerts crowded. Boston concert series sold out in advance of opening. New NBC headquarters opened for inspection in Radio City. World's largest broadcasting plant to be inaugurated Nov. 15, with special seventh anniversary programs. Radio has improved art of song. Eminent vocal teacher declares it is a mirror reflecting good points, a magnifying glass for bad ones. Symposium course in modern American music. Denver vocal teacher discusses training of radio artists. Boston Symphony orchestra to broadcast. Young tonal America strives zealously for lofty goals. Latin American music played in Washington by U. S. Navy band. Composers of 18 countries represented on program broadcast.

Parkway TRANSCRIPT Roslindale
OCT 19 1933 Mass

Boston Symphony Beethoven Cycle

The music lovers of the Parkway district will be pleased to learn that a notable Beethoven cycle is to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as a part of its 53rd season. The cycle will be given on six Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock, beginning October 31st. All of the symphonies, including the choral ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" Piano Concerto; the triple Concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts. Chorus, singers and instrumental soloists will be announced later.

The other dates will be November 21, January 23, February 13, March 27, and April 17.

On Monday evening, November 6th, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programs Dr. Koussevitsky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory.

This season, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky begins his tenth year in America as the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Koussevitsky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts, etc., is on view in Symphony Hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts of Friday and Saturday.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

Beethoven Cycle Will Be Given By Symphony Orchestra

A notable Beethoven cycle is to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as a part of its 53rd season, according to an announcement from Symphony hall, Boston. The cycle will be given on six Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock, beginning October 31. All of the symphonies including the choral ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus," and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts.

Monday evening, November 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programs Dr. Koussevitsky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins his tenth year in America as the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

New Bedford, Mass.
TIMES

OCT 22 1933

Boston Symphony Will Give Cycle of Beethoven

Starts Series of Concerts Oct. 31 Which Will End April 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, world-famous organization which has just begun its 53rd season, will give a cycle of Beethoven on the following six Tuesday afternoons: Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17. All nine symphonies by the master of Bonn will be played, as also the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont." The chorus, singers and instrumental soloists for these concerts will be announced shortly.

It is difficult to over-estimate the wonderful opportunity which musicians and music lovers of Boston and of nearby cities and towns will thus have, to hear some of the loftiest music ever written performed with consummate skill and understanding. Ever since 1790, when Beethoven at the age of 20 had already turned out a quantity of epochal music, the works of this Titan among composers have been growing in popularity throughout the world. The only writer of music who could possibly dispute with him the supreme place in the tonal art was Bach—who, as Romain Rolland reminds us, "was a genius enclosed within a formula." After these two, all the other great composers take second or third rank.

The Ninth Symphony

The culmination of Beethoven's symphonic writings was, of course, the great Ninth (or Choral) Symphony, which when it was first performed in Vienna the master was too completely deaf to hear; yet he could see the hands of the audience clapping in tremendous acclaim. The triumphant choral entrance in this work, commencing with the words "Freude, schoene Freude," is unforgettable.

By an unusual coincidence Dr. Koussevitsky's nephew, Fabian Sevitsky, will also present this symphony on the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, which he conducts.

On Monday evening, Nov. 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin.

Dr. Koussevitsky has been the leader of the orchestra for ten years and has, by his authoritative musicianship, his mastery as a conductor and his ingratiating personality, achieved a great success. Returning from abroad a few weeks ago, he brought various new scores by European composers for first presentation in Boston, and these—together with several new American works—promise a tremendously interesting season. A Koussevitsky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts and so forth, is now on view in Symphony Hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts this Friday and Saturday.

Incidentally, the financial condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is far better than that of most of the great orchestras of our country—particularly the Philadelphia Orchestra, which recently had to resort to auctioning off a number of season tickets for their regular weekly concerts.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Treasures of Musical World in Season's Concerts

Finest of Music To Be Heard Here

Philadelphia Concert First of Eight Programs.

No finer music will be heard anywhere this season than in the concerts arranged for the Bushnell Memorial series from October 25 to March 14. Music lovers here who have been keen in their interest in and generous in their support of the concerts in past years will be rewarded with a series which includes such superb musical organizations as the Philadelphia orchestra, the Detroit Symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, and such conductors as Stokowski, Gabrilowitsch, Koussevitzky, Rodzinski and Toscanini. In addition there will be a two-piano recital by Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

The Philadelphia concert with the brilliant Leopold Stokowski as director is but two days away. Not since the fall of 1931 has Stokowski led his musicians in a program at the memorial, but there are still vivid memories of their playing of the compositions of Weber, Schubert, Wagner and Richard Strauss during that season. This year the program will include: "Fugue in G Minor," Bach (orchestrated by Leopold Stokowski); "Symphony No. 2 in D Major," Brahms; "Concerto Sacro," Josten; "Rapsodie Espagnole," Ravel.

Stokowski Returns.

Such a world famous leader and his orchestra have the power to stamp indelibly on the memory of Hartford music lovers the beauty of these composers. Always an interesting personality, Mr. Stokowski is one of the most absorbing directors to watch as he controls the great body of musicians which he has painstakingly trained and merged into a symphonic ensemble. Memorial patrons will welcome heartily the return of this great director to the Bushnell concert series.

Hartford needs no introduction to Ossip Gabrilowitsch and the Detroit Symphony orchestra. Last season the warm response to the Detroit concert and to Mr. Gabrilowitsch's leadership was so genuine that it seemed almost tangible. Particularly beautiful was the Handel "Concerto Grosso" which Mr. Gabrilowitsch directed from the harpsichord. From that first number to the concluding "Sorcerer's Apprentice" by Dukas there was not a single flutter in the hall to break the rapt attention of the audience.

Since 1918 Mr. Gabrilowitsch has been conductor of the Detroit Symphony orchestra. For two seasons he alternated with Leopold Stokowski as director of the Philadelphia orchestra, in addition to conducting his own series of concerts with the Detroit Symphony. It was during this period that he led the Philadelphia in the dedication program at the Bushnell memorial. Hartford has welcomed his return each season since that memorable occasion.

A Boston Symphony concert has often been spoken of as "a thing apart." The genius of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has long been appreciated in Hartford. There is no conductor who is more masterful than Koussevitzky in an intense and tumultuous musical energy. His exploration of the modern field of composers has brought to his audience annually new symphonic works which have been selected with fine discrimination and presented with great artistry, winning new laurels for a distinguished conductor and his distinguished orchestra.

Last year, the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky completed a Brahms Centenary festival in Boston which included six concerts and embraced the principal orchestral, choral and smaller works of this composer. Prolonged applause, mingled with cheers, gave the Russian conductor his final farewell for the season on Sunday, April 30, at the conclusion of a magnificent performance of the German Requiem in which 300 singers from Harvard and Radcliffe combined with the orchestra.

London Triumph.

In May Dr. Koussevitzky sailed for England and there conducted a series of concerts in London. While there he was guest conductor in a series of concerts in the London Music Festival organized by the British Broadcasting company.

A review in the London Times recounted the occasion as follows: "It is many years since the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra has visited London, and the large audience welcomed his return to the Queen's hall very warmly."

"In the performances, the character of each work was finely realized. Prokofieff's Symphony was exquisite in finish and not without a touch of fun. Sibelius' was at once precise in detail and full of restrained energy. Its grandeur and its eloquence were apparent in spite of a refinement that, perhaps, left out of account something of its native ruggedness . . . . .

"After the interval M. Koussevitzky, to use a colloquialism, let himself go in an intensely dramatic performance of Tschaikovsky's symphony which yet avoided vulgarity, noisiness and, miraculously, in view of the pace at which he took the slow movement, sentimentality."

Hartford is, indeed, fortunate to have Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony again when such cities as Washington and Baltimore are hearing this orchestra for the first time in a dozen years.

Notable on this season's program is the eagerly anticipated two-piano recital by Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch whose work will be given a worthy place beside that of the great orchestras. It is interesting to note that the Bushnell memorial management's request for the joint appearance of these artists has brought about arrangements for a tour of America next season. It is doubtful if two artists could be brought together in a two-piano recital more advantageously than Bauer and Gabrilowitsch. Each has individual powers which complement the gifts of the other.

Paranov to Play.

Hartford will be further entertained in this concert because of the news that Moshe Paranov, prominent local pianist, will assist these artists by taking part in a triple concerto during the program.

Gabrilowitsch has been acclaimed "the poet of the piano," and it has been said that he is "an acknowledged authority of style in the performance of whatever music he chooses to expound." His interpretations are distinguished by thought and poetic feeling, expressing deep emotions which never degenerate into affectedness or exaggeration.

Harold Bauer has almays found a large and enthusiastic following whenever he has come to Hartford. His concert in the Colonial room last season taxed the capacity of the room, and the lage number of requests which came to the memorial management following the concert made it virtually a necessity to arrange for a concert this season.

Those who are familiar with the career of Harold Bauer recall that at the age of thirty he abandoned the violin for the piano. When Paderewski, who had heard him play the piano, persuaded him to think seriously of the instrument as a medium of self-expression, he applied himself to the task with such complete singleness of purpose that within three years he made his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic society, playing a Beethoven and a Saint-Saens Concerto, and the Liszt Hungarian Fantasy. To-day he ranks among the highest as a "poet and a lyric rhapsodist." Mr. Bauer made his American debut in 1901 as a soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Since then he has appeared with every orchestra of note in this country and Europe.

Mr. Bauer and Mr. Gabrilowitsch have played together many times and during their partnership have acquired a rich collection of two-piano literature upon which to draw for their coming recital. A solo concert by either is an important musical event, but the appearance of two great pianists in a joint recital makes it an outstanding occasion in the coming season.

A New Conductor.

Particularly interesting will be the appearance in Hartford of the Cleveland orchestra this season, as Bushnell patrons will be afforded the opportunity of seeing and hearing the work of a young man who this year becomes conductor of the Cleveland orchestra. A native of Poland, Artur Rodzinski came to this country at the invitation of Leopold Stokowski and was for some time an assistant director of the Philadelphia orchestra. For four years he was conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, and his progress brought him to the attention of a number of the country's symphony societies, several of which would have liked to engage him as conductor, but the management of the Cleveland orchestra, alert for a man who could carry on the splendid work and uphold the high standards of their group, secured him first.

The board of directors of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Los Angeles, owing to the uncertainty of the future of the orchestra, reluctantly released Mr. Rodzinski from his contract next season in the hope that an engagement with Cleveland will assure the continuance of the career of a talented conductor. W. A. Clark, jr., president of the board of directors of the Los Angeles orchestra, wrote John L. Severance, president of the Musical Arts association, in releasing Mr. Rodzinski, "Our great loss is your gain."

(CONTINUED ON PAGE 18)

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 2)

Mr. Rodzinski's conducting brings out two important characteristics as Hartford audiences will perceive: a fine intellectual penetration and a solid grasp of orchestral technique. He communicates his thoughts with rapidity and ease, conducting without a score, some of the time without even a baton, producing results with the mere movement of a finger.

One critic has written of Rodzinski's conducting, "He spreads a composition before one like a great curtain of lovely designs, suspending it in such a way that it seems to lose all weight. Its sweeping folds fall in just the right way to give an impression of grace, strength and dignity."

With such an admirable symphonic unit as the Cleveland orchestra available to him, Mr. Rodzinski will have full scope for his unquestioned powers as conductor. It is with confident and pleasurable expectations that the management of the Memorial have arranged for the appearance of the Cleveland orchestra under so talented a leader as Rodzinski, who will quickly take his place in the select circle of the world's great orchestra leaders.

Just New York and Hartford.

Hartford can be justly proud that this is the only city outside of New York in which the Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra with Arturo Toscanini conducting will play this season. The decision of the Philharmonic management to alter its announced plans and send the orchestra here is one of the greatest tributes that could be paid to the cultural standing which Hartford has won for itself.

The New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra is the oldest orchestra in the United States and the second oldest in the world. It has a record of performances unbroken since 1842, the year in which it was founded. No Philharmonic concert has ever been cancelled, and only two have ever been postponed in all these years. One concert was shifted, owing to the death of President Lincoln, and another was postponed when the conductor, Anton Seidl, died suddenly.

Hartford music lovers together with those the world over pay tribute to the genius of Maestro Toscanini. His perfectly-trained musicians, his vast knowledge of music, his miraculous memory which, contrary to natural law, seems to grow keener the older he gets, and his unique interpretive powers have made him a heroic figure in the symphonic world.

Olin Downes has written of Toscanini in "A Study" printed in the New York Times: "A man of adorable simplicity and warm-hearted in his personal relations, Toscanini is inflexible in everything that pertains to his art. He is one of the very rare men among artists who are utterly pure in heart, to whom money as such is not a consideration, and who has his own ideas, not flattering ones of audiences or critics who praise his performances when he is not satisfied with them. . . .

"Unreasonable? Perhaps. Difficult, because of his exorbitant artistic demands? Certainly. Which do you prefer: a reasonable mediocrity who will conform, adapt himself to the world as it is and let the ideals of his art suffer, or a man of really transcendent genius, a lonely and incomparable figure in his art, whose life and whose one thought is the service of that art and the approach, as nearly as it may be achieved by human beings, to perfection? With Toscanini this is a daily battle, one that must be fought anew at every rehearsal and performance."

Toscanini is an artist faithful to the essence of his art. He loves all music except, perhaps, the most modern. Beethoven is his idol, and on his table in the green room of Carnegie hall you will always find a miniature of the great symphonist.

In the Bushnell concert series this year Hartford has spread before it the treasures of the musical world, each concert in itself a gem of artistic achievement.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 2 2 1933

Music

By

H. E. Johnson

The announcement of a new concert season is a matter of great interest to local music lovers. Although one may not be able to attend all the events on the concert calendar it is a part of our civic pride to know that the greatest artists are to appear in our neighborhood. The prospectus for the coming season offers much which we shall welcome with joy, some which we shall accept with a shrug of the shoulders, and a few items which cause some puzzlement. We may rejoice that Scrapeowitz is coming again and deplore the absence of Hammerhard, at the same time admitting that we have never heard Madame Shoutloud. Such a set of emotions is a proper reaction to the situation at hand, but if we are openminded and fair we must admit that the season of 1933-1934 promises to be the most brilliant one New Haven has experienced for many years.

Of the visiting artists and aggregations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra represents the most considerable victory for the musical public of this city. The securing of this organization for an additional concert is not a matter financial, but a response to the musical intelligence and prestige of the New Haven public. Let us cultivate this friendship, as a supplement to the increasing importance of our local orchestras.

The New Haven Symphony Orchestra has become an institution of established merit in our midst. Proving itself during the last season to be more than an adequate organization for the playing of the classic works, it demonstrated a welcome farsightedness by the outstanding performance of several great and infrequently heard compositions, notably D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Theme", the Brahms violin concerto (with Zimbalist as soloist), and Elgar "Enigma Variations." This year events of equal scope are planned by the conductor, Dean David Stanley Smith, and with a greater proficiency resulting from the augmentation of the orchestra personnel to 85 players. The day when one reviewed these concerts chiefly from the standpoint of the orchestra's good intentions is definitely past; its merits are established; there but remains the need for an enlarged and more responsive public.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

2 1 1933

News of the Music World

The final concert by the Pro Arte String quartet of Brussels will be given tomorrow in Orchestra hall at 3:30. It will play Schoenberg's second and Hindemith's third quartets and Roy Harris' Three Variations on a Theme in C minor.

Nina Mariani, soprano, and the Whitney ensemble will give a concert tomorrow at 3:30 in the Studebaker theater, the proceeds of which will be used to transport wounded veterans from Edward Hines hospital to A Century of Progress on Oct. 28. Miss Mariani will sing songs by Schumann, Strauss, Wagner, Zandonai, Caccini, Malatesta and Catalani. The Whitney ensemble will play pieces by Bach-Siloti, Brahms, Borodin and Suk.

Present Mrs. Freer's Opera.

"The Masque of Pandora," an opera in concert form written by Eleanor Everest Freer, will be presented Tuesday evening in Kimball hall. The cast includes Lucinda Munroe and Helene Grossenbacher, sopranos; Eva Gordon Horadesky and Ada Belle Files, contraltos; William Miller and David Johnston, tenors, and Leslie Arnold, George Dopp and Jennings Fawcett, barytones. Karl Schulte, who is musical director of the production, will be assisted by members of the Little Symphony orchestra.

MRS. ELEANOR EVEREST FREER.

Ruth Huebner, soprano, will be heard in recital Thursday at 8:15 in Curtiss hall. She is a belated "Young American Artist," whose debut was scheduled in the regular spring series. Miss Huebner will sing songs by Scarlatti, Bach, Handel, Franz and a group by Schubert. Harold Van Horne will be the accompanist.

Koussevitzky to Conduct.

Stravinsky's epoch-marking masterpiece, "Le Sacre du Printemps," has a place of honor on the Boston Symphony's program for Orchestra hall Monday evening. Mr. Stock himself plans to give one or more performances of this modernistic picture of primitive Russia during the present reason of the Chicago Symphony orchestra. In actual date, however, Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of it on Monday will be the third in this city, and the first since the spring of 1925.

The second symphony of Sibelius, which Dr. Koussevitzky also lists, was last performed by the Chicago orchestra seven seasons ago, a little prior to the period in which the Finnish composer's works commenced to enjoy a vogue still roused by them in the east. Even Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which completes the list of Dr. Koussevitzky's offerings, is not extremely familiar here. The concert in general will not only avoid the hackneyed, it will afford an ample test of the present abilities of what, since its inception, has always been one of the world's most distinguished orchestras.

Last Opera Performance.

The San Carlo Grand Opera Company, after a most successful visit, will bid farewell to the Auditorium tomorrow evening with a gala performance, which includes the first and second acts from "The Barber of Seville," the second act of "Madame Butterfly," the triumphal scene from "Aida" with the Oukrainsky ballet, which also will present the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda." To mention but a few, the singers will be Saroya, Koyke, Morini, Hottinger, Schalker, Onofrei, Lindi, Valle, Caupolican, Rothier, Cordon, Cervi and Curci.

In Brief.

Eric DeLamarter will play Leo Sowerby's chorale-prelude on a "Melodic Fragment from a Motet by Palestrina" at the morning service in the Fourth Presbyterian church. . . . Liza Lehman's "Persian Garden" will be staged tomorrow at 2:30 by the DePaul University School of Music. . . . Frederik Frederiksen will conduct a concert, composed chiefly of Scandinavian music, at the Swedish Old People's Home in Evanston at 3 tomorrow . . . An informal evening of music and dance will be given tomorrow at 8:30 in the Punch and Judy theater. . . . Belle Bender, dancer will give a recital tomorrow at 3:15 in the Jewish People's Institute. . . . Tickets will go on sale at Orchestra hall Monday for Lawrence Tibbett's concert for the benefit of the Girl Scouts. . . . A reception in honor of Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and Frederick Stock will be held Monday afternoon in the Illinois Host house. . . . The Woman's Symphony orchestra, of which Ebba Sundstrom is conductor, has received a bequest of $10,000 from the will of the late Helen Sears. It is planned to use the money as the nucelus in establishing an endowment fund.

A Week or More Away.

OCTOBER—
29—Jascha Heifetz, violinist; Orchestra hall.
29—Cornell and Graff, dancers; Punch and Judy.
30—Lawrence Tibbett, barytone; Auditorium.
30—Frederick Jagel, tenor, New Trier high school.
31—Michael Wilkomirski, violinist; Doris Wittich, pianist; George Dopp, barytone; Kimball hall.
NOVEMBER—
4-5—Shan-Kar dancers; Orchestra hall.
5—Holmes and Wayne, dancers; Punch and Judy.
7—Chicago Symphony; Mandel hall.
12—Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Orchestra hall.
12—Angna Enters, dancer; Punch and Judy.
12—Joseffer string quartet; Cordon.
12—Claire Dux, soprano; Sinai temple.
12—Woman's Symphony; Congress hotel.
14—Mark Gunzberg, pianist; Kimball hall.
16—Efrem Zimbalist, violinist; Mario Chamlee, tenor; Blackstone hotel.
19—Vera de Villiers, contralto; Studebaker.
19—Vera Mirova, dancer; Punch and Judy.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

OCT 2 3 1

Tell Engagement of Virginia Tingle.

This morning we are also announcing the engagement of Miss Virginia Irene Tingle, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harry M. Tingle of Evanston, to Frank J. Madden of Chicago. Miss Tingle, who is one of the popular members of the young set on the north shore, was prepared at Roycemore, attended Sweetbriar college, and was graduated from the University of Wisconsin. Mr. Madden took both his undergraduate and law degrees at the University of Chicago where he was a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity. No date has been set for the wedding.

[Continued on page 15, column 1.]

Col. and Mrs. Albert A. Sprague are entertaining at dinner this evening for their double cousin, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, before the concert the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Orchestra hall.

After the concert the party will enjoy the supper the John Alden Carpenters are to have at their Lake Shore drive residence for Serge Koussevitsky, the director of the Boston Symphony, Mme. Koussevitsky, ~~and~~ the Zaltko Balokovics, who arrived on Friday to be the house guests of the Carpenters.

A socially distinguished audience will fill the box circle for tonight's concert. The Frederick Stocks will have a party of friends with them and so will Mrs. Walter A. Strong, Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Leverett Thompson, Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed, Mrs. Frederic W. Upham, and Mrs. Francis G. Lee. Philip Hale of Boston, the Charles H. Swifts, and the Charles H. Hamills will be others in the audience, but they have chosen main floor seats.

Chi. Journal of Commerce

OCT 19 1933

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra play at Orchestra Hall Monday night, the program will include Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," a serenade for string orchestra, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major. Meanwhile, Henry E. Voegell, manager of Orchestra Hall, announces the dates of the Shan-Kar dancers as Saturday night, November 4 and Sunday afternoon, November 5.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

OCT 18 1933

P. E. N.'s First Dinner of Season Tomorrow.

The P. E. N. Club, whose membership includes only the creme de la creme of the literati, is giving its first dinner of the Fall season tomorrow night at the Casino for the Hervey Allens and the John Farrars, here from the East for a few days. Unfortunately Arthur Meeker Jr., secretary of the organization, won't be back from his wanderings in Europe until next week, but the rest of the members will be there, including Fanny Butcher, the president; the Kellogg Fairbanks, the Cecil Barneses, Graham Aldises and James Herbert Mitchells.

* * *

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, back home once more with another musical festival for Chicagoans, is the raison d'etre of a great many very distingue parties. Tonight the Chauncey McCormicks are giving a dinner for her before the Pr Arte concert by the continentall famous quartet which Mrs. Coo idge brought over from the cou of Belgium at Brussells, at Orchestra Hall. Afterward there will b a supper party at the Lake Shor drive home of Mr. and Mrs. Joh Alden Carpenter.

* * *

Kellogg Fairbanks to Be Hosts Friday.

Friday the Kellogg Fairbank will be hosts before the second concert, and on Saturday Mrs. Coo idge is giving a luncheon for th Carpenters and the Roy Harrisse of New York . . . he is that up an coming modern American compose whose quartet is to be played fo the first time in America on Fr day evening. That night Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Stock will entertain.

Sunday Mrs. Charles Hamill ha taken over Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed's luncheon before the las concert, and Mrs. Goodspeed is having a dinner instead at the Art Club. Later there will be a reception for Mrs. Coolidge. The Harrises and Olga Averino, who is t sing with the Schoenburg quarte will also be guests. Monday Colon and Mrs. A. A. Sprague will b hosts of the evening before going o to hear the Boston Symphony an later to the Carpenters supper part for its conductor, Serge Koussevi sky and the Zlatko Balokovic (Joyce Borden), who arrive Frida The Illinois Host House is givin a reception for Mrs. Coolidge and D Stock on Tuesday and on Wedne day she and the Harrises will b off for Pittsfield where the Pr Arte quartet will perform in he Temple of Music.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

OCT 2 3 1933

* * *

The cream of the music audiences turns out this evening fo the Boston Symphony, straight from the punctually served dinners that herald the opening bars at 8:30.

Among the boxholders are Mr. and Mrs. John Alden Carpenter (the Boston Symphony played some of Mr. Carpenter's compositions at a home concert last year), Mrs. Leverett Thompson, Mrs. Frances Glessner Lee, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed, Mrs. Frederick Upham, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, Col. and Mrs. A A. Sprague. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Swift and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hammill have a group of seats on the main floor.

Mozart, Stravinsky and the Tibellius Second Symphony are on the pro-

CHICAGO TO HEAR NOVEL COMPOSITION.

Altho Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, a number of new American works are to be done by the New York Philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange. They include "1929—A Satire," by David Stanley Smith of New Haven; a symphony (No. 2) by Randall Thompson, a suite by Walter Piston of Boston, Whithorne's "Fandango" and two poems, "Winter" and "Spring."

Hans Kindler expects to present Lamar Stringfield's "Legend of John Henry" and a set of variations on a Hassler chorale by Templeton Strong. Stringfield, a North Carolinian, has interested himself in American folk music for years.

Chicago will hear Philip James' wireless piece, "Station WGZBX" under Frederick Stock; Cleveland, Whithorne's "The Dream Pedlar," and Carlton Cooley's "Caponsacchi," Cooley being solo viola in the Cleveland orchestra under Artur Rodzinski.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

OCT 2 0 1933

MUSICIANS HONOR MEMORY OF PARBS IN BACH ANDANTE

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

THAT AMAZING study in orchestral sonorities, Igor Stravinsky's "Petrouchka," was the most exciting item on the program presented last night by the Chicago Symphony. Together with the tone picture of pagan Russia called "The Rite of Spring," which Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are to play for us on Monday evening, it marks the climax of this composer's creative gift.

Not only are the sounds which Stravinsky causes the orchestra to produce new in effect and quite baffling to the theorist who seeks to classify them at first hearing, but, what is certainly more to the point, they have great power of suggestion.

* * *

THE STORY of the Russian clown is no different in its essentials from the universal legend of Punchinello. But its setting is a barbaric riot of sound and of color such as only a Slav could imagine.

This music is a mass of contradictions. Sophistication alternates with naivete. The harshest dissonances resolve themselves into simple harmonies. Fantastic and impossible melodies turn into nursery tunes. Humor and pathos, farce and tragedy go hand in hand.

* * *

IT IS SUPERB and impossible. Yet Dr. Stock and his group of virtuosi made light of its difficulties. I can't recall a performance of the work that had more urge and impulse. If some enterprising manager will bring about a presentation in the manner intended by the composer, with a ballet to visualize all the action of the music, I will gladly turn press agent for the show.

The concert began in wholesome and virile fashion with Sir Hamilton Harty's re-orchestration of the famous "Water Music" by Handel, a sturdy set of dances that honestly won a monarch's favor for the master. There followed the andante from the Bach A minor sonata for solo violin in Frederick Stock's marvelous transcription, which is so much more than a transference and elaboration of the composer's idea that it deserves to rank as an original masterpiece of counterpoint.

This noble piece was played in memory of Hans Parbs, whose thirty-eight years of service with the Chicago Symphony were ended last week by death.

* * *

THE C MINOR symphony of Saint-Saens was repeated from the Tuesday program to be accepted with cordial interest by the Thursday subscribers. Like all well made French music, this symphony boasts certain aspects of rhythmical variety that represent its principal claim to a permanent place in the repertoire. But though it shows some nuances of mood and melody that suggest Cesar Franck or Johannes Brahms, it remains music of the mind rather than of the heart, a tour de force of technical skill—good theater and good symphony both, but lacking inspiration.

Rimsky-Korsakow's Spanish Caprice, also offered to the Tuesday subscribers, closed the program which will be repeated this afternoon.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

OCT 23 1933

* * *

MR. FREDERICK STOCK can sit back in a comfortable chair in a box at Orchestra Hall tonight, and "just listen" for a change. And to such music as he himself conducts.

It's the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, ~~with~~ the celebrated Serge Koussevitsky conducting, and all the fashionable music lovers in town will be going to hear it.

The John Alden Carpenters will take their box guests (and after the concert they're giving a supper party at their home for Koussevitsky); Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, who is to be the guest of the Frederick Stocks at dinner before the concert, has a box for it, but will occupy downstairs seats, as she did for the three Pro Arte concerts she so generously gave for the Friends of Music last week.

Mrs. Francis G. Lee, Mrs. Walter A. Strong, Mrs. Leverett Thompson, the Charles B. Goodspeeds, Mrs. Frederic Upham, the A. A. Spragues, and Mr. Philip Hale of Boston, the annotater of program notes for the program, will all be box hosts at the concert. The Charles Hamills and the Charles Swifts are having guests with them in downstairs seats.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

OCT 21 1933

Brahms Sets Season's Pace for Rodzinski

Mighty First Symphony Used by New Conductor Thursday Night

By DENOE LEEDY
The Press Music Editor

AT 8:30 Thursday evening on the stage of Severance Hall, Oberon's horn will sound its magical note and our symphony season will be on. Weber's popular overture to the opera "Oberon" may be considered his swan song—at the time it was written the composer was close to death, it was all he could do to summon his depleted energies for the last arduous task of composition—but for the Cleveland musical public it serves to open the gates to a new era of orchestral delights.

With its tonal imagery Artur Rodzinski and the reassembled Cleveland Orchestra inaugurate a season which gives promise of great brilliance. The arch-romantic Weber will give way to Brahms —to Wagner, Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Stravinsky, the moderns and the ultra-moderns—a full, kaleidoscopic array of all the most magnificent composers.

For Thursday we must content ourselves with four of these artisans in tone —Weber of the above-mentioned overture; Brahms of the first symphony in C minor; Respighi with his dramatic thunderbolt, "The Pines of Rome," Moussorgsky as evidenced in the little entr'acte from "Khovanstchina."

We can readily see that our new conductor is an astute program maker. Here is excellent musical balance ranging from the most profound utterance of the Teuton Brahms to the theatrical Roman pictures of a contemporary Italian. Surely all tastes should be more than satisfied.

* * *

Debut With Beethoven

IT was with Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony that Rodzinski made his debut here. That was no casual task as all concertgoers know, inasmuch as the work in question has suffered the onslaughts of countless conductors and only a fresh recreation of its familiar pages can be tolerated.

But the performance on that occasion brought the house down. A time-honored classic was made to live again with vitality and surging power. There was nothing unduly sensational in it—only the just result of a divining musical intelligence and imaginative penetration into the heart of the composer's musical message.

With Brahm's titanic first symphony the conductor will again have a symphonic "role" which lacks nothing. On listening to it one can well agree with Schumann when he characterized the composer as "a creative artist who sprang fully armed, like Minerva from the head of Jove."

A first symphony—but not in the sense of Beethoven's, Mozart's, or Haydn's first. This work is numbered Opus 68, which tells the story. Brahms, the supreme craftsman, without parallel in the discipline he placed upon himself, was well acquainted with Beethoven's "Ninth"—knew that to write a symphony after that final, all-embracing tonal masterpiece was in the nature of pure impudence unless one was in possession of unquestioned composition technic and convincing musical ideas.

Critics saluted his first symphony as a worthy successor to Beethoven's "Ninth," a compliment which must have come as a surprise to the 43-year-old composer as well as to the continental musical world. For there was nothing of the high-flown Mahler in Brahms. He had no intention of scattering symphonies around Olympus, of sitting on a throne for which he might not be qualified.

* * *

Voice of a Great Man

BUT we know now that this first symphony is a worthy successor to Beethoven's "Ninth." If it isn't, what else is? Where else in the symphonic literature do we have such grandeur of conception, such tremendous, far-flung ideas?

This is "granitic" music, if you will, to quote Philip Hale, the grand old man of the Boston Symphony program books, but under its seemingly rough-hewn exterior lies a heart of gold. It is not music to while away a pleasant evening. It is not to be listened to casually. It is the voice of a great man, singing in ordered sequence the emotions of all mankind.

We have heard the word "cosmic" used by an important contemporary composer who recently passed by our portals with a new work under his arm. It's a dangerous word to apply to one's own music —to any music. Cosmic significance, foolish enough as a term to be applied to anything, is something we mere mortals had better not confuse ourselves with.

But used in a poetic sense, it does seem a fitting term for the Brahms' first symphony. There are no boundaries of language to be overcome in the understanding of this work. It says nothing—but it says everything.

In it the fundamental human emotions are crystallized into orchestral sound, at times bitter and acrid, only to pour forth again in flights of ecstacy. It breathes an air of mental health, a serene detachment from petty worries of the spirit. Listen to it, make every effort to fathom its meaning—for its meaning goes far below the objective thought we clothe with language—and you will have had one of the rarest experiences that the human organism is capable of.

There are too few composers of the stature of Brahms. Too many are prone to sing of their sorrows, their own personal problems. Brahms, like Bach, transcends all this. His music becomes a philosophy for good living, optimistic, clear of brain, courageous, emotionally mature.

TOLEDO, OHIO BLADE

21 1933

UNUSUALLY FINE MUSIC ON AIR

3 Symphony Orchestras and Operas Booked by Networks.

BY RALPH E. PHELPS
The Blade Radio Editor

Scheduling by the CBS of a series of six-a-week programs by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra calls attention to the unusual amount of fine music which listeners will hear this fall and winter.

Besides these quarter hour programs by the Philadelphia, and its Friday afternoon concerts, the CBS will continue to broadcast the Sunday afternoon concerts by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra.

The NBC has arranged to broadcast a series of Saturday night concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, while the Metropolitan Opera Co. Saturday afternoon performances are to start within a few weeks. These operas also will be NBC offerings.

Mishel Piastro, concert violinist and concertmaster of the New York orchestra, will hold the spotlight in the broadcast Sunday afternoon from 3 to 5 over the CBS. He will be soloist in Glazounoff's Violin Concerto in A minor, a work which he introduced throughout Russia with the composer accompanying him at the piano. The finale is the reaction of the composer to the end of the Russo-Japanese war. The orchestra also will play the Haydn Symphony in G major and the Brahms symphony No. 1 in C minor.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL

OCT 23 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play at Memorial Hall Wednesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with its full complement of 110 men, and its famous conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in Memorial hall, Wednesday night at 8:30 o'clock.

This concert will inaugurate the artist series that has been arranged for Dayton this season, including also in its lineup two of the most outstanding instrumentalists in the world, Fritz Kreisler and Serge Rachmaninoff, and the unique and attractive Wiener Saengerknaben (Vienna boys' choir.)

Dr. Koussevitzky, first famous as the greatest living virtuoso of the double bass, had attained considerable distinction as a conductor of his own orchestra, previous to the revolution. For a time after Koussevitzky conducted under government subsidy, but fleeing restriction, he established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris.

Here and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader. Such was the leader that came to America and the Boston symphony. Never had he in Europe such a great and permanent orchestra as the one he now commands, for the fullest expression of his genius.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at the Sterzer Jewelry company, 26 West Second street.

Tickets for the entire course also are still available. Telephone Patricia O'Brien, manager, at FUlton 9432.

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

OCT 23 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO DAYTON

The Aerist series of concerts will be opened this week in Memorial hall Wednesday evening at 8:30 by the second appearance here in its history of the famous Boston symphony orchestra, one of the outstanding organizations of its kind in the world, with its none the less distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who has just started his eleventh season with this orchestra with the same success that has always crowned his efforts.

The program chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky to be interpreted by his 110 artist players will be as follows:

Mozart—"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for strings.

Moussorgsky—Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina."

Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Tchaikowsky—Symphony No. 5 in E minor, op. 64.

Tickets are now selling for this concert at Sterzer Jewelry Co., 26 West Second street.

Season tickets also including the concerts of Kreisler, Nov. 10; Rachmaninoff, Nov. 21, and the Wiener Saenger Knaben, Dec. 6, are still available. Telephone FUlton 9432, Patricia O'Brien.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 21 1933

Cincinnatians Going to Dayton for Concert

A large number of local concertgoers are driving to Dayton next Wednesday evening to attend the concert to be given in Memorial Hall there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The concert opens the Artist Series, which is given in Dayton under the management of J. H. Thuman. The program will open with the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart and will further include the prelude to Moussorksky's opera, "Koventschina," the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and the Fifth Symphony in E minor of Tschaikowsky. Seats for this concert may be ordered from Mr. Thuman at his Cincinnati office in the Baldwin store.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 23 1933

MUSIC NOT FASHION IS RULE AT SYMPHONY

Although there is a natural and justified presumption on the part of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio that its patrons are deeply and personally devoted to symphony music, the Club's ticket sellers now and again meet Saturday. Part of the terror for beginners in the concert-going field may arise from the traditional habit of dressing up. This matter Arthur Rodzinski, new conductor of the Cleveland orchestra, has cleared up by the recent pronouncement that it is proper to come in familiar attire, since "the music is the thing."

The Boston symphony will play for the club and its patrons Thursday night.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

SERGE IS VERSATILE

Boston Symphony Director Has Had Varied Background.

Serge Koussevitzky's international reputation as a program builder appears to be an inevitable outgrowth of his enormous repertoire and his truly catholic taste. Opportunity to hear evidence of this master's skill will be offered at Memorial Hall Thursday night when Dr. Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the initial concert of the season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

Beginning with a marked predelection for the three B's (Bach, Beethoven and Brahms), he devoted himself for a period to the composers of his native Russia, and during his nine years' association with the Boston orchestra, has extended his interest to embrace practically everything, classical and modern, which is scored for orchestra, provided it is written with sincerity and dignity.

Tickets for the Symphony Club's season are on sale at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, and at Heaton's Music Store. Single admissions also are being sold this week.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 20 1933

Beethoven 'Eroica' Is Boston's Choice

THREE compositions make up the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a presentation Thursday, Oct. 26, by the Symphony club of central Ohio, for which reservations are now being made at Carl Koch's, Broad and Third streets. The major work is the Beethoven Third or "Eroica" symphony, which will close the program. The Mozart serenade for strings open the fine evening with a Scriabin to follow. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct this program, masterly in content and contrast:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade
for string orchestra (K. No. 525). Mozart Allegro
Romanza
Menuetto: Allegretto
Rondo: Allegro
"The Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54..Scriabin
(First Time in Columbus)
INTERMISSION
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major,
"Eroica," Op. 55............Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
Finale: Allegro molto

TOLEDO, O.
NEWS BEE

20 1933

Koussevitzky has conducted a lot of Gershwin with the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, which is NBC's answer to CBS's hold on the Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and perhaps Stokowski is going to try some now.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 20 1933

Boston Program

THE following works are announced for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at Memorial Hall next Thursday evening at 8:15:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik": Serenade
for string orchestra (K. 525)....Mozart
Allegro: Romanza:
Minuetto; Allegretto.
Rondo; Allegro.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54...Scriabin
(First time in Columbus)
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat-major,
"Eroica," Op. 55 ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marche funebre, adagio assai
Scherzo, allegro vivace, trio
Finale, allegro molto

For advance program notes, let me quote recent sentences from H. T. Parker of the Boston Transcript:

"In 1817 when Beethoven had written eight of his nine symphonies, a friend at supper asked him which he preferred. He insisted upon the third, which is the Eroica. Not a few listeners, Friday afternoon found themselves like-minded . . . To this day "The Eroica" seems to spring, fully conceived, fully accomplished, from the mind, hand and heart of Beethoven, at last finding and releasing his mature self. Like Wagner's "Tristan," it might have been written in a single sustained heat of creation . . . It is the high merit of Dr. Koussevitzky that at each repetition of "The Eroica" he makes it sound as though we were hearing it for the first time. In none of the classic masterpieces does this conductor more excel."

In 1923 Scriabin's "Poeme d'extase" was final item on the Dr. Koussevitzky's first program for his first year at Symphony Hall. In 1933 it filled like place at the outset of his 10th season. In his comments on this later performance Mr. Parker speaks of the "excitements of Scriabin, ecstatic, neurotic, sonorous."

Scriabin would lead his poem from plane to plane of exaltation," said the critic. "In the excitement that the conductor and orchestra generate, the listener in spite of himself mounts with all three. Yesterday there was no resisting the tonal flood and thunder. Throughout the "Poem of Ecstasy," from what he wrote into what he heard in imagination Dr. Koussevitzky transcribes Scriabin; then pours him into ears, compelled if not convinced."

Dr. Koussevistizky has again for Columbus shown himself an ingenious program-maker. The list, beginning with the mannered, melodious Mozart, sets forth variously the range and quality of the orchestra and of the conductor.

Both season tickets and single admissions are now on sale at the Symphony Club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

OCT 21 1933

STUDY COURSE HOURS CHANGED

The Wednesday session of the course in "Elements of Good Work to be given from Oct. 24 to 26 inclusive will begin at 7 and continue to 8:30 instead of from 7:30 to 9, to allow those wishing to attend the Boston symphony concert to do so.

This study course, under the auspices of the Council of Social Agencies, is to be held at the Westminster church. The afternoon sessions, to begin at 4, will consist of lectures by Roy Sorenson, national secretary of the Y. M. C. A. The evening meetings will be open for discussions.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 23 1933

PUBLIC TO AID IN ORCHESTRA SELECTION

Everyone who attends the Boston Symphony orchestra concert Thursday evening, Oct. 26, in Memorial hall, will be invited by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, sponsors, to list the particular orchestras he wishes to hear next year—the tenth year of the Symphony club.

Visitors will be provided with pencils and blanks, and will be asked to sign their names. The result, Mrs. Huntington hopes, will indicate not only which orchestra, but how many, the Columbus music-loving public believe should be supported here.

29

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

OCT 22 1933

Choral Union Lists Artists For Ann Arbor

The 55th annual series of Choral Union concerts will open in Ann Arbor, Oct. 24 when the Boston Symphony orchestra will give program under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor.

Ten concerts are scheduled in this season's series. Other events in the series will be: Fritz Kreisler, violin recital, Nov. 9; Vienna Boys' choir, Georg Gruber, conductor, Nov. 22; Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, Eugene Goosens, conductor, Dec. 5; Maria Olzewska, contralto, Dec. 14; Sergei Rachmaninoff, pianist, Jan. 18; Lily Pons, soprano, Jan. 29; Poldi Mildner, pianist, Feb. 15; Detroit Symphony orchestra, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor, Feb. 21, and Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, March 6.

TIMES
GENEVA, N. Y.

OCT 21 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to conduct the complete Beethoven Symphonic Cycle commencing on October 31st. It is understood that Arturo Toscanini renowned conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra is to do the same upon his resumption of leadership of that organization when he returns from Italy. Music lovers who are also radio owners will have a treat in store for them for Toscanini is unquestionably the foremost exponent of the music of Beethoven. It was a rare privilege for the writer to have heard Toscanini conduct the entire cycle at the Scala in Milan, an event which once heard would not soon be forgotten.

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 23 1933

15 SUNDAY RECITALS LISTED FOR ACADEMY

Programs by Famous Artists, With Commentary by Olin Downes, Are Announced.

Charles D. Atkins, director of the department of education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, announced yesterday that beginning Nov. 26 a series of fifteen Sunday afternoon recitals on "The Enjoyment of Music," with commentary by Olin Downes, music critic of THE NEW YORK TIMES, would be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

"Because of the overwhelming demand that could not be accommodated for the evening course on "The Enjoyment of Music" at the Academy," he said, "this companion series of equal appeal has been arranged. The programs, planned with the consideration of the special interests and interpretive tendencies of the collaborating artists, will be accompanied by informal comments by Mr. Downes."

Among the artists who will appear on the various programs are Richard Crooks, Jascha Heifetz, Lawrence Tibbett, Lily Pons, Josef Hofmann, the Hall Johnson Choir, Albert Spalding, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and the Boston Symphony Ensemble, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The complete program for the series follows:

Nov. 26—RICHARD CROOKS, songs and arias from oratorio and opera.
Dec. 3—HALL JOHNSON CHOIR, Negro folk music: Spirituals, work songs and "blues".
Dec. 10—JASCHA HEIFETZ, classicism and virtuosity in violin music.
Dec. 17—LAWRENCE TIBBETT, operatic songs in the hands of European and American composers.
Jan. 7—Open.
Jan. 14—THE NEW ENGLISH SINGERS, "The Golden Age of English Song."
Jan. 21—LILY PONS, coloratura song.
Jan. 28—MARGARET MATZENAUER, famous arias from Peri and Rossini.
Feb. 4—BARRERE LITTLE SYMPHONY, inventions for small orchestra.
Feb. 11—MYRA HESS, piano music of Chopin, Schurman and Brahms.
Feb. 18—RENAISSANCE QUINTET AND JESSICA DRAGONETTE, old music on ancient instruments and songs of the olden time.
Feb. 25—ALBERT SPAULDING AND OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH, sonatas for piano and violin.
Mar. 11—SOPHIE BRASLU AND THE KROLL SEXTET, songs by Russian composers and music for six stringed instruments.
Mar. 25—JOSEF HOFMANN, masterpieces of piano music.
Apr. 8—SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND TWENTY-FOUR PLAYERS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

N. Y. AMERICAN

OCT 22 1933

Musical Architects

Length and Variety of Orchestral Offerings Are Important Factors

BY LEONARD LIEBLING.

From time immemorial one of the most difficult problems that beset a symphonic conductor has been the selection, arrangement and duration of his programs.

Ancient tradition is of little help in the question, for new generations and changed tastes require ameliorations and adaptations suitable to the inexorable march of progress.

In the days of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven musical programs of all kinds ran to inordinate lengths. There were comparatively few concerts for the public, but many private performances at the homes of titled and wealthy music-lovers. Both the public and the private audiences had ample time for the consideration of as much as the performers and composers cared to give—especially the composers, who made the fullest possible use of their limited opportunities for the presentation of their works.

There are records of concerts at which three symphonies were played, and then for good measure some solo numbers and maybe a concerto for piano, violin or cello.

As an example, when Beethoven offered his "Pastorale Symphony" to the Viennese public for the first time they enjoyed a program consisting of that work, a vocal aria, a hymn, with Latin text, "composed in the church style with chorus and solos"; piano concerto, Holy, with Latin text, "composed in the church style with chorus and solos"; fantasia, for piano, "which culminates in the gradual entrance of the whole orchestra and at the end with the introduction of choruses as a finale." The works were all by Beethoven, and he played the solo parts in the concertos.

In that connection I recall a story told me by my late father, a musician and a Wagner enthusiast of the most pronounced stripe. He was at Bayreuth on his first visit to that temple of the Wagnerian muse. After a performance of "Gotterdaemmerung" my father, walking down the hill from the Wagner Festival Theatre, found himself trudging next to a tired little old man, a horn player in the orchestra. The two engaged in conversation, and the visitor from America launched into a fiery eulogy of Wagner:

"Think of the man's many-sided genius, his mental, musical and general artistic versatility. Not only does he write great music but also his own librettos and invents new harmonies and a totally new operatic style. Then he builds himself this theatre, stage manages and rehearses all its productions, conducts and—"

The horn player interrupted, grumblingly:

"True, quite true, but see how much time he had for all that work."

* * *

Where could a composer or a symphony conductor get an audience today in New York which would sit through a concert like the one aforementioned by Beethoven?

Modern nerves and patience are not adapted to long and slow-moving forms of entertainment. Most operas are too long, and also many of even the finest symphonies. Beethoven is not the worst offender in that regard; rather the contrary. But Mahler, Bruckner and others cared little how long their works ran. Several modern writers of symphonic poems are equally prolix and inconsiderate of their audiences.

At present Bruno Walter, conducting the Philharmonic Orchestra here, is making his current programs somewhat top-heavy, somewhat lengthy and preponderantly German. There can be no doubt about that leader's outstanding gifts as an interpreter and an expert with the baton. However, he lacks finical judgment as an architect of programs.

Strange it is, too, how few orchestral leaders are competent in that regard.

At present Koussevitzky, of Boston, is the most satisfactory builder of symphonic concert lists in extent and variety. The mighty Toscanini has too many personal preferences and dislikes. Stokowski runs to extremes, both in modern and classic directions. The public itself is a poor selector, for whenever voted "request" programs are presented the choice runs to the mustiest and most hackneyed numbers in the repertoire.

An ideal orchestral program should begin with an overture or kindred short piece, follow with a symphony—never two at one concert—and end with a new or at least modern composition. Sometimes the symphony, if it closes brilliantly, might wind up the concert, with total time of performance, including a fifteen-minute intermission, no longer than one hour and three-quarters.

* * *

From Siegfried O'Houlihan comes this cheerful contribution:

"A New York exchange tells of an undertaker who advertises that he will play Chopin's 'Funeral March' on the piano at mortuary ceremonies if desired. Can one not imagine his officiating at the keyboard for the funeral of a music-critic and the deceased suddenly sitting up and saying, 'Your rhythm is faulty, your tone lacks charm, you hurry your tempo, and your interpretation is highly unmusical and much too glad."

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 21 1933

* * *

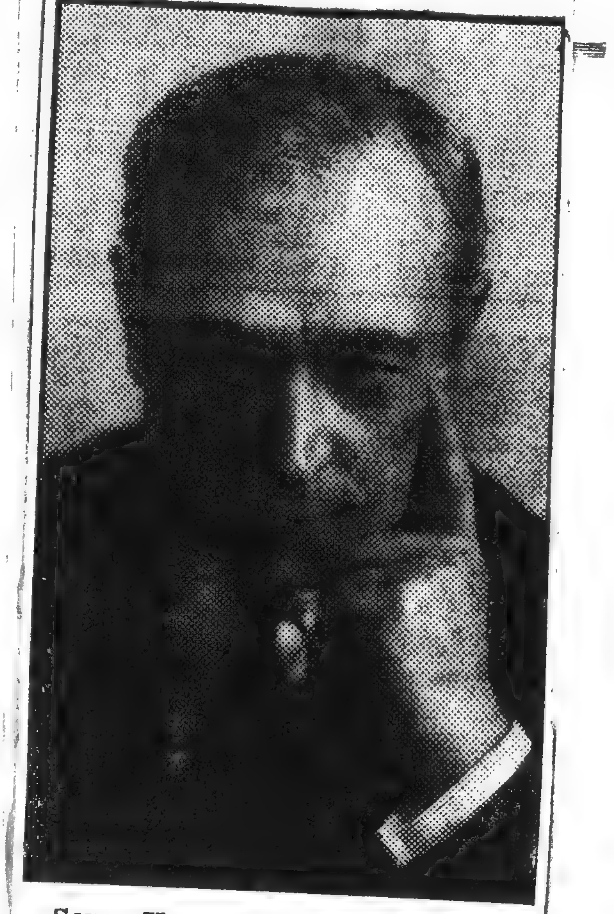
AND FROM NANCY'S VERY GOOD FRIEND, Edgar S. Van Olinda . . . secretary of the Albany Civic Music association . . . [illegible] word that . . . and I quote Mr. Van Olinda . . . "All of our concerts will be held in the auditorium of the Philip Livingston Junior High school, on Northern boulevard, in order to accommodate our large membership. Please take particular notice that the first concert of the Schenectady Civic Music association, the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held in the RKO Plaza theatre on State street, just below Nott Terrace and facing the park. All others will be held at the Mont Pleasant High school. You may be interested to know that pocket scores are available at the Van Curler Music Co., 90 North Pearl street, for the symphonies and other orchestral numbers to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Schenectady and Cleveland Symphony orchestra in Albany." . . . and, continuing, the gentleman tells me that the concert dates and the artists are as follows: Tuesday evening, November 28, Attilio Baggiore, tenor; Wednesday evening, January 17, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Thursday evening, March 22, Cleveland Symphony orchestra . . . the Schenectady attractions will be: Saturday evening, October 28, Boston Symphony orchestra; Wednesday evening, December 6, Don Cossack choir; Monday evening, March 19, Jose Iturbi, pianist.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

2 2 1933

Conductor



Serge Koussevitsky, brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will give a concert in Elmwood Music Hall this afternoon at 4 o'clock.

MUSIC

By MARY B. SWAN

Today's Concert

Instead of the Beethoven Overture to Leonore, first announced, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the Boston symphony's concert in the Elmwood Music Hall this afternoon at 4 o'clock, with Mozart's delicious Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, a serenade for string orchestra, which occupies a position midway between Mozart's chamber music proper and his compositions for full orchestra. It is an entrancing work, in which Mozart demonstrates anew his genius for saying much in little. The serenade was written in the eighteenth century, when almost every prince or rich nobleman had his own orchestra and when there was much music in the streets at night. The composition is hauntingly lovely and enriched with the spirit and romance of the time.

The program in its entirety reads:

Mozart ....Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, Serenade for String (Orchestra (Koechel No. 525)
I—Allegro
II—Romanza
III—Menuetto: Allegretto
IV—Rondo: Allegro
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
Clouds Festivals
Wagner ....The Ride of the Valkyries from Die Walkure.
Tchaikowsky....Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64.
I—Andante; Allegro con anima.
II—Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III—Valse (Allegro moderato).
IV—Finale (Andante maesoso, allegro vivace)

The box office at the Elmwood Music Hall will be open from 10 o'clock this morning. The concert is under the local management of Marian de Forest, with the co-operation of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, of which she is secretary-manager.

* * *

NEW YORK SUN

OCT 21 1933

A series of fifteen Sunday afternoon recitals on "The Enjoyment of Music," with commentary by Olin Downes, to begin November 26, has been announced by the Department of Education of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The artists to be presented in this series include Richard Crooks, Jascha Heifetz, Lawrence Tibbett, Lily Pons, Josef Hoffmann, New English Singers, Hall Johnson Choir, Margaret Matzenauer, Berrere Little Symphony, Myra Hess, Renaissance Quintet and Jessica Dragonette, Albert Spalding and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Sophie Breslau and the Kroll Sextet and the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Serge Koussevitsky conducting.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK SUN

OCT 21 1933

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzki, will begin at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 16 and 18.

NEW YORK TIMES

SEP 20 1933

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO DO NATIVE MUSIC

Koussevitzky Returns With Plans to Perform Works by Four Americans.

SEASON WILL OPEN OCT. 5

Berezowsky, Copland, Harris and Whithorne Novelties to Be Presented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play "what is important and interesting of the music composed last year" during the coming season, Serge Koussevitzky said yesterday on his arrival from abroad on the Ile de France. Mr. Koussevitzky, who will begin his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Oct. 5, plans his customary long list of new works by contemporary composers of many nations.

Four Americans figured in Mr. Koussevitsky's 1933-34 programs. They are Nicolai Berezowsky, whose Third Symphony will be played; Aaron Copland, Roy Harris and Emerson Whithorne. The English composers represented will be Vaughan Williams, William Walton and Arnold Bax, whose Third Symphony will be performed in this country for the first time.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who did not divulge the names of the compositions to be played, revealed that the following composers also would be represented by new works: Arnold Schönberg, Zoltan Kodály, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Lourié, Igor Markevitch, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Filip Lazar.

Mr. Koussevitzky added that he intended to invite Schönberg, who coming to this country next month to teach harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston, to conduct the Boston Symphony in a pair of concerts in the composer's own works. The conductor said also that he plans to repeat Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" this season and possibly William Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast." He also will direct the third act of Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" in concert form.

The Boston Symphony's opening program in Symphony Hall will be: Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, Brahms's Third Symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Scriabin's "Poème d'Exstase."

Mr. Koussevitzy conducted only one concert abroad, and that in London. He praised the work of the English composers. Most of his time abroad was spent at Aix-le-Bains. He spent last night in New York and will leave for Boston this afternoon. He arrived yesterday, accompanied by his wife and niece.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Music

by Larry Lipskin

Annunciata Garrotto will sing her first Marguerite in tonight's "Faust" at the Hippodrome, with Lawrence Power in the title role, and the other participants being Guido Guidi, Carl Formes, Luigi Molle, Marie Powers and Alice Haeseler. Eugene Plotnikoff will conduct...The week will just about be given over to Puccini, by the way, with two performances each of "Tosca," "Madame Butterfly" and "La Boheme" scheduled. Madeleine Keltie, who will sing Tosca tomorrow night, made her radio debut Friday evening over WMCA with Beniamino Riccio.

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, plays in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. The program: Strawinsk "Le Sacre du Printemps," Sibelius' Second Symphony and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Appearances in Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady are scheduled, beginning with tomorrow. The orchestra's New York season begins in Carnegie Hall Thursday and Saturday, November 16 and 18.

▼

The New York Opera Association presented "Traviata" over WOR last night, with Luella Melius, Edouard Grobe and Attilio Ruffo and Maurice Jacquet conducting... At the National Orchestral Association's first Carnegie Hall Concert, a week from tomorrow, Ray Lev, American pianist, will make her first appearance in this country.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

X

OCT 23 1933

NBC Imports Rare Talent

Three European Attractions to Make U. S. Debuts; Artists, etc., Listed

Three new European attractions will make their first American tours this season under the auspices of NBC Artists Service.

Nini Theilade, Danish dancer, who has been Max Reinhard't premiere danseuse in his last four big European productions, arrives in January for a six weeks' tour. Although Mlle. Theilade is only 18, she has been dancing publicly for four years. Her debut at The Hague in 1929 was sponsored by Anna Pavlowa, who predicted that the young dancer would become a public idol. The success of this appearance resulted in a long tour of Germany, Switzerland, Holland and Scandinavia, and the subsequent engagement with Max Reinhardt. Under his direction she appeared in Hoffman's "Erzahlungen," "Die Schone Helena," "Jedermann" and "Der Studentenprinz." On her mother's side Mlle. Theilade is a direct descendant of the ex-Sultan of Java. Her mother was a granddaughter of that Eastern potentate. Her father was a Danish planter.

European Success Due

Another dancing attraction which NBC Artists Service is booking for a long tour is the "Monte Carlo Ballet Russe," which has been a success in Europe the past two years. This is regarded as the greatest Russian ballet group since Diaghileff. During the hottest nights of the past Summer it played to crowded houses, both in Paris and London.

The Paris Instrumental Quintet, a unique ensemble, including harp, flute, violin, viola and violoncello, will also make its first American tour. The quintet recently celebrated its tenth anniversary in Paris. Since it was first introduced in that city in 1923, it has given more than three hundred concerts throughout Europe. Contemporary composers have been inspired to write new works especially for this group, among them Pierne, Ravel, Hindemith, D'Indy, Debussy, Jongen and Roussel.

In addition to these modern works the quintet plays many long-neglected masterpieces by Beethoven, Mozart, Schubert, Handel, Haydn and others. The five artists represented in the personnel have all achieved individual recognition. They are, Rene LeRoy, flute; Pierre Jamet, harp; Rene Bas, violin; Pierre Grout, viola; Roger Boulme, violoncello.

Arthur Schnabel Returning

Returning to this country after a long absence is Arthur Schnabel, Austrian pianist, who has been engaged to appear as solo pianist with six of the major symphony orchestras. Opening with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter Thursday, he will play the Beethoven concerto in G Minor. He appears with the Cincinnati Orchestra, under Eugene Goossens, October 27 and 28; with the Minneapolis Symphony, under Eugene Ormandy, November 2 and 3; with the St. Louis Symphony, under Vladimir Golschmann, November 17 and 19; with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, December 1 and 2; with the Chicago Symphony, under Frederick Stock, December 7, 8 and 12.

Schnabel's first recital appearance will be at Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening, November 8, when he will perform an all-Beethoven program consisting of five sonatas. His last tour of this country was made eight years ago. Three years ago he came here for a single appearance as guest artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Earlier this year he gave a series of seven Beethoven recitals at Queen's Hall in London.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 20 1933

Candlelight Supper Served After Boston Symphony

Town Club Members to Have Party in Clubhouse Following Sunday Night Concert

A candlelight supper will be served at Town club, Sunday evening, following the Boston Symphony concert. Mrs. Frank S. Fosdick is supper chairman.

Mrs. Granville M. Breinig was chairman of the club's first bridge luncheon yesterday in the Delaware avenue clubhouse. The luncheon tables were covered with ivory lace cloths and centered with yellow button chrysanthemums. About 100 women in attractive fall costumes played bridge until late in the afternoon.

Mrs. Breinig in Black Crepe

Mrs. Breinig wore a black crepe gown, the bodice of ciel blue satin with draped neckline and pleated cape sleeves. She wore a small toque of black felt. Mrs. D. J. Van Marle, co-chairman, wore wine velvet with crystal jewelry and small hat of black velvet. Mrs. David L. Johnston, president of the club, wore black velvet with bodice and sleeves of black lace, and long sash ends of black satin. Her close fitting hat was black velvet.

Mrs. Frank H. Messenger, honorary president, was gowned in powder blue crepe with brimmed hat of dark blue velvet having a small plume at the back. Mrs. Charles J. Sippi wore Spanish red crepe with applique coin dots of brown satin.

Hostesses for the day were: Mrs. Thomas C. Connolly, Mrs. Sippi, Mrs. Roger T. Thornton, Mrs. D. Ross Metzger, Mrs. Henry C. Gerber, Mrs. William H. Means, Mrs. Lida V. Tewkesbury, Mrs. Burton Bigelow and Mrs. Richard H. Templeton.

Among Those Present

Among the guests were: Mrs. Mark Hubbell, Mrs William Riehle, Mrs. F. F. Riehle, Mrs. James T. Ford, Mrs. Carl Grimm, Mrs. Clayton M. Brown, Mrs. William Rupp, Mrs. Merrill Campbell, Dr. Grace C. Learner, Mrs. D. F. Smith, Mrs. I. R. Templeton, Mrs. W. Morgan Kendall, Mrs. Adolph Rebadow, Mrs. A. Edward Allen, Mrs. Martin L. Kratz, Mrs. Henry W. Brendel, Mrs. Walter H. Lampman, Mrs. Bayless O'Bannon, Mrs. Frederick F. Fehr, Mrs. Dalton Meeks, Mrs. Harry Gaul, Mrs. S. H. Stilling, Mrs. John W. Henry.

Also, Mrs. George G. Schank, Mrs. George Brown, Mrs. James E. Hanrahan, Miss Martha Campbell, Miss Jane Bradley, Miss Mary Porter, Miss Virginia Metzger, Mrs. A. W. Howe, Mrs. Buell G. Tallman 2d, Mrs. Charles Durst, Miss Grace Ward, Mrs. R. E. Sage, Miss Jeanette Lynch.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 22 1933

By MARY M. HOWARD

INSTEAD of the Beethoven Leonore overture first announced, Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will open the Boston Symphony's concert in Elmwood Music Hall at 4 o'clock this afternoon, with Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, a serenade for string orchestra, which occupies a position midway between Mozart's chamber music and his works for full orchestra. This crystalline, charming composition for strings was written in 1787, at the height of Mozart's creative powers.

Horns Give Theme

The Debussy Nocturnes are dated 1897-1899. They are to be accepted as signifying diverse impressions and special lights. In the first, the composer outlines the various cloud forms of his imagination by a mysterious motive sung by clarinets and bassoons, with a later theme intoned by the English horn. The mood of Festivities is defined by its name, and its main theme is given out in triplets by the English horn and clarinet against a background of strings. Wagner and Tschaikowsky supply the remaining numbers of the program, which reads:

Mozart ...Eine Kleine Nachtmusik
Serenade for string orchestra
(Koechel No. 525)
I. Allegro
II. Romanza
III. Menuetto; Allegretto
IV. Rondo: Allegro
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
a. Clouds b. Festivals
Wagner .... The Ride of the Valkyries from Die Walkure
Tchaikowsky ......Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64
I. Andante; Allegro con anima
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse (Allegro moderato)
IV. Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace)

The box office at Elmwood Music Hall will be open from 10 o'clock this morning. The concert is under the local management of Marian de Forest, with the co-operation of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, of which she is secretary-manager.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 21 1933

Dr. Sergi Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has made one change in the program announced for the concert in Elmwood Music hall Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock, substituting for the Beethoven Overture to Leonore, Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, which occupies a position midway between Mozart's chamber music proper and his works for full orchestra.

The complete program is as follows:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for string orchestra (Koechel No. 525) .... Mozart
1. Allegro.
II. Romanza.
III. Menuetto; Allegretto.
IV. Rondo; Allegro.
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
a Clouds; b Festivals.
"The Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure" .... Wagner
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64. .... Tchaikovsky
1. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse (Allegro moderato.)
IV. Finale (Andante maestoso, allegro vivace).

This will be the opening concert in a week's mid-western tour. The Boston Symphony comes to Buffalo under the local management of Marian de Forest, with the co-operation of the Buffalo Musical foundation, of which she is secretary-manager.

* * *

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

OCT 22 1933

Brooklyn Institute Announces Course on 'Enjoyment of Music'

THE Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences has just announced a series of 15 Sunday afternoon recitals with explanatory comment by Olin Downes, music critic, to supplement the Monday evening series which has already opened. The subject under discussion will be the same as at the evening recitals, namely "The Enjoyment of Music," and the concerts will also take place at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education of the Institute, announced that the companion series had been arranged because of the "overwhelming demand that could not be accommodated for the evening course."

The list of artists, pre-eminent in the many different fields of music to be presented in the series, includes Richard Crooks, Jascha Heifetz, Lawrence Tibbett, Lily Pons, Josef Hofmann, the New English Singers, the Hall Johnson Choir, Margaret Matzenauer, the Barrere Little Symphony, Myra Hess, the Renaissance Quintet, Jessica Dragonette, Albert Spalding, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Sophie Braslau, the Kroll Sextet and the Boston Symphony Ensemble with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

"The programs," said Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education of the Institute, "planned by Mr. Downes with consideration of the special interests and interpretative tendencies of the collaborating artists, will be accompanied by his formal comment. These recitals will offer, in unusual variety, music representing aspects, familiar and novel, of the rich literature of music art."

A complete list of programs and dates follows:

Nov. 26, Richard Crooks, songs and arias from oratorio and opera.

Dec. 3, Hall Johnson Choir, Negro folk music: spirituals, work songs and "blues."

Dec. 10, Jascha Heifetz, classicism and virtuosity in violin music.

Dec. 17, Lawrence Tibbett, operatic song in the hands of European and American composers.

Jan. 14, the New English Singers, the golden age of English song.

Jan. 21, Lily Pons, coloratura song.

Jan. 28, Margaret Matzenauer, famous arias from Peri to Rossini.

Feb. 4, Barrere Little Symphony, inventions for small orchestra.

Feb. 11, Myra Hess, piano music of Chopin, Schumann and Brahms.

Feb. 18, Renaissance Quintet and Jessica Dragonette, old music on ancient instruments and songs of the olden time.

Feb. 25, Albert Spalding and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, sonatas for piano and violin.

March 11, Sophie Braslau and the Kroll Sextet, songs by Russian composers and music for six stringed instruments.

March 25, Josef Hofmann, masterpieces of piano music.

April 8, Serge Koussevitzky and 24 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, music by contemporaneous composers for small orchestra.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 21 1933

Symphony to Give Concert In RKO-Plaza

Expect Huge Audience of Music Lovers to Hear Boston Orchestra Next Week

The RKO-Plaza Theater has been selected by the Civic Music Association for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give next Saturday night. The decision to hold the concert in the theater rather than in Mont Pleasant High School as originally announced was reached by the association's executive board and directorate in view of the extremely large increase in membership this year and the large group from the Albany association which is expected to attend.

The concerts to be given by the Don Cossacks December 6 and Jose Iturbi March 19 will be given as planned in Mont Pleasant High School, for which events special arrangements have been made with the Schenectady Railway Company for an increase in bus service from State street at Brandywine avenue to and from the school.

Officials have announced that a number of schools outside of the city have requested large blocks of guest cards for the Boston Orchestra concert. Members who desire cards for out-of-town guests may procure them from the financial secretary, Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, 1174 Parkwood boulevard, until Wednesday; no provisions will be made for issuing them on the night of the concert. The association has a waiting list to which memberships will be issued in case of any withdrawals by present members. Otherwise only those who joined during the fall membership campaign will be able to attend concerts; membership cards have been mailed to these.

The Albany Civic Music Association, faced with the same seating difficulty as the Schenectady body, has written the local directorate that it will open its doors to Schenectady members at 8:10 p. m., for its concerts and will accommodate them to the capacity of the hall in the Philip Livingston High School. Several hundred Schenectady members will be able to attend Albany concerts, which will be given by Attilio Baggiore, tenor, November 28; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, January 17 and the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra under Arthur Redzinski, March 22.

Long Island City, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

3

OCT 11 1933

350 Old Programs Recall Concerts And Shows Of Yesteryear

Dr. Joseph J. Reilly, 35-49 Seventy-sixth street, Jackson Heights, college librarian and professor of English, announces the receipt by the Hunter College Library of a collection of more than 350 old theater and music programs. The collection is a gift of Dr. Margaret Barclay Wilson, former head of the department of physiology and hygiene.

The prize of the collection is a program dated March 16, 1885, announcing the farewell engagement of Henry Irving and Ellen Terry as Benedick and Beatrice in "Much Ado About Nothing." Also featured in this collection are Sarah Bernhardt's last visit to America in three plays, "Hecuba," "The False Model" and "From the Theater to the Field of Honor," and the farewell appearance of Forbes-Robertson.

That all-star attractions are not new is shown by the combinations advertised at the beginning of the century. In 1905 single stage casts included such names as Lowell Sherman, Frank Keenan and Ford Sterling, Dudley Diggs, Louise Closser Hale and Chrystal Herne; and William Gileltte, Blanche Bates, Marie Doro and Gustav von Seyffertitz.

"Tillie's Punctured Romance," which is billed as "the first filmization of comedy on a wholesale basis," stars Charlie Chaplin, Marie Dresaler and Mabel Normand.

Names since famous on both screen and stage appear on the yellowing pages—Beryl Mercer, Lionel Atwill, Parnell Pratt, Montagu Love and Julia Sanderson. Eva Le Gallienne is listed in the cast of "Mrs. Boltay's Daughter," in which Rita Jolivet appeared at the old Comedy Theater, and Alice Brady in the Gilbert & Sullivan operettas which De Wolf Hopper made popular twenty years ago.

Among the music programs of the collection is one of a presentation of a concert by the Boston Symphony Society at which Mme. Melba was soloist. Another feature of the collection is the program of a recital given by Josef Hofman in 1898. Early programs of the Philharmonic Symphony, the Musical Art Society, the Oratorio Society, the Russian Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are included.

The World's Columbian Exposition of 1893 is represented by programs of five Wagner concerts given by the Festival Hall, with Thomas Holmes conducting.

Plays and Players --- Music and

The Fete-Day Of Stravinsky And Sibelius

Prelude from Ravel-Couperin, "The Rite of Spring" at Present Climax

AGAIN, at the Symphony Concert of Friday, Dr. Koussevitzky was fortunate in program-making. Some prefer four numbers to the three that now filled the list. Four—they argue—usually imply two of shorter length, at least one of less exacting substance; so better serve the hearer's receptive and retaining faculties. Of the three in question only one was a symphony, desirably, as some also assert. True, programs containing two symphonies are rather a conductors' fashion nowadays. Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Walter cultivate them in New York; while to them in Boston Dr. Koussevitzky is no stranger. The usual objection seems reasonable. However diverse in contents and style the two symphonies may be, both follow more or less faithfully the symphonic course. For the listening ear and mind, starts, halts and goal remain the same, be the tonal prospects along the way never so various.

Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," Sibelius's Second Symphony—the three items of Friday—knew no such limitation. The first was timely revival. In thirteen years, only twice has it proved its clear deserts at these concerts; while on each occasion the orchestra excelled and the audiences applauded. Ravel's title implies both homage and imitation. They are unusually apt to this autumn of 1933. For two hundred years ago last September, the François Couperin, whom he would recall and honor, died at Paris in full note as composer. Elsewhere on these pages an article translated from Monsieur Edmond Jaloux and a plate from the Music Room at the Public Library modestly serve the same end.

The performance of Stravinsky's "Sacre" brought to climax the series began at Symphony Hall under Mr. Monteux in 1924, continued at irregular intervals by Dr. Koussevitzky. . . . If a symphony of Sibelius was desirable only six months after the end of a full cycle of them, the Second most holds the usual audiences. Connoisseurs may prefer the Fifth or still more the Seventh; but with the public the Second is to the other six of Sibelius as the First is to the other three of Brahms. . . . Finally, all three numbers were the music of composers now living and working. With them, more than with ancients or classics, many instinctively associate the Boston Orchestra and its conductor.

Originally Ravel wrote his four "Couperin-pieces" for piano, since he would do homage to a master of the harpsichord Subsequently he scored them for small orchestra; with his usual deftness left hardly a trace of origin behind. To a Prelude succeeds a sprightly Forlana; before the final Rigadoon stands a Minuet. A slight dryness, that has increased through Ravel's later years, may haunt all four. Otherwise felicitous invention, adroit craftsmanship, unerring and unfailing sense of style distinguish them. The germ of each piece sounds freshly, has character, invites development and decoration. Both flow easily and in measure from a quickened mind, a light, sure hand.

Here and there the Suite diffuses the old lavender of the ancient style. Oftener, as at the end of each division, a twentieth-century and Ravel-like piquancy seasons it. Graceful motion tempers the formal course of the Prelude. We listeners must have aristocratic ears. The Forlana cultivates a polished, elegant sprightliness. The Minuet is stately, but without tonal pomp. The dancers move intimately, as in their own salon. A hint of melancholy now and then shades the Rigadoon; for the instant the sun has gone into a broken cloud. Over the whole skilfully simple harmonic and instrumental devices make pattern and texture like brocaded silk. Throughout, this ancient-modern charm is irresistible. Light the rhythm but firm the structure.

Debussy in his last broken years liked to call himself "musicien Français." Often, as in these "Couperin-pieces," the unpretentious Ravel better deserves the title. Even the dry tang has Gallic flavor. The unlabored clearness, the unobtruded musical logic of each movement, the nice jointure of matter and manner, are unmistakable French traits. So also are the grace, the charm, the elegance, all ease and readiness to the moment. The occasional touch of passing melancholy sets the seal.

But the Suite is also homage to Couperin—garland such as he himself might have woven, hung now on his tomb. Imagine the scene engraved in eighteenth-century fashion—the medallion of Couperin set into the pseudo-classic sepulcher; before it Ravel, mantled, bowed, but still courtly, depositing the sheets of his "homage"; chubby infants with trumpets of fame above; furbelows of musical instruments below; "Respectfully Dedicated," so forth and onward. But for the moment turn to the article by Monsieur Jaloux, which is short and never dull; there discover that in many a quality Couperin and Ravel are at one; that in nearly all they are French of the truest stock and spirit.

Some affirm that no "reading" hereabouts of "The Rite of Spring" has excelled Mr. Monteux's in the final months of his Bostonian term. He had, they say, an intuitive flair for such a music. Experience with it in theater and concert-hall had ripened him. Hence full insight and projection. Modestly, but genuinely, he believed he had a mission to discharge with "The Rite." The Gentiles of America, so to say, should hear and believe the new Stravinskian gospel as in 1924 it was. Others do not remember too clearly Mr. Monteux's version and may not judge.

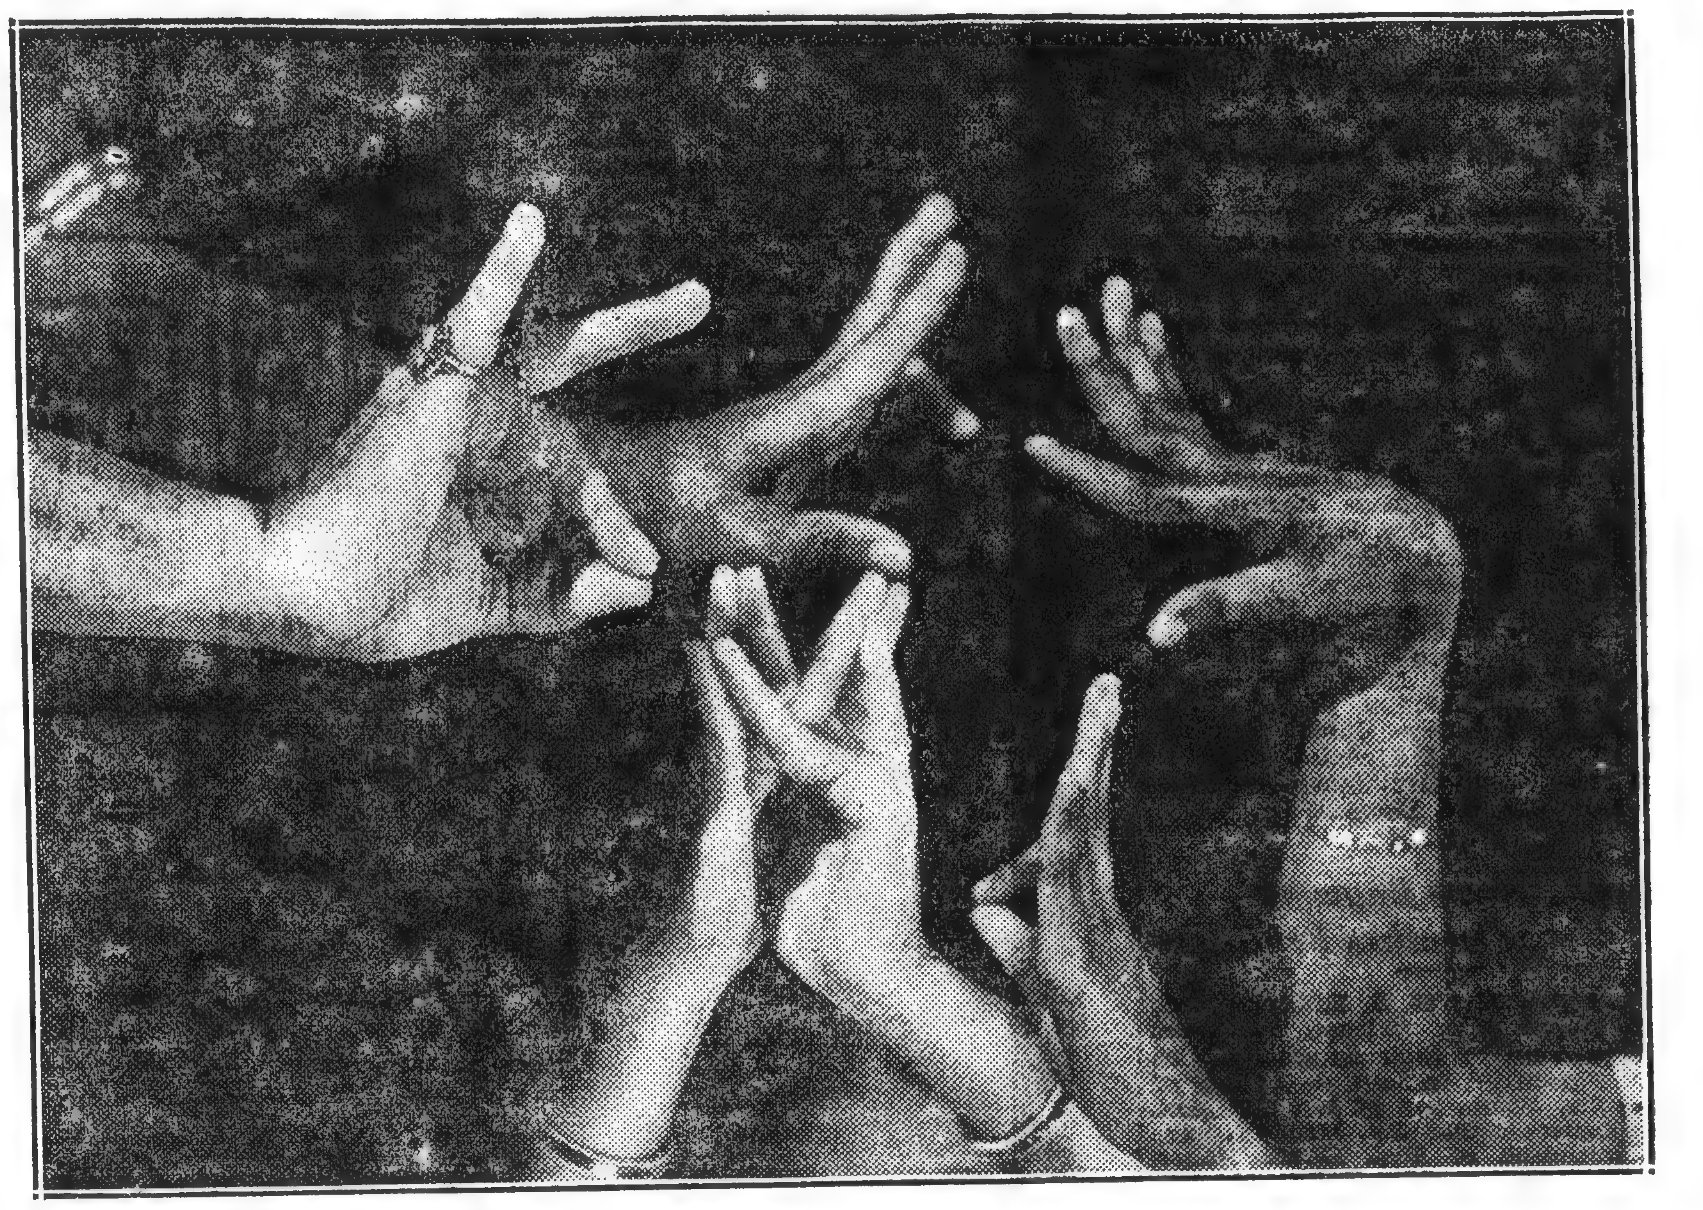
They pin faith to Dr. Koussevitzky's progress with the piece into the climactic performance they now heard. To the orchestra's advance as well. By this time it can sound, full and free, every note that Stravinsky set on his heavy laden staves. No curt or re-iterated shifts of rhythm balk it. No abrupt or involved transition stays it. The quality of its speech, the doing at every moment of the interwoven composer's and conductor's will, are now its task. With both on Friday the orchestra excelled itself.

The conductor, in turn, has gained a like familiarity and certainty with Stravinsky's exacting score. He now penetrates it more deeply and variously; imparts it with ultimate clarity, adjustment, perception and revelation. For him also there are no faltering or semi-obscured moments. If Mr. Monteux was alight with apostolic zeal, Dr. Koussevitzky burns with fervor of faith and energy of conviction. His intensities with "The Rite" are manifold and inexhaustible. Often, as it seems, while he conducts it, it also conducts him. Yet nowhere, so well is he now poised, do these ardors fall short or exceed.

Not few on Friday heard more of "Le Sacre" than they had ever heard before; heard the whole in clearer progress and inter-relation; heard it more closely articulated, more finely shaded, more overwhelmingly proclaimed. There were moments of passing disagreement as when in Part Two, Dr. Koussevitzky hushed to an orchestral whisper the "Mysterious Circles of the Adolescents." Moments, no less, in which the conductor crowned expectation with surprising achievement, as in the cataleptic posturings and poundings of the Chosen Virgin nearing her sacrifice. With or without a

Continued on Following Page

Woven Symbols



(Iffland)

Tracery of the Hands

In the Dances of Shan-Kar and His Hindu Troupe, Returning to the Hollis on Friday and Saturday of Next Week

The Musician Who Preferred A Simple Way

Out of the Eighteenth Into The Twentieth Century Comes Couperin

WE are celebrating this year—[and at the Symphony Concerts this week]—the bicentenary of François Couperin, called Couperin the Great. He was one of the composers who have most honored French music and one of three or four artists who have best proclaimed the unique and particular contribution which the French race has to make in the realm of sound.

Now one may be a man of the first rank and yet have no special message to divulge, even though one fill the little world about oneself with a tumult which is the tumult of one's own heart rather than an echo of a thousand mute and inexpressive souls. This was, for instance, the case of Berlioz, whose passionately romantic feeling took form in a tempestous lyricism, characterized by fantastic caprices and wittingly grotesque emotions. But though we may be perplexed by qualities which we recognize as typically national when we listen to such music, do we really feel that we are listening to a voice that speaks for France herself? This is precisely the feeling which we get in listening to the music of Couperin.

These Couperins were a great family of musicians. The first of them, Louis, François, and Charles, were born between 1626 and 1638 at Chaumes in Brie. They were descended of a long line of "practitioners"—that is to say, minor followers of the law, clerks of process. These three musicians owed their fortune to an "aubade," which they went, one day, to give to Chambonnière, the celebrated performer on the clavecin, whose family home was not far from Chaumes. The "Parnasse français" gives the story of this first interview which was to decide the fate of the three Couperins:

"These three brothers, Titon de Tillet tells us, together with their friends, also violinists, made up a party to go to M. de Chambonnière's château on his birthday to give him an 'aubade'! They took their places on arrival, at the door of the hall where Chambonniere was at table with a few select companions, men of parts, with a taste for music. The master of the house and all the company were agreeably surprised by the jolly symphony of sounds. Chambonnière requested the executants to come into the hall and asked them first who was the composer of the airs they had just played. One of them replied that the author was Louis Couperin, and presented him. Chambonnière at once complimented Louis Couperin and insisted on seating him and all his companions at table. He said that a man such as Louis was not made to stay in the country, and that he must come with Chambonnière to Paris—an offer which Louis Couperin accepted with pleasure. Chambonnière presented him at Paris and at the court where he made a good impression. A short time afterward he was made organist of St. Gervais at Paris and one of the organists in the Royal Chapel."

to be, nor as popular. It is true that it is only a few years since he was recovered from oblivion and we learned that with the Couperins, the Daquins, the Dandrieu family, and the Argincourts—I do not cite Rameau who, thanks perhaps to Diderot, is less neglected—French art can boast an admirable school of original composers. Is it generally known that the immense Bach himself was in relations with Couperin? He not only admired the Frenchman. He not only came under his influence. He had been in actual correspondence with him—a correspondence in which John Sebastian had admitted that he had borrowed here and there from our organist. We have word of Zelter for this; Zelter, the master of Mendelssohn. Moreover, M. André Pirrot tells us: "The works of François Couperin, which he appreciated and recommended to his pupils, also served Bach himself. Ernst Ludwig Gerber affirms that Bach employed in his playing most of the 'styles' of which Couperin was exponent."

These letters are lost. We know only that the Couperin family used them for practical purposes: to seal jars of preserves. Let us not grow indignant over this detail. Let us look on it rather as a charming example of the simple manners of those days, when folks were so little the artists, in the pretentious meaning that we give the word today, but rather plain and conscientious craftsmen. No one would have thought it more natural than the great Bach himself to have had his correspondence serve the household uses of the Couperins!

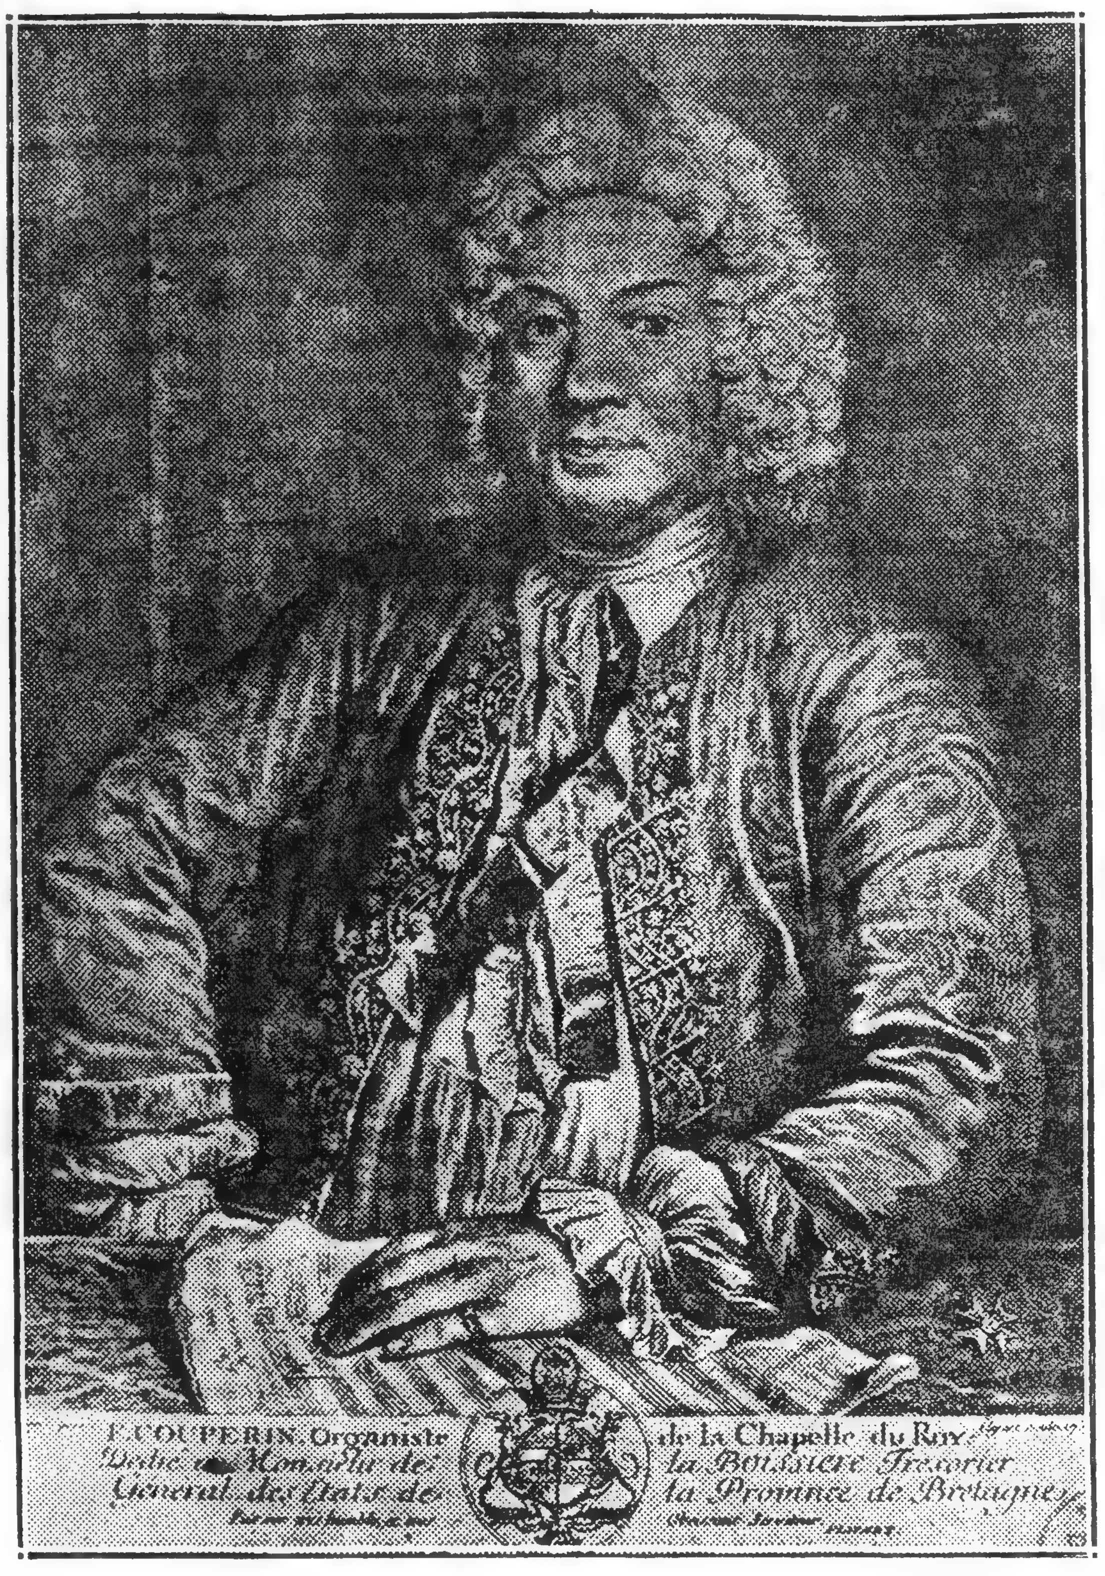
François Couperin was born at Paris the 10th of November, 1668, in the rue du Monceau-St. Gervais; and he died in this city Sept. 12, 1733, in a house in the rue Neuve-des-Bons-Enfants. He led a single-minded life of which we know only the exterior circumstances, the successes and the disappointments of his musical career. He seems to have had a delicate constitution. He married, in 1689, Marie Anne Anseault, who bore him three children, Marie Madeleine, Marguerite Antoinette, and Nicholas Louis, whom we have already seen following his father at the organ in St. Gervais. In the preface which he set at the head of his Fourth Book of clavecin pieces, his last work, which appeared in 1730, Couperin wrote:

> I am grateful to the public for the applause it has been pleased to bestow upon me; and I believe I have merited at least a part of this applause by the zeal with which I have tried to please it. As hardly anyone has composed more than I in a number of genres, I hope that my family may find in my portfolios something to cause them regret for my passing, if, indeed, regret shall be of any avail after life. But we must at least hold to this idea in order to try to merit a chimerical immortality to which almost every man aspires.

I have italicized two phrases. They reveal to us sufficiently clearly the natural melancholy behind the thought of Couperin the Great. But did we need this testimony? Can we not clearly read in such clavecin pieces as "les Barricades mysterieuses," "les Ombres errantes," "les Pavots," "l'Epineuse," or "Le Carillon de Cythère," the bruised sensibilities, the secret sadness of François Couperin's nature? In reading these modest and disillusioned lines we find simply the confirmation of the sentiments which we divine in his pure and adorable music—a music which truly reveals the inner life of a delicate spirit, which had to pour itself out in revelation lest it be itself surfeited in melancholy.

21

The Silken Side



F. COUPERIN, Organiste de la Chapelle du Roy la Boissiere Tresorier
General des Etats de la Province de Bretagne

Francois Couperin (Colby)

Music-Maker to Louis XIV, the Two Hundredth Anniversary of Whose Death the Symphony Orchestra Is Marking Today

From the Brown Collection in the Public Library

These first three Couperins succeeded each other in turn at St. Gervais. They were followed by François, surnamed the Great, the son of Charles. This François remained until 1733, the year of his death. Then came Nicholas, son of the first François (1733-1748), Armand Louis, son of Nicholas (1748-1789), Pierre Louis, son of Armand Louis, in the course of 1789, and finally Gervais François, younger son of Armand Louis, until 1826. This record constitutes, obviously, a fine family tradition. Let us add that besides these celebrated organists there were also to be found among the Couperins five daughters and a son who disclosed a special aptitude for music, sang, played divers instruments, or composed. One of the women, Marie Anne Couperin, entered holy orders and became the organist of the convent in which she ended her days.

It is rather strange that the musical bent should thus maintain itself in a family longer than the literary or the pictorial. Here is material for psychological research. But we know little enough about the talents which come to us through some mysterious coincidence of the faculties of intelligence, imagination and feeling. In any case, the example of the Couperins or of the Bach family, proves to us that there is in the power of musical expression something more instinctive, more elemental, less deliberately considered (in origin, I mean) than in other forms of artistic expression.

It is not necessary here to analyze the contribution to music of Couperin the Great, nor to trace the essential characteristics of that admirable figure. But perhaps we may seize on his bicentenary as pretext for enlarging the reputation of one of the purest geniuses in France. M. Charles Bouvet, M. André Pirrot, and M. Henri Quittard have written about him. We may still hear his works played in occasional concerts And Mme. Wanda Landowska, among other virtuosos, often plays his pieces with the suave vigor and the subtle comprehension of the clavecin which make her an incomparable interpreter. In spite of this, Couperin is not as familiar, even among musicians, as he ought

If a stranger were to ask of me in what the French spirit consisted—not as it is generally represented to be, but as it is in its most secret, innermost, truest, most significant nature—and were to question where I found that spirit best expressed, I think that I should name Marivaux; Watteau and Corot;

Continued on Following Page

The Musician Who Preferred A Simple Way

Continued from Preceding Page

Couperin. Perhaps I should add Joubert and Chardin, and, in poetry, Villon and Verlaine. The great organs of our literature, the Corneilles, the Bossuets, the Chateaubriands and Victor Hugos, are more likely to bewilder opinion than to reveal the intimate side of the French genius, whose deepest springs rise in the domain of discretion and of emotion in reserve. Of course, I am not attempting here to set up a new table of values, but only among these values to seek out those most representative of a state of mind to be met with nowhere else in the world, and which one does not find most in evidence when one speaks of us. It is not a state of mind, in brief, most flattering to our vanities; and modesty does not draw all votes.

But listen to one of those pieces of Couperin's we have noted above, or to "les Folies francaises," "la Convalescente," or "la Ténébreuse." Soak up those long-drawn phrases, now tender, now perfidiously languid. Catch these turns of wit. Hear fall these cadences which ceaselessly return upon themselves. Note these appogiaturas which lent to a theme such grace and fancy; these capricious resolutions which resolve nothing, but which, from their facile knots of melody let drop again new garlands of crystal tones; this airy turnabout of musical styles at the same time galante and reserved, and always suavely melancholy. Study, indeed, this whole fabric of sounds, full of a gaiety that provokes to pity and of a nostalgia instinct with happiness; and you cannot but gain the idea that you are hearing the expression of something unique in the world, something which could have come to fruition only under one certain sky, all bright with drifting clouds and charged with pearl drops.

EDMOND JALOUX

(Translated by D. W. B. from an article in Le Temps)

After the Rowing,

The Fete-Day Of Stravinsky And Sibelius

Continued from Preceding Page

stage, the whole "Sacre" for once sounded inevitable and unescapable.

And to what outcome? First, "The Rite" is an end and not a beginning. It remains the monstrous climax that Stravinsky heaped upon "The Fire Bird" and "Petrushka" to close his young prime. There has been no succeeding, no companion, piece. Probably there could not be, if he would. Prudently he turned to other courses that need not now be debated. . . . Second, "Le Sacre" remains intrinsically graphic, even delineative, music, the more for its intensive heats. Behind is always the program of the subtitles, the sense of a pagan, savage, awed and primitive world. Russian by the composer's written word and tonal implication; any other, so long as it remains fierce, dark and primeval, that the hearer's imagination chooses. Stravinsky merely postured—all his life he has renewed the trick—when he affirmed that he had written a music self-contained and absolute.

Third, to the impact and power of "Le Sacre" from the first acknowledged, add the gradual discovery of the beauty interlacing it. The time is come when the foretelling folk-song, the "Spring Rounds," the "Mysterious Circles" seep into the hearer, elude him with a gentler magic. . . . Fourth, "The Rite" persists as music of piercing or overpowering sensation. The listener does not answer with thought or feeling. First, last and nearly all the time, he is as one possessed. He neither hates nor loves. He is only flooded and swept onward. . . . Fifth and finally as to the ultimate fate of "Le Sacre." Who knows, who cares? Sufficient unto the day are the sensations thereof. In 1913 Stravinsky's music was first heard. In 1933, another and different generation is also holden—the men more than the women. Deduce what you will.

On the Second Symphony of Sibelius it is needless to dwell. Last season the cycle of his symphonies passed in a spate of words. Now many prefer to listen and thereafter dry pens and mute tongues. Once more the audience heard rapt and glowing. Once more Dr. Koussevitzky was as immersed, understanding and proclaiming as he had been with "The Rite"; the orchestra all accomplishment wherever composer and conductor ranged. Again the music sounded full-bodied and warm-hearted. The stark and brooding Sibelius of some of the later symphonies was not even in the middle distance. In the days when we Bostonians were discovering this Second, it was custom to say that it derived from Finnish sights and sounds. By the same token, in it Sibelius takes leave of such a "nature music." Henceforth he was to look within as well as around. H. T. P.

MADISON, WIS.
STATE JOURNAL

Franks to be Chicago Guests; Other News

PRESIDENT GLENN FRANK and Mrs. Frank, 130 N. Prospect ave., will be in Chicago Monday for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert and the entertainments which Mr. and Mrs. John Alden Carpenter are having in connection with this event.

The Franks will be among the guests at a small dinner which the Carpenters are having at their home on Lake Shore drive before the concert, and they will also be present at the larger supper and reception which the Carpenters are having afterwards for Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra conductor, and his wife.

MR. AND MRS. FRANK will have two Chicago guests for the coming homecoming weekend, Mrs. Francis Johnson and also Frank McNair.

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE
NRY NEW YORK
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM

TURDAY, OCTOBER 21

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For all its 20 years of age, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" apparently is still confined to that class of music more or less reprehensibly termed, according to the point of view, "debatable." Several persons left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon before the first part of the incomparable Igor's rousing celebration of Springtime rites in pagan, prehistoric Russia had been completed. One would like to have heard the first performance of this music, as the outraged Parisians heard it—as best they could above cat-calls and hissing—in 1913, when the score is recorded to have made murderous assault upon their ears. What an experience it would have been!

Today, a score of years later, parts of this work, notably the introductions to the two sections, have become less startling, even tame in the light of what has been composed since then. Yet the music, on the whole, has not been so mellowed by time as to persuade the many to greet it with smiles that are not a little wry. It likewise remains a landmark in modern music, substantially the end of one period and the beginning of another whose ultimate end is not yet in sight. The sheer, overwhelming force of "The Rite of Spring," its power of graphic delineation of incident (in spite of the fact that the composer regarded it as strictly "abstract" music) are still enthralling. And the extraordinary orchestral technic used by Stravinsky has not ceased to influence composers who have followed.

The remaining two numbers on a balanced and varied program were Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Like most of the music which this clever French contemporary has composed, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" displays exceptional distinction of technical ability. Ravel sought literally to raise a musical monument to the genius of Francois Couperin, who flourished in France between 1668 and 1733, and whose crisp, gay and fleeting music is widely admired even today. Ravel has here been able to write in his own modern harmonic and melodic idiom, yet in the forms of Couperin's time and in deliberate imitation of Couperin's style. The result is a paradoxical—and agreeable—blending of archaicism and modernity. But this work suffers from the esthetic anemia, which has touched so much of Ravel's music; there is no depth and no emotional substance, only external glitter.

One of the most gratifying aspects of Dr Koussevitzky's taste is his frequent performance of the music of Sibelius, that genius of Finland who can be compared to no other composer, either of the past or present. Last season we had the pleasure of hearing all of his seven symphonies, together with the tone poem "Tapiola." One would welcome repetition of the symphonies and "Tapiola" this year, and inclusion of the violin concerto and the tone poem "En Saga."

Miles remarks in Lucien Price's superb "Winged Sandals," when contemplating the Parthenon, that he fails to understand how anyone can regard that ancient Grecian temple without a feeling of worship, and that "your feeling is not to worship by bowing down, but by standing erect and looking up." The music of Sibelius prompts a similar urge to stand erect and look up. This Finnish master commands a wholly individual manner of expressing himself. Yet what he says has well-nigh cosmic breadth. In all music only a few composers have been granted the power of such utterance. Few will dispute the symphonic genius of Brahms and the exquisite beauty of his music. Yet, Brahms' symphonies, save for the colossal first movement of that in C minor, do seem more intimate, more restricted in scope of feeling, when compared to the symphonies of Sibelius. It has been remarked that Sibelius was thinking about the Finnish land and people when he conceived this D major symphony, a work not altogether representative of him in maturity and one frequently reminiscent of Tchaikovsky. He got his feet off the ground, however, and in the last movement figuratively soared to immeasurable heights.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. At the concerts of Nov 3 and 4 Honegger's "Mouvement Symphonique No. 3, new to America; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and a Mozart piano concerto in E-flat will be played. Egon Petri, a distinguished Dutch pianist, will be soloist.

C. W. D.

ATHENS, OHIO
MESSENGER

OCT 29 1933

HEAR SYMPHONY

LOGAN, Oct. 28.—Mrs. Nelle Allen Adams, Mrs. Fred Carpenter, Mrs. M. F. Weymueller, Mrs. George Carr, Mrs. F. E. Weinrich and Miss Annabelle Weymueller of this city were in Columbus Thursday night for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Post

DAY, OCTOBER 21,

SIBELIUS DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Climax of His Second Leaves Audience Impressed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If the Symphony concert of a week ago, with its two classical symphonies, was a somewhat sedate affair, that of yesterday afternoon, which offered both Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, fairly seethed with excitements.

ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

Next week the orchestra goes on a tour that takes it to seven cities between here and Chicago, and presumably Dr. Koussevitzky will display to one or more of them these pieces of yesterday afternoon. When he does, his audiences are certain to be astounded. Some of us hereabouts are becoming accustomed to these signs and wonders, but the fact remains that, for technical reasons, orchestral performances of such transcendent excellence and eloquence have not long been possible and even today are not to be found in many parts of the earth.

Before the numbers mentioned there came yesterday, in oblique tribute to the great French writer of pieces for the clavecin who died 200 year's ago last month, Ravel's own transcription of his pianoforte suite, "The Tomb of Couperin." The music, not unfamiliar here, in either version, is dexterous and charming, occasionaly spiced, as in the Forlane, with recondite harmonies. The performance yesterday matched the music.

Stravinsky's "Sacre"

To hear Stravinsky's "Sacre" for the second time within a year was to be reminded that there is dross mixed with its gold. Stravinsky cannot everywhere sustain the level he reaches in the extraordinary opening pages of this ballet of pagan Russia.

There is some sound and fury that seems of little significance, at least when the music is divorced from the stage. There are wearisome repetitions and the Dance of Sacrifice, that should be climax to the whole, fails to produce a truly cumulative effect.

Climax of Sibelius' Second

No doubt the radical Stravinsky would have scorned the methods and means by which Sibelius rears the final climax in this D major Symphony. But whereas the Finn leaves the listener limp and shattered, the end of the Russian's piece finds him wondering a little what the tonal fuss was all about.

Each of Sibelius' seven symphonies, even the elusive Sixth, has its special merit and appeal, but for the present the Second—the symphony, if we are to believe the composer's friend Georg Schneevoigt, of a Finland that visioned deliverance from Russian oppression—is the one that strikes hardest and sinks deepest. There is little else in music that can rival, in its own field, the Symphony's final progress from darkness into blinding light.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 22 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernist stripe: A new suite by Aaron Copland and a symphony by Emerson Whithorne.

Although Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, several new American works are to be done by the New York Philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange. They include "1929—A Satire," by David Stanley Smith, of New Haven; a symphony (No. 2) by Randall Thompson; a suite by Walter Piston, of Boston; Whithorne's "Fandango," and two poems, "Winter" and "Spring."

Hans Kindler expects to present Lamar Springfield's "Legend of John Henry" and a set of variations on a Hassler chorale by Templeton Strong.

Herald Oct 21

MUSIC

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the Second Symphony by Sibelius make up this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. None of these works is new to the Boston public and the program gave notable variety as well as distinct satisfaction to those who hope for a more intimate acquaintance with the creations of these composers.

Readers of this newspaper have had these compositions described with telling effect by the wise and discerning pen of Mr. Philip Hale, making a further detailed discussion at this time a matter of questionable taste.

Interesting, indeed, are one's conclusions after a goodly number of hearings of Stravinsky's "Sacre." What a furore it raised in Paris at its first performance! Yet yesterday's audience gave vent to no marked zeal, for or against the work itself, despite an exceptionally fine performance. Certainly in the degree that it no longer horrifies, it no longer fascinates. Is it reaching the level of an almost everyday affair?

Despite Stravinsky's assurance that the work is a piece of "abstract" music, it was first heard as a ballet. But it is as a purely instrumental work that we hear it today, a presentation that need not give the least impression of incompleteness.

Musical developments of the past 20 years have stressed rhythmic interest, and the importance of rhythm in the "Sacre" is paramount. Orchestrally, it is not a work in which Stravinsky speaks through an economy of means. Such a glorious body of instrumentalists is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the magnetic leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, that difficulties of a technical nature scarcely exist—a rare boon for the composer of complex scores.

Sibelius, thanks to years of devoted propaganda by such appreciators as Ferrucio Busoni, Cecil Gray and Serge Koussevitzky, is becoming an almost popular composer. His second symphony with its definite Tschaikowskian leanings in matters of rhythm and instrumentation, was superbly played, and concluded yesterday's program. This symphony makes a purely musical appeal, with or without a knowledge of its non-musical aspirations.

One returns to Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" which came first in yesterday's concert.

The version heard yesterday is the composer's own and he has clothed it in an orchestral garb of beautiful texture and subtle transparency.

The entire program was played in a way that one has come to expect from the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky shared with his men the eager applause of the audience.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES

COLONIAL—"Alice in Wonderland," with Josephine Hutchinson, Eva Le Gallienne; 8:15 P. M.

PLYMOUTH — "The Late Christopher Bean," comedy by Sidney Howard, with Pauline Lord; 8:30 P. M.

WILBUR—"Brothers," melodrama, with Walter Gilbert; 8:20 P. M.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 22 1933

Symphony Soloist Lauded By Brahms

Arthur Schnabel, distinguished German pianist, soloist for this week's concerts, is known internationally both as a virtuoso and teacher. Today, at 50, he looks back on a career of 35 years. At 10 he was accepted as a pupil of Leschetizky, and continued with him for five years—all the regular instruction this noted pianist ever had. And when at one of that famous pedagogue's studio concerts the diminutive boy pianist made one of his first appearances, an elderly, bearded man arose from a far corner of the room to ask in amazement:

"How in goodness' name can you play all this so correctly?"

The elderly man was none other than Johannes Brahms, of whose works Schnabel has since become one of the greatest exponents. Three years ago he crossed the ocean especially to appear at a Brahms Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting.

Widely known in Europe, and a great favorite in England, he has made but one previous appearance in America, in 1925.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

OCT 22 1933

WILL ATTEND STATE GARDEN CLUB MEET

Several members of the Flint Federated Garden club will attend a regional meeting of the Federated Garden Clubs of Michigan in the Michigan league building, Ann Arbor, Wednesday.

An all-day meeting will include discussions, business, and a luncheon at 1 o'clock. State officers are expected. The visitors will attend the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the evening.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 22 1933

Civic Music Association Sets Dates

Members of the Albany Civic Music association have received their 1933-34 membership cards entitling them to attend all three of the Albany concerts and the three in Schenectady. Same card admits to all concerts.

All the concerts will be held in the auditorium of the Philip Livingston Junior High school on Northern boulevard, in order to accommodate the large membership. The first concert of the Schenectady Civic Music association, the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held in the R. K. O. Plaza theatre on State street just below Nott Terrace and facing the park. All others will be held at the Mont Pleasant High school.

Pocket scores are available at the Van Curler Music company, 90 No. Pearl street for the symphonies and other orchestral numbers to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Schenectady and Cleveland Symphony orchestra in Albany.

The Albany attractions will be: Tuesday evening, November 28, 1933, Attilio Baggiore, tenor; Wednesday evening, January 17, 1934, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Thursday evening, March 22, 1934, Cleveland Symphony orchestra. All concerts at Philip Livingston High school.

The Schenectady attractions will be: Saturday evening, October 28, 1933, Boston Symphony orchestra; Wednesday evening, December 6, 1933, Don Cossack choir; Monday evening, March 19, 1934, Jose Iturbi, pianist.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1933

BEETHOVEN CYCLE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

A notable Beethoven cycle is to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as a part of its 53rd season at Symphony hall, Boston, on six Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock, beginning October 31st. All of the symphonies including the choral ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2", "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" Piano Concerto; the triple concerts for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts. Chorus, singers and instrumental soloists will be announced later.

The other dates will be November 21, January 23, February 13, March 27 and April 17.

On Monday evening, November 6th, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programmes Dr. Koussevitzky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory.

This season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins his tenth year in America as the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. A Koussevitzky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts, etc., is on view in Symphony hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1933 (32)

HARP DUO AT WOMEN'S CLUB

Miss Nellie Zimmer and Miss Louise Harris to Be Assisted by Harry D. Newcombe, Baritone.

Tomorrow, the program at the Middlesex Women's club is to be a concert by the Zimmer Harp Duo and Harry D. Newcombe, baritone.

The Harp Duo consists of Miss Nellie Zimmer, soloist, and Miss Louise Harris. Miss Zimmer, a native of New York state, has studied in America with Van Vechtan Rogers, and in Paris with Mlle Henriette Renie. Miss Harris, also a pupil of Rogers, is an accomplished artist; the works for two harps are given with consummate artistry.

Mr. Newcombe has a rich voice of exceptional power and wide range, and he excels in marvelous enunciation and brilliancy of interpretation. He has been heard in concert in most of the eastern cities of the United States and Canada, and has been soloist with the Boston

---

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 22 1933

Boston Symphony Will Give Cycle of Beethoven

Starts Series of Concerts Oct. 31 Which Will End April 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, world-famous organization which has just begun its 53rd season, will give a cycle of Beethoven on the following six Tuesday afternoons: Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17. All nine symphonies by the master of Bonn will be played, as also the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont." The chorus, singers and instrumental soloists for these concerts will be announced shortly.

It is difficult to over-estimate the wonderful opportunity which musicians and music lovers of Boston and of nearby cities and towns will thus have, to hear some of the loftiest music ever written performed with consummate skill and understanding. Ever since 1790, when Beethoven at the age of 20 had already turned out a quantity of epochal music, the works of this Titan among composers have been growing in popularity throughout the world. The only writer of music who could possibly dispute with him the supreme place in the tonal art was Bach—who, as Romain Rolland reminds us, "was a genius enclosed within a formula." After these two, all the other great composers take second or third rank.

The Ninth Symphony

The culmination of Beethoven's symphonic writings was, of course, the great Ninth (or Choral) Symphony, which when it was first performed in Vienna the master was too completely deaf to hear; yet he could see the hands of the audience clapping in tremendous acclaim. The triumphant choral entrance in this work, commencing with the words "Freude, schoene Freude," is unforgettable.

By an unusual coincidence Dr. Koussevitsky's nephew, Fabian Sevitsky, will also present this symphony on the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, which he conducts.

On Monday evening, Nov. 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin.

Dr. Koussevitsky has been the leader of the orchestra for ten years and has, by his authoritative musicianship, his mastery as a conductor and his ingratiating personality, achieved a great success. Returning from abroad a few weeks ago, he brought various new scores by European composers for first presentation in Boston, and these—together with several new American works—promise a tremendously interesting season. A Koussevitzky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts and so forth, is now on view in Symphony Hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts this Friday and Saturday.

Incidentally, the financial condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is far better than that of most of the great orchestras of our country—particularly the Philadelphia Orchestra, which recently had to resort to auctioning off a number of season tickets for their regular weekly concerts.

TURDAY, OCTOBER 21

MUSIC

Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For all its 20 years of age, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" apparently is still confined to that class of music more or less reprehensibly termed, according to the point of view, "debatable." Several persons left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon before the first part of the incomparable Igor's rousing celebration of Springtime rites in pagan, prehistoric Russia had been completed. One would like to have heard the first performance of this music, as the outraged Parisians heard it—as best they could above cat-calls and hissing—in 1913, when the score is recorded to have made murderous assault upon their ears. What an experience it would have been!

Today, a score of years later, parts of this work, notably the introductions to the two sections, have become less startling, even tame in the light of what has been composed since then. Yet the music, on the whole, has not been so mellowed by time as to persuade the many to greet it with smiles that are not a little wry. It likewise remains a landmark in modern music, substantially the end of one period and the beginning of another whose ultimate end is not yet in sight. The sheer, overwhelming force of "The Rite of Spring," its power of graphic delineation of incident (in spite of the fact that the composer regarded it as strictly "abstract" music) are still enthralling. And the extraordinary orchestral technic used by Stravinsky has not ceased to influence composers who have followed.

The remaining two numbers on a balanced and varied program were Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. Like most of the music which this clever French contemporary has composed, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" displays exceptional distinction of technical ability. Ravel sought literally to raise a musical monument to the genius of Francois Couperin, who flourished in France between 1668 and 1733, and whose crisp, gay and fleeting music is widely admired even today. Ravel has here been able to write in his own modern harmonic and melodic idiom, yet in the forms of Couperin's time and in deliberate imitation of Couperin's style. The result is a paradoxical—and agreeable—blending of archaicism and modernity. But this work suffers from the esthetic anemia, which has touched so much of Ravel's music; there is no depth and no emotional substance, only external glitter.

One of the most gratifying aspects of Dr Koussevitzky's taste is his frequent performance of the music of Sibelius, that genius of Finland who can be compared to no other composer, either of the past or present. Last season we had the pleasure of hearing all of his seven symphonies, together with the tone poem "Tapiola." One would welcome repetition of the symphonies and "Tapiola" this year, and inclusion of the violin concerto and the tone poem "En Saga."

Miles remarks in Lucien Price's superb "Winged Sandals," when contemplating the Parthenon, that he fails to understand how anyone can regard that ancient Grecian temple without a feeling of worship, and that "your feeling is not to worship by bowing down, but by standing erect and looking up." The music of Sibelius prompts a similar urge to stand erect and lool up. This Finnish master commands a wholly individual manner of expressing himself. Yet what he says has well-nigh cosmic breadth. In all music only a few composers have been granted the power of such utterance. Few will dispute the symphonic genius of Brahms and the exquisite beauty of his music. Yet, Brahms' symphonies, save for the colossal first movement of that in C minor, do seem more intimate, more restricted in scope of feeling, when compared to the symphonies of Sibelius. It has been remarked that Sibelius was thinking about the Finnish land and people when he conceived this D major symphony, a work not altogether representative of him in maturity and one frequently reminiscent of Tchaikovsky. He got his feet off the ground, however, and in the last movement figuratively soared to immeasurable heights.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. At the concerts of Nov 3 and 4 Honegger's "Mouvement Symphonique No. 3, new to America; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and a Mozart piano concerto in E-flat will be played. Egon Petri, a distinguished Dutch pianist, will be soloist.

C. W. D.

ATHENS, OHIO
MESSENGER

OCT 29 1933

HEAR SYMPHONY

LOGAN, Oct. 28.—Mrs. Nelle Allen Adams, Mrs. Fred Carpenter, Mrs. M. F. Weymueller, Mrs. George Carr, Mrs. F. E. Weinrich and Miss Annabelle Weymueller of this city were in Columbus Thursday night for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Post

DAY, OCTOBER 21, 1

SIBELIUS DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Climax of His Second Leaves Audience Impressed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

If the Symphony concert of a week ago, with its two classical symphonies, was a somewhat sedate affair, that of yesterday afternoon, which offered both Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, fairly seethed with excitements.

ON TOUR NEXT WEEK

Next week the orchestra goes on a tour that takes it to seven cities between here and Chicago, and presumably Dr. Koussevitzky will display to one or more of them these pieces of yesterday afternoon. When he does, his audiences are certain to be astounded. Some of us hereabouts are becoming accustomed to these signs and wonders, but the fact remains that, for technical reasons, orchestral performances of such transcendent excellence and eloquence have not long been possible and even today are not to be found in many parts of the earth.

Before the numbers mentioned there came yesterday, in oblique tribute to the great French writer of pieces for the clavecin who died 200 year's ago last month, Ravel's own transcription of his pianoforte suite, "The Tomb of Couperin." The music, not unfamiliar here, in either version, is dexterous and charming, occasionaly spiced, as in the Forlane, with recondite harmonies. The performance yesterday matched the music.

Stravinsky's "Sacre"

To hear Stravinsky's "Sacre" for the second time within a year was to be reminded that there is dross mixed with its gold. Stravinsky cannot everywhere sustain the level he reaches in the extraordinary opening pages of this ballet of pagan Russia.

There is some sound and fury that seems of little significance, at least when the music is divorced from the stage. There are wearisome repetitions and the Dance of Sacrifice, that should be climax to the whole, fails to produce a truly cumulative effect.

Climax of Sibelius' Second

No doubt the radical Stravinsky would have scorned the methods and means by which Sibelius rears the final climax in this D major Symphony. But whereas the Finn leaves the listener limp and shattered, the end of the Russian's piece finds him wondering a little what the tonal fuss was all about.

Each of Sibelius' seven symphonies, even the elusive Sixth, has its special merit and appeal, but for the present the Second—the symphony, if we are to believe the composer's friend Georg Schneevoigt, of a Finland that visioned deliverance from Russian oppression—is the one that strikes hardest and sinks deepest. There is little else in music that can rival, in its own field, the Symphony's final progress from darkness into blinding light.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

OCT 22 1933

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernist stripe: A new suite by Aaron Copland and a symphony by Emerson Whithorne.

Although Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, several new American works are to be done by the New York Philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange. They include "1929—A Satire," by David Stanley Smith, of New Haven; a symphony (No. 2) by Randall Thompson; a suite by Walter Piston, of Boston; Whithorne's "Fandango," and two poems, "Winter" and "Spring."

Hans Kindler expects to present Lamar Springfield's "Legend of John Henry" and a set of variations on a Hassler chorale by Templeton Strong.

Herald Oct 21

MUSIC

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the Second Symphony by Sibelius make up this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. None of these works is new to the Boston public and the program gave notable variety as well as distinct satisfaction to those who hope for a more intimate acquaintance with the creations of these composers.

Readers of this newspaper have had these compositions described with telling effect by the wise and discerning pen of Mr. Philip Hale, making a further detailed discussion at this time a matter of questionable taste.

Interesting, indeed, are one's conclusions after a goodly number of hearings of Stravinsky's "Sacre." What a furore it raised in Paris at its first performance! Yet yesterday's audience gave vent to no marked zeal, for or against the work itself, despite an exceptionally fine performance. Certainly in the degree that it no longer horrifies, it no longer fascinates. Is it reaching the level of an almost everyday affair?

Despite Stravinsky's assurance that the work is a piece of "abstract" music, it was first heard as a ballet. But it is as a purely instrumental work that we hear it today, a presentation that need not give the least impression of incompleteness.

Musical developments of the past 20 years have stressed rhythmic interest, and the importance of rhythm in the "Sacre" is paramount. Orchestrally, it is not a work in which Stravinsky speaks through an economy of means. Such a glorious body of instrumentalists is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the magnetic leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, that difficulties of a technical nature scarcely exist—a rare boon for the composer of complex scores.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES

COLONIAL—"Alice in Wonderland," with Josephine Hutchinson, Eva Le Gallienne; 8:15 P. M.

PLYMOUTH — "The Late Christopher Bean," comedy by Sidney Howard, with Pauline Lord; 8:30 P. M.

WILBUR—"Brothers," melodrama, with Walter Gilbert; 8:20 P. M.

Sibelius, thanks to years of devoted propaganda by such appreciators as Ferrucio Busoni, Cecil Gray and Serge Koussevitzky, is becoming an almost popular composer. His second symphony with its definite Tschaikowskian leanings in matters of rhythm and instrumentation, was superbly played, and concluded yesterday's program. This symphony makes a purely musical appeal, with or without a knowledge of its non-musical aspirations.

One returns to Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin" which came first in yesterday's concert.

The version heard yesterday is the composer's own and he has clothed it in an orchestral garb of beautiful texture and subtle transparency.

The entire program was played in a way that one has come to expect from the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky shared with his men the eager applause of the audience.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 22 1933

Symphony Soloist Lauded By Brahms

Arthur Schnabel, distinguished German pianist, soloist for this week's concerts, is known internationally both as a virtuoso and teacher. Today, at 50, he looks back on a career of 35 years. At 10 he was accepted as a pupil of Leschetizky, and continued with him for five years—all the regular instruction this noted pianist ever had. And when at one of that famous pedagogue's studio concerts the diminutive boy pianist made one of his first appearances, an elderly, bearded man arose from a far corner of the room to ask in amazement:

"How in goodness' name can you play all this so correctly?"

The elderly man was none other than Johannes Brahms, of whose works Schnabel has since become one of the greatest exponents. Three years ago he crossed the ocean especially to appear at a Brahms Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting.

Widely known in Europe, and a great favorite in England, he has made but one previous appearance in America, in 1925.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

T 22 1933

WILL ATTEND STATE GARDEN CLUB MEET

Several members of the Flint Federated Garden club will attend a regional meeting of the Federated Garden Clubs of Michigan in the Michigan league building, Ann Arbor, Wednesday.

An all-day meeting will include discussions, business, and a luncheon at 1 o'clock. State officers are expected. The visitors will attend the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the evening.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 22 1933

Civic Music Association Sets Dates

Members of the Albany Civic Music association have received their 1933-34 membership cards entitling them to attend all three of the Albany concerts and the three in Schenectady. Same card admits to all concerts.

All the concerts will be held in the auditorium of the Philip Livingston Junior High school on Northern boulevard, in order to accommodate the large membership. The first concert of the Schenectady Civic Music association, the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be held in the R. K. O. Plaza theatre on State street just below Nott Terrace and facing the park. All others will be held at the Mont Pleasant High school.

Pocket scores are available at the Van Curler Music company, 90 No. Pearl street for the symphonies and other orchestral numbers to be played by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Schenectady and Cleveland Symphony orchestra in Albany.

The Albany attractions will be: Tuesday evening, November 28, 1933, Attilio Baggiore, tenor; Wednesday evening, January 17, 1934, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Thursday evening, March 22, 1934, Cleveland Symphony orchestra. All concerts at Philip Livingston High school.

The Schenectady attractions will be: Saturday evening, October 28, 1933, Boston Symphony orchestra; Wednesday evening, December 6, 1933, Don Cossack choir; Monday evening, March 19, 1934, Jose Iturbi, pianist.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1933

BEETHOVEN CYCLE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

A notable Beethoven cycle is to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra as a part of its 53rd season at Symphony hall, Boston, on six Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock, beginning October 31st. All of the symphonies including the choral ninth; the overtures "Leonore No. 2", "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" Piano Concerto; the triple concerts for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" will be played in the course of the six concerts. Chorus, singers and instrumental soloists will be announced later.

The other dates will be November 21, January 23, February 13, March 27 and April 17.

On Monday evening, November 6th, the series of six Monday evening concerts will begin. On these programmes Dr. Koussevitzky will include representative works of the symphonic repertory.

This season, Dr. Serge Koussewitzky begins his tenth year in America as the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. A Koussevitzky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts, etc., is on view in Symphony hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 22 1933 (32)

HARP DUO AT WOMEN'S CLUB

Miss Nellie Zimmer and Miss Louise Harris to Be Assisted by Harry D. Newcombe, Baritone.

Tomorrow, the program at the Middlesex Women's club is to be a concert by the Zimmer Harp Duo and Harry D. Newcombe, baritone.

The Harp Duo consists of Miss Nellie Zimmer, soloist, and Miss Louise Harris. Miss Zimmer, a native of New York state, has studied in America with Van Vechtan Rogers, and in Paris with Mlle Henriette Renie. Miss Harris, also a pupil of Rogers, is an accomplished artist; the works for two harps are given with consummate artistry.

Mr. Newcombe has a rich voice of exceptional power and wide range, and he excels in marvelous enunciation and brilliancy of interpretation. He has been heard in concert in most of the eastern cities of the United States and Canada, and has been soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

OCT 2

Boston Symphony Will Give Cycle of Beethoven

Starts Series of Concerts Oct. 31 Which Will End April 17

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, world-famous organization which has just begun its 53rd season, will give a cycle of Beethoven on the following six Tuesday afternoons: Oct. 31, Nov. 21, Jan. 23, Feb. 13, March 27 and April 17. All nine symphonies by the master of Bonn will be played, as also the overtures "Leonore No. 2," "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont." The chorus, singers and instrumental soloists for these concerts will be announced shortly.

It is difficult to over-estimate the wonderful opportunity which musicians and music lovers of Boston and of nearby cities and towns will thus have, to hear some of the loftiest music ever written performed with consummate skill and understanding. Ever since 1790, when Beethoven at the age of 20 had already turned out a quantity of epochal music, the works of this Titan among composers have been growing in popularity throughout the world. The only writer of music who could possibly dispute with him the supreme place in the tonal art was Bach—who, as Romain Rolland reminds us, "was a genius enclosed within a formula." After these two, all the other great composers take second or third rank.

The Ninth Symphony

The culmination of Beethoven's symphonic writings was, of course, the great Ninth (or Choral) Symphony, which when it was first performed in Vienna the master was too completely deaf to hear; yet he could see the hands of the audience clapping in tremendous acclaim. The triumphant choral entrance in this work, commencing with the words "Freude, schone Freude," is unforgettable.

By an unusual coincidence Dr. Koussevitsky's nephew, Fabian Sevitsky, will also present this symphony on the programs of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, which he conducts.

On Monday evening, Nov. 6, the series of six Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin.

Dr. Koussevitsky has been the leader of the orchestra for ten years and has, by his authoritative musicianship, his mastery as a conductor and his ingratiating personality, achieved a great success. Returning from abroad a few weeks ago, he brought various new scores by European composers for first presentation in Boston, and these—together with several new American works—promise a tremendously interesting season. A Koussevitsky exhibition of pictures, sculpture, manuscripts and so forth, is now on view in Symphony Hall and may still be seen at the regular concerts this Friday and Saturday.

Incidentally, the financial condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is far better than that of most of the great orchestras of our country—particularly the Philadelphia Orchestra, which recently had to resort to auctioning off a number of season tickets for their regular weekly concerts.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

OCT 22 1933

Season Ends Tonight; New Records Set

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

Chicago's record-breaking season of dollar opera ends with tonight's gala performance. It has lasted five weeks. It has been witnessed by 180,000. It has offered forty-four performances in thirty-four days. It was undertaken without guarantee. It has been concluded without a deficit.

The San Carlo company must be credited with an average of artistic excellence that is exceptionally high. If, in the lavish days of our resident opera, performances were occasionally offered that represented higher standards, or that engaged singing actors of greater fame and talent than any who have served Fortune Gallo, it must also be stated that "six dollar" opera often presented performances in which the general artistic level was far lower than the San Carlo company's best.

If it were possible to strike an artistic average for the subsidized and the independent opera companies, and to reduce that average to some kind of an equation that should express the relation of one dollar to six as defined in the quality of the song and symphony offered, the result would be interesting.

Has Served Many

Lacking facilities for such a mathematical formula, it should suffice to say that Mr. Gallo has served more people with the kind of opera they like than ever were served by our aristocratic opera organizations in a similar period at much more than six times the cost of operation.

The company's farewell tonight will bring forward most of the artists who have been responsible for the company's astonishing popularity. The first two acts of "The Barber of Seville," a work not included in the repertoire, will open the bill with Rosalinda Morini, Dimitri Onofrei and Mario Valle in the major roles. The second act of "Butterfly" will exploit the greatly admired Japanese soprano, Hizi Koyke, Mario Valle, Francesco Gurci, Bernice Schalker and Natale Cervi. The triumph scene from "Aida" will present Bianca Saroya, Elsa Hottinger, Araldo Lindi, Chief Caupolican, Leon Rothier and Norman Gordon. The Oukrainsky Ballet will do the "Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda" with Lyda Arlova as prima ballerina.

This really is not good-by but au revoir. The San Carlo Company is now a resident organization. It goes on tour at this time but we may hope for a return engagement after the first of the year.

Opera Held Up

The Operatic Art Theater, which made such brave and artistically brilliant beginning in the Goodman with a season of English opera, has been obliged to discontinue its performances, temporarily, pending a reorganization of the company on a sound business basis. This courageous effort should succeed on its merit alone. But, as every one knows, that is not enough. So the management will take counsel as to financial methods before resuming its entirely admirable presentations of intimate lyric drama.

Meanwhile native opera will be represented unpretentiously, but, I am sure, worthily, with a performance Tuesday night in Kimball Hall of Eleanor Everst Freer's opera in concert form, entitled, "The Mask of Pandora."

There will be an exciting week of symphony during the next eight days in Chicago. Tomorrow evening Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its full personnel of 110 players, will present Mozart's "Little Serenade," Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" and the second Sibelius symphony in Orchestra Hall.

The Chicago Symphony will present Glinka's overture "Russian and Ludmilla" and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" with Egon Petri playing the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven, Tuesday afternoon. There will be an all-Brahms program for the Thursday-Friday subscribers, the works listed being the "Academic Festival" overture, the fourth symphony and the first piano concerto, Mr. Petri again being the soloist.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

OCT 22 1933

THEATER-MUSIC A

BY T. D. K

Reports from various parts of America indicate that music will have a successful season. Without government subsidies, as in many European countries, including Germany, and without the benefit of any of Mr. Ickes' $3,300,000,000 for "public works," good music still stands on its own feet.

In a few days all of the major orchestras will resume public concerts. Opera companies have already opened in New York, San Francisco, and Chicago. Well-known concert artists are now being booked for coast to coast tours. The disturbing influence in Germany has sent us several new musical personalities, including the great Arnold Schonberg.

Otto Klemperer will conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic. Arturo Toscanini will direct the San Francisco symphony for a number of concerts. Sir Hamilton Harty and Felix Weingartner will be the guest leaders of the Chicago Symphony. Bruno Walter will direct the New York Philharmonic - Symphony. Leopold Stokowski will direct the Philadelphia Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony. Karl Kreuger will direct the Kansas City Philharmonic. Almost every city in America, with a population of 100,000 or more, will have a symphony orchestra this season.

THIS CLIPPING
SAN BERNARDINO, CAL.
SUN

OCT 22 1933

SAYS VIOLIN AID IN STUDY OF ALL MUSIC

Helps Master Piano, De Soto Declares

The violin, almost more than any other instrument, develops a delicacy of touch and a sureness in tone preception that is an invaluable aid in the study of other instruments, especially the piano, declares Ernest De Soto, well known San Bernardino violinist and musical director of the West Coast Theaters.

"Many piano pupils upon taking up the study of the violin, are surprised to find how this instrument helps them in the mastery of their other work," says Mr. De Soto. "The very construction of the instrument lends itself to a facility of expression that permits the performer to give full rein to every emotion the music expresses, and engenders a skill often insensibly transferred to any other instrument he may play."

WITH PHILHARMONIC

Mr. De Soto, whose studio is located at 220 Eighth street, began the study of the violin at a very early age, first studying with Arnold Kraus, concertmaster of the old Los Angeles symphony orchestra. At the age of 16, Mr. De Soto was musical director of the Old Unique theater. He also studied both piano and violin with Bernhard Maullenhauer, and with Martinez of the National Conservatory of Music of Mexico City, and violin with Saslavsky of the Boston Symphony, and Franklin Booth. Mr. De Soto was musical director of the old opera house for 15 years and now plays first violin with the Philharmonic orchestra. He has taught in San Bernardino for 18 years.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT LEADER

More than 20 major concert attractions have been booked for Columbus, O., this season beginning with the appearance of Lucrezia Bori, on Oct. 23. The Symphony club will bring two famous orchestras, the Boston Symphony on Oct. 25 and the Cleveland orchestra on March 5. Others who will appear at various times are John McCormack on Nov. 3; Jascha Heifetz; Richard Crooks; The Minneapolis Symphony; Lawrence Tibbett, the Russian Ballet of Monte Carlo; Don Cossacks; Albert Spaulding, the Shan-Kar Dancers, the Vienna Boys' Choir, Efrem Zimbalist, Poldi Mildner, Maria Jeritza and Giovanni Martinelli. On Dec. 15 the Schubert Memorial concert will be given.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 22 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY SETS RECORD

Serge Koussevitzky, the distinquished leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now in his tenth year in America as the conductor of this time-honored orchestra. He has led the orchestra longer than any of its other conductors, and has brought it to a new and surpassing fame.

Mr. Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra of 110 players to Pittsburgh for the opening concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series next Friday night, October 27. The major work will be Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5. Other important works include Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" Serenade for String Orchestra, by Mozart.

The officers of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association are Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president; Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, vice president; Moorhead B. Holland, treasurer, and Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, secretary.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 22 1933

Fine Artists In Boston Personnel

HOWEVER important the ability, however inspired a conductor may be in bringing an orchestra to a supreme position in the musical world, he, even such a master as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, must asknowledge his dependence upon the quality and stability of his orchestra's personnel.

In the Boston Symphony orchestra, to appear at Memorial hall, Thursday evening, these two factors are found in the superlative degrees. The quality of the individual artists, one hundred and ten of them, is that of the finest musicians that Europe and America have produced while a minimum of change in the personnel from season to season enables them to interpret the more perfectly their conductor's intent.

In the esprit of combined performance, the stars, and personalities which appear in solos passages contribute much to the finished brilliance and beauty of symphonic presentations.

TRUMPET AND OBOE

TWO of the French musicians who will be heard here with Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra are to be seen in the chairs of the first trumpet and the first oboe. Besides having taken equal honors at the Paris conservatoire as a trumpet and as a viola player, Georges Mager, is a tenor of real merit. Having developed a marked virtuosity with his trumpet, he is now making that instrument his sole pursuit, continuing his other musical interests only for his own and his friends' diversion.

The strong representation of French musicians in the woodwind sections of the Boston orchestra is virtual insurance of its consumate musicianship as the French are considered the finest woodwind players in the world. The first oboe player Fernand Gillet, is not only a brilliant performer in his own right, but bears a name significant in the world of music. Georges Gillet, Fernand's uncle, was the tutor of Georges Longy, the master oboeist who preceded Fernand in this chair. Ernest Gillet, Fernand's father, is both a composer and a cellist, perhaps best known for the gay "Loin du Bal."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 22 1933

BOSTON SENDS VIRTUOSI HERE FOR CONCERT

Koussevitsky Maintains Hub's Renown for Classic Symphony; Play Friday.

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The list of concerts by visiting orchestras has been so drastically reduced that it is with greatest joy we welcome the return of the Boston Symphony, coming Friday night.

Mr. Lissfelt

The history of this organization is a long and enviable one. The one grand problem of maintaining such a body of players—that is, its financial support—was canceled by the generous support of Col. Higginson. After his death and the reorganization of the orchestras subsequent to the war period, the anxiety by the appearance of that problem again was minimized by Boston's loyal support and the continued popularity of the symphony concerts.

CLASSIC PROGRAM

Boston was rich enough always to employ a conductor of the first magnitude and to hold on to these men—Paur, Nikisch and Koussevitsky—over long enough periods of time to create and maintain that homogeneity of tone and spirit which gives this orchestra its individuality and finesse.

And so it is no surprise that we have quite ideal performances from Koussevitsky and his men. This conductor is fundamentally of the truest classic mould; his interpretations, however, are not without the flavor of his Slavic ancestry. For the classics he remains devoutedly traditional. The newer music he approaches in the spirit of adventure and utmost fairness. He plays with meticulous polish for his men are virtuosi, too.

When Koussevitsky plays Friday night, the program of Mozart, Richard Strauss, Moussorgsky and Tschaikowsky will be genuinely satisfying to layman and musician alike, an occasion for the best in his players.

KLIACHKO RECITAL

May we in Pittsburgh look with some admiration to Boston for encouragement in our own orchestral enterprise. May we soon find support to give our own the fair play which would mean the beginning of such a career which is the just pride of Boston.

Tuesday evening Samuel Klichko, one of our foremost Pittsburgh cellists, will give his annual recital in the auditorium of the Young Men and Women's Hebrew Association. Kliachko's musical life has brought him into contact with the finest musicians in Russia and America. He has played under the best conductors, is a sincere musician and a delightful personality. With his gifted wife as accompanist he should play a good concert.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

OCT 22 1933

More than 20 major concert attractions have been booked for Columbus, O., this season beginning with the appearance of Lucrezia Bori, on Oct. 23. The Symphony club will bring two famous orchestras, the Boston Symphony on Oct. 25 and the Cleveland orchestra on March 5. Others who will appear at various times are John McCormack on Nov. 3; Jascha Heifetz; Richard Crooks; The Minneapolis Symphony; Lawrence Tibbett, the Russian Ballet of Monte Carlo; Don Cossacks; Albert Spaulding, the Shan-Kar Dancers, the Vienna Boys' Choir, Efrem Zimbalist, Poldi Mildner, Maria Jeritza and Giovanni Martinelli. On Dec. 15 the Schubert Memorial concert will be given.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

OCT 22 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will play in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, tomorrow evening. The program will comprise Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps." Sibelius's second symphony and Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik."

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 22 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, tomorrow evening. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," Sibelius's Second symphony and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." The orchestra plays in Buffalo this afternoon, and after the Chicago performance the ensemble will visit Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady. The New York season begins on Nov. 16.

DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT LEADER

OCT 22 1933

FAMOUS VIOLINIST VISITS CLINTON

Special to The Democrat

Clinton, Ia., Oct. 21.—Karl J. Ondricek, former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the world's most renowned violinists, visited Clinton this week. The last few years he has been in charge of the McCormic trip of Santa Monica, Cal. He is a native of Bohemia and began his concert there.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 22 1933

TO PLAY "EROICA"

THE Boston orchestra, when it plays in Columbus this week, will offer the "Eroica" symphony (the No. 3) by Beethoven, the "Nachtmusik" serenade for strings by Mozart and a first time local playing of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." Personally, we do not recall hearing the Mozart number locally, either. Patrons should arrive early, as the Mozart is in four parts and opens the program.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

OCT 22 1933

FAMOUS VIOLINIST VISITS CLINTON

Special to The Democrat

Clinton, Ia., Oct. 21.—Karl J. Ondricek, former concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the world's most renowned violinists, visited Clinton this week. The last few years he has been in charge of the McCormic trip of Santa Monica, Cal. He is a native of Bohemia and began his concert there.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will direct the Boston Symphony at the Mosque Friday night.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

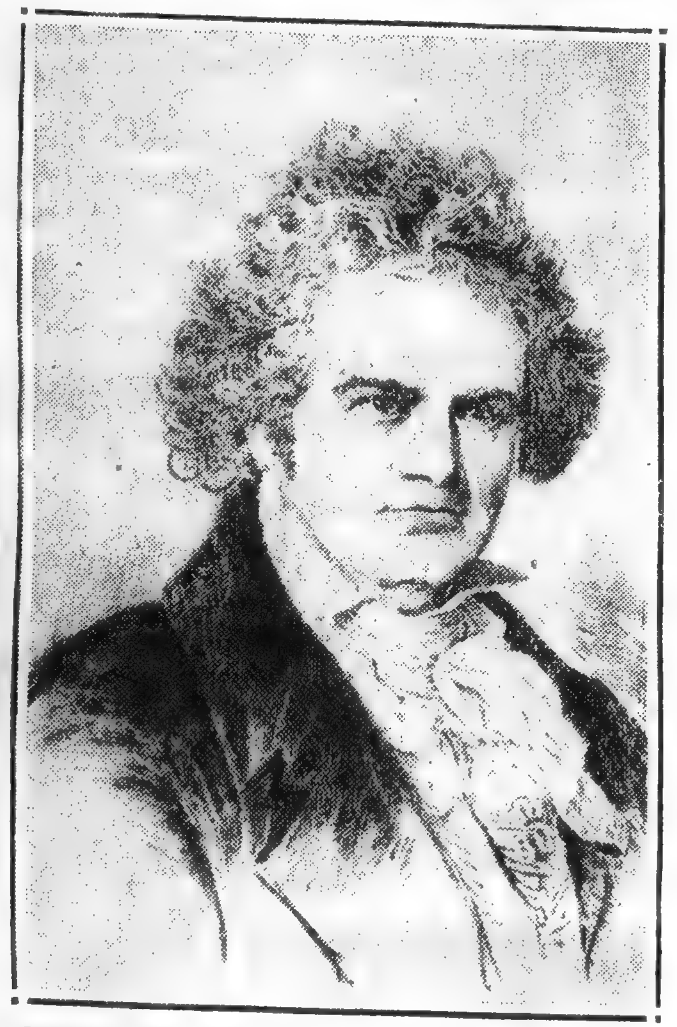
OCT 22 1933

WHAT THE LISTENING LAYMAN MAY GET OUT OF THE MASTERWORKS OF MUSIC

The Mechanic in Saskatchewan Who Always Got Right Up and Turned Off Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony Was Too Tired to Do So One Night, So Became a Lover of Great Music—Karl Krueger, Conductor of the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra, Says It Is a Fallacy to Believe That Only the Trained Musician Can Get Enjoyment From Hearing It.

THE first time I ever heard Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony' I got right up and turned it off," wrote a mechanic from his home in Saskatchewan to M. H. Aylesworth, president of the National Broadcasting Company. "Finally it came on once when I was too tired to get up, so I thought I would lie there and endure it. Well, I was surprised to find it wasn't so awful as I had supposed. The next time, I listened to it willingly, and now I would sit here for an hour waiting if I knew that at the end of the hour I could hear that symphony again."

The evolution of that man's taste was the direct outcome of radio listening. It will be interesting, when Kansas City's new Philharmonic orchestra plays its first concert Tuesday evening, November 28, to note the converts to music made by radio. There are bound to be a large number who, like the Canadian, were at some time in their lives too tired to get up and turn off the music.



LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS POWERS AS A COMPOSER, REVEALED IN HIS COUNTENANCE THE NOBILITY OF HIS MIND AND THE SPLENDOR OF HIS CREATIVE IMAGINATION.

In the Saskatchewan mechanic there was a latent need for such understanding music as Schubert composed in his "Unfinished" and it would have been a pity had the man and the music never met. In that event, something in the man would have lain dormant all his days—something fine, with unlimited possibilities for giving him pleasure.

APPRECIATION THROWS OUT ARDORS.

William Lyon Phelps says appreciation grows by what it feeds upon and that it throws out ardors that make invisible contacts with beauty. How true this is, all those who turn to art of one kind or another for the most secret of all their inspirations and joys need not be told. It is quite within the range of human possibilities that the experience of the mechanic who lives in a remote section of the world has been duplicated in every town and hamlet, on every farm in Kansas and Missouri, in the oil fields of Oklahoma and "way down South where the corn and cotton grows."

It would be pleasant to know that by this time he and those others have met and recognized the message of aspiration in Beethoven's Fifth symphony, the consoling beauty of the "Pastoral" and the colossal "Eroica." Romain Rolland went back to the first sketches made by Beethoven for the "Heroic Symphony" in order the better to grasp the meaning of the work.

He finds in the sketches "a hurricane in the night," "everything in an opaque minor" and deduces that the soul of the man is perpetually perturbed, which is why the supreme artist cannot bring himself to complete the work just then. He forces himself to wait until calm returns to his soul. "When the light does return," says Rolland, "he is able not only to dart a tranquilizing ray through the clouds, but to dominate the still miry matter . . . stir the heavy paste of it, knead it, unify it in one molten flood."

EMOTIONS IN THE "EROICA."

Weakness and strength alternate in Beethoven's hero as they alternate in life; there are great surges of force, intervals of anguish, despair, supplication. Rolland says "we can almost see the clenched hands and the contractions of the heart." Then, as always, in Beethoven, there arises the consolatory motive in the major mode, courage and hope that rise above all thought of despair. Not only in the "Eroica," which the Saskatchewan mechanic and his fellow listeners from sea to sea may have heard when the Boston symphony orchestra broadcast it as a memorial to Thomas A. Edison, but in nearly all his compositions Beethoven recorded the struggle, the despair, the divine hope and the calm of victory that every man of splendid gifts experiences.

It is to Beethoven, most human of all the great composers, that the lay-listener bows his head in love and admiration. He can forget himself completely when he hears "Leonora" or the "Third Symphony" or the "Seventh," certainly when he hears the "Fifth" and "Eighth" or "Eroica."

Tschaikowsky, of all composers, whose "Fifth Symphony" will be heard in the first concert by Kansas City's new orchestra, speaks the language of the emotions. "He has many things to say which are of the greatest interest to humanity," we are told by an authority, "and he says them with such warmth and intimate feeling that they seem less a revelation than an unexpected effluence from our own innermost being."

WEEPS AS HE SINGS.

Tschaikowsky often weeps as he sings, particularly in his "Symphony Pathetique." He had torturing doubts followed by bursts of confidence. His orchestral palette was varied and rich in color and whatever he said was set in glowing musical terms. There is no one to set beside Beethoven in emotional fire combined with lofty thought, for Beethoven was a master of philosophy as well as a poet in music, but no one will deny that Tschaikowsky walks more nearly hand in hand with the average man, the average woman; that he suffered as they suffer, was glad as they are glad, and was thrilled by all that thrills the human race today.

It would be interesting to get a report from the mechanic on such modern music as "Ein Heldenleben" by Richard Strauss. Would he recognize in "A Hero's Life" something new and great in music, something that points the way to untraveled paths? At first many listeners are overwhelmed by the mere bulk and noise produced by Strauss's modern orchestra, with its piercing cries from the violins and its thunder and lightning in the new world of orchestral tumult, but presently the atmosphere clears sufficiently for the listener to hear an intelligible story of a hero's material victory followed by the greater moral triumph.

followed by

HIS METTLE HAS BEEN TESTED.

The coming season of symphony concerts in Kansas City will be conducted by a man of acknowledged attainment in the symphonic field, one whose mettle has been tested in the critical fires of such an Old World capital as Vienna. Karl Krueger, conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra, plans a season that will give Kansas City music lovers a chance to hear the masterworks of musical literature. They shall hear an orchestra face to face, and not the mere echo of Schubert and Brahms and Beethoven and Tschaikowsky.

Some day our Philharmonic orchestra may play concerts that will reach the ears of faraway men, including the mechanic in Saskatchewan and all his brother listeners from pole to pole and sea to sea. The new conductor, Karl Krueger, has confidence in the ability of untrained ears to appreciate the best music.

"The greatest fallacy in connection with music," he says, "is the belief on the part of many laymen that only the listener who understands the mechanics of music can get enjoyment from hearing it. Nothing could be further from the truth, and it is deplorable that the misconception has prevented many persons from feeling the deep joy that great music imparts. Wagner never tired of insisting that the public should not be aware that anything technical exists in music.

"Music is as direct in its appeal as the beauty of a sunset. Surely nobody need know anything of the theory of color in order to be moved by the beauty of an autumn sky. The most abstruse piece of music in existence is probably Bach's B Minor Mass and still I have seen great audiences of 10,000 or more in the Crystal Palace in London and an audience in a great armory in New York transfixed by the beauty of this work.

LAYMAN SENSES ELEMENTAL POWER.

"The elemental power inherent in masterworks is sensed by the layman. It is well to remember that the final decision as to what music shall live and what shall disappear comes from the public—the great mass of people who know nothing and care less about the modus operandi of music-making. They are, as they should be, interested in the beauty and human appeal of great works.

"If the layman realized how few individuals in this world had truly mastered the mechanics of music, he might feel differently about the importance of so-called appreciation. You develop a child's sense of design and form by letting it look at beautiful buildings and surrounding it with great examples of the plastic arts.

"An individual's latent responsiveness to music of the nobler sort is brought to florescence only by letting him hear the best music. If any proof were needed of what I have just said, I can only repeat it is the layman who decides what composers shall live. And it is the public that makes the 'classics.' They represent the public vote as to what is the greatest music."

The Saskatchewan mechanic probably has learned by this time how ephemeral is the average song hit or popular ditty crooned nightly for a moon or so over the radio. Just as the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert found a secure place among the treasures of his mind after he had heard it a number of times, so inevitably would the song hit that appealed at first disclose its cheapness after a few hearings.

M. K. P.

34

35

Post Oct 22

Symphony on First Tour of Season—Music Notes of Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week the Symphony Orchestra makes its first trip of the season, to Buffalo, Chicago, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburg and Schenectady. On its return, at the concerts of Nov. 3 and 4, the season's first soloist will be heard: Egon Petri, Dutch pianist, previously known to Boston only as recitalist. Mr. Petri will play with the orchestra the E-flat Concerto of Mozart. The remainder of the programme will include Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, for some time unheard from Dr. Koussevitzky, and a new score of Arthur Honegger, "Symphonic Movement No. 3." The first two symphonic movements were the now-famous "Pacific 2-3-1" and "Rugby"; this third bears no descriptive title.

* * * *

Besides Mr. Petri, three soloists are announced for the current symphony season: Artur Schnabel, eminent German pianist, whose appearance with the orchestra in the course of the Brahms Festival will be long remembered, and Yehudi Menuhin and Paul Kochanski, violinists. Mr. Kochanski has previously been heard here with pleasure. Mr. Menuhin, hitherto heard here as the boy Yehudi, will be making his Boston debut as soloist with the orchestra.

* * * *

Announcement also comes from Symphony Hall of the first programme of the Beethoven Cycle, which begins on the afternoon of Tuesday, Oct. 31. It lists the first and the third of the symphonies. At a recent pair of regular subscription concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra brought this "Eroica" to eloquent performance; with the youthful first, they have in past seasons proved themselves persuasive.

* * * *

Mr. Kreisler has announced his programme for the recital to be given two weeks hence in Symphony Hall: The C Minor Conata of Grieg, the Chaconne of Bach, Chausson's "Poeme," an Adagio and a Rondo of Mozart, an Impromptu of Schubert and five Caprices—one by Cartier, one by Wieniawski, and three by Paganini. As it stands, there appears on the list no piece of transcription from Mr. Kreisler's own hand.

* * * *

Appearing in a private performance at the Copley-Plaza on Tuesday morning of this week, Justin Samdridge, young colored pianist, who deprecates the modern tendency to make the piano a percussive rather than a stringed instrument, will be heard in music ranging from Scarlatti and Bach through Beethoven's Opus 57, two of Chopin's ballades, an intermezzo of Brahms, and two pieces by Liszt to "The White Peacock" of Griffes and two pieces by the Spanish Lecuona.

* * * *

Esther Stein, who is to make her Boston debut as pianist at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening of this week, was born in Boston 15 years ago, and spent her childhood in Chelsea. More recently she has resided in New Bedford, where her father is an attorney. Last year she was a pupil in New York of Winfield Abell. Among her Boston teachers was Heinrich Gebhard. Last April, Miss Stein made her New York debut in a recital at Aeolian Hall.

* * * *

Ethel Leginska, formerly conductor of the Women's Symphony Orchestra, and occasional leader of the People's Symphony and the Boston Philharmonic, is to be conductor this winter of the Montreal Civic Grand Opera Company, which will open its season on Oct. 30. Among the singers listed are Hope Hampton and Hallie Stiles.

* * * *

The Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta, of which Fabien Sevitzky is both founder and conductor, announces a series of three concerts in the ballroom of the Bellevue-Stratford.

* * * *

CONCERTS TODAY

This afternoon, at Jordan Hall, the People's Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its new conductor, Fabien Sevitzky, will give the first of a series of ten concerts. This first programme lists the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berlioz; Debussy's nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals"; a Fugue for Eighteen Violins, by Dubensky; Leo Sowerby's "Money Musk," and the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

* * * *

This afternoon at Symphony Hall the Don Cossacks, with Serge Jaroff at their head, will be heard in a programme of Russian sacred and secular music, including several songs arranged by Mr. Jaroff himself.

STEIN RECITAL

A single recital has been announced for this week, that of Esther Stein, young pianist from New Bedford, who will play at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening. Bach, Beethoven, Chopin and Liszt appear on Miss Stein's programme.

VIENNA BOYS NEXT SUNDAY

Next Sunday afternoon and evening, at Jordan Hall, the Singing Boys of Vienna, remembered as one of the musical pleasures of last winter, will be heard in a programme that includes liturgical numbers, songs and an operetta of Offenbach.

Her. Oct 22 Boston

Casual Ruminations on the World of Music

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

This is evidently to be a Beethoven year, as far as Boston is concerned. Announcement has already been made of a Beethoven cycle at the Tuesday afternoon series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, and the Chardon Quartette announces all the Beethoven string quartettes for its Cambridge series. Last season Mr. Toscanini ushered in a Beethoven cycle with the New York Philharmonic on Sunday afternoons. At these concerts all the symphonies except the Ninth were given and the popular response grew with each successive performance. The Boston Symphony series should prove equally popular.

Arthur Schnabel, celebrated German pianist, announces that he will play nothing but Beethoven on his present American tour. For the sake of argument, this is a questionable ideal. One sometimes wonders how much men like Beethoven would approve of programmes containing nothing but their works. In the experience of the Boston public, which in point of orchestral programmes is given a varied fare second, perhaps, to no other city, one-composer programmes are more likely to stimulate than dampen interest. But when an artist of Mr. Sehnabel's eminence becomes the even temporary exponent of a single composer such as Beethoven, he may miss some of the other serious responsibilities of his calling, paradoxical as this may seem.

Dame Ethel Symthe, English composer and feminist, in discussing the Verdi operas is quoted as going so far as to say "a real appreciation of the great Verdi is an appreciation of the greatness of Il Trovatore." What a shock to some good people!

Apropos of this past week's Symphony concerts the following quotation from the pen of Donald Francis Tovey is pertinent:

> By its movement you may know when music is free. Sibelius, standing on the shoulders of the late 19th century masters of "symphonic poems," moves with perfect ease in his least-convincing works, and the ease is strengthened into freedom in his masterpieces. Although his designs complete themselves so quickly that his symphonies (except the seventh) break up into three or four movements, they have no real analogy with the sonata forms. In his first symphony the sonata forms are easily traced, but even there they are neither a necessity nor a convention, but a convenience which may not be convenient another time. With the Fifth Symphony nothing whatever is gained by thinking of them at all; and even without thinking of them, much criticism has been directed to Sibelius for his neglect of qualities which those forms imply. His intention and achievement is entirely different: instead of working out groups of complete themes on various principles of alternate exposition, development, and recapitulation, with essentially dramatic and narrative effects throughout, he makes his scheme build itself up out of fragments until a full-sized theme arrives as a supreme climax. Two such processes will cover the ground of one of his largest movements, and sometimes, as in the finale of his Third Symphony, one will suffice. The result is that, in works of no inordinate length, Sibelius achieves climaxes on the biggest Wagnerian scale without any redundancies, hesitations, or confusions from the habits of older art-forms.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 22 1933

Artist Series Comment

The Artist Series opens in Emery Auditorium next Thursday evening with a recital by Lucrezia Bori.

Boris is one of the great favorites at the "Met" and on the concert stage has won great favor because of the delicacy of her art and the refinement of her singing. Her personality also adds immeasurably to the enjoyment of a concert. Her program here will include some old French and Italian numbers, a group of modern French numbers, some American songs and a group of Spanish songs which she sings in inimitable style. She will also include the Gavotte from "Manon" and the Micaela aria from "Carmen." It was in the last-named role that she made her operatic debut in Rome shortly after coming to Italy from her native Valencia, Spain.

The second attraction of the Artist Series will present the Shan-Kar Ballet. It will be seen on Tuesday evening, November 7. The third attraction is the two-piano concert by Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, on Wednesday evening, November 22. The Vienna Singing Boys form the fourth attraction, coming on Tuesday evening, December 5. Yehudi Menuhin, brilliant young violinist, concludes the series on Tuesday evening, January 23.

Season seats will be sold tomorrow. Tuesday morning those seats which still remain will be sold for the individual concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give a concert in ~~Dayton~~, in the Memorial Hall of that city, next Wednesday evening. It will be the opening attraction in the Artist Series which J. H. Thuman conducts in Dayton. The program will open with the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart and will further include the prelude to the opera "Khovantschina" of Moussorgsky, the "Til Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss and the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky, the one in E minor.

Concert Season Is Under Way; the Order of Events

Adv Oct 22 By Moses Smith
Music Editor

THE SEASON of music is in full swing. A hasty glance at the calendar of concerts is met by a refreshing variety of programs, many of which are unique in appeal.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra season, which always gets a jump on the rest of the field, is already three weeks old, having produced concerts of mid-season brilliance and interesting content. During the present week, as it happens, the orchestra is on a western tour, involving nine successive concerts in as many days.

When Koussevitzky and his men return they will inaugurate, on October 31, the Tuesday afternoon series, devoted to an elaborate cycle of Beethoven music. On the following Friday and Saturday is presented the first trump card in the form of a soloist—Egon Patri, remarkable Dutch pianist, whose playing has been greeted so enthusiastically elsewhere.

* * *

36

Tel. CHelsea

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
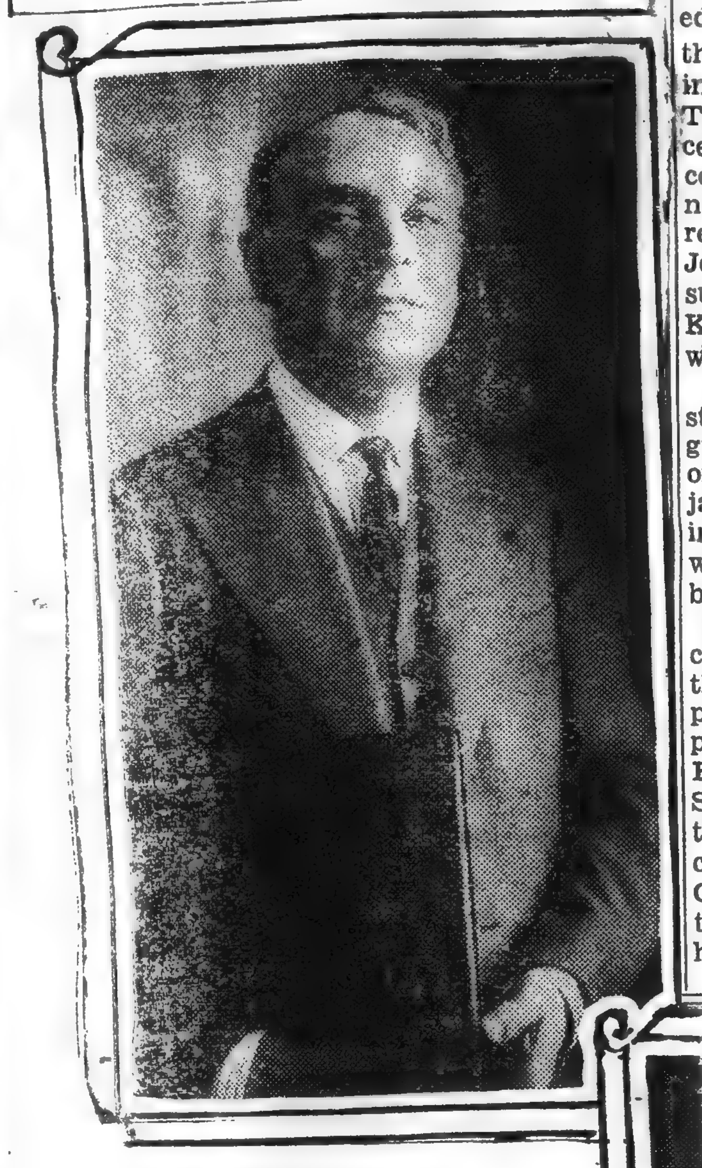
TIMES

OCT 23 1933

Great Mu



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

OCT 24 1933

Symphony Concert Delays Even Carpenter Supper

White ties and orchids pinned on ermine were scattered through crowded Orchestra hall last night to hear the Boston symphony orchestra playing Chicago as a one-night stand. Three Pro-Arte string quartet concerts, the regular Chicago symphony concert and the closing of opera had not surfeited society. Nor were they ready to leave—even for one of Mrs. John Alden Carpenter's famous buffet suppers—until they saw that Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor, positively would not add another note.

At the last Mrs. Carpenter was standing by the door waiting for her guest of honor and wearing two big orchids at the waist of her ermine jacket. Mrs. Jacob Baur, who came in with Mrs. Frederick Haskell, was wearing the inevitable orchid on her black wrap.

At intermission the lounge was a cluster of musicians, all talking about the stirring Stravinsky number just played. Roy Harris, the young composer, was chatting with Charles Hamill, while Mrs. Alfred Wolf in Schiaparelli blue crepe stood near by talking to the Felix Borowskys and a couple of the Pro-Arte quartet. Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed forsook her tiara for two diamond clips which hold her bobbed hair behind her ears. She carried a black ostrich fan with her low-cut black satin dress as she promenaded in the foyer with Egon Petri, piano soloist of Sunday's concert.

Mrs. Walter Wolf in burgundy velvet sat in an aisle seat downstairs with Mr. Wolf and spoke to friends as they passed. Some of them were the Arthur Meekers, Mrs. James R. Offield, Mrs. John W. Gary and one of her nieces, Miss Alice Roullier, and Arthur Heun and Mrs. George Burrage.

In the boxes were Princess Rostislav with a diadem. Mrs. Welch Dickinson in a soft blue velvet wrap incrusted with brilliants, Mrs. Bartholomay Osborne in a big blue fox collar, Mrs. Walter Brewster in ice-blue with pleated satin dust ruffles, Mrs. Albert Madlener, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Bradley, Mr. and Mrs. George Voevodsky.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

CT 24 1933

ONCE THE SCANDAL OF THE AGE, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," which brought forth catcalls and hisses when produced in Paris in 1913, brought forth an infinitely more sophisticated audience at Orchestra Hall last night, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The ballet, when danced by Nijinsky in 1913, aroused most bitter comments from critics, writers, musicians, as well as the audience . . . last night the modern ears found the music tame enough and it was Koussevitzky's conducting which brought forth the screams and yells of applause.

Unquestionably even those whose sense of snobbism is most critical couldn't complain of the audience at the concert . . . the foyer was indeed resplendent . . . in the boxes, Princess Rostislav was marvelously beautiful in black moire with a hobble skirt. She wore a bunch of white flowers at her bosom and a wonderful tiara of tortoise shell and diamonds, which stood high on her head. Those who are born to wear a crown invariably stand out from those who use it as a mere ornament . . . she was indeed the most distinguished of the beauties.

* * *

MME. KOUSSEVITZKY, in black lace with a blue necklace, who is distinguished and has red hair, was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. John Alden Carpenter. She is a very talented lady and only recently the bust of her husband, which she made, was placed in Koussevitzky Hall at Symphony Hall in Boston. It is the most recent tribute to Koussevitzky. There is also a portrait of Koussevitzky by Theodore Stravinsky, the son of the composer, as well as some of the works in manuscript form of Stravinsky himself.

Mr. and Mrs. Balocovitz, the former Joyce Borden, in a beautiful white taffeta dress with white lace shawl, the former sister-in-law of Mrs. Carpenter, finding many acquaintances in the audience. Dr. and Mrs. Glenn Frank, who had motored down from Madison, Mrs. Frank in glistening oyster satin, were also the guests of Mrs. Carpenter, who had given another of her delightful buffet suppers in honor of the Koussevitzkys.

* * *

A BLOND YOUNG GOD, with Mrs. Stock, turned out to be the young pianist Dallas Franz, who is to play with the Symphony in March . . . Gifted indeed since his looks would seem to be enough raison d'etre for his existence . . . Dr. Stock was indeed conspicuous by his absence, but he is still ill and will not be back until next week. Mrs. Stock also entertained the Pro Arte Quartet.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed, Mrs. Goodspeed wearing a new coiffure, her hair combed back off her ears and her clips worn at the top of her ears instead of at the lobe. Their guests; Mr. Egon Petri, who plays next week, and Mr. Karl Krueger, who is here for several days already rehearsing the Operas Intimes. Paul Kerby, whom, only that afternoon, I heard a lady describe as being charming because he had put her in her place intellectually in such an insulting manner.

Mrs. Coudert Nast, in a long-sleeved black velvet dinner dress with a very high neck and very low back, a tiara of black velvet and sable coat, brought forth comment at once, for she is outstanding. With Col. and Mrs. Albert A. Sprague was Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hamill, and Mrs. Potter Palmer in black lace. That demigod of symphony, Philip Hale, one of our greatest contemporary music critics.

There were shivers of excitement over Stravinsky and of delight over Sibelius . . . indeed the beau monde is the musical world, and one is gratified to find beautiful ladies decorating the boxes and the gentlemen discussing music more and more intelligently.

* * *

DE CINQ A SEPT . . . two parties . . . both highly amusing. The first for the George Hearsts, who are here for several days before going to New York for a week to see the new plays. Mrs. Hearst, who is a bride of but a few months, is extremely smart in black with a most lovely diamond bracelet and the most magnificent diamond clip watch . . . vivacious and very interesting, she managed to hide her cold very well. Mr. Hearst is very genial and affable and has found much of interest and amusement already in his short stay in Chicago.

Prince Matchabelli, who had just come from New York, presented his hostess with a lovely package which turned out to be perfume, sachets, and bath oil. He is a modern Santa Claus indeed to the ladies. Rosalina Miller, in black heavily trimmed with lynx . . . already packing for Europe, for where she sails next week. Alas! this charming Brazilian lady with her large dark eyes and deep voice will be much missed where she has made a very special place for herself.

Peggy Watson, in gray and green . . . the Austin Youngs . . . Baron Wrangel . . . Miss Peggy Hambleton. It was pleasant to sit by the fire and choose between tea and muffins, cocktails and highballs, and make plans to dash off to New York next week for Elsa Maxwell's treasure hunt . . . for Elsa's parties are internationally famous and one can't miss what promises to be her biggest of the Winter.

* * *

ONE DASHED IN TO WELCOME HOME Mary and Ambrose Cramer, who have both gained a few Swedish pounds and look exceptionally well. An impromptu party, really, for their friends, Stephen Parrott and his sister, Mrs. Laurence Redingway of San Francisco. Arthur Meeker Jr. arrives this morning with a friend of his from New York, Billy White, and there will be a three-day fete to celebrate his return. Rue and Al Shaw . . . Doris Winterbotham . . . Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Meeker and Janet Fairbank were all hearing untold tales of Swedish hospitality . . . which is likely to have a great vogue.

CHICAGO, ILL.
AMERICAN

OCT 24 193

'Laud' Triumph for Boston's Symphony

By Herman Devries.

From the point of volume and quality of sound the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Orchestra hall last night must rank as one of the season's greatest.

The piece de resistance of the program was Stravinsky's brutal "Sacre du Printemps." Whether one admires the work or not, whether one laughs as did some or applauds as did others, the fact remains that the "Sacre du Printemps" is the most complicated and difficult score in the modern repertoire. To play it at all is a feat for any orchestra, and to play it well in an achievement which only a great orchestra can attain. To say that it was played well last night is to understate the case.

Loudest at Least.

It was perhaps the loudest performance we have heard on the stage of Orchestra Hall, but all its terrific noises and shocking and unnerving dissonances were admirably commanded by that generalissimo of the baton, Serg. Koussevitzky.

Music of a more familiar and far more enjoyable order served as introduction to the Stravinsky work. The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," one of the most charming of this composer's smaller orchestral pieces. Here the amazing string tone of the Boston Symphony was revealed in its finest and silkiest texture.

Sibelius Played.

After the intermission, we heard the second symphony of Sibelius, a work that has never been a favorite of mine, but which as played by Koussevitzky's admirable orchestra at least had the virtue of hanging together, and not wandering aimlessly as it so often does. Here, too, the beautiful tone of the orchestra's wind players could be heard to better advantage than in the grinding and shattering rhythms of Stravinsky, although the rather bleak orchestration of Sibelius prevented their sounding with all the richness of which they are capable.

To conclude, all honor and praise to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for the manner of their performance last night. The matter of the concert seems open to grave criticism. It was not a good program.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

OCT 24 1933

SOPHIE BRESLAU TO SING IN ESSEX

Contralto Will Appear at Orange and Montclair Concerts.

The concert season of the New Jersey Orchestra, which will feature such distinguished artists as Efrem Zimbalist, Mischa Levitzki, and Sophie Breslau, will open with the presentation of a concert Monday evening, December 4, in the Orange High School. A second concert will be given the following night in Mount Hebron Junior High School, Montclair. Sophie Breslau, contralto, will be the soloist at both these concerts.

The orchestra, which will be under the direction of Rene Polllain, is composed of ninety musicians. The concert master is Remo Bolognini, a solo violinist of international reputation, who this year succeeds the late Anton Witek, formerly concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Among the works to be played at the first concerts under Pollain's direction will be Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

The schedule of the orchestra for the season includes other concerts in Orange on February 6 and April 16, and in Montclair, February 5 and Apirl 17. Mischa Levitzki, the pianist, will appear at the February presentations and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, has been engaged for the April dates.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

OCT 24 1933

Miss Gertrude F. O'Brien, director of music at the Lowell high school, and other local musicians who attended the opening concert of the People's Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon were pleased to find that the musicians who were playing under the able baton of Fabien Sevitzky, included Miss Frances Albertin, bassoonist, of Falmouth. Miss Albertin is known to many former Lowell high school students who had the privilege of participating in the New England high school music festival held yearly in Boston, for the Falmouth girl made her first bid for orchestral fame as a participant in the festival. Daughter of the director of music in Falmouth, and a pupil of Mr. Piller of the Boston symphony, Miss Albertin has made several appearances in orchestras in and around Boston, being included, two years ago, as guest player in the Lowell State Teachers college orchestra for the concert at the Memorial Auditorium.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

OCT 24 1933

A notable Beethoven cycle is to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a part of its 53rd season, according to an announcement from Symphony hall. The cycle will be given on Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock, beginning October 31, and will number in its course of six concerts all of the symphonies including the choral ninth; the overtures, "Leonore No. 2", "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus"; the "Emperor" piano concerto; the triple concerto for piano, violin and 'cello; likewise the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont." On Monday evening, November 6, the series of Monday evening concerts will begin, with Dr. Koussevitsky ready to carry out his plans to include representative works of the symphonic repertory.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

24 1933

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Pittsburgh Friday evening for the first concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series at Syria Mosque. The major work for the concert Friday night is the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 in E Minor. Other numbers include Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned "Roguish Manner."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON JOURNAL

OCT 24 1933

Will Attend Concert — Mr. and Mrs. William T. Drever, of 78 Greenwood avenue, and Lawrence Mayer, baritone soloist, will attend the concert to be given at Hill auditorium, Ann Arbor, tonight by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

OCT 24 1933

Boston Orchestra In Ann Arbor Tonight

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and its director, Serge Koussevitsky, will present the opening in this season's Choral Union Series tonight in the Hill Auditorium in Ann Arbor.

Koussevitsky, who is renowned for his musical innovations and his fostering of modern composers, is regarded as having one of the three finest orchestras in the country. He has paid annual visits to Ann Arbor regularly for several years and the audiences are comprised of as many visitors from Detroit and the state as local residents.

Several new numbers are on tonight's programme which will begin at 8:15 exactly.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER

24 1933

LAST NIGHT'S MEMORABLE performance of the Boston Symphony Concert in Orchestra Hall, was more than just an exquisite concert for Mrs. Andrew M. Sherriff! She had heard the Bostonians play many, many times, for her father, the late Bernard Listeman, was one of the founders of the orchestra, with Maj. Henry L. Higginson, back in 1881, and one of its first concert masters.

Mr. Philip Hale, annotater for the Boston programs for many years, and his wife were in the audience with Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Ganz, who are giving a tea this afternoon at the Pearson for them.

* * *

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 24 1933

Concert Fans Offered Vote

All concertgoers who take advantage of the opportunity occasioned by the appearance at Memorial Hall Thursday of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will find included in their program a new feature. This is an opportunity "to elect their favorite symphony orchestras for next year's season.

Five orchestras are named on the "ballot" printed on the program's first page. Patrons are asked to vote, expressing their preference by marking first, second and third choices among such organizations as the Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Cleveland orchestras.

Patrons are also asked to indicate the number of orchestral concerts they will attend next year; that is, how many they think Columbus should have.

Dr. Koussevitzky's 110-man organization starts the season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio with a program designed to please the jaded concertgoes. Beethoven's "Eroica" and the initial presentation in Columbus of Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy," Opus 54, and the Mozart serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," are included.

Season tickets to include the January appearance of the Cleveland group and its new conductor, Arthur Rodzinski, are on sale at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 23 1933

Newcomer Is Placed At Honored Position

A comparative newcomer among the 110 musicians of the personnel in the distinguished Boston Symphony Orchestra is George Boettcher, the first French horn. He came to play under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky five years ago after a carer in central European orchestras.

The Boston's young first harpist, Bernard Zingara, on the other hand, has accumulated an enviable reputation in a very brief career. He is still under 30 years of age.

Something of a paradox is this Zingara, who was born in Paris of a Rumanian father anr a Polish mother, neither of whom was musical. He was a consistent prize winner during his student days at Paris Conservatoire. He has two brothers whose musicianship rival his own.

The Boston orchestra opens the season for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday evening. Wednesday marked the opening of the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. Season tickets, including the post-holiday appearance of the Cleveland orchestra, are available.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 24 1933

ARTISTS TO COMPETE

Students Will Attend Concert By Boston Symphony.

One hundred art students will again compete for the awards offered for transposition of heard melody into pictured design or portrait when they are guests of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio Thursday evening at Memorial Hall.

Some of them will be recording their second impressions of a performance of the Boston orchestra as this "fusion of the arts" experiment was successfully carried out at both of last year's concerts.

Mrs. B. Gwynn Huntington, president of the Symphony Club, is offering two prizes for the most interesting "impression."

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

OCT 24 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra which will open the artist series of concerts at Memorial hall at 8:30 on Wednesday evening, has the unique distinction of being the best living virtuoso of the double bass, but also the only one of his time. So great was the musical genius of this man that whatever he might have turned to he would soon have reached the limit of its possibilities. Therefore he seems to have chosen wisely in selecting the role of orchestra conductor with its inxhaustible possibilities. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then having independent means, assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, giving a memorable series of concerts there and in Petrograd.

Tickets are now on sale for the Boston symphony orchestra concert, at the Sterzer Jewelry Co., 26 West Second street. Any one still desiring to secure season tickets for the entire series including also Kreisler, on November 10th, Rachmaninoff, November 21 and the Wiener Saengerknaben, December 6th can do so. Send orders to Patricia O'Brien, phone FUlton 9432.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

MEMORIAL HALL—The Artist Series of Concerts which are presenting the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevisky Fritz Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, and the Wiener Saenger Knaben, this season will open the course on Wednesday evening at 8:30 in Memorial hall with the Boston orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's first Russian conductor, was born in 1874 in the small central Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except from small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself to the Philharmonic school in Moscow. There was no place for the penniless young applicant, but authorities at once sensed his unusual qualities and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him, for a student of the double bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass with its first-wise bow. This was the Koussevitcky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then as now he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Soon Koussevitsky was giving recitals all over Europe. Finding no concerto for the instrument, he wrote one and played it with the principal orchestras. Very soon after his he turned his aspirations to orchestral conducting.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may now be secured from Patricia O'Brien at 26 W. Second st. (Sterzer Jewelry Co.). Phone FU-9432.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 24 1933

Koussevitzky's Tenth Season

THIS is the tenth season of Serge Koussevitzky, as the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which the Symphony club brings to Columbus, Thursday night. His tenure of the conductorship now exceeds in length any continuous term of a previous conductor. Features are planned for the anniversary season, which is the fifty-third of the great orchestra.

When Koussevitzky came to this orchestra in 1924, he had a sensational European reputation to command him to the American public. He had organized his own orchestra in Russia, and given monumental concerts in many cities. Later, in France, he founded the Concerts Koussevitzky, which came to be the talk of Paris. His occasional guest appearances in other cities were equally outstanding.

Through nine years, Dr. Kossevitzky has gradually made the Boston Symphony orchestra his own. He has brought fine talent to its ranks until they have become an assemblage of virtuosos probably without a match anywhere. He has shaped the ensemble into an ever more perfect instrument to express his will. He has developed an incandescent tone quality which is the distinguishing mark of this orchestra before all others. He has produced an immense repertory, missing none of the great classics, and making the Boston Symphony concerts the acknowledged gathering point of what is truly vital and significant in the music that is now being composed.

Koussevitzky approaches his tenth season with fresh zeal for new achievement. He is the conductor with whom, where quality of performance and beauty of interpretation is concerned, there is no such word as "sufficient."

Tickets are available daily at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 24 1933

FIRST ATTRACTION OF THE ARTIST SERIES IN DAYTON.

The first concert of the Dayton Artist Series, which will be given in that city, will attract the musically minded of Ohio and Kentucky to that near-by city. It is natural that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in the Gem City on Wednesday, should arouse widespread enthusiasm. An unusually fine program adds fresh interest to this attraction and will bring many parties of music lovers from Cincinnati and Louisville to join the Dayton enthusiasts who will crowd Memorial Hall to overflowing.

Among the Cincinnatians who are making arrangements to motor to Dayton for this event are Mr. and Mrs. Thuman, their daughter, Miss Mary Rose, and their guests, Mrs. Joseph Ryan and Mrs. H. H. Smith. Others from here who will also be found among Koussevitsky's admirers in Dayton's audience are: Mr. A. O. Palm, Mr. Abner Thorp, Dr. Julien Benjamin, Mrs. S. Meiss, Dr. R. W. Staley, Misses Louise and Eleanor Wilby, Misses Dorothy and Gwendolyn Rawson, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Cross, Miss Gertrude Englander who will have six others in her party, Mr. Milton Marx, Mr. H. M. Ritchey, and Miss Mary Hartwell.

Eager groups from Louisville will likewise acclaim the opening of the Dayton Artist Series. Their own series, also ably managed by Mr. Thuman, opens on Friday, under the sponsorship of the Louisville Junior League. With these splendid concerts in prospect, Cincinnati and its vicinity can look forward with keen anticipation to a superb musical season.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 24 1933

Symphony at Chicago World Fair Tonight

Boston Orchestra to Come Here Saturday Directly From Tour of Cities to the West

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which the Civic Music Association is bringing to Schenectady Saturday, will tonight make the only appearance of a visiting symphony orchestra at the Century of Progress Exposition at Chicago. Following that concert the orchestra will complete its western tour of Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Dayton, Plattsburgh and will play here Saturday at 8:30 o'clock in the RKO- Plaza Theater.

The theater, which has been closed for some time, is being opened and prepared for the occasion and a special rostrum is being constructed for Conductor Serge Koussevitzsky, who will make his first appearance in Schenectady. Dr. Koussevitzsky, who has now been with the orchestra longer than any of his famous predecessors, Henschel, Muck, Monteux, is beginning his 10th year with the organization.

When the Russian conductor came to Boston in 1924 he had a sensational European reputation, had organized his own orchestra in Russia and been decorated by the czar, had founded the "Concerts Koussevitzsky," which came to be the talk of musical France and had given sensational concerts throughout Europe. Under his direction the Boston orchestra's famed precision, ensemble and tonal beauty have excelled even its most glorious past.

For nine years Dr. Koussevitzsky has gradually made the group his own, bringing fine talent to its ranks until it has become an assemblage of virtuosos probably without a match anywhere, an even more perfect instrument to express his will. This splendid technical achievement is but the starting point toward still subtler beauties and deeper significance of interpretation.

Dr. Koussevitzsky has become the greatest living exponent of Sibelius and of Tchaikovsky, whose fifth symphony he will direct here Saturday night.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 24 1933

Boston Orchestra To Play Saturday

Albanians Expected to Attend Opening Music Association Event

Hundreds of Albany Civic Music Association members are arranging their affairs to permit attendance in Schenectady Saturday night at the first local appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in many seasons.

The orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, opens the season for the Schenectady Civic Music Association at the RKO Plaza Theatre in State Street, Schenectady, opposite Crescent Park.

The program, announced in full today, is to open with "Eine Kilene Nachtmusik" (Night Music) for strings by Mozart. It is in four movements, allegro, romanzo, menuetto-allegro and rondo-allegro.

The prelude from Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" will follow and then "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Richard Strauss. Olin Downes, noted critic, characterized the latter number not long ago as "music with quicksilver in it."

The second part of the program will be occupied by Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. The movements are andante-allegro con animo, andante-cantabile, valse and finale. The audience has been requested to refrain from interrupting the symphony with applause.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 24 1933

Boston Symphony orchestra to adorn NBC network soon.

Fabien Sevitzky is nephew of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 24 1933

Boston Symphony Program Announced

There is great interest in the first concert of the Schenectady Civic Music Association to be given Saturday night at 8:30 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, at RKO Plaza. As the concert is open only to members of the association and out-of-town guests, members must secure tickets for out-of-town guests from Mrs. H. J. Schauffler, financial secretary, phone 4-9695. The box office will not be open the night of the concert. The complete program follows:

"Eine Kliene Nachtmusick" for string orchestra .... Mozart Allegro.
Romanzo.
Menuetto: Allegro.
Rondo: Allegro.
Prelude to opera, "Khovantchina" .... Mussorgsky
"Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegel" .... Richard Strauss
Intermission.
"Fifth Symphony" .. Tchaikovsky
Andante: Allegro con anima.
Andante contabile.
Valse.
Finale.

* * *

---

nee Reviews New Films
ey Reach Chicago Screens

 17

Noted Boston Symphony Is Greeted Here

Program Shows 3 Phases of Excellence.

Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in concert at Orchestra hall Monday, Oct. 23. The program:

Mozart—Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (Serenade for String Orchestra).

Stravinsky—Le Sacre du Printemps (The Rite of Spring).

Sibelius—Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 43.

BY EDWARD MOORE.

For the first time in some four years the Boston Symphony orchestra and its eminent conductor paid a visit to Chicago last night. It was a long time between trips, but they were welcome guests bringing something interesting with them.

Such playing was good to hear. This is an admirable organization, excellent in tone, alert in bearing, full of all the merits of a fine orchestra in suave melody, brilliant performance, smashing climax. Over them always was Dr. Koussevitzky, an energetic, dominating personality, directing a phrase with his baton, shaping it with his left hand,

Though the three compositions which made up the program have no particular connection with each other —Mozart to Stravinsky, for instance, is quite a musical and emotional jump —they are three works which take high rating in the annals of performances by this orchestra. They show three phases of virtuosity in performance.

The Mozart music was all golden glow of melody and string tone, gentle, persuasive, bright, delightful. What came next was none of these, but rather their reverse.

The music of the theater, which is Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," super-music of a super-theater, if you like, has a peculiar effect. Hearing it again after an interval of some eight years, one realized that few themes are easier to forget than these. Yet as it went on, the same huge ballet picture began to be conjured up, a primitive landscape, primitive people with primitive emotions. Perhaps Stravinsky forgot to include a hint about some primitive animals as well, though the music could have well carried them, a few hairy mammoths, saber-toothed tigers, a couple of huge saurians and a diplodocus or two. Here was a performance both stirring and hypnotizing as well.

Back to civilization again with the Sibelius symphony, pastoral life in Finland, TWELVE CHICAGO HERALD AND EXAMINER --- A

Serge Koussevitzky and His Boston Symphony Come to Chicago and Conquer Their Audience

CONDUCTOR'S MAGIC BRINGS HARMONY OUT OF DISSONANCE

By Glenn Dillard Gunn.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, fulfilled the high expectations of the multitude that gathered in Orchestra Hall last night to hear him and his noted ensemble.

He is one of the gerat dramatists of the baton, one of the inspired masters of the orchestral address. But though his art is personal in its force, its sincerity, its theater, and in the fine and active imagination that discovers such varied and stimulating means of display, such high adventure, in the staid and heretofore solemn world of the symphony, it is nevertheless based on a brilliant and impeccable technic.

No conductor communicates his intentions with greater precision His beat is as unmistakable as it is eloquent. In consequence, the ensemble of the Boston orchestra retains its infallibility in the classic purity and serenity of Mozart, the turmoil of Stravinsky or the noble symphonic drama of Sibelius.

* * *

THE PROGRAM which Dr Koussevitzky announced was made up of these seemingly irreconcilable contradictions. Mozart's innocent and altogether delightful serenade for strings prefaced Stravinsky's pageant of pagan Russia misleadingly known as "The Rite of Spring." The Finnish master's second symphony completed the list. One read it and said, "What a badly balanced program!" One heard it and said, "How interesting! How nice! How stimulating!"

For the Mozart, despite its serenity, was vital. Its song radiated a spiritual impulse that held the attention and stirred the sympathies. It was an exhibition of string tone that for variety, for subtle nuance, for lightness that yet was strong and firm in texture, for contrasts both in quality and in range, kept the listener alert, yet never exceeded the limits of the classic pattern. It recaptured the immortal spirit of the composer, surely the most joyous the art has known.

* * *

THE TRANSITION from the lovely fragility of Mozart to the somber brutality of Stravinsky proved unexpectedly easy. For "The Rite of Spring," once deemed the most anarchistic collection of dissonances ever released within the concert hall, begins as music. Under Koussevitzky's baton the introduction to the first part proved quite simple as to its tunes and by no means an insoluble riddle in its harmonic structure.

The tunes are not first class nor are the harmonies beautiful. But they foreshadow the elements of a drama in rhythmic cacophony that surely represents the climax of the dissonant school, which we so devoutly believe is modern, and being modern, must be worth while. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky's gift to discover and project all varieties of pulse and of qualitative and dynamic contrast could make the work as a whole other than monotonous. Had it ended with the first division the impression might have been different. But unrelieved dissonance, such as develops in the finale, exhausts itself and spends all the listener's reactions.

It is, of course, not music. It is a drama of noise, meant to have the definition of the ballet and the stage picture. Deprived of these the loss yet was small. For the fascination of Koussevitzky's graphic and facile beat, the flexibility of his orchestral speech, the disciplined riot of sound, the ordered tumult of this bedlam of growling horns, shrieking wood-winds, thudding percussions and wailing strings, was as stimulating as any dance could have been.

* * *

NEVERTHELESS the Sibelius symphony came as a relief. It is an early work, written over thirty years ago, but more truly modern than Stravinsky, for all the latter's mastery of atonal dissonance. For if the melodies of the young Sibelius are fine in feeling, rhythmically interesting, and immediately comprehendable, the harmonic texture is of such delightfully unexpected quality that it surely will never become old.

Koussevitzky stressed this harmonic color at every moment. He decked it out with all the hues of a rich orchestral palette. He discovered rhythms that pulsed and glowed behind and through it. He drew across it translucent veils of counter melody. It was orchestral pageantry and drama, too, with a constant dilation and contraction of sonorities in infinitely varied contrast, a series of noble climaxes, expertly prepared and delivered with all the persuasive ardor of a great tonal orator.

* * *

THE CONCERT made a profound impression. It was heard by an audience that filled the hall. It was acclaimed with conviction. It should react to restore the concert-going habit among music-loving Chicagoans, which a combination of the unsatisfactory but accessible radio and hard times has done much to discourage.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

HONOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Exhibit in Boston Commemorates 10th Anniversary as Conducter.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is observing Dr. Koussevitsky's 10th anniversary as conductor by showing at Symphony Hall, in Boston, a collection of portrayals, parchments, manuscripts, relating to his career.

Paintings and sculptures show portrayals of Dr. Koussevitsky in various moods and varying modes.

Interesting, from the human side, is the bust modeled by Madame Koussevitzky. How does the conductor look to his wife? Not heroic, not defiant, not self-assertive, but thoughtful, anguished, poetic. In such impressionistic manner as is characteristic of the Rodin school, she has manipulated the clay, molding it freely in curves and lumps, emphasizing contours and playing up the emotoinal element.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 25 1933

ORCHESTRA ARRIVES TODAY.

Boston Symphony In Dayton For Concert Tonight.

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Dayton, Ohio, October 24—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Dayton tomorrow to open the Artist Series at the Memorial Hall, Wednesday night.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, has planned a special program for the occasion.

J. Herman Thuman, of Cincinnati, and Patricia O'Brien, of Dayton, in charge of the series will bring to Dayton in addition to the Boston organization, Fritz Kreisler, violinist, November 10; Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist, November 21, and the Singing Boys of Vienna, Wiener Saengerknaben, at a date not definitely fixed.

Wednesday, October 25, 1933.

THE COLUMBUS DISPATCH

Art Students Are Asked To Illustrate Symphony

REPETITION of the innovation sponsored by the Symphony club of central Ohio last season, when it invited students of the Columbus Art school as its guests to take notes on their impressions received from the symphony's sound and to transpose that impression through the medium of their art into a design, sketch or portrait, is scheduled for this Thursday evening.

One hundred art students will be the club's guests when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raises his baton and the dulcet introduction of Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" opens the Thursday evening program to be presented in Memorial hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra and its distinguished leader.

Prizes for the pictured symphonic patterns judged most laudable are to be awarded by Mrs. B. Cwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

INSPIRATION ENOUGH

MUCH inspirational material for artistic transposition appears inherent in the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his inimitable 110-man organization will present. Titles of the numbers are unusually pictorial, one notices, as the programing of Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy" (being played for the first time in Columbus) is glimpsed between the Mozart serenade and the symphony, Beethoven's richly hued "Eroica."

Thursday evening's concert is to start promptly at 8:15.

Season tickets—in which the January appearance of the Cleveland orchestra, with its new director, Artur Rodzinski, is included—are on sale at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 25 1933

Art Students Are Asked To Illustrate Symphony

REPETITION of the innovation sponsored by the Symphony club of central Ohio last season, when it invited students of the Columbus Art school as its guests to take notes on their impressions received from the symphony's sound and to transpose that impression through the medium of their art into a design, sketch or portrait, is scheduled for this Thursday evening.

One hundred art students will be the club's guests when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raises his baton and the dulcet introduction of Mozart's serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" opens the Thursday evening program to be presented in Memorial hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra and its distinguished leader.

Prizes for the pictured symphonic patterns judged most laudable are to be awarded by Mrs. B. Cwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

INSPIRATION ENOUGH

MUCH inspirational material for artistic transposition appears inherent in the program Dr. Koussevitzky and his inimitable 110-man organization will present. Titles of the numbers are unusually pictorial, one notices, as the programing of Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy" (being played for the first time in Columbus) is glimpsed between the Mozart serenade and the symphony, Beethoven's richly hued "Eroica."

Thursday evening's concert is to start promptly at 8:15.

Season tickets—in which the January appearance of the Cleveland orchestra, with its new director, Artur Rodzinski, is included—are on sale at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

25 1933

BOSTONIANS

FIRST-CHAIRS — George Boettcher, French horn, and Harpist Bernard Zingara are of 110-member Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing Thursday night in Memorial Hall under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction. The seat sale continues at Symphony Club's box office in Carl Koch Co.

Other Chicago notices
Dayton
Buffalo
Schenectady
Columbus
at end of book

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 25 1933

Boston Symphony Plays Here Wednesday On Tour That Has Taken It to Chicago

More Than 100 Musicians Travel in Three Special Pullmans.

Serge Koussevitzky.

By R. L. F. M'COMBS.

Within an hour after the closing notes of last Saturday's concert at Symphony Hall in Boston, Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were on a train, bound for a week of concert in the middle west.

The hundred-odd musicians occupy three special Pullmans. Their baggage, which includes upwards of $25,000 worth of instruments, also has its special car.

The brief tour, which brings the musicians to Columbus Thursday evening, began Sunday afternoon at Buffalo. Monday evening they played in Chicago. They are, incidentally, the only "outside" orchestra to play in that city during the Century of Progress Exposition. Tuesday they played at Ann Arbor, Wednesday finds them at Dayton, Thursday here, Friday in Pittsburgh, Saturday in Schenectady.

Home Next Sunday.

They will return to Boston next Sunday morning.

Dr. Koussevitzky (he gained the "doctor" from Brown University in 1926, from Harvard in 1929) is one of the most interesting of present-day musical personalities as well as one of the most distinguished.

He was born in 1874 in a remote province of Northern Russia. His parents were poor, but both had musical taste and ability. Young Serge allowed nothing to stand in the way of his ambition to excel in music.

Even as a child, he attended the small theater of his native town, helping with the music, playing in the pit or arranging entr'acte interludes. If the traveling musicians had anything to offer he was known to escape from home for days and follow them to other towns in order to pick up what they could teach him. When only 13 he was made director of the theater orchestra.

"Only a Double-Bass."

But presently, Dr. Koussevitzky was in Moscow, a bundle on his back, nothing in his pocket and determination in his heart. There, in the conservatory to which he tried to gain admittance, every scholarship pupil was required to study some orchestral instrument. When he arrived nothing was available but the double-bass.

The boy, now only 14, was only half as high as the instrument he was to master. In five months' time he had galloped through a course that was supposed to occupy five years. At 15 he played a solo in the school concert, at 18 he was leading the basses in the Imperial Theater Orchestra, at 20 he accepted a professorship of the double-bass at the Philharmonic School.

He already was a great virtuoso of the awkward instrument, playing it with all the sublety of a great cellist. Although in these days he seldom plays it, he always keeps a priceless Guarnerius double-bass near him at his Paris or his Boston home.

Organized Orchestra.

With fame, thus early, came prosperity. Presently, he had organized his own orchestra and, in the summer months, was taking it on a huge houseboat up the great rivers of Russia, playing in villages which had never known anything but peasant music. To them he played Beethoven and Schubert, Handel and Brahms, as well as the Russian composers.

The end of the war, the downfall of the old Russia, found him in Paris where he organized the "Concerts Koussevitzky," found him as guest conductor of the great orchestras of Western Europe. In 1924, he was called to the leadership of the Boston Symphony, a famous organization then in its 43rd year.

His 10 years there have been years of growing glory for both orchestra and conductor. His marked characteristics are his friendliness to new music (including American music) and his freedom with the classics. He is noted for his ability to excite an audience by goading his orchestra to a sort of furious eloquence.

A Task Master.

More Than $25,000 Worth Of Instruments Carried by Orchestra.

As a task master he is indefatigable. For the Corelli suite for strings with which he opened his Columbus program last season, he was said to have required 28 rehearsals.

At one concert last winter, an oboist went astray in a spot which was quite noticeable to musicians in the audience. When his attention was called to it afterward, Dr. Koussevitzky merely said, "Since I have been conductor of the Boston orchestra, I have replaced 51 players. If that occurs again in public, I will have replaced 52."

All of which no doubt accounts for the superiority of his aggregation, commonly conceded to be one of the first three or four orchestras in the United States, which is to say, in the world.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 25 1933

Boston Programs

There will be no home concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra this week, as the organization is on an exacting tour. Monday evening it gave a concert in Orchestra hall, Chicage, when Mr. Koussevitzky presented Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" which was the feature of the concerts in Boston last week. Sunday the orchestra played in Buffalo and the tour for the week includes Ann Arbor, Dayton, Columbus, Pittsburgh and Schenectady.

At the Boston concerts next week Egon Petri will be assisting pianist in Mozart's Concerto in E flat. The supplementary matinee series opens next Tuesday afternoon, beginning the promised Beethoven cycle.

The Rite of Spring

Listening to Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" as Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it in Symphony hall last Friday afternoon, it was easy to understand that on its first presentation in Paris it aroused the conservative to a storm of noisy protest. Pagan and barbarous it surely is, if not primitive in the musical sense. There it is certainly a marked departure from the conventional forms. If the history of the composition is understood aright, Stravinsky set his subject to music without any specific thought of the choreography, or the problems of the ballet. The dancers were left to adapt themselves to the music, although the story of the pagan maid sacrificed to dance herself to death gave the cue. Much of the music is overpowering in its intensity. Brass and a reinforced percussion section are worked to the limit. Of the strings sheer virtuosity is demanded. And on Friday that superb section of the orchestra gave it. There was the impression that heard in connection with the action of the stage the strenuosity of the music would have been less oppressive than when it is heard simply as symphonic music. It was not difficult to visualize the thrill of the dance. At this late day it does not alarm conservative Boston. But that the composition is still a subject of controversy was evident from the animated discussion in the corridors during intermission. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky played it to the hilt. And with it held the attention of the large audience, classicists and modernists alike. It suggested to one hearer "After Repeal."

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

OCT 25 1933

Noted Musician In Forum Series

A music appreciation program of such quality that the artist was called by presidential request to perform in the White House before the nation's chief executives is to be presented to a Meriden audience on November 20, when the Meriden Community forum is to bring to this city Paul Shirley, for eighteen years a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and now conductor of the Little Symphony orchestra of the foremost players of the larger Symphony.

Paul Shirley

Mr. Shirley is to give to the forum audience his famous illustrated lecture, "The Romance of Music," in which this nationally-known musician, with the aid of many rare slides, depicts the history of music, from the old Oriental sources of our modern strings, wood-winds, brasses and percussions, through the development of the piano from the old bible psaltery, and the story back of the modern organ. Mr. Shirley is to bring with him pictures of old wood-cuts and engravings, master paintings, quaint forgotten instruments and their players, and much other rare material.

Mr. Shirley is to conclude his presentation with intimate character-studies of the great composers from Bach to MacDowell.

The Boston Symphony soloist comes to Meriden with an interesting musical background. At the age of twenty-one, he was appointed a member of the famous court chapel in Weimar. At twenty-three he was elected solo viola at the Court theater in Darmstadt. Following an invitation from Siegfried Wagner, he joined in this capacity the Wagner Festival orchestra in Bayreuth, where he also appeared in chamber music in Richard Wagner's home.

He is both an author and composer of nation-wide note. Through his association with some of the great musical institutions of Europe, Mr. Shirley has enjoyed the rare privilege of knowing personally many of the outstanding figures of the classical school—Dr. Karl Muck, Siegfried Wagner, Max Schillings, and others. Later, as a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he has played under the direction of the composers themselves the works of D'Indy, Casella, Stravinsky and Resphigi.

In spite of this wealth of technical musical tradition, Mr. Shirley's outstanding qualification has been to make his musical subject clear and interesting to the layman, who has only the average man's knowledge of music.

Endorsed by the General Federation of Women's clubs, Mr. Shirley's presentation has been given, not only in the White House, but also at Harvard, Yale, New Hampshire, Miami, and other universities; Smith, Bryn Mawr, Goucher, Bowdoin, Amherst and other colleges, as well as the music clubs of Boston, Newport, New York, Pittsburgh, Providence, Rochester and other large cities.

Through an unfortunate misunderstanding, forum folders have included the statement that a short recital will be included in the evening program. Word has come from Mr. Shirley that his illustrated story of music occupies a full evening, making impossible the addition of a recital as well.

Increasing inquiries reveal a great interest in the coming forum series, which is to be held in the high school auditorium on Monday evenings starting November 6. Events preceding Mr. Shirley's visit are to be presentations by Frederic Snyder, famed news commentator; Dr. E. C. Lindeman, associate editor of the New Republic, and the Harvard university debating team in one of its major contests.

Registration for the course may be made at the Meriden, Wallingford or Southington Public Libraries, the Y. M. C. A., or Upham's Lynch's or Quinlan's stores.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 25 1933

Koussevitzky and Boston.

One Russian finishes a program and another readies a new one, and the return Friday night of Serge Koussevitzky and his beautiful Boston Symphony, makes Friday a red-letter day.

It is a striking program Sergus 1st has prepared, with the Tschaikowsky No. 5 being the major work. Then follows a serenade for strings, Mozart's ineffable "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and if you know the Boston strings, you know how opulent that will be.

The balance of the program is Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and the familiar Straus "Till Eulenspiegel."

A capacity Mosque should greet the Boston Orchestra, no finer ensemble will be heard here this year.

Thus sayeth the deponent.

MERIDEN, CONN.
JOURNAL

OCT 25 1933

FORUM TO BRING MUSICAL ARTIST HERE ON NOV. 20

Paul Shirley To Give Lecture On 'Romance of Music'

A music appreciation program of such quality that the artist was called by presidential request to perform in the White House before the nation's chief executive is to be presented to a Meriden audeince on November 20 when the Meriden Community Forum is to bring to this city Paul Shirley, for eighteen years a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and now conductor of the Little Symphony orchestra of foremost players of the larger symphony.

Mr. Shirley is to give to the Forum audience his famous illustrated lecture, the "Romance of Music," in which this nationally-known musician, with the aid of many rare slides, depicts the history of music, from the old Oriental sources of our modern strings, wood-winds, brasses and percussions, through the development of the piano from the old Bible psaltery, and the story back of the modern organ. He is to bring with him pictures of old wood-cuts and engravings, master paintings, quaint forgotten instruments and their players, and much other rare material.

Mr. Shirley is to conclude his presentation with intimate character-studies of the great composers from Bach to MacDowell.

Con't on next Line

The Boston Symphony soloist comes to Meriden with an interesting musical background. At the age of twenty-one, he was appointed a member of the famous Court Chapel in Weimar. At twenty-three he was elected solo viola at the Court theatre in Darmstadt. Following an invitation from Siegfried Wagner, he joined in this capacity the Wagner Festival orchestra in Bayreuth, where he also appeared in Chamber music in Richard Wagner's home.

He is both an author and composer of nation-wide note. Through his association with some of the great musical institutions of Europe, Mr. Shirley has enjoyed the rare privilege of knowing personally many of the outstanding figures of the classical school—Dr. Karl Muck, Siegfried Wagner, Max Schillings, and others. Later, as a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he played under the direction of the composers themselves the works of D'Indy, Casella, Stravinsky and Resphigi.

In spite of this wealth of technical musical tradition, Mr. Shirley's outstanding qualification has been to make his musical subject clear and interesting to the layman who has only the average man's knowledge of music.

Endorsed by the General Federation of Women's clubs, Mr. Shirley's presentation has been given not only in the White House but also at Harvard, Yale, New Hampshire, Miami, and other universities; Smith, Bryn Mawr, Goucher, Bowdoin, Amherst and other colleges, as well as the music clubs of Boston, Newport, New York, Pittsburgh, Providence, Rochester and other large cities.

Through an unfortunate misunderstanding, Forum folders have included the statement that a short recital will be included in the evening's program. Word has come from Mr. Shirley that his illustrated story of music occupies a full evening, making impossible the addition of a recital as well.

Increasing inquiries reveal a great interest in the coming Forum series, which is to be held in the high school auditorium on Monday evenings, starting November 6. Events preceding Mr. Shirley's visit are to be presentations by Frederic Synder, famed news commentator; Dr. E. C. Lindeman, associate editor of the New Republic, and the Harvard University debating team in one of its major contests.

Registration for the course may be made at the Meriden, Wallingford, Southington Public Libraries, the Y. M. C. A. or Upham's, Lynch's or Quinlan's stores.

Boston Orchestra Thrills Enthusiastic Audience

Ann Arbor Tribune October 25, 1933

First Concert of Choral Union Series Tremendous Success Here Last Night

(By Ruth Gallmeyer)

Music lovers of the city heard a brilliant opening of the fifty-fifth annual Choral Union concert series presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, last night in Hill auditorium. The great audience was held spell-bound by the masterly performance of the orchestra as a unit and the superb conducting of Mr. Koussevitsky.

The program opened with "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" a serenade for string orchestra, by Mozart. This was followed by "Le Sacre du Printemps," or "The Rite of Spring," by the great modern composer, Igor Stravinsky, played for the first time in Ann Arbor. Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C. Minor, opus 68, was the concluding number.

Stravinsky's ballet was perhaps the outstanding number on the program as it was new to local audiences and so modern as to defy many of the established principles of music. The composer, who was born near Leningrad, Russia in 1882, has depicted pagan Russia in music which works upon the primitive emotions and uses savage harmonies and rhythms to obtain its effect.

The work is written in two parts, the first of which is called "The Fertility of the Earth" and the second "The Sacrifice." In the first division comes an introduction and a series of dances including the Harbingers of Spring, the Dance of the Adolescents, the Abduction, the Spring Rounds, the Games of Rival Cities, the Procession of the Wise Men, and the Dance of the Earth. The second division has an introduction followed by the following dances: The Mystic Circle of the Adolescents, the Glorification of the Chosen One, the Evocation of the Ancestors, the Ritual Performance of the Ancestors, and the Sacrificial Dance of the Chosen One. The whole theme of this last part is the selection of a young girl who must be sacrificed to Spring by dancing to her death.

The orchestra last night gave a rendition of this number which showed a depth of understanding and feeling. The slow introduction to the first part, which some commentators have said reveals the "mystery of the physical world at spring" was played by

(Continued On Page Six)

DUNN. WEIMER

First Concert of Choral Union Series Tremendous Success Here Last Night

(Continued from Page One)

the woodwind instruments, with the trumpets breaking into the faster dance movements which followed. Deep, majestic sadness pervaded the second division, particularly the introduction or prelude; the throbbing notes of the great orchestra seemed heavy with the oppression of a Nature which demands its sacrifice from human beings.

Nine Concerts Remain

Nine more outstanding attractions remain on the Choral Union program. Fritz Kreisler, the world's most renowned and best-loved violinist, will give a concert here Thursday, November 9. He will be followed on Wednesday, November 22, by the Vienna Boys choir under the direction of Georg Gruber. The Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, with Eugene Goossens as conductor, will appear Tuesday, December 5, and Maria Olszewska, contralto, will sing Thursday, December 14.

The first concert of the new year will be given Thursday, January 18, by Sergi Rachmaninoff, the great pianist. Lily Pons, sensational young soprano of the Metropolitan Opera company, is scheduled for a concert Monday, January 29, while Poldi Mildner, young Viennese pianist, is to present her recital on Thursday, February 15. The Detroit Symphony orchestra, with Ossip Gabrilowitsch conducting, will play here Wednesday, February 21, and Gregor Piatigorsky, violincellist, is to conclude the concert series on Tuesday, March 6.

Michigan Daily

Musical Events

October 25, 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Koussevitsky! Director of a great orchestra!

Koussevitsky, before he settled down to the performance, seemed happy to be back at Hill Auditorium. The audience, certainly, was glad to see him at this first concert.

The small string orchestra gave the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusick" a vigorous, bright interpretation, true to the Mozart tradition of clarity and graciousness. There was an astringent quality to it, with the top violin-voices singing out over the others in the fashion of the time of the piece. There was no yielding to tempting lyric spots, but a swing and zest that at once established a bond between the performers and listeners.

Then came the Stravinsky! Either Americans are becoming inured to dissonances and outspoken tonal statements, or else they are not as sure of their likes and dislikes as Italians and French, for instance for the Rites of Spring was accepted enthusiastically, yet with private reservations. It appreciated the barbarous spirit of the work, though some, perhaps most, of the Rites remained harsh and startling in its clash and its queer little fragments. Koussevitsky urged it on, and on, with whirls of rhythm and dissonance and spurts of color. This last, particularly, was an outstanding characteristic, that of differentiation of tone qualities, even in full orchestra passages. (A full orchestra it was, too). Contrasts of mood were emphasized. the "spontaneous" bursts of energy, the anticipatory fragments of melody, the movement into strong pulses from disjointedness, each were given their moments.

The Brahms, under Koussevitsky, took on a drive and direction, that in others' readings becomes lost in its length. The second movement, played at a slower speed than was expected, held together. Again, the color, the quality of instrumental individualities was brought out, and gave an arresting point to otherwise hidden spots. The basses, a renowned section of this orchestra, deepened and gave a foundation to the Brahms, especially satisfying.

The concert had more significance than a concert, a series of pieces, played on an October evening. Koussevitsky gave it a unifying basis of human interest. A summary of varieties of humanity lay there. The social aspect, the cream of life, having no problems, appeared in the Mozart. The atavistic temperament raged through the Rites of Spring, and the humane individual, with ideals, and hopes, finally realized, underlay the Brahms. The point is, that, sure enough, man is a gay, witty, social and altogether delightful creature, without cares, without struggles, and, sure enough, man is an animal, a natural being, but, beyond that, man is a rationalizing growing, striving organism, with a pattern of life that must expand, and be realized. That one man could with a single program bring together these aspects and then demonstrate the was the achievement of last night's concert. It was rare. It was thrilling.

—Sally Place.

Ann Arbor Daily Oct. 25-33

Boston Orchestra Is Widely Acclaimed at Auditorium

Koussevitzky Conducts Men in Splendid Concert; Event Is Varied

By Carl E. Gehring

As those who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra play here during the past two seasons might have supposed he would, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again led his organization in a glorious concert Tuesday evening at Hill auditorium, inaugurating this city's fifty-fifth annual Choral Union Concert series. Koussevitzky's readings of Mozart's Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for String Orchestra, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor were brilliant and compelling, the orchestra was at its usual best, and the throng which crowded the auditorium to near-capacity was receptive in the extreme.

Two factors made the event one to be remembered in local musical annals. First there was this orchestra. While it is getting to be a cliche to report on the excellence of these musicians and their inspired leader, we may as well repeat the old story by saying that these men lived up to all that we have gotten to expect from them. Dr. Charles A. Sink's apparent plan to have them come here once a year has our hearty approval. In regard to the second factor, this had to do with the first Ann Arbor hearing of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." This monumental modern work, although late in reaching our city, was most welcome despite the sinister way it glowered out at us from between the genial Mozart and Brahms.

Mozart Heard First

Be this as it may, the concert started with a rather matter-of-fact reading of the Mozart Serenade. While it was chronologically fitting to begin with "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," we might have expected Koussevitzky to follow this with the Brahms Symphony and conclude with the Stravinsky. However, with the reverse order of things being the case, we were assured of the proverbially happy ending, which was playing safe. In any case, Koussevitzky's seeming detachment with this Serenade was interesting if not quite in accord with our idea of Mozart, the performance showing us the composer in one of his delightful moods and again emphasizing how vibrant is the string section of this orchestra.

To proceed chronologically in terms of musical history if not in terms of the concert, certain features of Koussevitzky's Brahms engaged us. While this conductor seldom falls into the exaggeration which so often typifies Stokowski, Koussevitzky letting the music speak for itself, as, indeed, it should, he introduced some departures from the usual run of First Symphony performances First, there was the pronounced retard with which he ended the first movement; second, his repeating the second part of the trio from the third movement was unusual; third, the dash of counterpoint which accompanied the restatement of the theme in the clarinet in this Allegretto Grazioso and then was absorbed in the harmonic texture is an apparent addition of Koussevitzky's; fourth, the accelerando which sets in during the pizzicato sections of the introduction to the finale was overdone; fifth, we have yet to hear Weingartner's handling of the last movement equalled.

Orchestra Is Excellent.

"Le Sacre" really may be approached with a few detailed remarks about the quality of the orchestra. This is easily done, for Stravinsky has emphasized the physical side of music as perhaps no other composer has. For that reason, an organization like this shows off at its best in so colorful an opus. The string choirs, for one thing, aside from their sensitivity, vibrancy and balance, did well in a new role: as percussion instruments. It was amazing. Concerning the woodwinds, brasses and the genuine percussion group, without which "Le Sacre" would lose much of its doughty vigor, the features of "Le Sacre" were set into high relief by the smooth and luminous intonations of the woodwinds and the super-ability of the brasses to bark savagely as well as utter the purest sounds.

Guiding such an orchestra through Stravinsky's kaleidoscope, with its cornucopia of color, rhythmic orgasms and sensuous beauty, was the genius of Koussevitzky, whose flair for interpreting Stravinsky and Sibelius must be a source of gratification to both composers. With the merest flicks of his fingers he drew out crescendo and decrescendo in a way that brought on the gooseflesh. With the lustiest jabs he piled rhythmic effect on rhythmic effect, musical counterparts of a "piston and a sexual action," as Paul Rosenfeld says in discussing this piece. Balanced against these results with "Le Sacre" were his successes with Mozart and Brahms, giving one an idea of the breadth and cosmopolitanism of the man.

Reaction to Stravinsky.

The reaction of the audience to Stravinsky was interesting. It recalls an occasion when an ultra-modern work for string quartet was played here years ago and certain worthies in Hill auditorium were not sure that what they had heard was music. Yet music it was, as is this "Le Sacre du Printemps." Whether one likes it or not is beside the question. This music is of our time as surely as the economic depression is a result of our time, of our material ways. This may be a back-handed way of saying that such music as Stravinsky has written has no future, that it really marks the end of an epoch, which is this writer's opinion. Yet it is important and should be heard, whether or not it expresses the futility of modern materialism and exploits the physical side of music at the expense of the spiritual.

It also was interesting to hear Brahms' Symphony after Stravinsky, if only to see how bland the former could appear by comparison, notwithstanding Brahms' profundity and conviction. The writer previously had had the same experience in Vienna by hearing an operetta of Schubert played directly after Schoenberg's "Gluckliche Hand." Yet one cannot help suggesting that the preference for Brahms prevailed for the same reason that this commentator's preference for Sibelius over Stravinsky prevails: because he writes from an inner compulsion which instinctively communicates itself to the hearer in a way that the cold and brutal "Le Sacre" never may. This is a subtle differentiation, but the greatest art is subtle. Stravinsky, however, stirred us all, quite apart from his effect on the Brahms, and we appreciated having the chance to hear at first hand his "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Detroit Free Press. October 25-33

Ann Arbor Music Lovers Stirred by Stravinsky Opus

Booston Symphony Brilliantly Performs Work That Always Arouses Controversy

By Herman Wise

ANN ARBOR, Oct. 24—Ann Arbor heard music Tuesday night that is certain to be debated all winter.

For the first time anywhere in Michigan, a performance of the monumental Stravinsky work, "Le Sacre du Printemps" ("The Rite of Spring") was presented in Hill Auditorium. The occasion was the appearance of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra under its brilliant leader, Serge Koussevitsky.

Played for the first time in Paris in 1913, the Stravinsky opus has been a cause of constant irritation to many followers of music. It is divided into two parts, "The Adoration of the Earth" and "The Sacrifice," and is subtitled "Pictures of Pagan Russia."

Its first performance in concert was in 1914 in England. Ten years later it was first played in the United States by the Boston Symphony.

Genius or Madman?

The audience of 5,000 which filled the large auditorium Tuesday night reacted with definite feeling to the composition. There were a few who immediately concluded that "Le Sacre du Printemps" ranks with the foremost of contemporary writing, but there were more who were outright frank in declaring the work to be that of an insane person.

There is no middle ground for those who have heard this Stravinsky outpouring. It leaves no room for doubt. One's feelings areeither strongly for it or strongly against it.

Those who seek beauty in music, as revealed by simple rhythm and melodic lines, are naturally bitterly disappointed in "The Rite of Spring." It is not intended for a sweet, touching song. It seeks to stir the emotions with primitive chaos, with mad, impossible rhythms. It overwhelms with its force, with its endless vitality. For succeeding in what it aims to do, "Le Sacre du Printemps" must be classed as a significant contemporary piece of music.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra of some 105 men turned in a remarkably finished performance of the Stravinsky. It was so stirringly done that even those who professed hate for it found themselves applauding loudly.

Mozart Serenade Played

The concert opened with the lovely Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" Serenade for string orchestra, which was played with the style and warmth for which the string sections of this organization have long been famous.

After the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky offered the Brahms First Symphony in C Minor, Op. 68, one of the best loved of all Brahms' works. No finer tribute could have been paid to the memory of this composer, whose birth occurred 100 years ago, than the inspired reading which was given to this work. The performance was flawless, made so by the fact that each member of the orchestra is a finished artist.

At the conclusion of the Brahms, the audience cheered and applauded Dr. Koussevitzky and his men and compelled them to take a number of bows.

The concert marked the opening of the fifty-fifth annual series of Choral Union concerts.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 26 1933

Musical For Guest

A MUSICAL will be given Thursday evening following the Boston Symphony orchestra concert by Mrs. Hazel Reed, 1063 Bryden road, in honor of a guest from Leminster, Mass., Mrs. R. F. Dickson. Mrs. Dickson is well known in musical circles in the east, and is an active member of the Melrose Symphony orchestra and of the Women's Music club of Leminster. Thirty guests have been invited to the affair. Mrs. A. V. Donahey of Indian Lake, and Miss Carlene Wolfe of Zanesville will be assisting hostesses.

* * *

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 26 1933

Symphony Club Presents Boston Group Tonight

"Eroica" Symphony From Pen of Beethoven Is Featured.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA arrives tonight at about 5:30 from Dayton for the concert for the Symphony Club of Central Ohio at 8:15 at Memori hall. It will have to be promptly at 8:15, as the orchestra has to leave town soon after the concert. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The principal offering will be the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony.

All the established orchestras are now back at work or will be shortly. The New York Philharmonic began a week or so ago; Bruno Walter had planned an all-Beethoven program for the first concerts, but when he was told on landing that Arturo Toscanini planned another Beethoven cycle, he made the program Beethoven-Brahms. Small encouragement for modernists there.

Most of the large orchestras have lost that aloof expression which was habitual for years with them. All sorts of inducements, ranging from an auction sale of seats in Philadelphia to lowered ticket prices in New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati and elsewhere, are being offered the public.

The sale of tickets for the orchestra, which continues through the day at the Carl Koch Co., Broad and Third streets, will be continued, preceding the concert, at Memorial hall.

JACKSON, MICH.
CITIZEN-PATRIOT

OCT 25 1933

FIRST OF MICHIGAN CONCERT SERIES GIVEN

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 25.—(AP)—The Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened the fifty-fifth annual University of Michigan choral union concert series Tuesday evening in Hill auditorium. A near capacity audience of 4,500 attended the concert.

A feature of the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of Spring—Pictures of Pagan Russia," which has caused arguments among music critics since it first was produced 20 years ago. The critical Ann Arbor audience pronounced it music and applauded enthusiastically. Dr. Koussevitsky also was accorded an ovation after the performance of Brahms' first symphony.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will appear at Hill auditorium, Nov. 9, in the second concert of the series.

PORT HURON, MICH.
TIMES-HERALD

OCT 25 1933

4,500 Hear Boston Symphony Open 'U' Series Of Concerts

Ann Arbor, Oct. 25.—AP—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened the fifty-fifth annual University of Michigan Choral union concert series Tuesday night in Hill auditorium. A near capacity audience of 4,500 attended the concert.

A feature of the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of Spring—Pictures of Pagan Russia," which has caused arguments among music critics since it first was produced 20 years ago. The critical Ann Arbor audience pronounced it music and applauded enthusiastically. Dr. Koussevitsky also was accorded an ovation after the performance of Brahms' First Symphony.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will appear at Hill auditorium Nov. 9 in the second concert of the series.

YPSILANTI, MICH.
PRESS

OCT 25 1933

Unusual Musical Work Opens Choral Concerts

Koussevitsky Directs Boston Symphony In "Le Sacre du Printemps"

Ann Arbor, Mich., Oct. 25—One of the opera's most debated works, Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," was presented in the opening concert of the Choral Union series here Tuesday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitsky rendered the monumental opus. An audience of 5,000 filled Hill Auditoruim to hear the music which, since it was first played in Paris in 1913, has been the subject of constant discussion, those who listen to it always leaving with decided belief in its musical qualities or as decidedly opposed to it.

There is little rhythm or melody in the odd masterpiece which, as interpreted by the Boston players, stirs primitive emotions by its force and vitality. The orchestra gave a remarkably finished rendition.

Other selections on the program which consoled those to whom the Stravinsky music did not appeal were, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Brahms' "First Symphony in C Minor, Opus 68."

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

OCT 26 1933

Attorney Stuart Redner of Country Club Hills attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Ann Arbor Tuesday evening.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 26 1933

Boston Symphony Will Come to City Today

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opening his tenth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, America's oldest orchestra, will bring his organization of 110 men to Columbus at 5:30 p. m., Thursday, to appear later in concert at Memorial hall.

The orchestra will come direct from Dayton, and will leave about 11 p. m. by special train for Pittsburgh.

The conductor will offer for the first time in Columbus a composition by the Russian Scriabin, whom Koussevitzky discovered and championed years ago in Berlin.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

OCT 26 1933

THUMAN SERIES OPENS

At Dayton With Concert By Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPECIAL DISPATCH TO THE ENQUIRER.

Dayton, Ohio, October 25—After an absence of seven years, Serge Koussevitzky tonight led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 110 players, in a concert at Memorial Hall, opening the series of J. H. Thuman, Cincinnati impresario.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 26 1933

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TONIGHT

Mozart, Beethoven and Scriabin Are Programmed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will play at Memorial Hall this Thursday evening at 8:15.

Their program lists Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's Third Symphony ("The Eroica") and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The concert is one of two brought to Columbus through the efforts of the Symphony Club of central Ohio, the second being that of the Cleveland Orchestra under its new director, Arthur Rodzinski, which is scheduled for Jan. 23. Tickets are available at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, until 5:30, and in Memorial Hall lobby before the concert.

COLUMBUS, O.
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 26 1933

Class Draws Club Concert

About 100 students of Columbus Art School will attend the concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight in Memorial Hall as part of their work in experimental design.

Notes they will make of their musical impressions will be transcribed graphically and submitted to a jury of artists and teachers who will discover the two pictures most imaginatively related to the music they interpret.

The young artists of these two pictures will receive gifts from the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. This organization is presenting the orchestra, with Mrs. B. G. Huntington as president. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts the 110-piece Boston organization.

Both season and single admission tickets are on sale today at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., and at Heaton's music store. Tickets will be sold immediately before the concert in Memorial Hall lobby.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 26 1933

TSCHAIKOWSKY TO FEATURE CONCERT

Boston Symphony Appears at Mosque Tomorrow Night

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor will be a feature of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Syria Mosque tomorrow night.

Koussevitzky

The Russian leader has long been noted as an interpreter of the Russian composer, and the Fifth Symphony is considered as among Koussevitzky's most vivid and moving interpretations. His performance of this symphony was an outstanding feature of Koussevitzky's guest appearance at the London Music Festival last May.

Tomorrow night's program will open with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," a serenade for string orchestras, which is considered one of the composer's most delightful scores.

The second number will be the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khonvantchina." This tone poem in miniature depicts the coming of dawn in the Red Square of Moscow.

Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also on the program.

SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

OCT 25 1933

Boston Symphony Opens Ann Arbor Concert Season

(By Associated Press.)

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Oct. 25.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, opened the fifty-fifth annual University of Michigan choral union concert series Tuesday evening in Hill auditorium. A near capacity audience of 4,500 attended the concert.

A feature of the program was Stravinsky's ballet, "The Rite of Spring—pictures of Pagan Russia," which has caused arguments among music critics since it fist was produced twenty years ago. The critical Ann Arbor audience pronounced it music and applauded enthusiastically. Dr. Koussevitsky also was accorded an ovation after the performance of Brahms' First symphony.

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will appear at Hill auditorium November 9 in the second concert of the series.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 26 1933

Buds to Be Guests For Opening of Concert Season

Debutantes will be guests at the opening of the symphony season tomorrow night in Syria Mosque, when the Boston Symphony will play.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president of the Symphony Association, will occupy a box, as usual. Others reserving boxes and parquet seats include Mrs. William Reed Thompson, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. Richard Beatty Mellon, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. George E. Tenner and Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, who always supports musical events in Pittsburgh.

Others will be Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Mrs. Leon Falk, Mrs. Biddle Arthurs, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Miss Ida M. Allerton, Mrs. E. V. Babcock, Dr. Thomas S. Baker, Mrs. Frank B. Bell, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Mrs. George J. Willock, Mrs. Silas N. Benham.

Still others will be Mrs. Charles B. Berger, Mrs. A. H. Burchfield, Mrs. Clarence P. Byrnes, Mrs. Harvey Childs, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Charles W. Dahlinger, Mrs. Harmar D. Denny, Mrs. J. Frank Drake, Mrs. Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. T. Raymond Eavenson, Mrs. J. H. Hillman, Jr., Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Otto C. Gaub, Mrs. James H. Hammond and scores and scores of others who are leaders in social circles.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 26 1933

Boston Symphony Tomorrow—Mosque

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky brings the distinguished Boston Symphony to the Mosque tomorrow night to open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series.

The orchestra will play an unusual program, with Tcshaikowsky's fifth symphony as the major work. Other works include Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik," a serenade for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," and the Strauss tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegal's Merry Pranks."

Other Detroit notices at end of book

Friday, October 27, 1933. THE COLUMBUS

Heroic Symphony; Heroic Orchestra

◆ ◆ ◆

Boston's Great Ensemble Gives Scriabin Poem Local Premiere

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH all the panoply of instrumental splendor which belongs to this time-honored institution, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to us last night in one of the two — how sad that there are so few this season! —concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. An audience of somewhat larger than the usual patronage, it seemed to us, attended the program raptly and gave voice to pronounced enthusiasm at the conclusion of each number and again and again at its conclusion. It seemed as if the hearers were saying, "Alas, these men come but once a year. Let us tell them once more how we appreciate them and their gifted leader."

First on the program was the Mozart serenade which Mrs. Hopkins and her string choir have played several times for us, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." It is a work for strings alone, and Dr. Koussevitzky did not even use all of his forces in that department, but they were enough to touch this beautiful composition with the hand of poetic ecstasy and evoke practically everything that Mozart set down in this treasured score. There was a balance and a symmetry to this remarkable choir of strings that the most cavilling critic could not deny; as for the present writer he is humble in his admiration.

SCRIABIN'S "ECSTASY"

CAME next the "Poem of Ecstasy," fifty-eighth opus of Scriabin, one of the great men of Russia. What year it was written we do not recall at the moment, but it might have been set on paper yesterday, so thoroughly modern is it in its orchestration and so distinctly of the present day in its inspiration and its motives. The program contained the poem which Scriabin set down on his work's program; it is interesting, but far from being as inspired as the music that basic inspiration suggested. It required the full resources of the orchestra, probably 15 men playing in it that were heard in no other part of the program. (When one has 110 men to command he can do miracles!)

This was the first time this work had been done in Columbus and it is well that the Boston played it for us, since Dr. Koussevitzky has directed it several times in Boston and perhaps on the road, and Fiedler and Muck and Monteux did it before him.

> "The Spirit,
> Winged by the thirst for life
> Takes flight
> On the heights of negation..."

is a part of the poetic motto and in that last line those who object to modernism may find ironic comfort. It is too complex in idiom; too massive in force; too manifold in its inspirations; too impressive in portions of its score to analyze in this brief space. Let us say that the orchestra made of it a clangorous, perfectly expressed, colorfully gorgeous tempest of emotion. It left the sympathetic listener breathless; the others at least not unmoved.

MEMORABLE "EROICA"

OF the interpretation of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony we can speak in even more unrestrained terms of adulation. Koussevitzky, with his catholicity of taste and his understanding of the moderns, has set the command of dynamics and shading and the grasp of Beethoven traditions to make of the "Eroica" the one supreme event in the evening's program.

The first movement, which is brisk with action, came to its best manifestation in about the mid-section when the orchestra was striking hammers of Thor in eccentric rhythm, a storm then relieved by beautiful modulations in the woodwinds,—a choir which the Boston owns that is by way of being incomparable among American orchestras. The marche funebre,—which is one of the great achievements of this composer,—was interpreted with tactful taste and a feeling for the great beauty inherent in that movement. There is more in this than a march for the dead, it is the appeal to the living that is woven in between, thick with mysticism, that gives this passage its eternal appeal. The orchestra mastered in remarkable style the headlong rhythms, the sonorous passages for horns and the serenity of heart which must mark a "Hero" and his admirers, at peace with the world. Violins, basses, oboes, clarinets, were some of the instruments which were heard with special pleasure in this allegro molto, which brings the Hero into the happy harbor of the perfect chord.

Koussevitzky conducted this symphony, from the first graceful phrases to the fanfares of the heroic finale, with anything but pedantic boredom or a carelessness which familiarity sometimes breeds in the best of conductors. He likes the "Eroica," even as Beethoven did, and he made us like it all the more. Only occasionally was there a faulty attack, seldom in any choir a deviation from pitch or rhythm, and in the whole reading by the large orchestra was an attention to detail with which the enthusiastic and scholarly leader must have freely imbued them.

The Boston heads our preference list for any season.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 27 1933

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH all the panoply of instrumental splendor which belongs to this time-honored institution, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to us last night in one of the two — how sad that there are so few this season! —concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. An audience of somewhat larger than the usual patronage, it seemed to us, attended the program raptly and gave voice to pronounced enthusiasm at the conclusion of each number and again and again at its conclusion. It seemed as if the hearers were saying, "Alas, these men come but once a year. Let us tell them once more how we appreciate them and their gifted leader."

First on the program was the Mozart serenade which Mrs. Hopkins and her string choir have played several times for us, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." It is a work for strings alone, and Dr. Koussevitzky did not even use all of his forces in that department, but they were enough to touch this beautiful composition with the hand of poetic ecstasy and evoke practically everything that Mozart set down in this treasured score. There was a balance and a symmetry to this remarkable choir of strings that the most cavilling critic could not deny; as for the present writer he is humble in his admiration.

SCRIABIN'S "ECSTASY"

CAME next the "Poem of Ecstasy," fifty-eighth opus of Scriabin, one of the great men of Russia. What year it was written we do not recall at the moment, but it might have been set on paper yesterday, so thoroughly modern is it in its orchestration and so distinctly of the present day in its inspiration and its motives. The program contained the poem which Scriabin set down on his work's program; it is interesting, but far from being as inspired as the music that basic inspiration suggested. It required the full resources of the orchestra, probably 15 men playing in it that were heard in no other part of the program. (When one has 110 men to command he can do miracles!)

This was the first time this work had been done in Columbus and it is well that the Boston played it for us, since Dr. Koussevitzky has directed it several times in Boston and perhaps on the road, and Fiedler and Muck and Monteux did it before him.

"The Spirit,
Winged by the thirst for life
Takes flight
On the heights of negation..."

is a part of the poetic motto and in that last line those who object to modernism may find ironic comfort. It is too complex in idiom; too massive in force; too manifold in its inspirations; too impressive in portions of its score to analyze in this brief space. Let us say that the orchestra made of it a clangorous, perfectly expressed, colorfully gorgeous tempest of emotion. It left the sympathetic listener breathless; the others at least not unmoved.

MEMORABLE "EROICA"

OF the interpretation of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony we can speak in even more unrestrained terms of adulation. Koussevitzky, with his catholicity of taste and his understanding of the moderns, has set the command of dynamics and shading and the grasp of Beethoven traditions to make of the "Eroica" the one supreme event in the evening's program.

The first movement, which is brisk with action, came to its best manifestation in about the mid-section when the orchestra was striking hammers of Thor in eccentric rhythm, a storm then relieved by beautiful modulations in the woodwinds,—a choir which the Boston owns that is by way of being incomparable among American orchestras. The marche funebre,—which is one of the great achievements of this composer,—was interpreted with tactful taste and a feeling for the great beauty inherent in that movement. There is more in this than a march for the dead, it is the appeal to the living that is woven in between, thick with mysticism, that gives this passage its eternal appeal. The orchestra mastered in remarkable style the headlong rhythms, the sonorous passages for horns and the serenity of heart which must mark a "Hero" and his admirers, at peace with the world. Violins, basses, oboes, clarinets, were some of the instruments which were heard with special pleasure in this allegro molto, which brings the Hero into the happy harbor of the perfect chord.

Koussevitzky conducted this symphony, from the first graceful phrases to the fanfares of the heroic finale, with anything but pedantic boredom or a carelessness which familiarity sometimes breeds in the best of conductors. He likes the "Eroica," even as Beethoven did, and he made us like it all the more. Only occasionally was there a faulty attack, seldom in any choir a deviation from pitch or rhythm, and in the whole reading by the large orchestra was an attention to detail with which the enthusiastic and scholarly leader must have freely imbued them.

The Boston heads our preference ist for any season.

Other Columbus notices at end of book;

42

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 27 1933

Bostonians In Varied Works

Three Composers Heard At Dr. Koussevitzky's Hands Thursday Evening.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY comes annually to a Columbus audience at the behest of the Symphony Club of central Ohio as if he were aware that one concert here equals many in Boston. To us he always displays in a single evening manifold varieties of his directorial genius and of his musicians' virtuosity.

He chose Thursday to show us his way with Mozart, thereby also showing the miraculous luminosity of his string section; his way with Scriabin, piling up and flinging out orchestral sonorities; his masterly and revealing way with Beethoven.

To hear these wonders, rare in our time, rarer in our city, there came an audience that was rather less in numbers than the occasion deserved, and rather more restless and talkative than manners permit. But to offset those who stayed away and those who chattered, was a solid nucleus of those who could drink deep of these refreshing waters, served to us all too seldom.

* * *

"EINE KLEINE NACHTMUSIK" of Mozart is one of that composer's graceful and gallant "occasional pieces," a suite designed for some 18th century garden or salon on a festal evening. It is quite of its formal, brittle period, lacking the overtones of drama that are heard in larger works. Dr. Koussevitzky approached it in this very spirit. While its brilliant or lyric phrases were molded with the most delicate grace, its imaginative fragility was built upon the soundest of bases. Technically it was matter for endless marvel. I venture to say there is no other such body of strings as these of Boston for pliability, sonority, suavity. And Koussevitzky is their master for every stroke of every bow.

Then players of brass and of woodwind filed in, the percussion corner came to hold more than its quota. "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which stood next, was on Dr. Koussevitzky's first program of his first season in Boston; it was there in the first program of this, his tenth. It is a work on which he evidently sets much store.

It is a powerful score and an exciting one, if only for sheer orchestral magnitude. Even those of us who thought it largely sound and fury and who believed its underlying philosophy less than profound could not escape its stormy exaltation. As the repeated trumpet theme shrilled out, as a player, mallet in hand climbed up beside the "deep chime in C," we responded in spite of ourselves.

Scriabin, we may have thought, uses Wagnerian methods without having access to Wagnerian beauty and clarity. But the Columbus audience, unused and therefore none too friendly to modern music in the larger forms, was fortunate at any rate, in having a standard work in that new repertory, stirring if not endearing, so compellingly and magnificently played.

The conductor then turned to the Beethoven of the "Eroica," with its riper wisdom, its more controlled, more musical, expression. Yet the "Eroica" contains its excitements, its exaltations, too. From Beethoven they reach the heart, from Scriabin only the ears.

It would be a gratuitous task here to enlarge on the shining glories of this third symphony. We hear each movement grow from the smallest of germs; we feel the music's vitality, its passion; we stand in awe of its concealing workmanship. With that we are content.

As the music speaks, so speaks Koussevitzky. One was not aware, hardly, of intent players and gesturing conductor standing between oneself and the composer. Out of such a clarifying performance it is Beethoven himself who speaks.

* * *

THE management of these concerts was minded to have Thursday's audience express itself as to next season's orchestras. For that purpose ballots giving choice of a number that may travel our way was included in the program. That in itself is a commendable idea, but not so commendable was the way it was accomplished. Handsomely gowned young women came ballot-collecting down the aisles during the very climactic pages of the "Eroica's" first movement with complete disregard of the most rudimentary ideas of concert-hall courtesy. Thus is art served.

—R. L. F. McCombs.

Heroic Symphony; Heroic Orchestra

◆ ◆ ◆

Boston's Great Ensemble Gives Scriabin Poem Local Premiere

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH all the panoply of instrumental splendor which belongs to this time-honored institution, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to us last night in one of the two — how sad that there are so few this season! —concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. An audience of somewhat larger than the usual patronage, it seemed to us, attended the program raptly and gave voice to pronounced enthusiasm at the conclusion of each number and again and again at its conclusion. It seemed as if the hearers were saying, "Alas, these men come but once a year. Let us tell them once more how we appreciate them and their gifted leader."

First on the program was the Mozart serenade which Mrs. Hopkins and her string choir have played several times for us, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." It is a work for strings alone, and Dr. Koussevitzky did not even use all of his forces in that department, but they were enough to touch this beautiful composition with the hand of poetic ecstasy and evoke practically everything that Mozart set down in this treasured score. There was a balance and a symmetry to this remarkable choir of strings that the most cavilling critic could not deny; as for the present writer he is humble in his admiration.

SCRIABIN'S "ECSTASY"

CAME next the "Poem of Ecstasy," fifty-eighth opus of Scriabin, one of the great men of Russia. What year it was written we do not recall at the moment, but it might have been set on paper yesterday, so thoroughly modern is it in its orchestration and so distinctly of the present day in its inspiration and its motives. The program contained the poem which Scriabin set down on his work's program; it is interesting, but far from being as inspired as the music that basic inspiration suggested. It required the full resources of the orchestra, probably 15 men playing in it that were heard in no other part of the program. (When one has 110 men to command he can do miracles!)

This was the first time this work had been done in Columbus and it is well that the Boston played it for us, since Dr. Koussevitzky has directed it several times in Boston and perhaps on the road, and Fiedler and Muck and Monteux did it before him.

"The Spirit,
Winged by the thirst for life
Takes flight
On the heights of negation..."

is a part of the poetic motto and in that last line those who object to modernism may find ironic comfort. It is too complex in idiom; too massive in force; too manifold in its inspirations; too impressive in portions of its score to analyze in this brief space. Let us say that the orchestra made of it a clangorous, perfectly expressed, colorfully gorgeous tempest of emotion. It left the sympathetic listener breathless; the others at least not unmoved.

MEMORABLE "EROICA"

OF the interpretation of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony we can speak in even more unrestrained terms of adulation. Koussevitzky, with his catholicity of taste and his understanding of the moderns, has set the command of dynamics and shading and the grasp of Beethoven traditions to make of the "Eroica" the one supreme event in the evening's program.

The first movement, which is brisk with action, came to its best manifestation in about the midsection when the orchestra was striking hammers of Thor in eccentric rhythm, a storm then relieved by beautiful modulations in the woodwinds,—a choir which the Boston owns that is by way of being incomparable among American orchestras. The marche funebre,—which is one of the great achievements of this composer,—was interpreted with tactful taste and a feeling for the great beauty inherent in that movement. There is more in this than a march for the dead, it is the appeal to the living that is woven in between, thick with mysticism, that gives this passage its eternal appeal. The orchestra mastered in remarkable style the headlong rhythms, the sonorous passages for horns and the serenity of heart which must mark a "Hero" and his admirers, at peace with the world. Violins, basses, oboes, clarinets, were some of the instruments which were heard with special pleasure in this allegro molto, which brings the Hero into the happy harbor of the perfect chord.

Koussevitzky conducted this symphony, from the first graceful phrases to the fanfares of the heroic finale, with anything but pedantic boredom or a carelessness which familiarity sometimes breeds in the best of conductors. He likes the "Eroica," even as Beethoven did, and he made us like it all the more. Only occasionally was there a faulty attack, seldom in any choir a deviation from pitch or rhythm, and in the whole reading by the large orchestra was an attention to detail with which the enthusiastic and scholarly leader must have freely imbued them.

The Boston heads our preference list for any season.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

OCT 27 1933

By H. E. Cherrington

WITH all the panoply of instrumental splendor which belongs to this time-honored institution, the Boston Symphony orchestra came to us last night in one of the two — how sad that there are so few this season! —concerts of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. An audience of somewhat larger than the usual patronage, it seemed to us, attended the program raptly and gave voice to pronounced enthusiasm at the conclusion of each number and again and again at its conclusion. It seemed as if the hearers were saying, "Alas, these men come but once a year. Let us tell them once more how we appreciate them and their gifted leader."

First on the program was the Mozart serenade which Mrs. Hopkins and her string choir have played several times for us, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." It is a work for strings alone, and Dr. Koussevitzky did not even use all of his forces in that department, but they were enough to touch this beautiful composition with the hand of poetic ecstasy and evoke practically everything that Mozart set down in this treasured score. There was a balance and a symmetry to this remarkable choir of strings that the most cavilling critic could not deny; as for the present writer he is humble in his admiration.

SCRIABIN'S "ECSTASY"

CAME next the "Poem of Ecstasy," fifty-eighth opus of Scriabin, one of the great men of Russia. What year it was written we do not recall at the moment, but it might have been set on paper yesterday, so thoroughly modern is it in its orchestration and so distinctly of the present day in its inspiration and its motives. The program contained the poem which Scriabin set down on his work's program; it is interesting, but far from being as inspired as the music that basic inspiration suggested. It required the full resources of the orchestra, probably 15 men playing in it that were heard in no other part of the program. (When one has 110 men to command he can do miracles!)

This was the first time this work had been done in Columbus and it is well that the Boston played it for us, since Dr. Koussevitzky has directed it several times in Boston and perhaps on the road, and Fiedler and Muck and Monteux did it before him.

"The Spirit,
Winged by the thirst for life
Takes flight
On the heights of negation..."

is a part of the poetic motto and in that last line those who object to modernism may find ironic comfort. It is too complex in idiom; too massive in force; too manifold in its inspirations; too impressive in portions of its score to analyze in this brief space. Let us say that the orchestra made of it a clangorous, perfectly expressed, colorfully gorgeous tempest of emotion. It left the sympathetic listener breathless; the others at least not unmoved.

MEMORABLE "EROICA"

OF the interpretation of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony we can speak in even more unrestrained terms of adulation. Koussevitzky, with his catholicity of taste and his understanding of the moderns, has set the command of dynamics and shading and the grasp of Beethoven traditions to make of the "Eroica" the one supreme event in the evening's program.

The first movement, which is brisk with action, came to its best manifestation in about the midsection when the orchestra was striking hammers of Thor in eccentric rhythm, a storm then relieved by beautiful modulations in the woodwinds,—a choir which the Boston owns that is by way of being incomparable among American orchestras. The marche funebre,—which is one of the great achievements of this composer,—was interpreted with tactful taste and a feeling for the great beauty inherent in that movement. There is more in this than a march for the dead, it is the appeal to the living that is woven in between, thick with mysticism, that gives this passage its eternal appeal. The orchestra mastered in remarkable style the headlong rhythms, the sonorous passages for horns and the serenity of heart which must mark a "Hero" and his admirers, at peace with the world. Violins, basses, oboes, clarinets, were some of the instruments which were heard with special pleasure in this allegro molto, which brings the Hero into the happy harbor of the perfect chord.

Koussevitzky conducted this symphony, from the first graceful phrases to the fanfares of the heroic finale, with anything but pedantic boredom or a carelessness which familiarity sometimes breeds in the best of conductors. He likes the "Eroica," even as Beethoven did, and he made us like it all the more. Only occasionally was there a faulty attack, seldom in any choir a deviation from pitch or rhythm, and in the whole reading by the large orchestra was an attention to detail with which the enthusiastic and scholarly leader must have freely imbued them.

The Boston heads our preference ist for any season.

Other Columbus notices at end of book.

'Bombsh

oussevitzky's Hands
Thursday Evening.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY comes annually to a Columbus audience at the behest of the Symphony Club of central Ohio as if he were aware that one concert here equals many in Boston. To us he always displays in a single evening manifold varieties of his directorial genius and of his musicians' virtuosity.

He chose Thursday to show us his way with Mozart, thereby also showing the miraculous luminosity of his string section; his way with Scriabin, piling up and flinging out orchestral sonorities; his masterly and revealing way with Beethoven.

To hear these wonders, rare in our time, rarer in our city, there came an audience that was rather less in numbers than the occasion deserved, and rather more restless and talkative than manners permit. But to offset those who stayed away and those who chattered, was a solid nucleus of those who could drink deep of these refreshing waters, served to us all too seldom.

* * *

"EINE KLEINE NACHTMUSIK" of Mozart is one of that composer's graceful and gallant "occasional pieces," a suite designed for some 18th century garden or salon on a festal evening. It is quite of its formal, brittle period, lacking the overtones of drama that are heard in larger works. Dr. Koussevitzky approached it in this very spirit. While its brilliant or lyric phrases were molded with the most delicate grace, its imaginative fragility was built upon the soundest of bases. Technically it was matter for endless marvel. I venture to say there is no other such body of strings as these of Boston for pliability, sonority, suavity. And Koussevitzky is their master for every stroke of every bow.

Then players of brass and of woodwind filed in, the percussion corner came to hold more than its quota. "The Poem of Ecstasy" by Scriabin, which stood next, was on Dr. Koussevitzky's first program of his first season in Boston; it was there in the first program of this, his tenth. It is a work on which he evidently sets much store.

It is a powerful score and an exciting one, if only for sheer orchestral magnitude. Even those of us who thought it largely sound and fury and who believed its underlying philosophy less than profound could not escape its stormy exaltation. As the repeated trumpet theme shrilled out, as a player, mallet in hand climbed up beside the "deep chime in C," we responded in spite of ourselves.

Scriabin, we may have thought, uses Wagnerian methods without having access to Wagnerian beauty and clarity. But the Columbus audience, unused and therefore none too friendly to modern music in the larger forms, was fortunate at any rate, in having a standard work in that new repertory, stirring if not endearing, so compellingly and magnificently played.

The conductor then turned to the Beethoven of the "Eroica," with its riper wisdom, its more controlled, more musical, expression. Yet the "Eroica" contains its excitements, its exaltations, too. From Beethoven they reach the heart, from Scriabin only the ears.

It would be a gratuitous task here to enlarge on the shining glories of this third symphony. We hear each movement grow from the smallest of germs; we feel the music's vitality, its passion; we stand in awe of its concealing workmanship. With that we are content.

As the music speaks, so speaks Koussevitzky. One was not aware, hardly, of intent players and gesturing conductor standing between oneself and the composer. Out of such a clarifying performance it is Beethoven himself who speaks.

* * *

THE management of these concerts was minded to have Thursday's audience express itself as to next season's orchestras. For that purpose ballots giving choice of a number that may travel our way was included in the program. That in itself is a commendable idea, but not so commendable was the way it was accomplished. Handsomely gowned young women came ballot-collecting down the aisles during the very climactic pages of the "Eroica's" first movement with complete disregard of the most rudimentary ideas of concert-hall courtesy. Thus is art served.

—R. L. F. McCombs.

43

OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27, 193

Koussevitsky Leads Boston Symphony in Fine Program

By HAROLD G. DAVIDSON. How absurd!

TO a well-filled balcony and a large crowd on the first floor, but not a packed house, alas, that notable Boston Symphony Orchestra and its right honorable director, Serge Koussevitsky, played a fine program Thursday night at Memorial Hall.

We had with us Koussevitsky the program-builder, thank heaven, as well as Koussevitsky the conductor. Can you imagine a bigger contrast than progressing from the chaste simplicities of Mozart's music for string orchestra alone to the voluptuous and heavily loaded orchestration of Scriabin? And anything better to top it off with than the sane and noble eloquence of a Beethoven symphony?

Interest centered mainly on the Russian number, Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy" over which many learned musicians are still squabbling. It was designated "first time in Columbus" and rightly so; the Cleveland orchestra almost summoned the nerve, once, to take a chance—and then got chilly inside its shoes.

One thing is certain; if you heard Koussevitsky's orchestra perform this strange attempt to communicate ecstasy you probably heard it at its best in this country; for Koussevitsky knows Russian music in general perhaps better than any other conductor in the world. And besides that he was one of the first to understand and perform Scriabin's works in Russia and European countries.

* * *

HOW different it is to hear a big opus like this played in a large hall by a first-rate organization when your acquaintance with the work has been limited to records and radio, no matter how good the recording nor how clear the reception! It is hardly fair to the composer to judge a composition when you haven't heard it often enough to know it, let alone get sick of it.

Our personal impression of the "Poeme d'extase" is this; that the thematic material is both sparse and choppy, the harmony contains by far too many pedal points on the major ninth chord (of which the composer is inordinately fond) and that the orchestration is rich to a point of being over-loaded.

The latter would tend to cover up the defects of melodic invention and harmonic partiality. However, there are some thrilling climaxes that ought to move anyone. One climax has a compelling rhythmic throb and another is sheer weight of superimposed masses. No matter what you think, it's quite a neat little accomplishment. And the audience, on the whole, was much impressed.

* * *

AS for the Mozart music, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (a Serenade for string orchestra), it was thoroughly delightful. We have great faith in Koussevitsky as a leader of strings. He is the man who learned to make the gruff double-bass sound like the tenderer cello, a feat in virtuosic history. There was a fine unity of attack, all the varieties of bowing splendidly co-ordinated and richness of string tone both in slow passages and rushes.

The Beethoven "Eroica" symphony has been heard too often for extended comment. Koussevitsky is in love with all music that is good; which means something close to perfection in the German classics as well as those of other countries and his native Russia.

We winced at one sour cadence, but the horn player didn't blubber when he got a second chance. That is one good thing about recapitulation. The player may redeem himself. Otherwise, it was fine. We shall look forward with even keener interest to the coming broadcasts of this great orchestra and the right honorable Dr. Koussevitsky's masterly chosen programs.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 27 1933

BEETHOVEN CYCLE BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's cycle by the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 31. The program will include the Masters' First Symphony, and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3. The cycle is to include all of the nine symphonies; also overtures, concertos and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont," The chorus and vocal and instrumental soloists are still to be announced. Subscription seats are still to be had for this cycle to be given on six Tuesday afternoons, and the series of six Monday evening concerts which open Nov. 6 and which will be devoted to representative masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 27 1933

PARKING RESTRICTIONS LIFTED FOR CONCERT

Albanians attending the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Schenectady tomorrow night, under the auspices of the Schenectady Civics Music association, will find parking restrictions removed for the period of the concert. The area immediately behind the RKO Palace in which the concert is to be held has been reserved for listeners. Due to the length of the program the performance will begin promptly at 8:30 p. m.

RICHMOND, IND.
PALLADIUM

OCT 27 1933

Personals

Among the several Richmond people who attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in Dayton, Ohio on Wednesday evening were Paul Moore and Paul G. Druley.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Magaw will motor to Bloomington on Sunday to visit their daughter, Miss Margaret Magaw who is a student at Indiana university.

Mrs. Dudley Cates of Winnetka, Ill., who has been visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Dudley Foulke, of this city for several days left Wednesday to return to her home. She was accompanied by Mrs. George Cates and Mrs. Sarah Stutson who will remain in Winnetka as house guests of Mr. and Mrs. Cates and their family for two weeks.

Mrs. Joseph Frisby returned Thursday evening from Indianapolis where she has been attending a two-day church conference and visiting relatives.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 27 1933

Boston Symphony Gives Mosque Concert Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players arrived in the city this morning and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series at Syria Mosque tonight. The Boston Orchestra is now in its fifty-third season, and Dr. Koussevitzky has been its conductor for 10 years, the longest period of any one director in the history of this organization.

The program for tonight includes the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 in E. Minor; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

OCT 27 1933

WILL PRESENT THREE EVENTS

Afternoon Musical Society Arranging Series of Subscription Concerts.

The Afternoon Musical society has announced a series of three subscription concerts to be given here during the coming season, the first of which will take place on the evening of November 15.

The society, after having omitted its subscription concerts last year, is resuming this usual feature of its yearly program mainly to bridge the gap in the musical life of young people of Danbury due to the dropping of music in the public schools. In order that the children and young people in the schools may have the opportunity of hearing these concerts a special price is being made to pupils in the grammar, high and State Normal schools which will make it possible for practically everybody to subscribe who wishes to do so.

The first of the concerts will be given by the Beacon Hill Symphonic Ensemble, a string ensemble of fifteen musicians, most of whom play in the summer "pop" concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and all of whom have played with famous symphonies in this country and in Europe. This group is directed by Russell Ames Cook, who also directs the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston and the Ensemble chorus and orchestra of the International Music Festivals, and is director of music at Ford Hall Forum, Boston; the International Music Festivals at Symphony Hall, Boston, and is also director of symphonic music of the graduate school of Harvard university.

The second event will be a song recital by John Gurney, bass-baritone, who was heard with much pleasure by members of the society when he sang at the State Convention of Music Clubs held in this city last winter.

On February 8, the Brahms quartet, a vocal ensemble of four young women which has a national reputation which is enviable, will be heard. The Brahms quartet, now a national institution, had its beginning in 1916, when it was organized in the studio of Percy Rector Stephens. The singers chose to call their organiation the Brams quartet because Johannes Brahms, the composer, was especially noted for the songs he wrote for women's voices. And then, to carry out the spirit of its historic purpose, the quartet elected to wear the costumes of 1860, the period in which Brahms was especially active in his writing of compositions for women.

All of the concerts of the series, which have been arranged through Miss Isabel Scott of the National Music League, New York city, will be given in the High school auditorium.

BRADDOCK, PA.
NEWS HERALD

OCT 27 1933

Boston Symphony To Open Season At Mosque Tonight

Pittsburgh's orchestra season opens at 8:15 o'clock tonight when the Boston Symphony comes to the Syria Mosque as the first attraction of this year's Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor.

Internationally famous, Dr. Koussevitsky is beginning his tenth year in America as the leader of the Boston Symphony.

May Beegle is manager of the Orchestra Association.

* * *

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

OCT 27 1933

Boston Symphony Has Work By Tchaikovsky On Program Saturday

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock in the RKO-Plaza theater before the Schenectady Civic Music Association will mark the return to Schenectady of that organization after an absence of ten years. It comes under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, Russian conductor who is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, interpretors of Tchaikovsky's music.

The program tomorrow evening will be climaxed by Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, of which Dr. Kousseivtzsky's reading is especially famous. He conducts it with magnificent energy, yet with the utmost ease and without the rhythmic oddities some conductors consider essential to Tchaikovsky, and never allows it to become vulgar.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which opens the program, is in marked contrast to the last number. A serenade for string orchestra, it is beautiful, exquisite, typically Mozartian. The work is composed in four movements: Allegro, Romanza, Menuetto: Allegretto, and Rondo: Allegro. One critic wrote of Dr. Koussevitzsky's treatment of Mozart: "He embodies the intrinsic sympathy between the music of the twentieth century and that of the eighteenth." This serenade is considered one of the composer's most delightful scores.

The program is balanced by another Russian number in a more realist vein than Tchaikovsky's Symphony, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and by Richard Strauss' roguish "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a tone poem in brilliant grotesque.

The concert tomorrow evening is open only to members of the Civic Music Association and their out-of-town guests, so that no box office will be open at the theater. Members who desire tickets for such guests may procure them before the concert from Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, financial secretary, at 1174 Parkwood boulevard, but not at the theater.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

OCT 27 1933

Art Institute To Sponsor 5 Concerts

Record crowds are expected to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 47th season in Brooklyn, which will be inaugurated Nov. 17 at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The Institute and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn have scheduled five Friday evening concerts for Nov. 17, Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Serge Koussevitzki will conduct.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 27 193

Mrs. Walker To Be Hostess At First Concert

Mrs. John Walker, of Warwick terrace, will entertain a party of 10 at the Boston Symphony concert this evening. Thirty of the debutantes and their escorts will also be at the concert.

This celebrated orchestra returns to open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque. The president of the association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., will be among the boxholders, and others who will pay honor to Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, are Mrs. William Reed Thompson, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. R. B. Mellon, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Mrs. Leon Falk, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Jr., Miss Ida M. Allerton, Mrs. Biddle Arthurs, Mrs. E. V. Babcock, Dr. Thomas S. Baker, Mrs. Frank B. Bell, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Mrs. George J. Willock, Mrs. Silas N. Benham, Mrs. A. H. Burchfield, Mrs. Charles B. Buerger, Mrs. W. P. Witherow, Mrs. Clarence P. Byrnes, Mrs. R. D. Campbell, Mrs. Harvey Childs, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Charles W. Dahlinger, Mrs. Harmar D. Denny, Mrs. Robert J. Dodds, Mrs. J. Frank Drake, Mrs. Charles Dreifus, Mrs. Oliver K. Eaton, Mrs. Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. Frederick W. Edmondson, Mrs. T. Raymond Evans, Mrs. Edwin S. Fickes, Mrs. W. S. Flower, Mrs. Isaac W. Frank, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Otto C. Gaub, Miss Mabel Lindsay Gillespie, Mrs. James H. Hammond, Mrs. L. B. Hays, Mrs. Howard Heinz, Mrs. Ernest Hillman, Mrs. J. H. Hillman, Jr., Miss Martha Jamison, Mrs. William R. Jarvis, Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister, Mrs. William B. Klee, Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, III., Mrs. James H. Lockhart, Mrs. George D. Macbeth, Mrs. J. E. MacCloskey, Mrs. James R. Macfarlane, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. John R. McCune, Mrs. A. W. McEldowney, Mrs. George W. McKee, Mrs. John Patterson, Mrs. J. G. Pontefract, Mrs. James H. Reed, Mrs. William Scott, Mrs. Charles

---

URBANA, OHIO
DAILY CITIZEN

In Columbus

Miss Martha Lichti, who is teaching this year in the public schools on Kelley's Island, is spending a vacation period with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Lichti, at their home, just west of Urbana, on the Terre Haute Road.

Thursday evening, Miss Lichti and her sister, Mrs. Donald Doss, motored to Columbus to hear the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Memorial Hall.

√3

OHIO STATE JOURNAL, COLUMBUS, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1933.

Koussevitsky Leads Boston Symphony in Fine Program

By HAROLD G. DAVIDSON. How absurd!

TO a well-filled balcony and a large crowd on the first floor, but not a packed house, alas, that notable Boston Symphony Orchestra and its right honorable director, Serge Koussevitsky, played a fine program Thursday night at Memorial Hall.

We had with us Koussevitsky the program-builder, thank heaven, as well as Koussevitsky the conductor. Can you imagine a bigger contrast than progressing from the chaste simplicities of Mozart's music for string orchestra alone to the voluptuous and heavily loaded orchestration of Scriabin? And anything better to top it off with than the sane and noble eloquence of a Beethoven symphony?

Interest centered mainly on the Russian number, Scriabin's "The Poem of Ecstasy" over which many learned musicians are still squabbling. It was designated "first time in Columbus" and rightly so; the Cleveland orchestra almost summoned the nerve, once, to take a chance—and then got chilly inside its shoes.

One thing is certain; if you heard Koussevitsky's orchestra perform this strange attempt to communicate ecstasy you probably heard it at its best in this country; for Koussevitsky knows Russian music in general perhaps better than any other conductor in the world. And besides that he was one of the first to understand and perform Scriabin's works in Russia and European countries.

* * *

HOW different it is to hear a big opus like this played in a large hall by a first-rate organization when your acquaintance with the work has been limited to records and radio, no matter how good the recording nor how clear the reception! It is hardly fair to the composer to judge a composition when you haven't heard it often enough to know it, let alone get sick of it.

Our personal impression of the "Poeme d'extase" is this; that the thematic material is both sparse and choppy, the harmony contains by far too many pedal points on the major ninth chord (of which the composer is inordinately fond) and that the orchestration is rich to a point of being over-loaded.

The latter would tend to cover up the defects of melodic invention and harmonic partiality. However, there are some thrilling climaxes that ought to move anyone. One climax has a compelling rhythmic throb and another is sheer weight of superimposed masses. No matter what you think, it's quite a neat little accomplishment. And the audience, on the whole, was much impressed.

* * *

AS for the Mozart music, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (a Serenade for string orchestra), it was thoroughly delightful. We have great faith in Koussevitsky as a leader of strings. He is the man who learned to make the gruff double-bass sound like the tenderer cello, a feat in virtuosic history. There was a fine unity of attack, all the varieties of bowing splendidly co-ordinated and richness of string tone both in slow passages and rushes.

The Beethoven "Eroica" symphony has been heard too often for extended comment. Koussevitsky is in love with all music that is good; which means something close to perfection in the German classics as well as those of other countries and his native Russia.

We winced at one sour cadence, but the horn player didn't blubber when he got a second chance. That is one good thing about recapitulation. The player may redeem himself. Otherwise, it was fine. We shall look forward with even keener interest to the coming broadcasts of this great orchestra and the right honorable Dr. Koussevitsky's masterly chosen programs.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 27 1933

BEETHOVEN CYCLE BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's cycle by the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin in Symphony hall on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 31. The program will include the Masters' First Symphony, and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3. The cycle is to include all of the nine symphonies; also overtures, concertos and the incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont," The chorus and vocal and instrumental soloists are still to be announced. Subscription seats are still to be had for this cycle to be given on six Tuesday afternoons, and the series of six Monday evening concerts which open Nov. 6 and which will be devoted to representative masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 27 1933

PARKING RESTRICTIONS LIFTED FOR CONCERT

Albanians attending the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Schenectady tomorrow night, under the auspices of the Schenectady Civics Music association, will find parking restrictions removed for the period of the concert. The area immediately behind the RKO Palace in which the concert is to be held has been reserved for listeners. Due to the length of the program the performance will begin promptly at 8:30 p. m.

RICHMOND, IND.
PALLADIUM

OCT 27 1933

Personals

Among the several Richmond people who attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in Dayton, Ohio on Wednesday evening were Paul Moore and Paul G. Druley.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson Magaw will motor to Bloomington on Sunday to visit their daughter, Miss Margaret Magaw who is a student at Indiana university.

Mrs. Dudley Cates of Winnetka, Ill., who has been visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. William Dudley Foulke, of this city for several days left Wednesday to return to her home. She was accompanied by Mrs. George Cates and Mrs. Sarah Stutson who will remain in Winnetka as house guests of Mr. and Mrs. Cates and their family for two weeks.

Mrs. Joseph Frisby returned Thursday evening from Indianapolis where she has been attending a two-day church conference and visiting relatives.

URGH, PA.
AZETTE

T 27 1933

Symphony Gives Mosque Concert Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players arrived in the city this morning and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series at Syria Mosque tonight. The Boston Orchestra is now in its fifty-third season, and Dr. Koussevitzky has been its conductor for 10 years, the longest period of any one director in the history of this organization.

The program for tonight includes the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5 in E. Minor; Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned Roguish Manner; Moussorgsky's Prelude to the Opera "Khovantchina," and Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

OCT 27 1933

WILL PRESENT THREE EVENTS

Afternoon Musical Society Arranging Series of Subscription Concerts.

The Afternoon Musical society has announced a series of three subscription concerts to be given here during the coming season, the first of which will take place on the evening of November 15.

The society, after having omitted its subscription concerts last year, is resuming this usual feature of its yearly program mainly to bridge the gap in the musical life of young people of Danbury due to the dropping of music in the public schools. In order that the children and young people in the schools may have the opportunity of hearing these concerts a special price is being made to pupils in the grammar, high and State Normal schools which will make it possible for practically everybody to subscribe who wishes to do so.

The first of the concerts will be given by the Beacon Hill Symphonic Ensemble, a string ensemble of fifteen musicians, most of whom play in the summer "pop" concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and ~~all of~~ whom have played with famous symphonies in this country and in Europe. This group is directed by Russell Ames Cook, who also directs the Symphonic Ensemble of Boston and the Ensemble chorus and orchestra of the International Music Festivals, and is director of music at Ford Hall Forum, Boston; the International Music Festivals at Symphony Hall, Boston, and is also director of symphonic music of the graduate school of Harvard university.

The second event will be a song recital by John Gurney, bass-baritone, who was heard with much pleasure by members of the society when he sang at the State Convention of Music Clubs held in this city last winter.

On February 8, the Brahms quartet, a vocal ensemble of four young women which has a national reputation which is enviable, will be heard. The Brahms quartet, now a national institution, had its beginning in 1916, when it was organized in the studio of Percy Rector Stephens. The singers chose to call their organiation the Brams quartet because Johannes Brahms, the composer, was especially noted for the songs he wrote for women's voices. And then, to carry out the spirit of its historic purpose, the quartet elected to wear the costumes of 1860, the period in which Brahms was especially active in his writing of compositions for women.

All of the concerts of the series, which have been arranged through Miss Isabel Scott of the National Music League, New York city, will be given in the High school auditorium.

BRADDOCK, PA.
NEWS HERALD

OCT 27 1933

Boston Symphony To Open Season At Mosque Tonight

Pittsburgh's orchestra season opens at 8:15 o'clock tonight when the Boston Symphony comes to the Syria Mosque as the first attraction of this year's Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor.

Internationally famous, Dr. Koussevitsky is beginning his tenth year in America as the leader of the Boston Symphony.

May Beegle is manager of the Orchestra Association.

* * *

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

OCT 27 1933

Boston Symphony Has Work By Tchaikovsky On Program Saturday

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock in the RKO-Plaza theater before the Schenectady Civic Music Association will mark the return to Schenectady of that organization after an absence of ten years. It comes under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, Russian conductor who is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, interpretors of Tchaikovsky's music.

The program tomorrow evening will be climaxed by Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, of which Dr. Kousssevitzsky's reading is especially famous. He conducts it with magnificent energy, yet with the utmost ease and without the rhythmic oddities some conductors consider essential to Tchaikovsky, and never allows it to become vulgar.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which opens the program, is in marked contrast to the last number. A serenade for string orchestra, it is beautiful, exquisite, typically Mozartian. The work is composed in four movements: Allegro, Romanza, Menuetto: Allegretto, and Rondo: Allegro. One critic wrote of Dr. Koussevitzsky's treatment of Mozart: "He embodies the intrinsic sympathy between the music of the twentieth century and that of the eighteenth." This serenade is considered one of the composer's most delightful scores.

The program is balanced by another Russian number in a more realist vein than Tchaikovsky's Symphony, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and by Richard Strauss' roguish "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a tone poem in brilliant grotesque.

The concert tomorrow evening is open only to members of the Civic Music Association and their out-of-town guests, so that no box office will be open at the theater. Members who desire tickets for such guests may procure them before the concert from Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, financial secretary, at 1174 Parkwood boulevard, but not at the theater.

NEW YORK JOURNAL

OCT 27 1933

Art Institute To Sponsor 5 Concerts

Record crowds are expected to attend the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 47th season in Brooklyn, which will be inaugurated Nov. 17 at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The Institute and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn have scheduled five Friday evening concerts for Nov. 17, Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Serge Koussevitzki will conduct.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 27 1933

Mrs. Walker To Be Hostess At First Concert

Mrs. John Walker, of Warwick terrace, will entertain a party of 10 at the Boston Symphony concert this evening. Thirty of the debutantes and their escorts will also be at the concert.

This celebrated orchestra returns to open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque. The president of the association, Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., will be among the boxholders, and others who will pay honor to Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, are Mrs. William Reed Thompson, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. R. B. Mellon, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. John W. Lawrence, Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, Mrs. George E. Tener, Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, Mrs. James Lyall Stuart, Mrs. Horace Forbes Baker, Dr. Ellen J. Patterson, Mrs. Leon Falk, Mrs. John G. Stephenson, Jr., Miss Ida M. Allerton, Mrs. Biddle Arthurs, Mrs. E. V. Babcock, Dr. Thomas S. Baker, Mrs. Frank B. Bell, Mrs. Thomas W. Phillips, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Mrs. George J. Willock, Mrs. Silas N. Benham, Mrs. A. H. Burchfield, Mrs. Charles B. Buerger, Mrs. W. P. Witherow, Mrs. Clarence P. Byrnes, Mrs. R. D. Campbell, Mrs. Harvey Childs, Mrs. Mortimer Miller, Mrs. Charles W. Dahlinger, Mrs. Harmar D. Denny, Mrs. Robert J. Dodds, Mrs. J. Frank Drake, Mrs. Charles Dreifus, Mrs. Oliver K. Eaton, Mrs. Howard N. Eavenson, Mrs. Frederick W. Edmondson, Mrs. T. Raymond Evans, Mrs. Edwin S. Fickes, Mrs. W. S. Flower, Mrs. Isaac W. Frank, Mrs. John M. Freeman, Mrs. Otto C. Gaub, Miss Mabel Lindsay Gillespie, Mrs. James H. Hammond, Mrs. L. B. Hays, Mrs. Howard Heinz, Mrs. Ernest Hillman, Mrs. J. H. Hillman, Jr., Miss Martha Jamison, Mrs. William R. Jarvis, Mrs. T. Clifton Jenkins, Mrs. W. Terrell Johnson, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister, Mrs. William B. Klee, Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, III., Mrs. James H. Lockhart, Mrs. George D. Macbeth, Mrs. J. E. MacCloskey, Mrs. James R. Macfarlane, Mrs. Samuel McClay, Mrs. John R. McCune, Mrs. A. W. McEldowney, Mrs. George W. McKee, Mrs. John Patterson, Mrs. J. G. Pontefract, Mrs. James H. Reed, Mrs. William Scott, Mrs. Charles

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette • Oct. 28

URBANA, OHIO
DAILY CITIZEN

In Columbus

Miss Martha Lichti, who is teaching this year in the public schools on Kelley's Island, is spending a vacation period with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Lichti, at their home, just west of Urbana, on the Terre Haute Road.

Thursday evening, Miss Lichti and her sister, Mrs. Donald Doss, motored to Columbus to hear the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Memorial Hall.

44

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette - Oct. 28

Fashionable Symphony Audience Fills Mosque

PATRONS OF THE SYMPHONY concerts who have occupied the same seats for six or seven seasons were out in great numbers for the Boston Symphony performance last night in Syria Mosque. But they constituted only part of the immense crowd, which filled the first floor and the two balconies, and were still buying tickets at 9 o'clock, although the orchestra began playing at 8:30. The last minute assault upon the ticket office was so unexpected that the program supply ran out long before the supply of seats.

And so differently are people constituted, fortunately, that there were people in the Mosque and even in their seats before 8 o'clock. Mrs. Ralph Flinn was about the first to arrive, closely followed by Mrs. George D. MacBeth. Mrs. Flinn wore black, and Mrs. MacBeth was attired in shell pink crepe with a full length wrap of bronze velvet.

Recording them as they passed into the Mosque, Mrs. A. S. F. Keister and Miss Mary Provost came next, Mrs. Keister in electric blue satin, with a long wrap of bright red velvet, collared in white fur. Two of the debutantes were next: Elinor Cowdrey in red crepe, with a three-quarter length wrap of black velvet, and Sally Jane Fields, in black velvet, with a scarlet velvet wrap.

And after 8:15, the crowd gathered rapidly, so rapidly in fact, that only a face or a costume here and there stood out. Mrs. Andrew Sloan was an early arrival, costumed in wine colored velvet. And at about the same time came Mrs. Harmar D. Denny, in black crepe, with a vari-colored brocade wrap. Mrs. Lawrence Knapp, in black lace, and her daughter, Mrs. Nielen Otterbein, in green bagheera velvet, and a mink wrap, followed.

Mrs. James I. Kay was there in black lace, and her daughter, Mrs. George S. Ebbert, in flag blue lace. Bishop Alexander Mann came about the same time. And another arrival just then was Mrs. Tracy W. Guthrie, in black lace.

Mrs. Thaw Arrives With Party

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., who moved recently to her town house from her place "As You Like It," on Sewickley Heights, and one of the symphony sponsors, arrived in black satin, accompanied by Mrs. George Pomeroy Bassett, Jr., in wine colored crepe.

Mrs. Edward Vose Babcock and Mrs. James Holland Hammond came together, both in black velvet, and Miss Laura Childs arrived with her grandmother, Mrs. James G. Pontefract. Bettie Guiler was there in crimson velvet, and Mary Gordon, another of the debutantes, in pale green satin, and a long black wrap, with white fur collar. Other debutantes and their mothers, who entered by the carriage door, in the same crowd, were Florence Willock in black velvet, with her inevitable orchid corsage, and Mrs. George J. Willock, also in black; Virginia Evans, in bright red satin and a white fur coat, with Mrs. Thomas Raymond Evans, in black. Louise Collier, in black crepe, and a black wrap, was accompanied by Barbara Verner, in white crepe, with a gardenia corsage.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Alexander Mellon had with them their daughter, Miss Patsy Mellon, who wore a striking floor-length wrap of black velvet, with sleeves, puffed and formed of alternate rows of black velvet and white fur. Under it she wore chartreuse crepe.

Mrs. Thompson Among Those Present

Mrs. William Reed Thompson was there, with Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eddy, and one of their young daughters. Mrs. Mortimer Miller wore maroon lace and a wrap to match, and Mrs. John Miller Freeman, dark red satin, the top of the bodice of pink satin. Mrs. William Maclay Hall was present, and starting down the aisle at the same time was the inevitable debutante, Eleanor Jane McKennan, in dark blue chiffon, studded with metal nailheads. Eloise Dorrance, another debutante, wore flag blue bagheera velvet. Mr. and Mrs. Howell C. Cooper were in a box, Mrs. Cooper wearing black velvet with white fur, and with them were Mrs. Chester M. Van Kleeck, Miss Melus Rhodes and Mrs. J. D. Rhodes.

Every place one looked there was an interesting personality, or a striking costume. Noted were

---

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 28 1933

Black Gowns Predominate At Symphony

Society Attends Syria Mosque Concert, Marking Opening of Season

IT'S OPEN season now for ermine and mink wraps and formal evening gowns. The appearance last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque marked the opening of the symphony season. The ever popular black shown in many of the gowns made a striking background for the gay colors worn by the debutantes.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., president of the Orchestra Association, occupied one of the boxes. She wore a black velvet gown with a chinchilla trimmed black wrap. Mrs. William Reed Thompson, one of the charter members, was there with her daughter, Mrs. Thomas Eddy. Mrs. Thompson wore black and Mrs. Eddy was in green and gold brocade. Mrs. William Watson Smith, Mrs. H. H. McClintic, Mrs. Leon Falk were other orchestra member box-holders.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Mellon and their daughter, Miss Patsy Mellon were in the audience. Mrs. Mellon appeared in blue with a white ermine wrap. Her daughter wore green velvet with a black velvet and ermine wrap.

* * *

MRS. T. C. JENKINS in gray and silver brocade and her daughter, Miss Elizabeth Jenkins, were together. Miss Jenkins wore a striking costume consisting of a white velvet gown and a pastel blue velvet bolero jacket embroidered in vari-colored beads.

Thronging the lobby, the debutantes gave the appearance of a Fourth of July holiday. Red, white and blue were the predominating colors in their gowns. Miss Ann Brown was attired in red velvet. Miss Dorothy Clark also wore red velvet. Miss Margaret Phillips of Butler was in red. Miss Barbara Verner wore white. Miss Eloise Dorrance had chosen blue.

* * *

MISS FLORENCE WILLOCK wore black velvet. Miss Nancy Doyle had also chosen black velvet. Miss Emily Stuart wore a blue velvet gown. Miss Elizabeth George was also in blue.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 28 1933

Bostonians Cheered By Huge Crowd

Koussevitsky's Direction of Symphony Here Appreciated

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Mr. Lewando

The incomparable Boston Symphony directed by the eminent Dr. Serge Koussevitsky ushered in the local orchestral season, and incidentally the 13th year of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, last night in Syria Mosque, presenting an impressive program of works that embraced Mozart's serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina;" Richard Strauss' 'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony in E minor.

The audience that turned out to hear these compositions played with indescribable eloquence, filled the downstairs, the upper balcony and most of the first balcony. It was the largest attendance at these concerts in many a moon; a sight to gladden the hearts of those persons who have banded together to give of their means in order to guarantee such concerts and a further proof that the projection of fine music is bound to be appreciated and win the wholehearted support of people seeking an art message.

Such a message was conveyed last evening.

From the opening bright notes of the Mozart work to the final vital chords of the Tschaikowsky symphony, every man, woman and child was held under the spell of collective virtuoso skill transmitting through the sway of an interpretive genius such as Koussevitsky's, the musical thoughts of immortal composers.

Thus the lovely serenade of Mozart for strings was played in a rare manner that proved that classicism still retains its lure. The gaiety of the Allegro; the delicacy and limpidity of tone of the Romanza, the sturdiness of the Menuetto, and the rampant enthusiasm, blitheness and jollity of the concluding Rondo was a tonal feast for the ears that evoked several recalls and an ovation for both leader and players.

But that was just the beginning of the wonders that Koussevitsky and his cohorts was to conjure up. The ensuing Moussorgsky prelude proved an equal delight.

The evening's accomplishments reached their apogee with a memorable performance of Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel," a musical delineation of the escapades of a fourteenth century "beloved vagabond."

To this potent score, a marvel of orchestration, Dr. Koussevitsky and his men gave as brilliant and vivid a reading as it has been this reviewer's good fortune ever to hear. Especially impressive were the building of the various climaxes and the implications of the final sections, the interpretive aspects of which were lucidly defined.

Concluding came that saga of sorrow, the Tschaikowsky Fifth, which is replete with emotional expression.

Certainly this is not the best of the composer's work in the symphonic field, for there are sections in the third and fourth movements that are most trite.

Yet the genius of Koussevitsky lifted these parts from banality and uninterest to the heights of musical worth. Unforgettable though, was the melancholy Andante Cantabile with its wistful horn solo, expressive of the anguish of a human heart. The significance of the entire movement was heightened by the highly individual and poetic treatment.

The end of the concert was the signal for an enthusiastic outbreak of applause.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 28 1933

Boston Opens The Symphonic Season, Mosque

Dr. Koussevitsky And Men Given Three-Fold Ovation.

When Dr. Koussevitzky brings his distinguished band, the Boston Orchestra, to town, then is our symphonic season really open.

And what an opening!

With more enthusiasm than has been shown here in two years, with a queue of people way out in front, with standees all over the gallery, it was almost an old-time beginning.

Boston did it, and the orchestra was never more effulgent than it was last night at the Mosque, magnificent in ensemble, glowing in solo bits, the Symphony is glory.

There were extravagant people who thought they really had never heard "Till Eulenspiegel" until Serge Koussevitzky unfolded his merry pranks, and perhaps these listeners were correct. It was a truly splendid exposition, with that delicious figure, the Till motivation, admirably given.

One thing Dr. Koussevitzky feels beyond the composer, and that is instrumentation. He plays the solo bit and he colors the phrase, gives the French horn a half-bar phrase, and you hear it open and close, and that is as it should be.

In matters of allargandi, accelerandi, the fading of a passage, we doubt if there is a better band in the land than this Boston body. Absolute homogeneity, a one-ness, conductor and men, and it made an ideal interpretation.

Germans and Russians.

As far as this reviewer is concerned the program began with the Moussorgsky "Khovanstchina," a prelude of haunting sonorities and colors.

Of course it is heresy to say so, and the black-hand bund will begin bombarding us with unsigned postcards, but a good deal of Mozart is boring, and as far as we're concerned a little Wolfgang Amadeus goes a long way.

The orchestra played the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," with full-throated strings and lightly singing strings, but the four movements for all their fiddle intimacy, are tiresome—or don't you think so?

Undoubtedly you are right.

Of the four the "Romanza" was the most appealing, though there are many finely wrought bars in the menuetto-allegro.

Then came Moussorgsky, and some of us consider Modest Petrovitch the grandest of the Russians and certainly "Khovanstchina" is high in merit. From the tenuous opening to the last somber sonority, it was one of the high lights.

Sometimes we wish Serge Koussevitzky would come with nothing but a Russian program, he so comprehends the whole mood of the composition, as witness the Tschaikowsky fifth.

Richness was in that opening andante, and if the valse seemed to lack spontaneity, at least it was magnificently contoured and developed. The cantabile in the second movement was finely handled without being saccharine.

Three times Dr. Koussevitzky stood the men on their feet. Not enough, they should have been waved up for every movement of the oft-heard Tschaikowsky.

H. G.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

OCT 28 1933

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Syria Mosque

PROGRAM

Serenade for String Orchestra	Mozart
Prelude to "Khovantschina"	Moussorgsky
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks	Strauss
Symphony No. 5 E Minor	Tschaikowsky

The large audience which crowded Syria Mosque last night was a welcome sight after seasons of vacant, staring seats. The occasion was the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and from eavesdropping I learn that this concert will be remembered as making musical history in Pittsburgh. Everyone was agreed that it was great music and voted, vive voce, that Koussevitsky is now the best of conductors in America.

Mr. Lissfelt

The orchestra and the many phases of its perfection, the excellent solo players, the ensemble, the sensitive response to every nuance in the director's emotion, we have long ago taken for granted. But Koussevitsky last night excelled all his former playing in Pittsburgh.

In every phrase there was such intensity as must come to the composer at the moment of creating that music. I had just come from reading those pranks of Till Eulenspiegel, for they were but a review of what I had heard at my grandfather's knee, and he had known these stories and had walked the very roads of Till's adventures in his boyhood.

The "Once Upon a Time" of Koussevitsky's opening phrases were as simple as the beginning of those fireside stories. Then came the scenes of deviltry and rascality with humor such as we have never before had from any orchestra.

But it was not merely in the mere telling of these adventures that Koussevitsky succeeded so subtly. His complete understanding of those motifs and of the character of each instrument in giving this music its fullest expression could come from only the maturest musician.

To watch Koussevitsky's masterful understanding of the simple Mozart Serenade, his coloring of the Moussorgsky Prelude, and then follow him to the climax of the Tschaikowsky Symphony was for any enthusiast the most satisfying experience. I should say this concert was the conductor's personal triumph.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

Otte

N. Y. EVENING POST

4

OCT 28 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Another American Orchestral Novelty and the Problem of the Right Sort of Measuring Rod

IF THERE is anything New York's concert habitues must be utterly weary over, it is the annual argument over Mahler and Bruckner. The writer of these lines, for one, is convinced there can be more profit today in taking stock of the substantial success of an American novelty, Werner Josten's Concerto Sacro, No. 1, heard at last Tuesday night's Philadelphia Orchestra concert.

For some time we have been convinced that too much attention was being paid to eccentrics whose scores suggest that they are written with the tongue in the cheek. Music has had about enough of machines, burlesque and jeering irony. It is high time it returned to honest sentiment, honest feeling, honest aspiration and an honest idealism. Mr. Josten's modal professions of faith carry conviction.

Next week's Philharmonic programs will bring another American novelty, Randall Thompson's Second Symphony. Mr. Thompson is a New Yorker, by birth and residence. He is thirty-four years old. A graduate of Harvard and a pupil in composition of Ernest Bloch, he has won several awards, including a Guggenheim Fellowship and a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. He was formerly assistant professor of music in Wellesley College and has lectured at Harvard. Besides two symphonies, his orchestral works include "The Piper at the Gates of Dawn," played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky; "Pierrot and Cothurnus," which Mr. Thompson conducted at the Augusteo in Rome; and a "Jazz Poem," with piano, performed by the Rochester Philharmonic. He has written chamber music and several choral works, including one called "Americana," given by the League of Composers. He composed incidental music for "The Straw Hat," and the score for "Grand Street Follies."

Asks for Our Own Measure

Though Mr. Thompson does not seem to have qualified as being sufficiently radical as an American for Henry Cowell's symposium of "American Composers on American Composers," we find him asking, in an article in the Musical Quarterly, when this country will stop seeking the European stamp of approval. "Does Europe," he asks, "await our endorsement of things European? The European yardstick is no measure for the things we do and we shall never achieve artistic autonomy so long as we employ a foreign unit of measure. It constitutes a tyranny of opinion under which we struggle to please Europe, but only succeed in displeasing and aping it. We ourselves must be the supreme judges of our own music. The value that a given work has for us is the important thing, and that value is only to be estimated by its relation to other works of our own. This is heresy. But be it noted that such has been, and still is, the practice in all other nations; and in this way only shall we give our composers the support and stimulus that other nations have given theirs."

Next Thursday night's symphony was composed in Switzerland, and was first performed at Rochester on March 24, 1932. The composer is authority for the statement that it has no program, either literary or spiritual, that it is not cyclical, but, like the symphonies of the eighteenth century, is primarily melodious and objective.

RADIO GUIDE

k

OCT 28 1933

Symphonists

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI and the Philadelphia Symphony are broadcasting fifteen of their Friday afternoon concerts from the Academy of Music. The second broadcast is November 3 (2:30 p. m. over CBS-WABC). Others follow on November 10 and 24; December 1, 15 and 22. Pitts Sanborn is again the commentator. And now, Chesterfield is sponsoring this great symphony in an evening series.

As yet, NBC has sent no word concerning the renewal of the Boston Symphony broadcasts. Nothing would please them better than to have a card from you asking for their continuance.

Outstanding contribution in the early season is the hour broadcast of Egon Petri every Sunday (NBC-WJZ at 8 p. m.). A complete concerto by the Dutch pianist and suitable orchestral selections by a symphony under the direction of Frank Black will complete the program. This is a welcome amplifiication of the precedent set by Columbia with Ernest Hutcheson, whose broadcasts were only half an hour in length.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 28 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

Obviously honesty of purpose, clear evidence of much hard work, some degree of technical attainment, but, alas, very little imaginativeness or sense of the dramatic emerged Thursday evening as characteristic of Juan Reyes, Chilean pianist, who made his debut here at Town Hall.

These characteristics were made evident in the first number, the Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue of Bach. Nothing which later put in an appearance was repugnant to this estimate. Beethoven's Rondo in G major; the ever-popular Chopin B minor Sonata, and compositions of Albeniz, deFalla, Schumann, Sauer (teacher of the pianist) and Wagner-Liszt made up the rest of the program. A good-sized audience was pleased with the proceedings.

Serge Koussevitzky, conducting the Boston Symphony next Friday and Saturday in Boston, will give an American premiere to Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement, which is all the name it has . . . Egon Petri will play Mozart's E-flat Piano Concerto, K.482, at these performances . . . The annual faculty concert of the New York Schools of Music will be held Sunday afternoon, November 26, for philanthropic reasons . . .

▼

Saturday evening, November 11, the League of Composers will give its first concert of the season, at Town Hall, and in honor of Arnold Schoenberg. His arrival in New York will be the cause for celebration. After the program, the League will give the composer a reception in the Town Hall Club. The concert program will consist of representative Schoenberg pieces presented by the Pro-Arte Quartet with Ruth Rodgers, soprano, and Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, assisting . . . The League's second concert, January 29, will be an all Strawinsky-Hindemith evening . . . The third, March 27, will be devoted to chamber music by four Spanish, Italian, French and American composers.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

OCT 28 1933

Sponsors Concert Series

Miss Elizabeth Pafford is a member of the Junior League committee which is joining efforts with the general committee of sponsors for the Boston Syphony Orchestra's concert series which will begin at the Academy of Music next month.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

OCT 28 1933

Boston Symphony's Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Forty-Seventh season in Brooklyn, which will be inaugrated on Friday evening, Novenber 17, at the Academy of Music, has created greater interest than ever before according to subscriptions reported at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

As the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this year, the occasion of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's tenth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Ochestra is expected to be marked by an attendance exceeding that of any recent previous season in its record.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Soceity of Brooklyn, and an enlarged Brooklyn Committee, who are sponsoring the current series, have scheduled five Friday evening concerts for November 17, January 5, February 1, March 2 and April 6.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, in assuming the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, was successor to procession of noted leaders from Wilhelm Griecke, forty years ago, through the successive eras of Arthur Nikisch, Emil Pauer, Max Fiedler, Dr. Muck, and the World War, when two French conductors, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux, wielded the baton. The reign of Dr. Koussevitsky, the great Russian conductor, from 1924 to the present day is the longest consecutive period in which any conductor has held this post.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the enlarged Brookln Committee for the Boston Symphony Crchestra Concerts which includes many former members of the Brooklyn Committee for the New York Philharmonic Concerts, and also a committee of members of the Junior League.

Whiteman and Petri Added To Institute Music Series

Paul Whiteman and his orchestra, and Egon Petri, pianist, have been added to the new "Enjoment of Music" series of fifteen Sunday afternono recitals, with commentary of Olin Downes, to begin Nov. 26, at the Brooklyn Institue of Arts and Sciences, Brooklyn Academy of Music.

In the fifth recital of the series, on Jan. 7, Paul Whiteman and his orchestra will illustrate the theme, "The Significance of American Popular Music." On the program of Feb. 4, Egon Petri will appear with Georges Barrere and the Barrere Litle Symphony in a recital illuminating "Compositions by Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century Composers."

The complete schedule of artists who will be held in this 110th anniversary series of the Institute is as follows: Richard Crooks and Margaret Matzenauer, Hall Johnson Choir, Jascha Heifetz, Lawrence Tibbett, Paul Whiteman and his orchestra, the New English Singers, Lily Pons, Albert Spalding and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Georges Barrere, the Barrere Little Symphony and Egon Petri, Myra Hess and the Perole String Quartet, Jessica Dragonette and Renaissance Quintet, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Sophie Braslau and the Kroll Sextet, Josef Hofmann, Serge Koussevitzky and twenty-four players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BUFFALO, N. Y. NEWS

OCT 28 1933

THE ENTHUSIASTIC audience last Sunday afternoon proved that Marian deForest is right in her contention that the town will rise to the occasion when the highest kind of music is offered them. In a program of decided contrasts the Boston Symphony orchestra displayed his ability to present the most delicate tonal shadings and to deliver all the thunders of Olympus. Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to be in top form and infused his players with his tireless energy. Debussy's Festivals and Tschaikovsky's Fifth Symphony stood out in fine authority, although one can understand why Brahms did not like the final movement of the symphony. Music heard over the radio cannot equal the contagious excitement of an appreciative audience and massed players led by an inspired conductor.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y. GAZETTE

OCT 28 1933

Koussevitzsky To Open Local Music Season

Large Audience Expected at Plaza Theater Tonight for the Boston Symphony Program

The current Civic Music Association season will begin tonight before the largest audience in the local organization's history, when Conductor Koussevitzsky's baton falls before the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8:30 o'clock in the RKO-Plaza Theater. With a large number of members bringing out-of-town guests and the majority of the Albany Association expected to attend, officials have announced that doors will be opened at 7:15 o'clock.

Guests of members of the association are coming not only from cities in the Schenectady area, such as Gloversville, Amsterdam, Troy, Saratoga Springs, Johnstown, but from the Knox School at Cooperstown, Bennington, Vt., Pittsfield, Mass., Hudson Falls and Glens Falls. Members may procure tickets for their out-of-town guests from Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, 1174 Parkwood boulevard, until 5:15 o'clock this afternoon. Tickets will not be procurable at the theater tonight.

Dr. Koussevitzsky has chosen a well balanced program for presentation tonight which will show the orchestra at its best, bringing out the precision and beauty of its string choir, unequalled anywhere at present, in the Mozart Serenade for String Orchestra, and, in the Prelude to Moussorgsky's Opera, "Khovantchina," the incandescent tone quality of the entire ensemble which distinguishes this orchestra above all others. This string number is followed by the rougish "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss' most famous score, while the program is climaxed in Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, a number for which the Russian conductor is particularly famed as interpretor.

Dr. Koussevitzsky brings to Schenectady a magnetic personality which has thrilled audiences in two continents. Yet, this hypnotic power upon his audience is not accomplished by gallery conducting. For waving arms he substitutes a single innate gesture, constant use of facial expression—the all-sufficient spell of the eternally magnetic.

The program tonight will be:

"Eine Kleine Natchtmuski" Mozart
  Allegro
  Romanza
  Menuetto: Allegretto
  Rondo: Allegro
Prelude to "Khovantchina" .... Moussorgsky
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" .... Richard Strauss Symphony No. 5.......Tchaikevsky
  Andante: Allegro con anima
  Andante cantabile
  Valse
  Finale

SCHENECTADY, N. Y. GAZETTE

OCT 28 1933

To Entertain Tonight After Concert

Professor and Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler of Parkwood boulevard will entertain at dinner this evening, following the Boston Symphony concert, in compliment to Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Rowney, who are leaving soon for Indianapolis, to make their home there.

The other guests will include Mr. and Mrs. John Allen Capp, Mr. and Mrs. Earl Rice, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Kelly, Mrs. Helen Jenkins, Miss Myra Whitcombe, Joseph Derrick, Ellis Auer, Robert Carothers and Anthony Palermo.

* * *

ALBANY, N. Y. NEWS

OCT 28 1933

Phil Baker's description of a photograph as a "group picture of Kate Smith" was amusing, and the New World Symphony orchestra played the surpassingly beautiful andante from Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which the Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Schenectady tonight.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y. GAZETTE

OCT 27 1933

Symphony to Play Russian Masterpieces

Koussevitzsky to Direct the Boston Orchestra in Tchaivoksky's "Fifth Symphony"

The program in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night at the RKO-Plaza Theater, will include two works by his compatriots, Tchaivoksky's "Fifth Symphony" and the prelude to Moussorgsky's Opera, "Khovantichina". The concert, which is before the Civic Music Association, will begin at 8:30 o'clock.

There is in Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony" a religious sentiment lacking in his other great works; it appears in the chorale-like introduction to the second movement and in the andante maestoso which precedes the finale. This symphony is also his most homogeneous work; in it the composer presents the struggle of life, or of the soul, against fate.

Dr. Koussevitzsky is particularly renowned for his interpretation of this work. He gives an intensely dramatic reading which yet avoids vulgarity and, remarkably, in view of the pace at which he takes the slow movement, sentimentality. One critic wrote of his performance of the Fifth, "Again a sophisticated audience was stirred beyond itself; with Koussevitzsky no detail lost its significance. The performance was one of cumulative elegance and power".

There is nothing in symphonic literature more intensely yet touchingly national than the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," the other Russian composition on the program. The introduction is based upon national anthems in a scene placed by the River Moskva. Bells are ringing for matins as the sun rises and the gathering light reveals the Red Square, "Holy of Holies" to all Russian hearts. The noisy jingosim of Tchaikovsky's familiar "1812 Overture" pales in comparison with this poetical evocation from the national life.

As only members of the association and their out-of-town guests are admitted in Civic Music concerts there will be no box office open at the theater. Members who have guests may procure tickets for them from the financial secretary, Mrs. Henry A. Schauffler, 1174 Parkwood boulevard.

DAYTON, O. HERALD

OCT 2[illegible]

ARTISTS SERIES CONCERTS.

To the Editor of The Herald:

It was indeed gratifying to see the vast number of Daytonians who turned out Wednesday for the first concert of the Artist series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Finally, it seems, music in Dayton is being truly appreciated. Finally the efforts of a few music lovers, who have staunchly insisted that Dayton must have the best in music although the few here who patronized such things seemed to be less each year, have begun to bear fruit.

Until recently it was believed that symphonies were for the few who knew and understood music. To those who had but little musical education it was believed a symphony was "deep stuff," boring, and certainly not thrilling. But within the few years, this fact particularly evident in other cities where grand opera and symphonies have won a tremendously large following, people have realized that at a symphony or opera one can learn music and that it is by attending that they will become music conscious.

Although at Wednesday's concert there were a number of empty seats, the concert was the best advertisement for those following in the series. Would that there were symphony concerts oftener here. Although even this is fast becoming an actual fact by the new group of young people who are giving programs during the winter at the Dayton Art Institute.

—MUSIC LOVER.

HARTFORD, CONN. TIMES

OCT 28 1933

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to be heard in this city during the latter part of the season, gave a concert in Orchestra hall, Chicago, on Monday evening. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, and the program featured the well-known "Second Symphony" by Sibelius.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 27 1933

Can You Keep Still?

By KATE BURR

THE woman in the seat ahead of me at the Boston Symphony concert last Sunday kept a continual tapping of her foot on the floor.

Not the tapping that goes with keeping time, but a tapping because her nerves would not allow her to keep still.

She was using all her stored energy and the people near her were troubled to deep annoyance by that continual tap, tap, tap, like that of Poe's immortal raven perched above his chamber door.

By and by my thoughts were distracted from the music by that tap, tap, tapping on the music hall floor.

She was frail—that woman—worn, and I could guess why.

Think of all that she could have done in many lines if the effort expended in that tapping foot had been diverted to something constructive.

But finally the playing and the musicianship of the artists—most of the men in the Boston Symphony are soloist as performers—distracted my mind from that eternal tapping.

Undoubtedly that poor woman was unconscious of the fact that her foot would not keep still.

* * *

A young woman visited a business friend of mine.

She had come for a program of a coming series of events.

While she was waiting, she sat flipping the cover of a magazine almost in the face of the woman with whom she was talking.

My friend drew back, for the paper was heavy and the sharp corner of the cover narrowly missed her eye

Still the young woman who was twirling the sheet kept on undeterred.

She had to wait 30 minutes for her order to be filled and never once in that time did she stop her whirligig motion.

The three who witnessed it were made dizzy by the incessant fling of the paper—round and round.

* * *

Finally her errand was fulfilled and as she rose to go one of the spectators, a physician, stepped forward. She said, "I am nearly tired to death!"

"I should think you would be, my dear young lady," said the doctor.

"Can you not learn repose? You would then get a good rest."

"Repose!" exclaimed the young woman nervously. "Why I am quiet all the time, I think I need stirring up."

The doctor smiled.

"Were you aware," he said, "that you were making about eighty revolutions a minute with that twirling finger and thumb of yours?"

She looked at him aghast.

"Do you mean to say my hand was in motion all this time?" she inquired.

You see she was unconscious of all these wild dips and flourishes, while they were depleting her energy.

* * *

A good thing in these days of strain is to watch ourselves.

To see that we do not engage in violent thumb twirling, foot tapping or use of any other emotional outlet which burns up energy.

To cultivate outward repose I consider a bounden duty to ourselves.

More of us than I like to think need this warning.

We are too apt to express the inward perturbation through these outward channels of unrest, thereby dissipating strength otherwise needed .

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

OCT 28 1933

A record attendance is expected at the opening concert of the Civic Music Association at the Plaza Theater tonight, when the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitszky, will play. Koussevitszky has, in the last seven years, endeared himself to the hearts of that portion of the music-loving public which is eager to know what is being done in the American field of composition, by giving many first performances of American composers. Of these, Edward Burlingame Hill has been represented by four—Symphony in B flat major, "Lilacs," Sinfonietta in one movement, and the ode for the Orchestra s 50th anniversary. Frederick Shepherd Converse has been represented by "California," and "Prophecy," and Walter Piston by "Symphonic Piece," and "Piece for Orchestra."

Other composers were Daniel Gregory Mason, Arthur Foote, Blair Fairchild, George Chadwick, Carl McKinley, A. L. Steinert, Mabel W. Daniels, John Alden Carpenter, Ernest Schelling, Howard Hanson, Rubin Goldmark, Henry Eicheim, Henry Hadley, Aaron Copland, George Gershwin, Charles T. Griffe, Leo Sowerby and Edward MacDowell.

HANOVER, PA.
SUN

OCT 28 1933

Music

BALTIMORE CONCERT SEASON

With three concerts each to be given in Baltimore by both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, in addition to the concerts by the Philadelphia orchestra and the Baltimore Symphony orchestra, the coming season promises to be of more than usual importance.

The dates selected for the appearance of the National Symphony Orchestra, with Hans Kindler directing, are November 8, January 24 and March 14. The Baltimore engagements of the Boston Symphony will be on November 14, January '31 and April 3. All the concerts will be given at the Lyric.

The plans for bringing the National Symphony to Baltimore were launched last season following its local debut. Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, its Baltimore counsellor, has announced that a number of boxes for the three concerts have already been reserved. Among the soloists who will appear with this organization is Rose Brampton, brilliant young contralto, and John Charles Thomas, barytone, both of the Metropolitan Opera.

The National Symphony, though still in the early stage of its career, has won recognition among American orchestras and Dr. Kindler has established a reputation as a director as well as a 'cello virtuoso, in which capacity he first took a place in the world of music.

* * *

For the first time in twelve years the trustees of the Boston Symphony will give a series of concerts in Baltimore. This organization will be presented under the local management of the T. Arthur Smith Concert Bureau, and Miss Starr is acting as counsellor.

All three concerts will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky, who is entering his tenth year as the orchestra's conductor. The personnel of 108 remains virtually unchanged, as it has stood for a number of seasons past.

Although Serge Koussevitzky has added a number of new works to the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the bulk of his programs consists of compositions by the established masters, and some of the greatest of them will be presented under his direction at the three concerts this orchestra will give at the Lyric, the opening date being November 14.

The Baltimore and Washington concerts were arranged, it is stated by George E. Judd, assistant manager, as the result of the orchestra's extended schedule, which marks its fifty-third season.

* * *

The Baltimore Symphony Orchestra will begin its nineteenth season with a concert at the Lyric, on December 14. George R. Siemonn, is continuing as conductor of this organization.

Frederick R. Huber, municipal director of music, has announced that he has secured Sascha Jacobson, first violinist of the Musical Art Quartet, as soloist for the first concert.

This appearance will afford the general public of Baltimore its first opportunity to hear Jacobson since his solo engagement at the Lyric with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

MINNEAPOLIS STAR

OCT 28 1933

Listener Today Is Being Spoiled for Poor Music

By JOHN K. SHERMAN

The only change we have noted in local symphonic traditions this week is that Eugene Ormandy wears a blue sweater instead of a gray one at rehearsals. In all other respects, the orchestra and its leader seem to be following the time-honored custom of playing better than any symphony orchestra ought to play this early in the season.

That is a commendable habit, but it is apt to spoil concertgoers. If an orchestra plays raggedly at the opening concert, listeners are more than ordinaril, tolerant. Being exhilarated by the thrill of the occasion anyway, they are inclined to forgive little lapses.

The next concert, they'll say, will see considerably more polish in the playing. So they go eagerly to the next concert to note the improvement. If that concert is a little better than its predecessor, they'll offer silent thanks and make a mental note to be sure to attend the third concert, just to hear how much better it will be than the second.

* * *

Thus the concertgoer who follows the slow and gradual improvement of the orchestra is lured again and again to the concerthall. At the eighth concert, he may notice that the woodwinds are in tune with the orchestra for the first time, and his heart leaps up at that discovery and that achievement. At the ninth, he'll be amazed and delighted, perhaps, that the French horn didn't burble once all evening. At the tenth, the first violins may have finally mastered the art and science of playing in unison. And so on. When each concert succeeds in showing definitely more skill and proficiency than the one before, the observant music lover is kept on his toes, so to speak, all season—always hopeful for the best, always optimistic and forward-looking in his whole attitude.

But when a symphony orchestra plays as well at a first concert as the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra will doubtless play tonight, the game of hunting errors and hoping for better luck next time is just about ruined. The concertgoer is flabbergasted by hearing music from which virtually all boners, flaws and sour notes have been ruthlessly deleted. There is nothing left for him to do but enjoy fine interpretations from the very start.

* * *

And hearing masterly interpretations week after week, with standards so high at first that their gradual ascent during the season is scarcely perceptible, the concertgoer gets so he depends on masterly interpreations at all times. His ear has been taken out of the elementary grades in music appreciation and enjoys now a college education. He is apt to grow snobbish and hypercritical when he hears anything of lower grade in interpretative art. He's spoiled. And he's also adult, with a sense of values and discrimination he might never have acquired under the old trial-and-error system.

Interpretative standards are pretty stringent today, and listeners are constantly growing more critical and keen-eared. There is altogether too much good playing to make mediocre playing tolerable. Not for nothing do the concerts of the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and the Boston symphony orchestras come over the air waves, and not for nothing does the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra lead off, as unquestionably it will tonight, with a program as polished and grade A in performance as any we may hear later, even though the season will doubtless bring added finesse and refinement. This type of excellence is spoiling all of us—spoiling us for poor music and poorly played music.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 28 1933

Dr. Hanson's German Program Enlightening to Audience

Dr. Howard Hanson's program of contemporary German music in Kilbourn Hall, yesterdy, was enlightening from various viewpoints. First, it showed that all the bad modern music that is written is not produced in America. Second, it pointed out conclusively that the American music that we have been hearing is an individual expression not derivative or dependent upon a modern European culture. And most important, the music played yesterday showed an American audience that their own music could well stand beside contemporary musical efforts in other countries.

I make these comparisons because this program was the first of a series usually devoted to American music alone.

The concert, as a whole, was well planned, interesting, and somewhat refreshing. Most of the music was substantial and coherent: a lot of it had the same youthful mistakes that some of our American music contains.

The most consistant and even piece on the program was Ernst Toch's "Prelude to a Fairy Tale." Aside from the attractive subject, it seemed better formed, more inspired, than any other composition played. Toch is, by birth, an Austrian Jew, and is now in London, an exile from Berlin, where he has made his home for some time. I met Herr Toch in this country some few years back, and was impressed by his music then and later when the Boston Symphony played his piano concerto. Yesterday's performance of his work served to renew my faith in him as one of the finest talents in modern Germany.

Herman Wunsch's "Festival on Monbijou" was attractive for its complete frankness and naturalness. His gemutlich German tunes were a surprise after reading the rather oriental title of his work. I am frankly at a loss as to the where, the how, or the what about "Monbijou."

More original than any other piece on the program was Karol Rathaus's "Small Prelude" for trumpet and strings. Though it was announced as being atonal, it had none of the acerbity that one usually associates with the atonal composers. The melodic material was altogether charming if not very profound, and the harmonic treatment lost none of its progressiveness through the natural and positive dissonance that Rathaus uses.

An "Epilogue" for strings, piano and harp, by Rudi Stephan, expressed a different emotional state than the others did. The work is classified as "romantic," there can be no denying that, for the most part, the motivation is sheer sentimentality.

The compositions of Wolfgang Fortner and Hugo Hermann were not too impressive. Fortner's "Toccata" on the theme of a seventeenth century Dutch composer was illogical and futile.

The Hugo Hermann suite, despite a fine performance, was not very interesting; it is well written but dull.

Dr. Hanson is to be complimented for the interesting program. An occasional look into what other contemporaries are doing is not only enlightening but gives new faith to American composers, and new belief in their own individuality. G. L.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

47

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 29 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL OPEN CIVIC MUSIC SEASON

Auditorium to Be Scene Of Five Concerts Scheduled

MEMBERS ONLY

Hub Aggregation Under Serge Koussevitzky's Direction

THE fourth Civic Music association in Worcester opens Monday, Dec. 11, with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

All of the series of five concerts will be held in the Auditorium and will be restricted to the 1700 association members who subscribed during the annual Spring campaign. Guest tickets are available only to those living outside a 40-mile radius of Worcester.

Florence Austral, soprano, who has appeared once before in this series here, will come again Wednesday, Jan. 17, with John Amadio, flutist. The Tokatyan trio of two voices and cello are scheduled for Tuesday, Feb. 6; Mischa Levitzki, pianist, for Tuesday, Feb. 27; and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, Tuesday, March 6.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play here after an absence of many years. Conducting will be Serge Koussevitzky, who began his 10th season of Boston concerts early this month.

Founded 1881

This famous orchestra was founded in 1881 by Maj. Henry L. Higginson, the banker, who engaged the finest musicians in Europe and brought to this country a succession of great conductors. George Henschel was the first of these. Dr. Koussevitzky succeeded Pierre Monteux in 1924, arriving with a sensational European reputation to commend him to his American public.

Koussevitzky began his musical career and soloist on the double bass, an instrument which he has played in concert a few times during his American residence. He took up the double bass while at the Conservatory in Moscow and made himself the greatest living master of that instrument.

Soon, however, he turned to conducting, first in Berlin, and then organized his own orchestra in Petrograd, and chartered a steamer and took the orchestra down the Volga to play in innumerable provincial towns on the way. Interested in the music of his countrymen, he introduced the compositions of Scriaben, Stravinsky and Proko[illegible] which he later played to his conduc[illegible] [illegible] revolution he [illegible] ernment subsidy, then [illegible] where he established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky." He also gave guest performances in London and other capitals to which he still goes back each Summer to repeat his triumphs.

Florence Austral and her flutist-husband provide an unusual concert combination. The soprano was born in Melbourne, Australia, sang ballads and little songs at amateur and church concerts, and in 1918 entered the Ballaret competitive musical Festival at Victoria, New South Wales. Her success at this festival was so great she immediately began her musical education at the Conservatory of Music at Melbourne, completing the course in 18 months.

Four years later after studying in London, Miss Austral made her operatic debut as Brunhilde. She was the special feature of the 1925 Cincinnati Festival, being specially engaged to come here for that event.

John Amadio was born in Wellington, New Zealand. At the age of 12 he played a flute concerto with the Wellington Orchestra society. A year later he was sent to Australia for further study.

At 15 he was principal flutist to the famous Italian Grand Opera Company which toured Australia. After a few years more of study, he was engaged as principal flutist to the first Melba Opera Company, which included John McCormack. Engagements followed as solo flutist of all the visiting celebrities, including Calve and Melba. His subsequent appearances as solo artist have been in Rome, Paris, Berlin and New York.

The Tokatyan Trio comprises Armand Tokatyan, Egyptian tenor, Hans Hess, German cellist, and Sonia Sharnova, American-born contralto.

The tenor is really a blend of several ancient and semi-Oriental peoples. His parents were both natives of Turkish Armenia but moved to Bulgaria before the birth of their son. Armand lived just long enough in the Balkan country to imbibe something of its spirited nature and then departed with his family to the land of the Pharoahs. There he stayed, in the ancient city of Alexander the Great, until his popularity with the French soldiers, for whom he sang in the cafes, took him to Paris. For a time he sang with a French company of the "Merry Widow" and then went to Italy to study under the great master, Çairone. He had only been a few weeks with the Modena Opera Company when he was invited by Gatti-Casazza to join the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York.

The tenor returned last Summer to Europe for his first appearance there since the brief days with the Modena Opera Company. He appeared with the opera companies of Paris, Berlin, Rome, Milan, Budapest, Vienna, Liege and Brussels and sang in concert in London.

Mr. Hess, who now makes his home in Ravinia, Illinois, brings with him his great Bergonzi cello, an instrument of rare beauty, made by Carlo Bergonzi, the famous craftsman of Cremona, Italy. This magnificent instrument, renowned for its tonal beauty and fidelity, one of the few still in existence, was made in 1741. Mr. Hess will also bring with him a Tourte bow, one of the few in this country, made by Francois Tourte.

Sonia Sharnova is an American born singer of Russian origin a product of Chicago. She made her operatic debut at the Nice Opera, and then appeared with notable success in such operatic centers as Milan, Sienna and Livorno, singing in La Gioconda, La Favorita, Il Trovatore and others.

Two U. S. Tours

Returning to this country she made two coast to coast tours with the German Grand Opera Company. Her success brought her to the attention of the Chicago Civic Opera Company management and in 1930-31 became a member of that organization, and continued with the company until its suspension last season.

Mischa Levitzki is an American by birth, though born in distant Krementchug, Southern Russia.

At an early age he showed a marked musical talent, and Michailowski of Warsaw became his teacher. When he was eight years old, an audition before Walter Damrosch resulted in the boy being enrolled at the Institute of Musical Art in New York under Stojowski. He continued his studies with this master for the next five years. then went to Europe to study under Dohnanyi at the Berlin Hochschule.

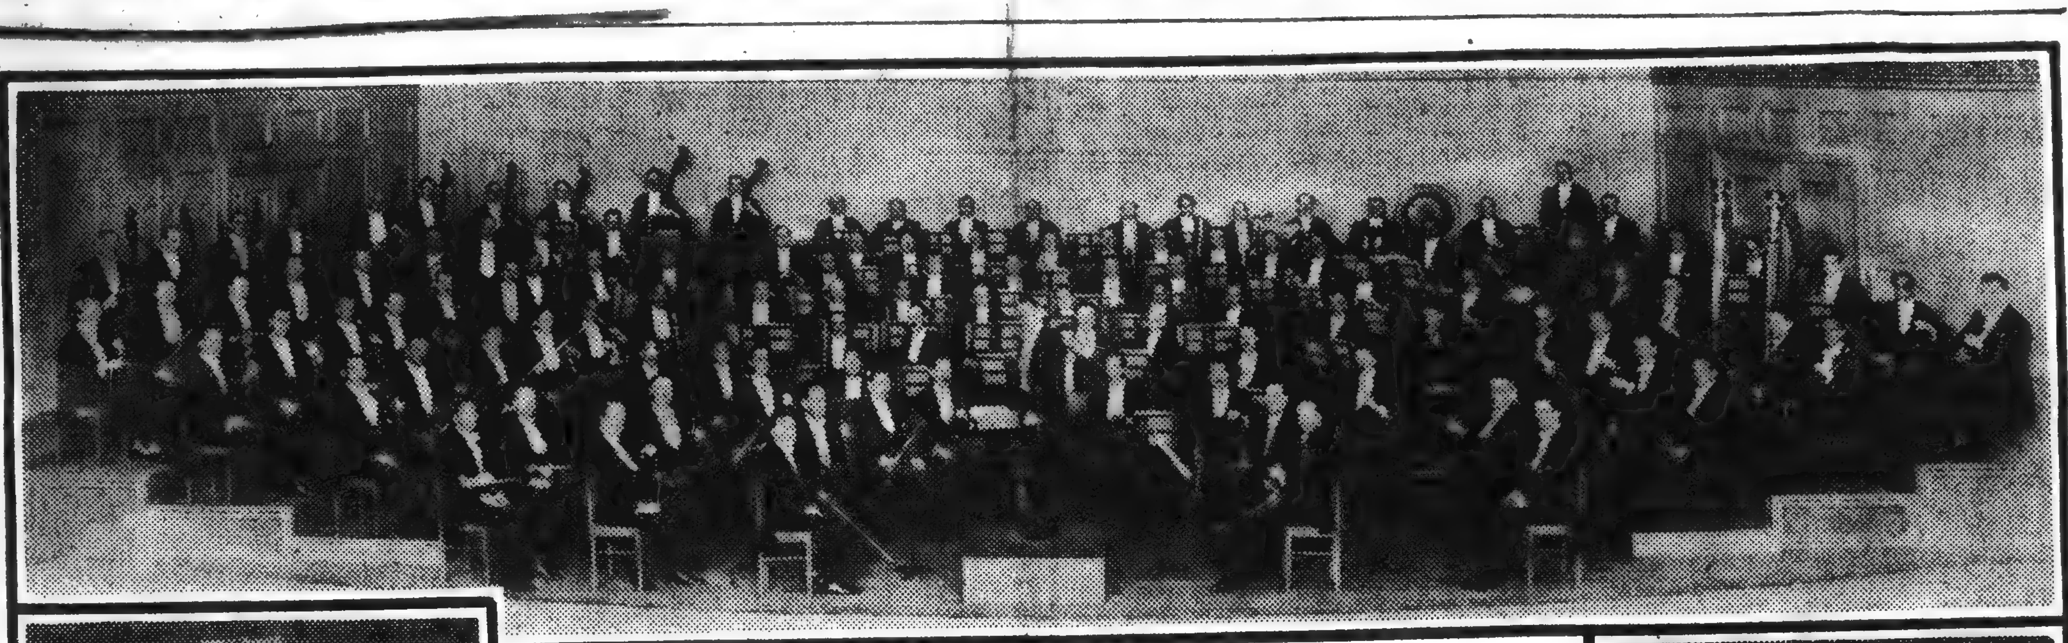
Finally his career was launched with a Berlin debut. He has since toured the entire world, even in distant Java, Singapore, China, Japan and Australia. He is now making his 14th tour of the United States.

Russian Born

Although Russian by birth, Zimbalist is in many respects an American artist. He is an American citizen, makes his Winter home in New York city and his Summer home in Connecticut and has two children born in this country.

Zimbalist was born in Rostov-on-Don, on April 9, 1889. His first teacher was his father, who was an orchestra leader. The boy showed such extraordinary gifts at so early an age that when he was only nine years old he became first violinist in a grand opera orchestra.

Although an active child, fond of sports and fun, Zimbalist had an absolute passion for music. It was this insatiable desire to master music in all its forms that decided his father in sending him in the Autumn of 1903 to the Imperial Conservatory in St. Petersburg where he entered the class of Prof. Leopold Auer and became the forerunner of the famous coterie of violinists—Elman, Heifetz, Seidel—who came after him.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON'S PROGRAM

MONDAY, DEC. 11, 1933
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY CONDUCTING.
WEDNESDAY, JAN. 17, 1934
FLORENCE AUSTRAL, SOPRANO, AND JOHN AMADIO, FLUTIST.
TUESDAY, FEB. 6, 1934
TOKATYAN TRIO; ARMAND TOKATYAN, EGYPTIAN TENOR; HANS HESS, CELLIST; SONIA SHARNOVA, CONTRALTO.
TUESDAY, FEB. 27, 1934
MISCHA LEVITZKI, PIANIST.
TUESDAY, MARCH 6, 1934
EFREM ZIMBALIST, VIOLINIST.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

FLORENCE AUSTRAL
· SOPRANO ·

ARM[illegible] TOKATYAN
· TENOR ·

MISCHA LEVITZKI
· PIANIST ·

EFREM ZIMBALIST
· VIOLINIST ·

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 29 1933

CONCERTS TO OPEN IN BROOKLYN NOV. 17

Forty-seventh Season of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Include Five Programs.

TO HAVE THREE SPONSORS

Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct for His Tenth Consecutive Year in Borough.

The forty-seventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be inaugurated Friday, Nov. 17, it was announced yesterday. The series will be sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and a special committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman.

Five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Lafayette Avenue, on Nov. 17, Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6. Subscriptions have been coming in this year better than heretofore, Mr. Van Sinderen said.

On Borough Committee.

Assisting him on the borough committee will be:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Mrs. John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Frank L. Babbott, Dr. Frank L. Babbott Jr., William R. Bayes, Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Miss Alice Brinsmade, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Charles B. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, William M. Calder, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll and I. Sherwood Coffin.

Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Harris M. Crist, Supreme Court Justice James C. Cropsey, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Supreme Court Justice Norman S. Dike, Miss Mary E. Dillon, the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy DuVal, Mrs. William P. Earle Jr., S. Raymond Estey, Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis and Theodore L. Frothingham.

Others on Committee.

Others on the committee will be: Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Mrs. James M. Hills, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. William Kennedy Jr. and Jacob C. Klinck.

Also serving are:

David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Edie Leech, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. Frank Melville Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. Burt F. Nichols, Mrs. Carroll L. Nichols, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons.

Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter Jr., Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, William A. Thayer.

Mrs. David Thornton, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, John T. Underwood, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Miss Josephine D. Wilkin, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Surrogate George A. Wingate, Mrs. Harry M. Wingle, Cornelius D. Wood, R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Annie S. Wyckhoff and Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

Junior Committee to Aid.

There will also be a junior committee serving under the direction of Mrs. Charles Franklin. It will comprise: Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy R. Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Miss Elizabeth Pafford, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra throughout the season, marking the tenth consecutive year he has held the baton in Brooklyn. Mr. Van Sinderen said no previous conductor had equalled this record.

NEW YORK TIMES

T 29 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programs for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Boston, include Honegger's "Mouvement Symphonique No. 3," Mozart's piano concerto in E flat major with Egon Petri as soloist and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

---

born in Melbourne, [illegible], sang ballads and little songs at amateur and church concerts, and in 1918 entered the Ballaret competitive musical Festival at Victoria, New South Wales. Her success at this festival was so great she immediately began her musical education event. John Amadio was born in Wellington, New Zealand. At the age of 12 he played a flute concerto with the Wellington Orchestra society. A year later he was sent to Australia for further study.

At 15 he was principal flutist to sequent [illegible] solo artist have been in Rome, [illegible] and New York.

The Tokatyan Trio comprises Armand Tokatyan, Egyptian tenor, Hans Hess, German cellist, and Sonia Sharnova, American-born

There he stayed in the ancient city of Alexander the Great, until his popularity with the French soldiers, for whom he sang in the cafes, took him to Paris. For a time he sang with a French company of the "Merry Widow" and peared with the opera companies of Paris, Berlin, Rome, Milan, Budapest, Vienna, Liege and Brussels and sang in concert in London.

Mr. Hess, who now makes his home in Ravinia, Illinois, brings where he entered the class of Prof. Leopold Auer and became the forerunner of the famous coterie of violinists—Elman, Heifetz, Seidel—who came after him.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

OCT 29 1933

Brooklyn Institute Offers Brilliant Programs

A MAJOR feature of the 110th anniversary season's activities of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is its musical program. This promises to be one of the most brilliant and varied in its long artistic tradition and will help in making the Academy of Music a mecca for music lovers of the city.

The annual series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will mark the 47th year of this famous musical organization in Brooklyn as well as the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the orchestra, will be inaugurated Nov. 17, with concerts following on Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Two distinguished series of recitals on "The Enjoyment of Music," with comment by Olin Downes, music critic, are featured on the institute's program. As a complementary course to the Evening Series, which began on Oct. 13, an Afternoon Series of equal appeal has been added, to begin Sunday, Nov. 26. The overwhelming demand for the Evening Course necessitated the arrangement of the new series of 15 Sunday afternoon lecture-recitals.

Special recitals will be given by Fritz Kreisler, Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Ionian Quartet, the Curtis String Quartet, Tollefsen Trio, and others in this brilliant program provided by the institute in its 110th year.

Paul Whiteman and his Orchestra and Egon Petri, pianist, have been added to the new "Enjoyment of Music" series of 15 Sunday afternoon recitals, with comment by Olin Downes, music critic, to begin November 26 at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Brooklyn Academy of Music.

In the fifth recital of the series, on Jan. 7, Paul Whiteman and his Orchestra will illustrate the theme "The Significance of American Popular Music." On the program of Feb. 4, Egon Petri will appear with Georges Barrere and the Barrere Little Symphony in a recital illuminating "Compositions by seventeenth and eighteenth century composers.

The complete schedule of artists who will be heard in this 110th anniversary series of the institute is as follows: Richard Crooks and Margaret Matzenauer, Hall Johnson Choir, Jascha Heifetz, Lawrence Tibbett, Paul Whiteman and his Orchestra, the New English Singers, Lily Pons, Albert Spalding and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Georges Barrere, the Barrere Little Symphony and Egon Petri, Myra Hess and the Perole String Quartet, Jessica Dragonette and Renaissance Quintet, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, Sophie Braslau and the Kroll Sextet, Josef Hofmann, Serge Koussevitzky and 24 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Following is a complete list of the musical events of the institute:

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 5 — MARC BLITZSTEIN, composer-pianist. Lecture-recitals on "Three Masterworks of Modern Music," "Igor Stravinsky and the Sacre du Printemps."

Tuesday evening, Nov. 7 — JOHN CHARLES THOMAS, baritone. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Folk Songs and Art Songs."

Friday evening, Nov. 17 — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY conducting.

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 19 — MARC BLITZSTEIN, composer-pianist. Lecture-recitals on "Three Masterworks of Modern Music," "Arnold Schoenberg and the Pierrot Lunaire."

Tuesday evening, Nov. 21—MISCHA ELMAN, violinist. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Music for the Violin."

Sunday afternoon, Dec. 17—Richard CROOKS AND MARGARET MATZENAUER. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Songs of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms."

Monday evening, Nov. 17 — FRITZ KREISLER. Violin recital.

Sunday afternoon, Dec. 3 — HALL JOHNSON CHOIR. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Negro Folk Music: Spirituals, Work Songs and Blues."

Friday evening, Dec. 8—ROSA PONSELLE, soprano. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "The Italian Music Drama."

Sunday afternoon—JASCHA HEIFETZ. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Violin Music of Bach, Schubert, Richard Strauss, Ravel and Other Composers."

Sunday afternoon, Dec. 17—THE TOLLEFSEN TRIO. (Augusta Tollefsen, piano; Carl Tollefsen, violin; Robert Thrane, 'cello).

Sunday afternon, Dec. 17—LAWRENCE TIBBETT. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Operatic Song in the Hands of European and American Composers."

Tuesday evening, Dec. 19—WIENER SAENGERKNABEN. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Medieval and Modern Choral Music."

Friday evening, Jan. 5—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY conducting.

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 7 — PAUL WHITEMAN and his Orchestra. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "The Significance of American Popular Music."

Tuesday evening, Jan. 9—THE BY-TOWN TROUBADOURS. JOSE ITURBI pianist. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Eighteenth Century Piano Music."

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 14—THE NEW ENGLISH SINGERS. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "The Golden Age of English Song."

Monday evening, Jan. 15—ROTH QUARTET. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Modern Quartet Music."

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 21—LILY PONS. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Coloratura Song."

Wednesday evening, Jan. 24—VICTOR CHENKIN, Russian baritone-diseur. Recital of Continental character songs.

Friday evening, Jan. 26—THE ROBERT BURNS QUARTET. (Helen Bone, soprano; Marget B. LeCompte, contralto; Edwin C. Nelson, tenor; Alan Ballantyne, baritone). Recital of Scotch songs.

Sunday afternoon, Jan. 28—ALBERT SPALDING AND OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Sonatas for Piano and Violin."

Tuesday evening, Jan. 30—GRETA STUECKGOLD, soprano, "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "German Lieder."

Thursday evening, Feb. 1—THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducting.

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 4—GEORGES BARRERE, THE BARRERE LITTLE SYMPHONY AND EGON PETRI. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Compositions by Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century Composers."

Thursday evening, Feb. 8—SERGEI RACHMANINOFF. Piano recital.

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 11—MYRA HESS AND THE PEROLE STRING QUARTET. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Solo and Chamber Music of Chopin, Schumann and Brahms."

Wednesday evening, Feb. 14—HAROLD BAUER, pianist. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Chromaticism in Piano Music from Bach to Cesar Franck."

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 18—JESSICA DRAGONETTE AND RENAISSANCE QUINTET. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Old Music on Ancient Instruments and Songs of the Olden Time."

Sunday afternoon, Feb. 25 — GUY MAIER AND LEE PATTISON. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Music for Two Pianos."

Wednesday evening, Feb. 28—SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "The Modern Symphony and Symphonic Poem."

Friday evening, March 2—THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducting.

Monday evening, March 5—YEHUDI MENUHIN, violinist. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Classic and Modern Forms of Violin Music."

Tuesday evening, March 13—MARIA OLSZEWSKA, contralto. "The Enjoyment of Music" Evening Series, "Song of the Classic and Modern Periods."

Friday evening, March 16 — JOHN HAZEDEL LEVIS. Lecture-recital on "The Music of China."

Sunday afternoon, March 18—SOPHIE BRASLAU AND THE KROLL SEXTET. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Songs by Russian Composers and Music for Six Stringed Instruments."

Sunday afternoon, March 25—JOSEF HOFMANN. "The Enjoyment of Music Series" Sunday afternoon, "Masterpieces of Piano Music."

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

OCT 29 1933

Boston Symphony On Special Train

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, en route from Youngstown, O., to Schenectady, passed through Syracuse yesterday morning at 6:30 o'clock on the New York Central Railroad. A special train of eight cars was operated for the orchestra.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

OCT 28 1933

Efrem Zimbalist accepted an invitation to tour Russia in April. He has not visited his native land since his debut with the Boston symphony.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 29 1933

The well-known Philadelphia harpist, Dorothea Fox, formerly with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Baseler Harp Ensemble and the Matinee Musicale Club Harp Ensemble, now broadcasts concert programs twice weekly on WHAT at 9:30 P. M. Sundays and 10:30 P. M. Wednesdays.

SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

OCT 29 1933

SEASON BRINGS AMERICAN-MADE MUSIC TO FORE

By John Selby

NEW YORK, Oct. 28 (A.P.)—Look up musical America! You are going to hear three new American operas this season along with a lot of other compositions by home town boys who know how to make music for the oboe and bull fiddle.

In the operatic field there will be Howard Hanson's "Merry Mount" to a libretto by Richard Stokes of New York. Mr. Hanson's music is written around a dramatic situation in the Massachusetts bay colony and is one of the few American operatic attempts that employs directly American legend and history as material.

The music has had an abridged concert performance at Ann Arbor, Mich., last spring, but never a stage performance. That has been reserved for this season at the Metropolitan.

January will see the first performances of two other operas, one, "Helen Retires," the libretto by John Erskine and the music by George Antheil, the other, "Four Saints in Three Acts," for which the well known modernist, Gertrude Stein, has provided the libretto and Virgil Thomson the score.

Libretto by Erskine

Mr. Erskine's libretto is based on an uncanonical legend concerning Helen of Troy and Menelaos. The production will be by the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

"Four Saints in Three Acts" is the story of some worthies of the church reduced to the often astonishing English of Miss Stein and clothed musically by Thomson, formerly of Kansas City and now living in Paris. It will be given in January as the opening performance in the New Model theatre at Hartford, Conn.

American composers generally are being given considerable attention by the major orchestras of the country this winter.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony and always a champion of the new, plans at least three performances of major works by American composers of the modernist stripe.

Although Arturo Toscanini's programs are not ready, a number of new American works are to be done by the New York philharmonic under Bruno Walter and Hans Lange.

NEW YORK TIMES

OCT 29 1933

'ENJOYMENT OF MUSIC' SERIES.

The dates, the artists and the subjects of the fifteen Sunday afternoon recital programs to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, with commentary by Olin Downes, are as follows:

Nov. 26—Richard Crooks and Margaret Matzenauer. Songs of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms.
Dec. 3—Hall Johnson Choir. Negro folk music: Spirituals, work songs and "blues."
Dec. 10—Jascha Heifetz. Violin music of Bach, Schubert, Richard Strauss, Ravel and other composers.
Dec. 17—Lawrence Tibbett. Operatic song in the hands of European and American composers.
Jan. 7—Paul Whiteman and his orchestra and an artist to be announced. The significance of American popular music.
Jan. 14—The New English Singers. The Golden Age of English song.
Jan. 21—Lily Pons. Coloratura song.
Jan. 28—Albert Spalding and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Sonatas for piano and violin.
Feb. 4—Georges Barrere, the Barrere Little Symphony and Egon Petri. Compositions by seventeenth and eighteenth century composers.
Feb. 11—Myra Hess and the Perole String Quartet. Solo and chamber music of Chopin, Schumann and Brahms.
Feb. 18—Renaissance Quintet and Jessica Dragonette—Old music on ancient instruments and songs of the olden time.
Feb. 25—Guy Maier and Lee Pattison. Music for two pianos.
March 18—Sophie Braslau and the Kroll Sextet—Songs by Russian composers and music for six stringed instruments.
March 25—Josef Hofmann. Masterpieces of piano music.
April 8—Serge Koussevitzky and twenty-four players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Music by contemporaneous composers for small orchestra.

NEW YORK NEWS

OCT 29 1933

Symphony Season To Begin Nov. 17 And End April 6

Adrian Van Sinderen

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will begin its season at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, it was announced yesterday.

The concerts, sponsored, in addition to the Institute, by the Philharmonic Society and a committee of Brooklyn citizens, will be given five times during the season, Nov. 17, Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Dr. Koussevitzky begins his tenth consecutive year as conductor of the orchestra. He came to the orchestra in 1924, establishing a record for the longest consecutive period in which any conductor has held the post.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Brooklyn committee for the concerts. Tickets for the concerts may be obtained by subscription.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

29 1933

Boston Symphony Has Important Sponsors

Washington society is enthusiastically supporting the series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall this coming Winter, according to a list of boxholders just made public by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra. Thirty-seven boxes out of a total of 52 available at the hall, have already been taken.

The boxholders are: Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. William H. Woodin, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. William R. Castle, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Eliot, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. A. B. Houghton.

Mrs. Oscar Jareski, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Keith Merrill, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Mrs. Russell Magna, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. H. C. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mr. Gustav Weckel and Mrs. C. C. Williams.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

29 1933

Washington society is enthusiastically supporting the series of three matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at Constitution Hall this coming winter, according to a list of boxholders just made public by Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, local representative of the orchestra.

The boxholders are:

Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. William R. Castle, jr., Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. James C. Dunn, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Eliot, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. A. B. Houghton, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes.

Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, Mrs. F. A. Keep, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mr. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Keith Merrill, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Mrs. Russell Magna, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mr. Gustav Weckel, Mrs. C. C. Williams and Mrs. William H. Woodin.

ctive Week

Merits and Faults of the Piano Concertos of Mozart

Her.

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

There is a mistaken piety in the belief that all of Mozart's writing of pianoforte represent the best phases of his art. Some of it shows him at a disadvantage. On the other hand, his pianoforte concertos—one of which, the E flat, will be played by Egon Petri at the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting—stand out among the gems of literature.

Camille Saint-Saens, a musician of remarkably facile powers of appreciation, took it upon himelf, when already an octogenarian, to do justice to some of these rarely beautiful works. He appeared in London, giving four Mozart programs in a chamber music hall, at which time he presented 12 of the finest pianoforte concertos. A glance at contemporary programs, as well as those of the last generation, would give the impression that Mozart had written at the outside, four of these works, so narrow is the choice of most pianists. Thanks go in advance to Mr. Petri for giving us one that is seldom heard.

Mozart's intimacies are by no means frailties; his marvelously transparent scoring gives his every utterance unusual powers of penetration, both in sound and meaning. Who will emulate, at least in part, the example of the venerable Saint-Saens and give Boston one or two programs of these concerts in Jordan hall? There is need to draw nearer to these works that are—if one regard not the academic definition of the word—beautiful examples of chamber music style.

In the classical concertos the composer left a space for extemporary playing by the performer. This "cadenza" gave him a wonderful opportunity to deal, in his own way, with material already contributed by the composer. In the space of a few minutes the player could show his imagination, his musicianship, and his individual technical resources. Perhaps no other important feature of the concerto style laid itself open to such tactful handling or again such abuse. The art of extemporizing is one almost forgotten, but we find the names of Mozart and Mendelssohn prominent among its greatest exponents. Mozart, himself, left a number of written cadenzas to his own works which, while somewhat perfunctory, give glimpses of the greatness of what he must have improvised.

In the "gay nineties" Carl Reinecke was considered by a group of Leipzig admirers to be the greatest Mozart interpreter of his day. Those who have patiently, or impatiently, scanned his over-valued cadenzas to the concertos can only wonder why.

Walter R. Spalding in his book "Music: an Art and a Language" says, "His (Mozart's) one important contribution to the development of instrumental form was the Pianoforte Concerto." Certainly he shows in no other form so much variety. He has a special way of handling the orchestral tuttis in both the first movements and the rondos. Genuine appreciation and enjoyment of these works are gained, not by waiting for the advent of the solo part, but by realizing that all that the orchestra does to prepare it is of the same relative importance as is the "Prelude" to "Tristan and Isolde." There will be but little limit to the listener's joy if he will but "begin at the beginning."

The Juilliard School of Music announces that Dec. 1, 1933, is the closing date on which manuscripts will be accepted for its 1933 Competition for Publication of New Orchestral Works by American Composers. The school will select a given work from the entries and pay for its publication. The composer receives all royalties and fees accruing from the sale or performance of his work. The school also co-operates with the composer in securing for his work adequate rehearsal and performance.

More encouragement for the American composer!

The League of Composers will open its 1933-1934 season with a concert in honor of Arnold Schoenberg. The season's second concert will be devoted to a Hindemith-Stravinsky program. The third in the series will be music for chamber ensemble by leading Spanish, Italian, French and American composers.

Interesting is the fact that the league has given American premieres of some of Schoenberg's major works, notably his opera, "Die Gleuckliche Hand," which was presented in 1930 under the baton of Leopold Stokowski.

Advices from Chicago are that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky scored a huge success.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1933

FIVE CONCERTS LISTED BY CIVIC MUSIC ASS'N

A series of five concerts will be presented for the 1700 members of the Civic Music association, beginning with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra Monday, Dec. 11, at the auditorium.

Guest tickets are available only to those living outside a 40-mile radius of Worcester.

Florence Austral, soprano, who has appeared once before in this series, will come Wednesday, Jan. 17, with her husband, John Amadio, flutist.

The Tokatyan trio of voices and 'cello are scheduled for Tuesday, Feb. 6.

Mischa Levitzki, American pianist, will play Tuesday, Feb. 27.

The noted violinist and composer, Efrem Zimbalist, will be presented Tuesday, March 6.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 30 1933

Speaking of symphonies, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony club, informs us that the Boston Symphony orchestra paid for itself once more, leaving no deficit. The votes of the listeners, which were counted that same night, showed this group almost a unanimous first favorite, with the Chicago orchestra a close second.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
OCT 31 1933

Kreisler Opens Woolsey Series Thursday

The opening event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series is scheduled for Thursday evening at 8:30, with the famous musical personage, Fritz Kreisler, as the season's first artist. One of the largest audiences ever to crowd its way into the spacious Yale University auditorium will hear the distinguished violinist, who is recognized the world over as the finest exponent of one of the most difficult of instruments.

The ticket sale for this season's Woolsey Hall Series has surpassed all previous years by a large margin due, of course, to the fine list of musical events that will be presented. Following Kreisler will come in order the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13th Lawrence Tibbett on December 13th; Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch on January 11th; Lottie Lehmann on February 13th; and the Boston Symphony again on February 27th.

This season's series will mark the first time that the great Boston Orchestra of 110 men has ever visited New Haven more than once the same year, as well as being the first time that Kreisler has appeared as a Woolsey Series artist, although he has been heard here a number of times previously. The Bauer-Gabrilowitsch two-piano recital is likewise a Series innovation this year for never before has such an event been presented on the annual program.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 31 1933

FRITZ KREISLER AT WOOLSEY THURSDAY

The opening event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series is scheduled for Thursday evening at 8:30, with Fritz Kreisler, as the season's first artist. One of the largest audiences ever to crowd its way into the spacious Yale University auditorium will hear the distinguished violinist, who is recognized the world over as the finest exponent of one of the most difficult of instruments.

The ticket sale for this season's Woolsey Hall Series has surpassed all previous years by a large margin. Following Kreisler will come in order the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13th; Lawrence Tibbett on December 13th; Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch on January 11th; Lotte Lehmann on February 13th, and the Boston Symphony again on February 27th.

This season's series will mark the first time that the Boston Orchestra of 110 men has ever visited New Haven more than once the same year, as well as being the first time that Kreisler has appeared as a Woolsey Series artist, although he has been heard here a number of times previously. The Bauer-Gabrilowitsch two-piano recital is likewise a Series innovation this year for never before has such an event been presented on the annual program.

ctive Week

Merits and Faults of the Piano Concertos of Mozart

Her. Oct 28

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

There is a mistaken piety in the belief that all of Mozart's writing of pianoforte represent the best phases of his art. Some of it shows him at a disadvantage. On the other hand, his pianoforte concertos—one of which, the E flat, will be played by Egon Petri at the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting—stand out among the gems of literature.

Camille Saint-Saens, a musician of remarkably facile powers of appreciation, took it upon himelf, when already an octogenarian, to do justice to some of these rarely beautiful works. He appeared in London, giving four Mozart programs in a chamber music hall, at which time he presented 12 of the finest pianoforte concertos. A glance at contemporary programs, as well as those of the last generation, would give the impression that Mozart had written at the outside, four of these works, so narrow is the choice of most pianists. Thanks go in advance to Mr. Petri for giving us one that is seldom heard.

Mozart's intimacies are by no means frailties; his marvelously transparent scoring gives his every utterance unusual powers of penetration, both in sound and meaning. Who will emulate, at least in part, the example of the venerable Saint-Saens and give Boston one or two programs of these concerts in Jordan hall? There is need to draw nearer to these works that are—if one regard not the academic definition of the word—beautiful examples of chamber music style.

In the classical concertos the composer left a space for extemporary playing by the performer. This "cadenza" gave him a wonderful opportunity to deal, in his own way, with material already contributed by the composer. In the space of a few minutes the player could show his imagination, his musicianship, and his individual technical resources. Perhaps no other important feature of the concerto style laid itself open to such tactful handling or again such abuse. The art of extemporizing is one almost forgotten, but we find the names of Mozart and Mendelssohn prominent among its greatest exponents. Mozart, himself, left a number of written cadenzas to his own works which, while somewhat perfunctory, give glimpses of the greatness of what he must have improvised.

In the "gay nineties" Carl Reinecke was considered by a group of Leipzig admirers to be the greatest Mozart interpreter of his day. Those who have patiently, or impatiently, scanned his over-valued cadenzas to the concertos can only wonder why.

Walter R. Spalding in his book "Music: an Art and a Language" says, "His (Mozart's) one important contribution to the development of instrumental form was the Pianoforte Concerto." Certainly he shows in no other form so much variety. He has a special way of handling the orchestral tuttis in both the first movements and the rondos. Genuine appreciation and enjoyment of these works are gained, not by waiting for the advent of the solo part, but by realizing that all that the orchestra does to prepare it is of the same relative importance as is the "Prelude" to "Tristan and Isolde." There will be but little limit to the listener's joy if he will but "begin at the beginning."

The Juilliard School of Music announces that Dec. 1, 1933, is the closing date on which manuscripts will be accepted for its 1933 Competition for Publication of New Orchestral Works by American Composers. The school will select a given work from the entries and pay for its publication. The composer receives all royalties and fees accruing from the sale or performance of his work. The school also co-operates with the composer in securing for his work adequate rehearsal and performance.

More encouragement for the American composer!

The League of Composers will open its 1933-1934 season with a concert in honor of Arnold Schoenberg. The season's second concert will be devoted to a Hindemith-Stravinsky program. The third in the series will be music for chamber ensemble by leading Spanish, Italian, French and American composers.

Interesting is the fact that the league has given American premieres of some of Schoenberg's major works, notably his opera, "Die Gleuckliche Hand," which was presented in 1930 under the baton of Leopold Stokowski.

Advices from Chicago are that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky scored a huge success.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 30 1933

FIVE CONCERTS LISTED BY CIVIC MUSIC ASS'N

A series of five concerts will be presented for the 1700 members of the Civic Music association, beginning with a program by the Boston Symphony orchestra Mo~~nday, Dec.~~ 11, at the auditorium.

Guest tickets are available only to those living outside a 40-mile radius of Worcester.

Florence Austral, soprano, who has appeared once before in this series, will come Wednesday, Jan. 17, with her husband, John Amadio, flutist.

The Tokatyan trio of voices and 'cello are scheduled for Tuesday, Feb. 6.

Mischa Levitzki, American pianist, will play Tuesday, Feb. 27.

The noted violinist and composer, Efrem Zimbalist, will be presented Tuesday, March 6.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 30 1933

Speaking of symphonies, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the Symphony club, informs us that the Boston Symphony orchestra paid for itself once more, leaving no deficit. The votes of the listeners, which were counted that same night, showed this group almost a unanimous first favorite, with the Chicago orchestra a close second.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER
OCT 31 1933

Kreisler Opens Woolsey Series Thursday

The opening event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series is scheduled for Thursday evening at 8:30, with the famous musical personage, Fritz Kreisler, as the season's first artist. One of the largest audiences ever to crowd its way into the spacious Yale University auditorium will hear the distinguished violinist, who is recognized the world over as the finest exponent of one of the most difficult of instruments.

The ticket sale for this season's Woolsey Hall Series has surpassed all previous years by a large margin due, of course, to the fine list of musical events that will be presented. Following Kreisler will come in order the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13th Lawrence Tibbett on December 13th; Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch on January 11th; Lottie Lehmann on February 13th; and the Boston Symphony again on February 27th.

This season's series will mark the first time that the great Boston Orchestra of 110 men has ever visited New Haven more than once the same year, as well as being the first time that Kreisler has appeared as a Woolsey Series artist, although he has been heard here a number of times previously. The Bauer-Gabrilowitsch two-piano recital is likewise a Series innovation this year for never before has such an event been presented on the annual program.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
OCT 31 1933

FRITZ KREISLER AT WOOLSEY THURSDAY

The opening event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series is scheduled for Thursday evening at 8:30, with Fritz Kreisler, as the season's first artist. One of the largest audiences ever to crowd its way into the spacious Yale University auditorium will hear the distinguished violinist, who is recognized the world over as the finest exponent of one of the most difficult of instruments.

The ticket sale for this season's Woolsey Hall Series has surpassed all previous years by a large margin. Following Kreisler will come in order the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13th; Lawrence Tibbett on December 13th; Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch on January 11th; Lotte Lehmann on February 13th, and the Boston Symphony again on February 27th.

This season's series will mark the first time that the Boston Orchestra of 110 men has ever visited New Haven more than once the same year, as well as being the first time that Kreisler has appeared as a Woolsey Series artist, although he has been heard here a number of times previously. The Bauer-Gabrilowitsch two-piano recital is likewise a Series innovation this year for never before has such an event been presented on the annual program.

50

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

3 0 1933

Huge Audience Rains Applause On Symphony

Is Fascinated by Koussevitzky, Bostonians' Conductor, in Initial Concert of Music Assoc.

The Boston Symphony orchestra played Saturday night to one of the largest audiences that has gathered for any program in this city in years, and the RKO-Plaza Theater proved a pleasing concert hall, welcoming with its comfortableness and spaciousness the members of the Schenectady Civic Music Association and many members from Troy and Albany.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was as magnetic and fascinating in his directing manner and personality as when he appeared in the armory with the Bostonians in one of the early years of his American career and won the aroused enthusiasm of a Schenectady audience. We took things more calmly Saturday night, perhaps partly because the handsome master's face was obscured by the lighting arrangement and when he turned to the audience most people could not see his expression alight with the recent reading. But each number drew prolonged applause and after the great Tschaikowsky symphony, the closing number, he was recalled many times. And, of course, most people were well aware that the Boston symphony gives no encores.

It is years since a Schenectady audience has heard a concert by this superb orchestra. When it was here last it was still recovering from the war, but now it has returned to its own estate, one of the most perfect musical organization in the world, and it has a director who is equal to the magnificent task of leading it. The Civic Music Association has proved its position of being an artistic benefactor of the city by presenting this orchestra and the size of Saturday night's audience showed that there are plenty of people who want to have the experience of acquaintance with the greatest musical compositions. Probably the fact that much symphonic music is on the air these days has helped build a big audience for such work, and it might be possible to have several orchestral concerts in a season, perhaps when financial things have settled down a little more.

For the first number, the Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," there was just the string orchestra, and if one happens to be especially fond of a violin, that choir proved the height of joyous satisfaction. And the Mozart piece with its marvelous clarity of conception and development was a pure delight. This night music was of an old-time German garden, perhaps, beyond which lay happy fields, and there were stars and brooks and a youthful artist's heart entranced with the dark beauty, with suggestions of romance and rather far-away love, but nothing of horror and threatening darkness, such as moderns would weave into the theme. Its melodies and varying beauties were well presented by the vigorous and yet delicate playing of the orchestra.

The prelude to the Moussorgsky opera was especially interesting and the Russian leader gave a most colorful and dramatic presentation. There is the magnificent opening, "Dawn over the Red Square," in which the dawn music reminds one somewhat of the music of light in "Parisifal," then the great themes of the Russian hymn and the gypsy songs come in, varying the feeling of the music, and the conflict of the groups in the story of the opera is heard in the splendid music. There is always that note of tragic beauty which came from the hopelessness of the Russians of that old time, appearing in all the folk songs, and an audience which listens with a thought for the realities back of it all would like to hear a new symphony from Soviet Russia to make a comparison. Maybe Koussevitzky, who is so liberal about modern compositions, will have one next time he comes. As the composition closed with its grand marching harmonies one wondered if it was all the heavenly hosts parading by or the composer's excitement as the soldiers of the czar rode past with their band.

"Richard Strauss wrote music about Til Eulenspiegel, and Dr. Koussevitsky played it on his big instrument, the orchestra, on Saturday night so that everyone felt that instinctive delight in wonder tales and almost forgot to marvel at the ingeniousness of the music and the finish and charm of the performance. And anyone who has spoken of the director as a quiet leader should watch him do that Til music, for he has an art of gesture as surely as any dancer has, and, while he probably would be highly indignant at such a suggestion, there is a beauty in his motions that is as fascinating as the music if one is sensitive to sculpturesque expression. After all the humor and laughter—the bells, drums, the threat of hell, Til's song coming out at all kinds of unexpected places, and his escapes from justice after his escapades—had got everyone in chuckling good humor, there was the final tragedy, for Til was caught and condemned to the gallows. How that orchestra played the not too serious music of the scene, and how the leader fairly shook with Til's terror until he reminded one of the grim humorous horror of the Villon poem of the gallows!

The large and beautiful Symphony No. 5 of Tschaikowsky was chosen for the climax and closing of the program, and was presented with all that dignity of assured power for which the Boston Symphony orchestra and its distinguished conductor are hailed. There may be many symphonies which have more admirers, but this is surely one of the most interesting examples of the symphonic composition. It follows the classic pattern but with a certain modern variation and it is full of the Russian musical style which was the glory of the musical work at Tschaikowsky's time. Colorful and sad, with only the brighter passages here and there, the first movement closed in an unbelievably sad strain.

During the second movement there is a long passage in plucked strings and if anyone wants to know what plucked strings can do in eloquent tonality, that is the part to hear, done by the Bostonians. Following along there came an exalted mood, and, if you happened to allow yourself to be making a program of it, it seemed as if the director was standing on a precipice and all heaven calling him to some high thought, until you thought he would step off and be plunged to darkness. But the sun rose and the song took him back to the earthly pastures. The valse movement was entrancing and so interestingly varied, and the symphony proceeded to the magnificent and eloquent finale.

The next concert in the Civic Music Association series will be given Wednesday night, December 6, at Mont Pleasant High School, by the Russian male chorus, the Don Cossacks.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 3 0 1933

MRS. YATES GUEST

Mrs. Miles Yates of the Knox School at Cooperstown was the week-end guest of Mr. and Mrs. H. G. French and Miss Eleanor French of Adams road. Mrs. Yates and Miss French, who is a student at Knox, were in town for the Boston Symphony concert.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

OCT 3 0 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY GREETED IN CONCERT HERE

Crowd of 2,500 Hears Noted Orchestra at RKO-Plaza Theater

EAGERLY AWAITED

Koussevitzky Directs Program Which Includes "Till Eulenspiegel"

By J. STANLEY LANSING.
Director of Music at Mont Pleasant High School.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky opened the present season of the Schenectady Civic Music Association on Saturday night at the RKO-Plaza Theater. The concert proved to be the greatest treat to musicians and music lovers of the vicinity offered in many years. The audience of 2,500 was brought under complete control by the magnetic personality of Dr. Koussevitzky. In eager anticipation everyone had subsided into absolute silence before his entrance. Tremendous applause broke instantly with the conductor's appearance.

In the opening number of the program, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," serenade for string orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky showed complete understanding of the composer's work. Only a part of the string section was used for this number. At all times the strings of each section played as one man, and with great delicacy.

Artistic Tone Coloring.

The audience waited in silence for the conductor's entrance to the second number which was the "Prelude to the Opera 'Khovantschine'" by Moussorgsky. Through the artistic tone coloring of the orchestra the listener was given a clear mental picture of the dawn over Red Square in Moscow. The audience seemed charmed as though watching the actual performance of the entire opera.

In the closing bars of this prelude the orchestra made a decrescendo until it was difficult for the listener to be sure whether the orchestra was still playing or had stopped and the tones were merely continuing in his mind. The response to this number was extremely warm. Upon his return to the platform, Dr. Koussevitzky graciously invited the orchestra to stand and share the approval of the audience.

Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" added joyous humor to the program. This tone poem is one of the most unique examples of humorous music found in orchestral literature. One could see the impish Till Eulenspiegel jumping on his horse and riding among the chattering market women, the clatter of their pans as he passes on; turning himself into an elf and peeping out from a mouse hole; then disguised as a priest, with his theme solelmly stated by the bassoon, he preaches salvation. But the roguish Till Eulenspiegel then peeks out from beneath the monk's garments—he spies a pretty maiden and falls in love. But the maiden spurns him and he vows vengeance on all mankind. He meets a group of Philistines and runs after them mocking them and making faces. But at last he over-reaches himself and is caught. We hear his last attempt to be merry as he faces the crowd from the scaffold. His spirit departs. Again the opening theme is heard, and the composition ends.

The audience burst into hearty applause which brought the conductor to the platform three times, the third time again sharing the approval with the orchestra.

Above Earthly Things.

Tchaikovsky's "Symphony number 5 in E minor" closed the program. Such excellence of tone quality in all choirs of the orchestra is rarely found in organizations of this kind. With such perfect ensemble playing and interpretation, this symphony raises one above earthly things to realms of greater joy. As one listens one feels a deep gratitude to the composer for such a superb creation and to the conductor and orchestra for their thorough understanding and appreciation of the symphony. The brass choir predominated the majestic and triumphant close of the finale and brought the program to its climax.

At the close of the final number the audience applauded steadily for nearly five minutes. Dr. Koussevitzsky returned to the platform five times and gave special recognition to Mr. Burgin, the concert-master and again shared the applause with the entire symphony orchestra. Leaving the concert hall one heard on all sides enthusiastic comments of approval and deep appreciation. The Civic Music Association can well be proud of its success in bringing the Boston Symphony to Schenectady.

N. Y. EVENING POST

OCT 31 1933

Fifty Artists in Music

Music lovers will welcome "Artists in Music Today" (Grosset & Dunlap, New York), first for its remarkably fine full-page portraits of well-known and popular artists by Louis Lupas, and also for the brief histories of their lives by Helen L. Kaufman and Eva vB. Hansel, which are authentic. It is a well-selected lot of fifty artists of today, the likenesses being perfect. Of prima donnas there are Bori, Garden, Ferrar, Jeritza, Pons, Ponselle, Rethberg, Schumann-Heink, Lotte Lehmann and others. Tenors include Johnson, Martinelli, McCormack, Schipa and Hayes; Robeson, Thomas and Tibbett are the baritones, and Chaliapin the sole basso. Pianists include Grainger, Gieseking, Gabrilowitsch, Hofmann, Iturbi, Paderewski, Rachmaninoff and Samuel, and some of the violinists are Elman, Heifetz, Kreisler, Menuhin, Spalding, Szigeti and Zimbalist, while the 'cellist is Casals. The conductors are Bodanzky, Damrosch, Koussevitzky, Schelling, Stock, Toscanini and Walter. Taken all in all it is a representative list of the musicians we have heard and loved and a valuable contribution to music literature.

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 3 0 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excellent at Schenectady

Grace of Conductor Noted—Performance Declared Nearing Perfection—Capital District Well Represented

Grace that charmed an audience of 2,400 persons as few save a Pavlova or Harriet Hoctor could have done it, marked the first local appearance in many seasons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night in Schenectady.

This seldom-considered feature of a performance by the world-famous organization was contributed by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, its conductor. So fascinating and magnetic is the work of the maestro, that many auditors watched him almost to the total exclusion of his masterful organization.

Albany was prominently represented at the concert as were Troy, Saratoga Springs, Amsterdam, Cooperstown and many other eastern New York communities. It is seldom that an audience is assembled in any one city of the capital District so representative of the region.

The verdict at the close of the concert was unanimous. The orchestra had come as near to presenting a perfect performance as is humanly possible.

Three distinct divisions in the stratosphere of music were invaded to provide the program, opening with the four movements of Mozart's Nightmusic for strings. It is a serenade of etherial beauty abounding with lacelike pianissimos.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina" and the Tchaikowsky Spmphony in E Minor might readily be coupled in identical musical category. Both are filled with drama and were dramatically done.

Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegal's Merry Pranks," stands in a class by itself as probably one of the most intricate examples of orchestral scoring in existence, one of the most thrilling musical fantasies ever committed to paper and the most modern in technical thought among those offered Saturday night.

All were performed with superb verve under the magic and always charming personality that stood upon the conductor's dais.

The heavy drape back of the brass choir subtracted brilliance in the forte ensembles but this could readily be overlooked in the degree of perfection otherwise attained.

The concert was the first in the Schenectady Civic Music Association's series.—R. A. M.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

OCT 31 1933

Public Rises to the Best Music

THE CIVIC MUSIC Association earns congratulations at the outset of its fourth season for the enormous success of its first offering, the brilliant concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was an ambitious undertaking for the association to assume responsibility for so famous—and, of course, expensive—an attraction as the premier orchestra of this country. The great and enthusiastic response of the public justified the venture. It puts the Civic Music Association among those organizations which vision great things, and dare to attempt them.

Nothing could be added to the excellent critique of the concert in the columns of this paper, written by J. Stanley Lansing; but a word may be said for the appreciation which the audience expressed. Its response to the wonderful performance amounted to an ovation. It indicated that, despite all the cheap, tawdry and noisy attempts at entertainment to which, in despair, we had thought at times almost all had succumbed, there is a substantial populace which never has bowed the knee to Baal, nor worshipped in his temple. There is still response to the finest things in life.

The community owes gratitude to the Civic Music Association—a distinctive, non-profit, community enterprise—for providing the opportunity to receive such joy and uplift as the best music affords.

MISSING
PAGE(S)

Nov 1 Transcript

Current News Of The Concert-Halls

The Beethoven Cycle Begins, Schnabel's Five Sonatas, Back to Strauss

WITH yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began the year's Tuesday series, began also the cycle of performances of the works of Beethoven. Whatever else may be said of a Beethoven cycle at this time, whatever may or may not be the surfeit of performances by works of Beethoven, such a cycle fits well into the scheme of the Tuesday concerts. By some "educational" scheme these concerts have always been planned. More than once the history of music has been traversed in fairly strict chronological order; the music of the world has also been reviewed in national groups. It is well to the point that this youngest of the symphony audiences should be asked to concentrate on the works of one of the greatest of symphonists.

The aspect of yesterday's audience was much the same as that of the Tuesday concerts of other years. The roving eyes of those on the look-out for damaging signs of the depression must have been disappointed, for empty seats were by no means numerous. And the freshness and enthusiasm of this audience was what it always has been. After the slight and graceful First Symphony it recalled the conductor repeatedly until he bade the orchestra rise in response. After the titanic Third, enthusiasm was even greater.

For the First Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky used the diminshed orchestra which it has become his custom to use for the works of Mozart and Haydn. From it the music took on a lightness that it could hardly have had with a larger instrumentation. Thus heard, its ideas of a cast similar to those of Haydn and Mozart, came forth in their freest and most untrammeled form. Taken as a whole, this performance, theme for theme and movement for movement, might well be considered a model for works of this kind.

What an advance when Beethoven comes to the writing of his Third Symphony! Allegiance to earlier models is quickly swept aside; the genius stands forth in all his power. The many and confusing programs which have been ascribed to this work need not detain one. In actual fact it has never been proved that Beethoven had a program in mind in writing the symphony. Sufficient it is that his hero stands forth in one way or another in every one of the four movements. Those who find him in the first two movements surely cannot fail to find him in the powerful rhythms of the third, or in the martial portions of the fourth. Through it all the hero strides with firm, unmistakable tread. What further program is needed?

As a work heroic in all its proportions Dr. Koussevitzky again conceived this symphony. In the lyric moments as well as in the more prevailingly aggressive one, it is always the hero who is speaking. With Beethoven, the conductor recognizes that a touch of sentiment need not be in contradiction to the heroic nature. But when sentiment appears, with Koussevitzky as with Beethoven, it is the sentiment of the heroic character, never that of the dreamer or of the lover. For these have no place in this work with either the composer or his true interpreter. At no point in the symphony was this trait better managed than in the interpolated Andante near the end of the last movement.

At the beginning of a Beethoven cycle, it is pertinent to note the vitalizing force which Dr. Koussevitzky throws into his Beethoven. Traditionalists may object; but traditionalists once objected to Beethoven himself, even in his first symphony. And traditionalists have in their day been well on the way toward choking the very life out of Beethoven, as out of many another. One can only with difficulty imagine a traditionalist conducting a heroic reading of the Heroic Symphony. With Dr. Koussevitzky the symphony is heroic above all else.

A. H. M.

From Dr. Koussevitzky

For the Symphony Concerts of next week—the last before the orchestra's first journey to New York—Dr. Koussevitzky returns to a four-piece program and again chooses from living composers. The final, and also the central, number is Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," unheard through two seasons, best-liked of the composer's longer tone-poems, music in which the conductor, the orchestra and Mr. Burgin as solo-violin, all excel. With it go Markevitch's new "Hymn," elsewhere noted on this page; Pierné's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme," likewise new to these concerts; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody, picked up again after seven years. Note also the catholic quality of this program, divided between a German, a Russian, a French and an English composer; and the counterbalance of three shorter and lighter numbers to the large and lengthy "Ein Heldenleben."

Dr. Koussevitzky keeps faith in the youthful Igor Markevitch whose imaginary ballet, "Rebus," he played at Symphony Hall last spring. In the Symphony Concerts of next week (Nov. 10-11), the conductor will include a second piece, "Introduction and Hymn," by Markevitch, heard first in Paris last summer. . . . Gusty winds in cross-currents are already the weather-indication for the lobbies.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 - 1933

Boston Programs.

Back from its tour, which included Chicago, where it was warmly received, the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes the home concerts this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Egon Petri will be assisting pianist in the Mozart Concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor. The Tuesday afternon series began yesterday with the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony as a feature of the cycle of that composer's works. Next Monday evening the supplementary evening series opens.

Post Am

be given.

To Play Sibelius Symphony

One of the most famous and at the same time least seldom heard of modern orchestral works—Sibelius Second Symphony—will be featured in the program with which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of three concerts at the Lyric the night of Dec. 14. Because the concert will mark the return of the Boston Symphony for a group of engagements after a period of years during which it filled but one a season, is being anticipated with particular interest.

Besides the symphony, the program will comprise Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for strings, a Prelude to a Moussorgsky opera and a tone poem by Richard Strauss.

The Sibelius work is ranked by authorities with the most beautiful and important modern compositions in its form. Its composer is a Finn and is still living; he is best known to the general public for his "Finlandia" for orchestra and his "Valse Triste" for piano.

His symphony and the Mozart Serenade were included in the program the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. Both made a great hit and the concert as a whole was declared one of Chicago's outstanding recent musical events. The Boston Symphony was the only orchestra, it is said, to visit Chicago during A Century of Progress Exposition.

In speaking of Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the leading critics of the mid-West, Glenn Dillard Dunn, declared that "no conductor communicates his intentions with greater precision. His beat is as unmistakable as it is eloquent. In consequence, the ensemble of the Boston Symphony retains its infallibility to the classic purity and serenity of Mozart, the turmoil of Strawminsky or the noble symphonic drama of Sibelius."

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 2 - 1933

G. F. HEIM, MUSICIAN, DEAD AT AGE OF 54

Was Trumpet Soloist in Leading Orchestras Here and in Boston and Detroit.

Gustav F. Heim, trumpeter in the New York Symphony Orchestra and one of the best known orchestral musicians in this country, died at the Cornell Medical Centre on Monday after seven months illness of heart disease, it became known yesterday. He was born in Germany fifty-four years ago and has been in the United States for the last thirty years.

Mr. Heim, whose home was at 9,228 Vermont Avenue, Elmhurst, Queens, played the trumpet for fourteen years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was directed by Dr. Karl Muck. He also had been a member of the New York Philharmonic and the Detroit Symphony Orchestras. Later he joined the New York Symphony under the direction of Dr. Walter Damrosch. He continued to play until his illness compelled his retirement.

Mr. Heim was a Mason and a member of the Mutual Musical Protective Union 802. Surviving are three sons, Karl, Fred G. and Gustav, and a daughter, Elsa.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 2 - 1933

SCHOENBERG IS HERE TO TEACH

Noted Modernist Composer Talks of His Art.

UNDISTURBED BY CRITICISM

Recalls That Work of Wagner in Past Was Hissed.

By MABEL GREENE.

Meet Arnold Schoenberg, internationally famous German composer. Arnold Schoenberg, a voluntary exile from Germany where his music is under Reich ban, but nevertheless one of the foremost figures in contemporary music. Mr. Schoenberg arrived here on Tuesday, accompanied by his wife and seventeen-months-old daughter, to teach composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston, and is spending a day or two at Hotel Ansonia, seeing New York for the first time.

He is of medium height, with a rather broad face, the sensitive pointed ears of a dreamer, and serious brown eyes. He could never be mistaken for anything but a musician—a serious musician of genuine artistic impulses. Admittedly in his fifty-ninth year, although his partially bald head is the only betrayal of his age, Mr. Schoenberg's slender, nervous fingers which have set down compositions marking a new epoch in musical development, would mark their owner as an artist if all other characteristics did not.

Yesterday he was reluctant to discuss his departure from Germany. It is not a compulsory banishment that has sent him here, he said, but all last winter his music was under ban in Germany because of its advanced character and the Semitic background of the composer. And he believes he will be happier in America.

Schoenberg's name has been associated with such bold experimentation and has been the center of so many violent controversies in the musical world during the last generation that it is interesting to know his attitude toward the criticism which has been directed at him in the past.

As to Modernism.

"We modernists are condemned by some people," he said, "but we cannot stand still. The music of the old masters will live forever, but we must keep step with life. We have at our disposal far more material than they had, and we must use it.

"Like composers of the past—Wagner, for example, whose earlier efforts were hissed by his audiences—the artist is often misunderstood. Of necessity he is always ahead of his time. His contemporaries may not understand him, but the next generation and future generations will."

Mr. Schoenberg will teach advanced harmony and composition at the Boston Conservatory under the sponsorship of the dynamic Malkins, Joseph and Manfred, who are themselves well known in the musical world. Joseph Malkin, director of the conservatory, is a famous cellist and his brother is a successful pianist. One day each week, probably on Fridays, Schoenberg will instruct New York classes at a Steinway Hall studio, and between times will act as guest conductor for such orchestras as the Boston Symphony and others who are now negotiating for his appearance.

He is scheduled to lecture on modern music at the New School for Social Research here on Tuesday, Nov. 14.

"I plan to leave for Boston shortly," he said yesterday. "But I am returning to New York next week for the concert and reception on November 11, at Town Hall, when a program of my works will be given by the Pro-Arte Quartet and assisting artists, under the sponsorship of the League of Composers."

Among First to Appreciate.

Incidentally, the League of Composers was one of the first groups of musicians and music patrons in this country to recognize Mr. Schoenberg's genius. It is an organization of musicians and musical patrons devoted to fostering new works by living composers.

Mr. Schoenberg is a native of Vienna and is largely self-taught. He began to compose in his boyhood, but was unable to gain a hearing for his works in Vienna and in 1901 went to Berlin. After a year he obtained a position as teacher at Stern's Conservatory, at the recommendation of Richard Strauss, but in 1903 he returned to Vienna.

A meeting with Gustav Mahler led to the performance of some of Schoenberg's work and in 1911 he went back to Berlin, settling there as a teacher. During the last eight years he has been connected with the Berlin Academy of Arts.

Schoenberg has many compositions to his credit, notably "Pierrot Lunaire" and the "Gurrelieder" which Stokowski directed here recently. His book on composition, the much discussed "Treaties on Harmony," begins with this sentence of the preface: "This book I have learned from my pupils."

His pupils have attained significant stature in the field of modern music. Foremost among them are Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Egon Wellesz, Paul Pisk, Hans Eisler, Heinrich Javlovetz and Erwin Stein. Berg, the best known here, is the composer of "Wozzeck," which had its American premiere three years ago under the direction of Stokowski.

Artur Bodanzky, George Gershwin, Harold Bauer, Ernest Bloch, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Arthur Fiedler, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Frederick Stock are on the advisory board of the Malkin Conservatory of Music, sponsoring Mr. Schoenberg's American appearances.

Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene of Boston, music patron and philanthropist, George Gershwin, American composer, and Leopold Stokowski are among those who have contributed toward scholarships for study with Schoenberg.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 2 - 1933

SCHOENBERG SEEKS NEW TALENT HERE

Ultra-Modern Composer Says He Hopes to Learn From His American Pupils.

PUTS BAN ON IMITATORS

His Students Are Asked Only Express Themselves, He Tells Interviewers.

Arnold Schönberg, one of the world's foremost composers and teachers, said yesterday in an interview at the Hotel Ansonia that he had high hopes of encountering fine musical talents in this country. He looked forward not only to the opportunity to guide some of America's young composers to a fuller expression of themselves but to the learning of new and enriching things from the contact with them.

Mr. Schönberg, who arrived on Tuesday from Europe to take up his duties as teacher of harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Boston, has never been in this country before. He is a small man, shy and extremely modest, with a sensitive face and expressive brown eyes. He spoke some English and some German yesterday. He admitted studying English in school forty-five years ago, but has had very little occasion to use it since.

A full program is being arranged for the composer's first weeks in this country. He takes up his professorial duties in Boston on Monday. He also will come to New York every Friday to teach. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, outstanding patron of music, is sponsoring a program of all-Schönberg music in Washington tomorrow at the Library of Congress.

On Nov. 9 and 10 there will be concerts and receptions for him at Yale and Harvard respectively under Mrs. Coolidge's auspices. The League of Composers is presenting a Schönberg program at the Town Hall Club in this city on Nov. 11 and the composer will lecture at the New School for Social Research on Nov. 14 in English on materials gleaned from his writings and speeches.

Tells of His Teaching Methods.

Speaking of his teaching methods, Mr. Schönberg said that he has always insisted that his students seek only to express themselves. Imitation of his own music is strictly forbidden. He has also required a thorough grounding in the classics, he added.

Regarding his own music, Mr. Schönberg's comment was illuminating:

"I have no style," he said. "I do not write for the sake of being original. I cannot help it if my music happens to have this quality. I seek only to express my thoughts and my emotions. My greatest desire is to compress the most substance into the least possible space and time."

He is searching more and more intensively for concentrated expression, he said. A composition like the "Gurre Lieder" was written in a broad, expansive manner. But that was long ago, he said; now he wanted compactness and intensity.

His most recent compositions, he said, were a concerto for 'cello, which is a free transcription of a clavicembalo concerto by Monn, a contemporary of Bach; a transcription for string quartet of a concerto grosso by Handel, and a new opera, "Moses and Aaron." The opera is based on the Biblical story, the libretto by the composer himself. Two acts are completed, and Mr. Schönberg expects to finish the third as soon as he gets several months' leisure.

Rarely Attends Concerts.

Mr. Schönberg was asked how he felt about the occasional hissing of his compositions. He smiled somewhat sadly, then said that he rarely attended concerts and his instinct had kept him away from most of the performances where there were hostile demonstrations. But he considered these offensive.

He had words of praise for a number of his contemporaries—Ravel, Bartok, Hindemith, among many, and told of the work being done by some of his outstanding pupils: Alban Berg is writing a new opera called "Lulu" and Anton von Webern is composing a new piano concerto.

Mr. Schönberg expects to lecture and conduct as well as teach here. Serge Koussevitsky said recently that he would invite him to conduct a pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own music. The composer is here with his wife, his eighteen-months-old daughter, Nuria, and a terrier named Witz German for jest. He plans to stay here throughout the season and perhaps longer.

5 Nov 1 Transcript

Current News Of The Concert-Halls

The Beethoven Cycle Begins, Schnabel's Five Sonatas, Back to Strauss

WITH yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began the year's Tuesday series, began also the cycle of performances of the works of Beethoven. Whatever else may be said of a Beethoven cycle at this time, whatever may or may not be the surfeit of performances by works of Beethoven, such a cycle fits well into the scheme of the Tuesday concerts. By some "educational" scheme these concerts have always been planned. More than once the history of music has been traversed in fairly strict chronological order; the music of the world has also been reviewed in national groups. It is well to the point that this youngest of the symphony audiences should be asked to concentrate on the works of one of the greatest of symphonists.

The aspect of yesterday's audience was much the same as that of the Tuesday concerts of other years. The roving eyes of those on the look-out for damaging signs of the depression must have been disappointed, for empty seats were by no means numerous. And the freshness and enthusiasm of this audience was what it always has been. After the slight and graceful First Symphony it recalled the conductor repeatedly until he bade the orchestra rise in response. After the titanic Third, enthusiasm was even greater.

For the First Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky used the diminshed orchestra which it has become his custom to use for the works of Mozart and Haydn. From it the music took on a lightness that it could hardly have had with a larger instrumentation. Thus heard, its ideas of a cast similar to those of Haydn and Mozart, came forth in their freest and most untrammeled form. Taken as a whole, this performance, theme for theme and movement for movement, might well be considered a model for works of this kind.

What an advance when Beethoven comes to the writing of his Third Symphony! Allegiance to earlier models is quickly swept aside; the genius stands forth in all his power. The many and confusing programs which have been ascribed to this work need not detain one. In actual fact it has never been proved that Beethoven had a program in mind in writing the symphony. Sufficient it is that his hero stands forth in one way or another in every one of the four movements. Those who find him in the first two movements surely cannot fail to find him in the powerful rhythms of the third, or in the martial portions of the fourth. Through it all the hero strides with firm, unmistakable tread. What further program is needed?

As a work heroic in all its proportions Dr. Koussevitzky again conceived this symphony. In the lyric moments as well as in the more prevailingly aggressive one, it is always the hero who is speaking. With Beethoven, the conductor recognizes that a touch of sentiment need not be in contradiction to the heroic nature. But when sentiment appears, with Koussevitzky as with Beethoven, it is the sentiment of the heroic character, never that of the dreamer or of the lover. For these have no place in this work with either the composer or his true interpreter. At no point in the symphony was this trait better managed than in the interpolated Andante near the end of the last movement.

At the beginning of a Beethoven cycle, it is pertinent to note the vitalizing force which Dr. Koussevitzky throws into his Beethoven. Traditionalists may object; but traditionalists once objected to Beethoven himself, even in his first symphony. And traditionalists have in their day been well on the way toward choking the very life out of Beethoven, as out of many another. One can only with difficulty imagine a traditionalist conducting a heroic reading of the Heroic Symphony. With Dr. Koussevitzky the symphony is heroic above all else.

A. H. M.

From Dr. Koussevitzky

For the Symphony Concerts of next week—the last before the orchestra's first journey to New York—Dr. Koussevitzky returns to a four-piece program and again chooses from living composers. The final, and also the central, number is Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," unheard through two seasons, best-liked of the composer's longer tone-poems, music in which the conductor, the orchestra and Mr. Burgin as solo-violin, all excel. With it go Markevitch's new "Hymn," elsewhere noted on this page; Pierné's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme," likewise new to these concerts; Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody, picked up again after seven years. Note also the catholic quality of this program, divided between a German, a Russian, a French and an English composer; and the counterbalance of three shorter and lighter numbers to the large and lengthy "Ein Heldenleben."

Dr. Koussevitzky keeps faith in the youthful Igor Markevitch whose imaginary ballet, "Rebus," he played at Symphony Hall last spring. In the Symphony Concerts of next week (Nov. 10-11), the conductor will include a second piece, "Introduction and Hymn," by Markevitch, heard first in Paris last summer. . . . Gusty winds in cross-currents are already the weather-indication for the lobbies.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 - 1933

Boston Programs.

Back from its tour, which included Chicago, where it was warmly received, the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes the home concerts this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Egon Petri will be assisting pianist in the Mozart Concerto in E flat. The orchestral numbers will be Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor. The Tuesday afternon series began yesterday with the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony as a feature of the cycle of that composer's works. Next Monday evening the supplementary evening series opens.

---

be given.

To Play Sibelius Symphony

One of the most famous and at the same time least seldom heard of modern orchestral works—Sibelius Second Symphony—will be featured in the program with which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of three concerts at the Lyric the night of Dec. 14. Because the concert will mark the return of the Boston Symphony for a group of engagements after a period of years during which it filled but one a season, is being anticipated with particular interest.

Besides the symphony, the program will comprise Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for strings, a Prelude to a Moussorgsky opera and a tone poem by Richard Strauss.

The Sibelius work is ranked by authorities with the most beautiful and important modern compositions in its form. Its composer is a Finn and is still living; he is best known to the general public for his "Finlandia" for orchestra and his "Valse Triste" for piano.

His symphony and the Mozart Serenade were included in the program the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. Both made a great hit and the concert as a whole was declared one of Chicago's outstanding recent musical events. The Boston Symphony was the only orchestra, it is said, to visit Chicago during A Century of Progress Exposition.

In speaking of Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the leading critics of the mid-West, Glenn Dillard Dunn, declared that "no conductor communicates his intentions with greater precision. His beat is as unmistakable as it is eloquent. In consequence, the ensemble of the Boston Symphony retains its infallibility to the classic purity and serenity of Mozart, the turmoil of Strawminsky or the noble symphonic drama of Sibelius."

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 2 - 1933

G. F. HEIM, MUSICIAN, DEAD AT AGE OF 54

Was Trumpet Soloist in Leading Orchestras Here and in Boston and Detroit.

Gustav F. Heim, trumpeter in the New York Symphony Orchestra and one of the best known orchestral musicians in this country, died at the Cornell Medical Centre on Monday after seven months illness of heart disease, it became known yesterday. He was born in Germany fifty-four years ago and has been in the United States for the last thirty years.

Mr. Heim, whose home was at 9,228 Vermont Avenue, Elmhurst, Queens, played the trumpet for fourteen years in the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was directed by Dr. Karl Muck. He also had been a member of the New York Philharmonic and the Detroit Symphony Orchestras. Later he joined the New York Symphony under the direction of Dr. Walter Damrosch. He continued to play until his illness compelled his retirement.

Mr. Heim was a Mason and a member of the Mutual Musical Protective Union 802. Surviving are three sons, Karl, Fred G. and Gustav, and a daughter, Elsa.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 2 - 1933

SCHOENBERG IS HERE TO TEACH

Noted Modernist Composer Talks of His Art.

UNDISTURBED BY CRITICISM

Recalls That Work of Wagner in Past Was Hissed.

By MABEL GREENE.

Meet Arnold Schoenberg, internationally famous German composer. Arnold Schoenberg, a voluntary exile from Germany where his music is under Reich ban, but nevertheless one of the foremost figures in contemporary music. Mr. Schoenberg arrived here on Tuesday, accompanied by his wife and seventeen-months-old daughter, to teach composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston, and is spending a day or two at Hotel Ansonia, seeing New York for the first time.

He is of medium height, with a rather broad face, the sensitive pointed ears of a dreamer, and serious brown eyes. He could never be mistaken for anything but a musician—a serious musician of genuine artistic impulses. Admittedly in his fifty-ninth year, although his partially bald head is the only betrayal of his age, Mr. Schoenberg's slender, nervous fingers which have set down compositions marking a new epoch in musical development, would mark their owner as an artist if all other characteristics did not.

Yesterday he was reluctant to discuss his departure from Germany. It is not a compulsory banishment that has sent him here, he said, but all last winter his music was under ban in Germany because of its advanced character and the Semitic background of the composer. And he believes he will be happier in America.

Schoenberg's name has been associated with such bold experimentation and has been the center of so many violent controversies in the musical world during the last generation that it is interesting to know his attitude toward the criticism which has been directed at him in the past.

As to Modernism.

"We modernists are condemned by some people," he said, "but we cannot stand still. The music of the old masters will live forever, but we must keep step with life. We have at our disposal far more material than they had, and we must use it.

"Like composers of the past—Wagner, for example, whose earlier efforts were hissed by his audiences—the artist is often misunderstood. Of necessity he is always ahead of his time. His contemporaries may not understand him, but the next generation and future generations will."

Mr. Schoenberg will teach advanced harmony and composition at the Boston Conservatory under the sponsorship of the dynamic Malkins, Joseph and Manfred, who are themselves well known in the musical world. Joseph Malkin, director of the conservatory, is a famous cellist and his brother is a successful pianist. One day each week, probably on Fridays, Schoenberg will instruct New York classes at a Steinway Hall studio, and between times will act as guest conductor for such orchestras as the Boston Symphony and others who are now negotiating for his appearance.

He is scheduled to lecture on modern music at the New School for Social Research here on Tuesday, Nov. 14.

"I plan to leave for Boston shortly," he said yesterday. "But I am returning to New York next week for the concert and reception on November 11, at Town Hall, when a program of my works will be given by the Pro-Arte Quartet and assisting artists, under the sponsorship of the League of Composers."

Among First to Appreciate.

Incidentally, the League of Composers was one of the first groups of musicians and music patrons in this country to recognize Mr. Schoenberg's genius. It is an organization of musicians and musical patrons devoted to fostering new works by living composers.

Mr. Schoenberg is a native of Vienna and is largely self-taught. He began to compose in his boyhood, but was unable to gain a hearing for his works in Vienna and in 1901 went to Berlin. After a year he obtained a position as teacher at Stern's Conservatory, at the recommendation of Richard Strauss, but in 1903 he returned to Vienna.

A meeting with Gustav Mahler led to the performance of some of Schoenberg's work and in 1911 he went back to Berlin, settling there as a teacher. During the last eight years he has been connected with the Berlin Academy of Arts.

Schoenberg has many compositions to his credit, notably "Pierrot Lunaire" and the "Gurrelieder" which Stokowski directed here recently. His book on composition, the much discussed "Treaties on Harmony," begins with this sentence of the preface: "This book I have learned from my pupils."

His pupils have attained significant stature in the field of modern music. Foremost among them are Alban Berg, Anton von Webern, Egon Wellesz, Paul Pisk, Hans Eisler, Heinrich Javlovetz and Erwin Stein. Berg, the best known here, is the composer of "Wozzeck," which had its American premiere three years ago under the direction of Stokowski.

Artur Bodanzky, George Gershwin, Harold Bauer, Ernest Bloch, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Arthur Fiedler, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Frederick Stock are on the advisory board of the Malkin Conservatory of Music, sponsoring Mr. Schoenberg's American appearances.

Mrs. A. Lincoln Filene of Boston, music patron and philanthropist, George Gershwin, American composer, and Leopold Stokowski are among those who have contributed toward scholarships for study with Schoenberg.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 2 - 1933

SCHOENBERG SEEKS NEW TALENT HERE

Ultra-Modern Composer Says He Hopes to Learn From His American Pupils.

PUTS BAN ON IMITATORS

His Students Are Asked Only Express Themselves, He Tells Interviewers.

Arnold Schönberg, one of the world's foremost composers and teachers, said yesterday in an interview at the Hotel Ansonia that he had high hopes of encountering fine musical talents in this country. He looked forward not only to the opportunity to guide some of America's young composers to a fuller expression of themselves but to the learning of new and enriching things from the contact with them.

Mr. Schönberg, who arrived on Tuesday from Europe to take up his duties as teacher of harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Boston, has never been in this country before. He is a small man, shy and extremely modest, with a sensitive face and expressive brown eyes. He spoke some English and some German yesterday. He admitted studying English in school forty-five years ago, but has had very little occasion to use it since.

A full program is being arranged for the composer's first weeks in this country. He takes up his professorial duties in Boston on Monday. He also will come to New York every Friday to teach. Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, outstanding patron of music, is sponsoring a program of all-Schönberg music in Washington tomorrow at the Library of Congress.

On Nov. 9 and 10 there will be concerts and receptions for him at Yale and Harvard respectively under Mrs. Coolidge's auspices. The League of Composers is presenting a Schönberg program at the Town Hall Club in this city on Nov. 11 and the composer will lecture at the New School for Social Research on Nov. 14 in English on materials gleaned from his writings and speeches.

Tells of His Teaching Methods.

Speaking of his teaching methods, Mr. Schönberg said that he has always insisted that his students seek only to express themselves. Imitation of his own music is strictly forbidden. He has also required a thorough grounding in the classics, he added.

Regarding his own music, Mr. Schönberg's comment was illuminating:

"I have no style," he said. "I do not write for the sake of being original. I cannot help it if my music happens to have this quality. I seek only to express my thoughts and my emotions. My greatest desire is to compress the most substance into the least possible space and time."

He is searching more and more intensively for concentrated expression, he said. A composition like the "Gurre Lieder" was written in a broad, expansive manner. But that was long ago, he said; now he wanted compactness and intensity.

His most recent compositions, he said, were a concerto for 'cello, which is a free transcription of a clavicembalo concerto by Monn, a contemporary of Bach; a transcription for string quartet of a concerto grosso by Handel, and a new opera, "Moses and Aaron." The opera is based on the Biblical story, the libretto by the composer himself. Two acts are completed, and Mr. Schönberg expects to finish the third as soon as he gets several months' leisure.

Rarely Attends Concerts.

Mr. Schönberg was asked how he felt about the occasional hissing of his compositions. He smiled somewhat sadly, then said that he rarely attended concerts and his instinct had kept him away from most of the performances where there were hostile demonstrations. But he considered these offensive.

He had words of praise for a number of his contemporaries—Ravel, Bartok, Hindemith, among many, and told of the work being done by some of his outstanding pupils: Alban Berg is writing a new opera called "Lulu" and Anton von Webern is composing a new piano concerto.

Mr. Schönberg expects to lecture and conduct as well as teach here. Serge Koussevitzky said recently that he would invite him to conduct a pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his own music. The composer is here with his wife, his eighteen-months-old daughter, Nuria, and a terrier named Witz German for jest. He plans to stay here throughout the season and perhaps longer.

Plays a

Day's Garner From Boston Concert-Halls

A New Work from Honegger, Festival of Chamber Music, Schoenberg Arrives

A PIECE of music, new to Boston and to America, heard only two weeks ago in the composer's own Paris, begins the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—Honegger's "Third Symphonic Movement." In 1924 Honegger wrote his first Symphonic Movement. It is better known as "Pacific 2-3-1"—the "locomotive piece." In 1928 came another work of the same general designation—"Rugby," or the "football piece." Both were heard at the Symphony Concerts, the latter with the composer conducting. It is more than symptomatic of the trend of music in these later years that the "Third Symphonic Movement" bears no further title. The first two were clearly programmatic; whereas the present piece gives no indication of a program; is indeed altogether absolute music. This new movement is dedicated "to Wilhelm Furtwängler and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin." The date-line at the end of the score reads, "Paris, October, 1932; Chesières-Paris, January, 1933." It has been published during the present year. It employs the usual large orchestra of the present day, with wood-winds in threes; adds thereto an Alto saxophone in E-flat.

The "Movement" begins Allegro Marcato. There is an epilogue, Adagio. The idiom is preponderantly atonal, with leanings toward the key of C-sharp minor. The idiom is consequently that modern contrapuntal idiom which goes so well hand in hand with atonality. There are numerous, well-rhythmed, tonality-destroying little figures, flitting about restlessly and energetically. Usually these figures are not the point of the music itself, as has sometimes been the case with modern "pattern-pieces." Oftener they furnish the accompanimental background for the various and rather numerous melodic lines of thematic value.

After two vigorous up-rushing measures which leave no doubt as to the tonality-less scheme, two such melodic lines appear. The second is plainly a counterpoint to the first. In analogy to the traditional sonata-form, these are clearly the "first-theme" section. A more highly rhythmed idea, first heard in the basses, is transition to a melody in notes of longer time-value presented in octaves by the wood-winds. A secondary idea follows, much repeated, accompanied by exceedingly active rhythms, much varied. Equally clearly here is the "second-theme" section.

The direction is now "Poco piu pesante." With it comes an energetic, motto-like figure in the horns above an ostinato pedal-figure. This, in turn, is extensively developed, toward the end with stretti. In the recapitulation, Tempo Primo,—again the sonata-form—the themes of the exposition occur in different order than in the exposition, with new instrumentation, and with a new scheme of dynamic values. When Honegger reaches the horn-motto he gives it to the saxophone, playing quietly. The transitional theme, taken fugato, furnishes the climax for the principal portion of the movement.

The concluding Adagio is a piece of pure lyricism over an indistinct atonal accompaniment. Once previously, in his symphony, for the fiftieth year of the Boston Orchestra, Honegger tried his hand at a slow, lyrical close with results of uncommon beauty. The ending of the "Symphonic Movement" bid fair to match that of the symphony.

A. H. M.

Chamber Concerts Brimful

The programs for Boston's festival of chamber music next week—it is hardly less—may now be outspread. Through years nothing like it has befallen in this town or in the region roundabout. The devotees of chamber music may preen themselves accordingly; the more miscellaneous public take its pleasure at will. Both have reason to return thanks to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Cooolidge, once more the patron of patrons for chamber concerts. It was she who summoned to America the renowned Belgians of the Pro-Arte Quartet; despatched them to Boston and Cambridge; saw to it that the programs should be wide-ranging; provided that all four concerts should be open to the public without charge.

For the first, in the Lecture-Hall of the Public Library on Sunday evening next at eight o'clock, the program stands:

Quartet in B-flat major (K. 458).......	Mozart
Quartet in A minor, Op. 7, No. 1.....	Bartók
Quartet in E-flat major, Op. 74......	Beethoven

For the second concert, on Monday evening next at 8.15, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the auspices of the Division of Music at Harvard, the numbers are:

Quartet in F major, Op. 135.........	Beethoven
Fifth Quartet, in G minor...........	Chadwick
Quartet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1......	Brahms

For the third concert in the same room at the same hour on Wednesday evening, the list runs:

Quartet in D major..................	Franck
Quartet for Strings.................	Carpenter
Quartet in G minor..................	Debussy

At the final concert, in the same room at the same hour on Friday evening, modernist composers, German or American have an inning, viz.:

Quartet for Strings and Voice in F-sharp minor .... (Singer: Olga Averino)	Schoenberg
Three Variations on a Theme in C minor..	Harris
Quartet, No. 3, Op. 22.............	Hindemith

Note, finally, the scope of these programs: a quartet of Mozart for the earlier masters; Beethoven of the middle and of the final years, more particularly the infrequent Opus 135; Brahms characteristically and familiarly; Franck and Debussy for French contrasts; three Americans, two living, Chadwick, Carpenter and Roy Harris; three mid-European modernists, Bartók, Hindemith, Schönberg. To play one and all the four masters of the Pro-Arte Quartet, Messieurs Onnou, Halleux, Prévost, Mass.

the little opera; an assortment of folk-songs and Viennese numbers after it.

Der Herr ist hier!

On Tuesday afternoon last, our distinguished fellow-townsman that is to be, Herr Arnold Schönberg, the modernist composer, landed in New York. Frau Schönberg and their child accompanied him. Instead, however, of proceeding to Boston, he tarried in New York until today, when he may be expected hereabouts. To the waiting reporters, he was brief but not indifferent. According to The Herald Tribune, he insisted that he had not been driven from Germany, as had been reported. He was, he said, a self-determined exile who planned to live permanently in America. The composer, who formerly headed the class in composition in the Prussian Academy of Fine Arts in Berlin, declined to discuss any of the difficulties he had encountered in Germany, saying that he had left numerous relatives in that country.

Schönberg is a Jew. He abandoned the Israelitish faith in 1921, but last summer in Paris was officially received again into the Jewish communion. Schönberg will teach harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston. He said that he had completed the score of the first two acts of a new opera and hoped to finish the work when he is settled in Boston. . . . To the reporters he is already "Dr." Schönberg. Bless their souls! It is the fashionable title for the high-browed.

Meanwhile preparation goes forward in a loud voice, so to say, for the concert of Schönberg's chamber-pieces and the reception that the League of Composers will proffer him in New York on Saturday, Nov. 11. The Pro-Arte Quartet will play his second and third quartets; a singer will be heard in four of his songs; a pianist in four of his piano-pieces. Thereafter fifty American composers—"Count 'em," as the circus-bills used to say—"will greet him." So also will the quiet-living Schönberg discover our exuberant American customs and our congenital liking for crowds and parties. How Manhattan-ish also to annex Schönberg forthwith!

H. T. P.

Schönberg announces that he has received and accepted an invitation from Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct at a pair of Symphony Concerts, presumably during the conductor's midwinter absence.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 2 - 1933

Capital Concert To Be Tribute To Schoenberg

Composer To Be Guest Tomorrow of the Elizabeth S. Coolidge Foundation

To Conduct Class Here

Plans Call for His Return to Germany in June

Arnold Schoenberg, German composer, completed his twenty-four hours in this country by submitting yesterday to the questioning of the musical reporters, and announcing that he would teach composition here as well as in Boston, which will be his headquarters during the coming academic year. Although he has long been regarded as one of the two or three principal creative figures in contemporary music, and his works often have been occasions of warm controversy, he had no manifestos to issue. He will not, he assured his interrogators, try to develop a group of disciples in this country; he never has asked his pupils to imitate him, nor to adopt any particular manner, but has sought to help them develop their creative individuality.

Describes His Latest Works

Short and stocky in appearance, looking much younger than his fifty-nine years, engagingly modest and unaggressive in manner, Mr. Schoenberg briefly discribed his latest works: a concerto for cello and orchestra freely transcribed from a clavier concerto by Monn, a virtually unknown contemporary of Haydn; a concerto for string quartet and orchestra based on a Handel concerto grosso; and a new opera on a Biblical subject, "Moses and Aaron," with a libretto of his own. He completed the second act in March, 1932, and is working on the third and last.

Although he agreed that his latest major work to be heard here, the orchestral variations played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in November, 1929, might be considered not unrepresentative of his present style, he was reluctant to define styles or manners in connection with his music, regarding style as a matter of constant development.

"All I want to do," he said, "is to express my thoughts and get the most possible content in the least possible space." Although he admitted a dislike of hissing, and an avoidance of occasions where it was likely to occur, he was troubled over the fact that some sections of the musical public have been unreceptive to his compositions. The works of some composers are in advance of their time, he observed, and other generations take them up more easily.

With American music Mr. Schoenberg has had little chance for acquaintance, although a few Americans have studied with him abroad; he is sure, however, that it will be possible to develop widespread and significant musical talent in this country. Among foreign composers he expressed admiration for the work of Hindemith, Milhaud, Stravinsky, Ravel and Bartok. Among his most prominent European pupils, Alban Berg is working on his second opera, "Lulu," based on a work of Franz Wedekind; Anton von Webern is composing chamber music and is also engaged on a piano concerto.

Has Busy Weeks Ahead

The composer, who is stopping at the Hotel Ansonia with his wife, his eighteen-months-old daughter, Nuria, and his small terrier, Witz, will begin his American visit with considerable traveling. Tomorrow night he will be the guest of honor at a concert of his works at the Library of Congress, Washington, under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, which is also sponsoring Schoenberg concerts at Yale and Harvard Universities on November 9 and 10. On Saturday he will go to Boston, begin his classes at the Malkin Conservatory of Music early next week; by the following Saturday he will be back here for a concert of his music and reception to be given by the League of Composers at Town Hall. On Tuesday evening, November 14, he will lecture on his music and his writings at the New School for Social Research.

His New York classes, to be held on Fridays in a Steinway Hall studio, will begin November 10. He has accepted Serge Koussevitzky's invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony in two concerts of his music, and may also make a few appearances as conductor elsewhere. His lectures will be in English; he had studied the language, he said yesterday, in his school days, but had taken it up again in a serious way only recently. He showed a very fair mastery of it yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Schoenberg added that he would be in America until June; he still is under contract with the Prussian Academy of Arts, which has given him a year's leave of absence. But, if his first year here proves successful, a longer stay can be arranged.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

NOV 3 - 1933

Two Baltimoreans Write Opera To Be Given by Civic Group

"Swing Low," a new opera by Emmanuel Wad and Elmer Greensfelder, ill be presented for the first time on any stage by the Baltimore Civic pera Company, under Eugene Martinet's direction in Lehmann Hall the ight of Nov. 28.

It will be the second bill of the organization's season which opens next Tuesday night with "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mr. Wad has long been a esident of Baltimore and is internationally known as a pianist. Several ears ago he was decorated by the king of Denmark, of his native land, n recognition of his services to mu- c and following the acceptance of is first grand opera "Tagwawa" by he Royal Opera of Copenhagen. Mr. reensfelder is one of the well nown young Baltimore playwrights, mong his works being "Broom- icks, Amen."

Mr. Martinet, it is said, has as- embled a particularly good ensem- le of young voices. The principals "Cavalleria" will be Elizabeth Mc- omas, Margaret Gilner, Mary Van oren, Douglas McComas and Fred lgrim. In connection with it, ballet umbers by Carol Lynn dancers will given.

To Play Sibelius Symphony

One of the most famous and at e same time least seldom heard of odern orchestral works—Sibelius econd Symphony—will be featured the program with which Dr. erge Koussevitzky will open the oston Symphony Orchestra's se three concerts at the Lyric ght of Dec. 14. Because the con- rt will mark the return of the oston Symphony for a group of agagements after a period of years ring which it filled but one a sea- n, is being anticipated with par- cular interest.

Besides the symphony, the pro- am will comprise Mozart's Little renade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," r strings, a Prelude to a Moussorg- y opera and a tone poem by ichard Strauss.

The Sibelius work is ranked by thorities with the most beautiful d important modern compositions its form. Its composer is a Finn d is still living; he is best known the general public for his "Fin- ndia" for orchestra and his "Valse iste" for piano.

His symphony and the Mozart renade were included in the pro- am the Boston Symphony Orches- a recently gave in Orchestra Hall, hicago, under Dr. Koussevitzky's rection. Both made a great hit and e concert as a whole was declared e of Chicago's outstanding recent usical events. The Boston Sym- ony was the only orchestra, it is id, to visit Chicago during A Cen- ry of Progress Exposition.

In speaking of Dr. Koussevitzky, e of the leading critics of the mid- est, Glenn Dillard Dunn, declared at "no conductor communicates s intentions with greater precision. s beat is as unmistakable as it is oquent. In consequence, the en- mble of the Boston Symphony re- ins its infallibility to the classic urity and serenity of Mozart, the rmoil of Strawminsky or the noble mphonic drama of Sibelius."

Trans

Plays a

Day's Garner From Boston Concert-Halls

A New Work from Honegger, Festival of Chamber Music, Schoenberg Arrives

A PIECE of music, new to Boston and to America, heard only two weeks ago in the composer's own Paris, begins the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—Honegger's "Third Symphonic Movement." In 1924 Honegger wrote his first Symphonic Movement. It is better known as "Pacific 2-3-1"—the "locomotive piece." In 1928 came another work of the same general designation—"Rugby," or the "football piece." Both were heard at the Symphony Concerts, the latter with the composer conducting. It is more than symptomatic of the trend of music in these later years that the "Third Symphonic Movement" bears no further title. The first two were clearly programmatic; whereas the present piece gives no indication of a program; is indeed altogether absolute music. This new movement is dedicated "to Wilhelm Furtwängler and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin." The date-line at the end of the score reads, "Paris, October, 1932; Chesières-Paris, January, 1933." It has been published during the present year. It employs the usual large orchestra of the present day, with wood-winds in threes; adds thereto an Alto saxophone in E-flat.

The "Movement" begins Allegro Marcato. There is an epilogue, Adagio. The idiom is preponderantly atonal, with leanings toward the key of C-sharp minor. The idiom is consequently that modern contrapuntal idiom which goes so well hand in hand with atonality. There are numerous, well-rhythmed, tonality-destroying little figures, flitting about restlessly and energetically. Usually these figures are not the point of the music itself, as has sometimes been the case with modern "pattern-pieces." Oftener they furnish the accompanimental background for the various and rather numerous melodic lines of thematic value.

After two vigorous up-rushing measures which leave no doubt as to the tonality-less scheme, two such melodic lines appear. The second is plainly a counterpoint to the first. In analogy to the traditional sonata-form, these are clearly the "first-theme" section. A more highly rhythmed idea, first heard in the basses, is transition to a melody in notes of longer time-value presented in octaves by the wood-winds. A secondary idea follows, much repeated, accompanied by exceedingly active rhythms, much varied. Equally clearly here is the "second-theme" section.

The direction is now "Poco piu pesante." With it comes an energetic, motto-like figure in the horns above an ostinato pedal-figure. This, in turn, is extensively developed, toward the end with stretti. In the recapitulation, Tempo Primo,—again the sonata-form—the themes of the exposition occur in different order than in the exposition, with new instrumentation, and with a new scheme of dynamic values. When Honegger reaches the horn-motto he gives it to the saxophone, playing quietly. The transitional theme, taken fugato, furnishes the climax for the principal portion of the movement.

The concluding Adagio is a piece of pure lyricism over an indistinct atonal accompaniment. Once previously, in his symphony, for the fiftieth year of the Boston Orchestra, Honegger tried his hand at a slow, lyrical close with results of uncommon beauty. The ending of the "Symphonic Movement" bid fair to match that of the symphony. A. H. M.

Chamber Concerts Brimful

The programs for Boston's festival of chamber music next week—it is hardly less—may now be outspread. Through years nothing like it has befallen in this town or in the region roundabout. The devotees of chamber music may preen themselves accordingly; the more miscellaneous public take its pleasure at will. Both have reason to return thanks to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Cooolidge, once more the patron of patrons for chamber concerts. It was she who summoned to America the renowned Belgians of the Pro-Arte Quartet; despatched them to Boston and Cambridge; saw to it that the programs should be wide-ranging; provided that all four concerts should be open to the public without charge.

For the first, in the Lecture-Hall of the Public Library on Sunday evening next at eight o'clock, the program stands:

Quartet in B-flat major (K. 458)....... Mozart
Quartet in A minor, Op. 7, No. 1..... Bartók
Quartet in E-flat major, Op. 74......Beethoven

For the second concert, on Monday evening next at 8.15, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the auspices of the Division of Music at Harvard, the numbers are:

Quartet in F major, Op. 135 ....Beethoven
Fifth Quartet, in G minor...........Chadwick
Quartet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1......Brahms

For the third concert in the same room at the same hour on Wednesday evening, the list runs:

Quartet in D major..................Franck
Quartet for Strings.................Carpenter
Quartet in G minor..................Debussy

At the final concert, in the same room at the same hour on Friday evening, modernist composers, German or American have an inning, viz.:

Quartet for Strings and Voice in F-sharp minor ....Schoenberg
(Singer: Olga Averino)
Three Variations on a Theme in C minor..Harris
Quartet, No. 3, Op. 22... ....Hindemith

Note, finally, the scope of these programs: a quartet of Mozart for the earlier masters; Beethoven of the middle and of the final years, more particularly the infrequent Opus 135; Brahms characteristically and familiarly; Franck and Debussy for French contrasts; three Americans, two living, Chadwick, Carpenter and Roy Harris; three mid-European modernists, Bartók, Hindemith, Schönberg. To play one and all the four masters of the Pro-Arte Quartet, Messieurs Onnou, Halleux, Prévost, Mass.

the little opera; an assortment of folk-songs and Viennese numbers after it.

Der Herr ist hier!

On Tuesday afternoon last, our distinguished fellow-townsman that is to be, Herr Arnold Schönberg, the modernist composer, landed in New York. Frau Schönberg and their child accompanied him. Instead, however, of proceeding to Boston, he tarried in New York until today, when he may be expected hereabouts. To the waiting reporters, he was brief but not indifferent. According to The Herald Tribune, he insisted that he had not been driven from Germany, as had been reported. He was, he said, a self-determined exile who planned to live permanently in America. The composer, who formerly headed the class in composition in the Prussian Academy of Fine Arts in Berlin, declined to discuss any of the difficulties he had encountered in Germany, saying that he had left numerous relatives in that country.

Schönberg is a Jew. He abandoned the Israelitish faith in 1921, but last summer in Paris was officially received again into the Jewish communion. Schönberg will teach harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston. He said that he had completed the score of the first two acts of a new opera and hoped to finish the work when he is settled in Boston. . . . To the reporters he is already "Dr." Schönberg. Bless their souls! it is the fashionable title for the high-browed.

Meanwhile preparation goes forward in a loud voice, so to say, for the concert of Schönberg's chamber-pieces and the reception that the League of Composers will proffer him in New York on Saturday, Nov. 11. The Pro-Arte Quartet will play his second and third quartets; a singer will be heard in four of his songs; a pianist in four of his piano-pieces. Thereafter fifty American composers—"Count 'em," as the circus-bills used to say—"will greet him." So also will the quiet-living Schönberg discover our exuberant American customs and our congenital liking for crowds and parties. How Manhattan-ish also to annex Schönberg forthwith! H. T. P.

Schönberg announces that he has received and accepted an invitation from Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct at a pair of Symphony Concerts, presumably during the conductor's midwinter absence.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 2 1933

Capital Concert To Be Tribute To Schoenberg

Composer To Be Guest Tomorrow of the Elizabeth S. Coolidge Foundation

To Conduct Class Here

Plans Call for His Return to Germany in June

Arnold Schoenberg, German composer, completed his twenty-four hours in this country by submitting yesterday to the questioning of the musical reporters, and announcing that he would teach composition here as well as in Boston, which will be his headquarters during the coming academic year. Although he has long been regarded as one of the two or three principal creative figures in contemporary music, and his works often have been occasions of warm controversy, he had no manifestos to issue. He will not, he assured his interrogators, try to develop a group of disciples in this country; he never has asked his pupils to imitate him, nor to adopt any particular manner, but has sought to help them develop their creative individuality.

Describes His Latest Works

Short and stocky in appearance, looking much younger than his fifty-nine years, engagingly modest and unaggressive in manner, Mr. Schoenberg briefly discribed his latest works: a concerto for cello and orchestra freely transcribed from a clavier concerto by Monn, a virtually unknown contemporary of Haydn; a concerto for string quartet and orchestra based on a Handel concerto grosso; and a new opera on a Biblical subject, "Moses and Aaron," with a libretto of his own. He completed the second act in March, 1932, and is working on the third and last.

Although he agreed that his latest major work to be heard here, the orchestral variations played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in November, 1929, might be considered not unrepresentative of his present style, he was reluctant to define styles or manners in connection with his music, regarding style as a matter of constant development.

"All I want to do," he said, "is to express my thoughts and get the most possible content in the least possible space." Although he admitted a dislike of hissing, and an avoidance of occasions where it was likely to occur, he was troubled over the fact that some sections of the musical public have been unreceptive to his compositions. The works of some composers are in advance of their time, he observed, and other generations take them up more easily.

With American music Mr. Schoenberg has had little chance for acquaintance, although a few Americans have studied with him abroad; he is sure, however, that it will be possible to develop widespread and significant musical talent in this country. Among foreign composers he expressed admiration for the work of Hindemith, Milhaud, Stravinsky, Ravel and Bartok. Among his most prominent European pupils, Alban Berg is working on his second opera, "Lulu," based on a work of Franz Wedekind; Anton von Webern is composing chamber music and is also engaged on a piano concerto.

Has Busy Weeks Ahead

The composer, who is stopping at the Hotel Ansonia with his wife, his eighteen-months-old daughter, Nuria, and his small terrier, Witz, will begin his American visit with considerable traveling. Tomorrow night he will be the guest of honor at a concert of his works at the Library of Congress, Washington, under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, which is also sponsoring Schoenberg concerts at Yale and Harvard Universities on November 9 and 10. On Saturday he will go to Boston, begin his classes at the Malkin Conservatory of Music early next week; by the following Saturday he will be back here for a concert of his music and reception to be given by the League of Composers at Town Hall. On Tuesday evening, November 14, he will lecture on his music and his writings at the New School for Social Research.

His New York classes, to be held on Fridays in a Steinway Hall studio, will begin November 10. He has accepted Serge Koussevitzky's invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony in two concerts of his music, and may also make a few appearances as conductor elsewhere. His lectures will be in English; he had studied the language, he said yesterday, in his school days, but had taken it up again in a serious way only recently. He showed a very fair mastery of it yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Schoenberg added that he would be in America until June; he still is under contract with the Prussian Academy of Arts, which has given him a year's leave of absence. But, if his first year here proves successful, a longer stay can be arranged.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

1933

53

Two Baltimoreans Write Opera To Be Given by Civic Group

"Swing Low," a new opera by Emmanuel Wad and Elmer Greensfelder, will be presented for the first time on any stage by the Baltimore Civic Opera Company, under Eugene Martinet's direction in Lehmann Hall the night of Nov. 28.

It will be the second bill of the organization's season which opens next Tuesday night with "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mr. Wad has long been a resident of Baltimore and is internationally known as a pianist. Several years ago he was decorated by the king of Denmark, of his native land, in recognition of his services to music and following the acceptance of his first grand opera "Tagwawa" by the Royal Opera of Copenhagen. Mr. Greensfelder is one of the well known young Baltimore playwrights, among his works being "Broomsticks, Amen."

Mr. Martinet, it is said, has assembled a particularly good ensemble of young voices. The principals of "Cavalleria" will be Elizabeth McComas, Margaret Gilner, Mary Van Doren, Douglas McComas and Fred Pilgrim. In connection with it, ballet numbers by Carol Lynn dancers will be given.

To Play Sibelius Symphony

One of the most famous and at the same time least seldom heard of modern orchestral works—Sibelius Second Symphony—will be featured on the program with which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's se three concerts at the Lyric ight of Dec. 14. Because the concert will mark the return of the Boston Symphony for a group of engagements after a period of years during which it filled but one a season, is being anticipated with particular interest.

Besides the symphony, the program will comprise Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for strings, a Prelude to a Moussorgsky opera and a tone poem by Richard Strauss.

The Sibelius work is ranked by authorities with the most beautiful and important modern compositions in its form. Its composer is a Finn and is still living; he is best known to the general public for his "Finlandia" for orchestra and his "Valse Triste" for piano.

His symphony and the Mozart Serenade were included in the program the Boston Symphony Orchestra recently gave in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. Both made a great hit and the concert as a whole was declared one of Chicago's outstanding recent musical events. The Boston Symphony was the only orchestra, it is said, to visit Chicago during A Century of Progress Exposition.

In speaking of Dr. Koussevitzky, one of the leading critics of the mid-West, Glenn Dillard Dunn, declared that "no conductor communicates his intentions with greater precision. His beat is as unmistakable as it is eloquent. In consequence, the ensemble of the Boston Symphony regains its infallibility to the classic purity and serenity of Mozart, the turmoil of Strawminsky or the noble symphonic drama of Sibelius."

Trans
Nov, 2

Plays a

Day's Garner From Boston Concert-Halls

A New Work from Honegger, Festival of Chamber Music, Schoenberg Arrives

A PIECE of music, new to Boston and to America, heard only two weeks ago in the composer's own Paris, begins the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday—Honegger's "Third Symphonic Movement." In 1924 Honegger wrote his first Symphonic Movement. It is better known as "Pacific 2-3-1"—the "locomotive piece." In 1928 came another work of the same general designation—"Rugby," or the "football piece." Both were heard at the Symphony Concerts, the latter with the composer conducting. It is more than symptomatic of the trend of music in these later years that the "Third Symphonic Movement" bears no further title. The first two were clearly programmatic; whereas the present piece gives no indication of a program; is indeed altogether absolute music. This new movement is dedicated "to Wilhelm Furtwängler and the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin." The date-line at the end of the score reads, "Paris, October, 1932; Chesières-Paris, January, 1933." It has been published during the present year. It employs the usual large orchestra of the present day, with wood-winds in threes; adds thereto an Alto saxophone in E-flat.

The "Movement" begins Allegro Marcato. There is an epilogue, Adagio. The idiom is preponderantly atonal, with leanings toward the key of C-sharp minor. The idiom is consequently that modern contrapuntal idiom which goes so well hand in hand with atonality. There are numerous, well-rhythmed, tonality-destroying little figures, flitting about restlessly and energetically. Usually these figures are not the point of the music itself, as has sometimes been the case with modern "pattern-pieces." Oftener they furnish the accompanimental background for the various and rather numerous melodic lines of thematic value.

After two vigorous up-rushing measures which leave no doubt as to the tonality-less scheme, two such melodic lines appear. The second is plainly a counterpoint to the first. In analogy to the traditional sonata-form, these are clearly the "first-theme" section. A more highly rhythmed idea, first heard in the basses, is transition to a melody in notes of longer time-value presented in octaves by the wood-winds. A secondary idea follows, much repeated, accompanied by exceedingly active rhythms, much varied. Equally clearly here is the "second-theme" section.

The direction is now "Poco piu pesante." With it comes an energetic, motto-like figure in the horns above an ostinato pedal-figure. This, in turn, is extensively developed, toward the end with stretti. In the recapitulation, Tempo Primo,—again the sonata-form—the themes of the exposition occur in different order than in the exposition, with new instrumentation, and with a new scheme of dynamic values. When Honegger reaches the horn-motto he gives it to the saxophone, playing quietly. The transitional theme, taken fugato, furnishes the climax for the principal portion of the movement.

The concluding Adagio is a piece of pure lyricism over an indistinct atonal accompaniment. Once previously, in his symphony, for the fiftieth year of the Boston Orchestra, Honegger tried his hand at a slow, lyrical close with results of uncommon beauty. The ending of the "Symphonic Movement" bid fair to match that of the symphony. A. H. M.

Chamber Concerts Brimful

The programs for Boston's festival of chamber music next week—it is hardly less—may now be outspread. Through years nothing like it has befallen in this town or in the region roundabout. The devotees of chamber music may preen themselves accordingly; the more miscellaneous public take its pleasure at will. Both have reason to return thanks to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Cooolidge, once more the patron of patrons for chamber concerts. It was she who summoned to America the renowned Belgians of the Pro-Arte Quartet; despatched them to Boston and Cambridge; saw to it that the programs should be wide-ranging; provided that all four concerts should be open to the public without charge.

For the first, in the Lecture-Hall of the Public Library on Sunday evening next at eight o'clock, the program stands:

Quartet in B-flat major (K. 458)	Mozart
Quartet in A minor, Op. 7, No. 1	Bartók
Quartet in E-flat major, Op. 74	Beethoven

For the second concert, on Monday evening next at 8.15, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, under the auspices of the Division of Music at Harvard, the numbers are:

Quartet in F major, Op. 135	Beethoven
Fifth Quartet, in G minor	Chadwick
Quartet in C minor, Op. 51, No. 1	Brahms

For the third concert in the same room at the same hour on Wednesday evening, the list runs:

Quartet in D major	Franck
Quartet for Strings	Carpenter
Quartet in G minor	Debussy

At the final concert, in the same room at the same hour on Friday evening, modernist composers, German or American have an inning, viz.:

Quartet for Strings and Voice in F-sharp minor (Singer: Olga Averino)	Schoenberg
Three Variations on a Theme in C minor	Harris
Quartet, No. 3, Op. 22	Hindemith

Note, finally, the scope of these programs: a quartet of Mozart for the earlier masters; Beethoven of the middle and of the final years, more particularly the infrequent Opus 135; Brahms characteristically and familiarly; Franck and Debussy for French contrasts; three Americans, two living, Chadwick, Carpenter and Roy Harris; three mid-European modernists, Bartók, Hindemith, Schönberg. To play one and all the four masters of the Pro-Arte Quartet, Messieurs Onnou, Halleux, Prévost, Mass.

the little opera; an assortment of folk-songs and Viennese numbers after it.

Der Herr ist hier!

On Tuesday afternoon last, our distinguished fellow-townsman that is to be, Herr Arnold Schönberg, the modernist composer, landed in New York. Frau Schönberg and their child accompanied him. Instead, however, of proceeding to Boston, he tarried in New York until today, when he may be expected hereabouts. To the waiting reporters, he was brief but not indifferent. According to The Herald Tribune, he insisted that he had not been driven from Germany, as had been reported. He was, he said, a self-determined exile who planned to live permanently in America. The composer, who formerly headed the class in composition in the Prussian Academy of Fine Arts in Berlin, declined to discuss any of the difficulties he had encountered in Germany, saying that he had left numerous relatives in that country.

Schönberg is a Jew. He abandoned the Israelitish faith in 1921, but last summer in Paris was officially received again into the Jewish communion. Schönberg will teach harmony and composition at the Malkin Conservatory of Music in Boston. He said that he had completed the score of the first two acts of a new opera and hoped to finish the work when he is settled in Boston. . . . To the reporters he is already "Dr." Schönberg. Bless their souls! it is the fashionable title for the high-browed.

Meanwhile preparation goes forward in a loud voice, so to say, for the concert of Schönberg's chamber-pieces and the reception that the League of Composers will proffer him in New York on Saturday, Nov. 11. The Pro-Arte Quartet will play his second and third quartets; a singer will be heard in four of his songs; a pianist in four of his piano-pieces. Thereafter fifty American composers—"Count 'em," as the circus-bills used to say—"will greet him." So also will the quiet-living Schönberg discover our exuberant American customs and our congenital liking for crowds and parties. How Manhattan-ish also to annex Schönberg forthwith! H. T. P.

Schönberg announces that he has received and accepted an invitation from Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct at a pair of Symphony Concerts, presumably during the conductor's midwinter absence.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 2 - 1933

Capital Concert To Be Tribute To Schoenberg

Composer To Be Guest Tomorrow of the Elizabeth S. Coolidge Foundation

To Conduct Class Here

Plans Call for His Return to Germany in June

Arnold Schoenberg, German composer, completed his twenty-four hours in this country by submitting yesterday to the questioning of the musical reporters, and announcing that he would teach composition here as well as in Boston, which will be his headquarters during the coming academic year. Although he has long been regarded as one of the two or three principal creative figures in contemporary music, and his works often have been occasions of warm controversy, he had no manifestos to issue. He will not, he assured his interrogators, try to develop a group of disciples in this country; he never has asked his pupils to imitate him, nor to adopt any particular manner, but has sought to help them develop their creative individuality.

Describes His Latest Works

Short and stocky in appearance, looking much younger than his fifty-nine years, engagingly modest and unaggressive in manner, Mr. Schoenberg briefly discribed his latest works: a concerto for cello and orchestra freely transcribed from a clavier concerto by Monn, a virtually unknown contemporary of Haydn; a concerto for string quartet and orchestra based on a Handel concerto grosso; and a new opera on a Biblical subject, "Moses and Aaron," with a libretto of his own. He completed the second act in March, 1932, and is working on the third and last.

Although he agreed that his latest major work to be heard here, the orchestral variations played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Stokowski in November, 1929, might be considered not unrepresentative of his present style, he was reluctant to define styles or manners in connection with his music, regarding style as a matter of constant development.

"All I want to do," he said, "is to express my thoughts and get the most possible content in the least possible space." Although he admitted a dislike of hissing, and an avoidance of occasions where it was likely to occur, he was troubled over the fact that some sections of the musical public have been unreceptive to his compositions. The works of some composers are in advance of their time, he observed, and other generations take them up more easily.

With American music Mr. Schoenberg has had little chance for acquaintance, although a few Americans have studied with him abroad; he is sure, however, that it will be possible to develop widespread and significant musical talent in this country. Among foreign composers he expressed admiration for the work of Hindemith, Milhaud, Stravinsky, Ravel and Bartok. Among his most prominent European pupils, Alban Berg is working on his second opera, "Lulu," based on a work of Franz Wedekind; Anton von Webern is composing chamber music and is also engaged on a piano concerto.

Has Busy Weeks Ahead

The composer, who is stopping at the Hotel Ansonia with his wife, his eighteen-months-old daughter, Nuria, and his small terrier, Witz, will begin his American visit with considerable traveling. Tomorrow night he will be the guest of honor at a concert of his works at the Library of Congress, Washington, under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, which is also sponsoring Schoenberg concerts at Yale and Harvard Universities on November 9 and 10. On Saturday he will go to Boston, begin his classes at the Malkin Conservatory of Music early next week; by the following Saturday he will be back here for a concert of his music and reception to be given by the League of Composers at Town Hall. On Tuesday evening, November 14, he will lecture on his music and his writings at the New School for Social Research.

His New York classes, to be held on Fridays in a Steinway Hall studio, will begin November 10. He has accepted Serge Koussevitzky's invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony in two concerts of his music, and may also make a few appearances as conductor elsewhere. His lectures will be in English; he had studied the language, he said yesterday, in his school days, but had taken it up again in a serious way only recently. He showed a very fair mastery of it yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Schoenberg added that he would be in America until June; he still is under contract with the Prussian Academy of Arts, which has given him a year's leave of absence. But, if his first year here proves successful, a longer stay can be arranged.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

NOV 3 - 1933

Two Baltimoreans Write Opera To Be Given by Civic Group

"Swing Low," a new opera by Emmanuel Wad and Elmer Greensfelder, will be presented for the first time on any stage by the Baltimore Civic Opera Company, under Eugene Martinet's direction in Lehmann Hall the ight of Nov. 28.

It will be the second bill of the organization's season which opens next Tuesday night with "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mr. Wad has long been a esident of Baltimore and is internationally known as a pianist. Several ears ago he was decorated by the king of Denmark, of his native land n recognition of his services to mu- ic and following the acceptance of is first grand opera "Tagwawa" by he Royal Opera of Copenhagen. Mr. reensfelder is one of the well nown young Baltimore playwrights, mong his works being "Broom- ticks, Amen."

Mr. Martinet, it is said, has as- mbled a particularly good ensem- le of young voices. The principals "Cavalleria" will be Elizabeth Mc- omas, Margaret Gilner, Mary Van oren, Douglas McComas and Fred lgrim. In connection with it, ballet umbers by Carol Lynn dancers will given.

To Play Sibelius Symphony

One of the most famous and at e same time least seldom heard of odern orchestral works—Sibelius econd Symphony—will be featured the program with which Dr. rge Koussevitzky will open the oston Symphony Orchestra's se three concerts at the Lyric ght of Dec. 14. Because the con- rt will mark the return of the oston Symphony for a group of agagements after a period of years ring which it filled but one a sea- n, is being anticipated with par- cular interest.

Besides the symphony, the pro- am will comprise Mozart's Little renade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," r strings, a Prelude to a Moussorg- y opera and a tone poem by ichard Strauss.

The Sibelius work is ranked by thorities with the most beautiful d important modern compositions its form. Its composer is a Finn d is still living; he is best known the general public for his "Fin- ndia" for orchestra and his "Valse iste" for piano.

His symphony and the Mozart renade were included in the pro- am the Boston Symphony Orches- recently gave in Orchestra Hall, hicago, under Dr. Koussevitzky's rection. Both made a great hit and e concert as a whole was declared e of Chicago's outstanding recent usical events. The Boston Sym- ony was the only orchestra, it is id, to visit Chicago during A Cen- ry of Progress Exposition.

In speaking of Dr. Koussevitzky, e of the leading critics of the mid- est, Glenn Dillard Dunn, declared at "no conductor communicates s intentions with greater precision. is beat is as unmistakable as it is oquent. In consequence, the en- mble of the Boston Symphony re- ins its infallibility to the classic urity and serenity of Mozart, the rmoil of Strawminsky or the noble mphonic drama of Sibelius."

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

NOV 1 - 1933

AROUND THE TOWN

Daytonians may cast aspersions upon their own city, but those who come here for brief visits are loud in their praises when they happen to return. Generally, Dayton "stacks up" remarkably well in comparison with other municipalities.

Two instances of this nature were noted here last week in the visits of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra, and Edward McHugh, manager for Miss Ethel Barrymore.

Dr. Koussevitzky first met up with Dayton seven years ago, when his orchestra played here on a Sunday afternoon. That time Mrs. H. E. Talbott took him around the city on an automobile trip and he was thrilled with the beauty of the environs.

So the moment he stepped off the train on his trip here last week he began to comment on the beauty of the city, insisted on walking to the Biltmore and further expressed his likeness for the city by remaining here the next day until 4 p. m., when he entrained for a concert that night in Columbus.

Eddie McHugh was director here for the Wright Players during the first season they played stock at the Victory with Selena Royle and Ernest Glendening in the lead roles. Before that and ever since the close of that stock season he has been with Miss Barrymore.

Coming here with Miss Barrymore was like old home week to him, he declared. He hasn't seen a town to match it since he was here, he insisted, as he went about shaking hands with acquaintances made at that time.

Eddie is a brother of the well-known Frank McHugh, who is one of the screen's best comedians. Also of Matt McHugh, who played here for awhile in stock and who, too, has been seen in several pictures. Both Frank and Matt have gone thoroughly Hollywood, but so far Eddie has been able to resist the temptation.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

Music Group In 'Eroica'

Beethoven's most famous symphony—the "Eroica"—will be the principal work on the first of three concert programs to be given here this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the orchestra has just announced this program in full. It also will include a new score, Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme"; the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina"; and Richard Srauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegal."

The orchestra gives this concert the afternoon of November 15, appearing at Constitution Hall under the local management of Dorothy Dorsey, whose bureau is in Droop's, Thirteenth and G Sts. N. W.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

NOV 4 - 1933

Boston Symphony Program For Institute Announced

The program for the first of the season's series of five concerts of The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Nov. 17, has been announced. This inaugural concert marks the orchestra's forty-seventh season in Brooklyn as well as the tenth consecutive season with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the role of conductor.

The program for the concert of Nov. 17 is as follows:

Pierne—Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Opus 49.

Mussorgsky—Prelude to the Opera, "Chovantchina."

Strauss—"Till Eulenspingel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in Rondo form, Opus 28.

The four succeeding Friday evening concerts, according to the enlarged Brooklyn Committee whihc is sponsoring the series, will be held Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Trans Nov 4 Mu

Concerto and Pianist Lift Their Heads

Mozart with Petri Signally At the Symphony Concert, Chaikovsky Furore

WISELY chosen and played by distinguished hands, the much-abused concerto can still assert itself. Within easy memory young men and maidens, old men and children, variously decried it as outworn, superfluous musical form, no longer deserving place in serious concerts. If it existed primarily to exhibit a virtuoso-performer in the solo-part, out with it. The days of such display, it appeared, were numbered, though in all probability they will continue as long as human nature on stage and in auditorium remains unaltered. Eighteenth-century concertos—the argument ran—were no more than parlor games as useless to Enterpe in the practice of her art as a silver-gilt snuff-box. As for the nineteenth-century product, it was misconceived, miscontrived, misnamed.

What the composer had really put to paper was a symphonic piece in which he had added a piano to the other orchestral instruments for a more or less conspicuous part. So Beethoven with his fourth and fifth concertos, and Brahms with his first and second, "got by," as the boys say. Yet either—the extremists repeated—would have been better advised had he made his solo-part a "piano obbligato." In this twentieth century, "of course," music put by such childish things; but somehow musicians, being mere men and subject to the weaknesses of flesh and spirit, still made and played them. Worse and worse, toward the end of the nineteen-twenties, along came a tendency to return to the classic forms and to write assiduously in them. It persists to this day. Once more human nature which, as we all know, is wayward, defeated the theorists.

As it happened, the concerto that carried all before it at the Symphony Concert of Friday was no twentieth, or even nineteenth, century, piece. It was signed unobtrusively by W. A. Mozart, dated in 1785, one of his later and richer years. It was, indeed, one of a set of three, the other two of which were played at Symphony Hall within recollection by Mr. Orlov and Mr. Simonds severally. Now an eighteenth-century concerto, even a concerto by Mozart, may invite most of the detractors' darts. It can be a routine job, strung together in the day's work for the day's pay, taking the easiest way, displaying the virtuoso, tickling as often as need be the casual ear, letting all else slide. As it happened again, this Concerto in E-flat, numbered 482 in Koechel's identifying catalogue, is not that sort of piece.

It contains a slow movement in which the orchestra is often predominant and prevailing voice; that is written as symphonically, within the limits of 1785, as though Beethoven or Brahms had shaped and filled it; that is no virtuoso's exhibition-ground but an unfolding of musical thought and musical emotion. True, the "daimonic" Mozart, as they call it in these latter days, does not thrust out of it; but through it sings a Mozart "most musical, most melancholy," touched by inner and outer experience that transforms thought, which was pure music, into emotion as musically expressed. The sentiment, as the Vienna of the seventeen-eighties called it, rises for us of the nineteen-thirties to poignancy. Idea and expression, facture and texture, are assimilated into a single and touching beauty. Through it one hears the piano, but quite as often woodwinds, horns, the orchestra as well. In the finale, also, which idealizes the usual tripping, sparkling close, stands a slower middle section, suffused again by melancholy mood as though it would recall the abandoned beauty. Even the first movement, which remains the pianist's own, keeps to a delicate and subtle texture—the craftsman's skill, the poet's fancies.

This remarkable concerto was as remarkably played, first by Mr. Egon Petri, as pianist, making, unless this report is mistaken, his first public appearance in Boston; second by Dr. Koussevitzky and a reduced orchestra in familiar skill and sensibility as accompanists. Mr. Petri, a Hollander with the stature and the dignity of his race, nursling of Busoni and protegé of Paderewski, passes for pianist who can range from the austerities of Brahms to the lusters of Liszt. Beyond that pale, as he now proved, he can achieve the utmost delicacies of Mozart and the piano; while others praise him to the sky in Bach. Clearly a full-freighted, wide-ranging pianist whom Bostonians may soon hear in Beethoven also.

The prowess of Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in concertos is an old story; but one warranting repetition since it is the way of all orchestral and much conductorial flesh to take their ease in such pieces. To the contrary Dr. Koussevitzky is all for the integrity of a concerto as musical composition no less than soloist's piece; would have orchestra and soloist in adept, sympathetic interplay; would deny it no care and pains that he and his musicians may bestow. The adroit delicacy of the first movement in this E-flat concerto became fourfold—Mozart's, the pianist's, Dr. Koussevitzky's, the orchestra's. The impression from the slow movement was more orchestral than pianistic. In the finale both factors were as one in the contrasts of substance and texture.

For his part Mr. Petri distinguished himself by a rare fineness of finger (as the mid-nineteenth-century reviewers liked to say); a most sensitive ear to tone; a clear comprehension that he was playing an ancient music upon a modern piano; a penetrating and communicating sympathy with Mozartean substance and style. From his fingers—and understanding—the traceries of the first movement flowed with equal clarity, delicacy and elegance. The tone was limpid and shimmering, never hard, brittle or opaque; the phrases edgeless and gently molded; the transitions finely spun; the adjustments flawless, with never an error of over-accent on the one side or lapse into dry mechanics on the other. Throughout musical poise tempered musical life.

To both in the slow movement Mr. Petri added felicity of finger and feeling. His euphonies with the woodwinds and horns melted on the ear. Within the narrow range that the music imposed, his shadings of its melancholy were subtle and lovely. There was no tonal color in our sense of the words, only a distilled beauty of musical sound, a like transfiguration of the mood within—the Mozart of these Andantes and Adagios in spirit and in truth. Through the final division, Mr. Petri had only to recall the finesse of the first, the felicities of the second, the sense of style that distinguished both.

Egon Petri has fared so well with all concerned in the Symphony Concerts—conductor, management, orchestra, audience—that he has been re-engaged to play the piano-part in the "Emperor Concerto" at the second matinée of the "Beethoven Cycle" on Tuesday, Nov. 21.

An acute and persistent neuritis compels the aged Paderewski to cancel the American tour arranged for him from January. It included a concert at Symphony Hall.

The new piece of the afternoon was Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement written of late to round out a triology that began with "Pacific, 2-3-1," the "locomotive piece"; continued with "Rugby," the "football piece"; now ends with a piece unlabelled save as it bears audible marks of the other two. It is, in fact, a good-enough job of the routined Honegger, setting to his music-making as a journalist sets to his writing. There is the temperate, unaffected use of the atonal idiom; the high-powered percussive, modernistic rhythms by this time so ingrained in some of us that they thrill even when Honegger plies them no more than mechanically; the propulsive urge from first measure to last; the flitter of more or less exciting figures about musical ideas that in this instance are unexciting in themselves; the rhetorical pause; the close in more or less lyrical measures diffusing sweetness and light through a quivering atonal haze—the twilight of contemplative repose after a busy day with modern rhythm and modern counterpoint.

Nowhere the vigor of invention, the ample and characteristic substance, the driving energy and warm imagination that set Honegger's Symphony, written for the orchestra's jubilee, above all his music as Boston knows it. And is the hushed and lyrical close that seemed true flow of mood and expression when it ended the Symphony to become mere device, almost hand-me-down, in Honegger's workshop, as it seems in this Third Symphonic Movement? Routine stuff for certain but stuff that is still cast in that unforced and significant atonality which is unmistakable self-expression, though Marlborough Street and Heath Hill avert their ears. Solidity and substance and sobriety, a deep-seated readiness and energy, still distingush Honegger; but they need to be freshly touched to new issues.

Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor filled the second part of the concert, revived for the first time within four seasons. If this reviewer were to express in print his full and free mind about it, he might undergo in Grant Gately Square, which is the official name for the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues at Symphony Hall, the fate that overtook the legendary intruder into the rites of the Bacchantes, whom they slew with their hairpins and ornaments of metal. Therefore let him say, as peacefully as he may, that in musical invention, substance and design this Fourth Symphony falls far below the more familiar Fifth; in emotional import and impression falls even farther from the ever-present Sixth.

Let him add that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra excelled themselves in thunderous proclamation of the theme of fate; that they alternately shaded and surcharged with melancholy and disillusion the waltz that seldom waltzes, the haunted "canzona" that tries hard to sing; that the finale enlarged even the welter of sound and fury that Chaikovsky set on music-paper; that the strings did miracles of virtuosity in the plucked scherzo. Let him report, finally, that around him was an audience rigid with excitement or relaxed in sensuous enjoyment; passionate at the end in plaudits. Then let general obloquy and particular shame hide him.

H. T. P.

—An advertisement reads: "Four full quart bottles of Storm King Whisky, eight years old, $3.10, by express prepaid." But don't get excited; the advertisement was published in 1902. [Pathfinder

Globe Nov 4

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There were two items of especial interest at the Symphony concert yesterday: the Boston debut of Egon Petri, distinguished Dutch pianist, and the first performance in America of Arthur Honegger's new "Symphonic Movement No. 3." Mr Petri's debut was by far the more important. Dr Koussevitzky conducted as final number Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, a work in which he excels.

Peculiarly enough, Mr Petri had not previously even been heard here in recital, although he first came to this country nearly two years ago and immediately found favor in New York. He played yesterday Mozart's E-flat concerto (K 482), a relatively unfamiliar work and one tinged with boldness of harmony and feeling that is a little rare for Mozart, but characteristic of Beethoven when he began to display his individuality. Mr Petri comes of a musical family, and was first taught to play the violin by his parents. This instrument occupied most of his time until he was 20, when he decided to become a pianist. He was taught by Teresa Carreno, the Venezuelan pianist. Busoni, a friend of the Petri family, later took an interest in him. Mr Petri assisted the Italian musician in his formidable edition of the music of Bach.

If a man's playing can be summed up in few words, Mr Petri's interpretation of Mozart can be said to stress tenderness and lyricism. He "sang" Mozart's incomparable cantilena with extraordinary though subdued beauty of tone, and in perfect command of the style in which Mozart should be played. Even where a percussive touch was in order, he preferred to dwell upon the songful elements of the music. Speaking offhand, one can think of no pianist who plays Mozart in quite this fashion. Gieseking, perhaps, approaches nearest. Mr Petri's technique is, of course, that of a musician in prime of years and physique. Oddly enough, there was one rough spot near the beginning of the concerto where his fingers stumbled for a moment.

Mr Petri proved himself one of the notable musicians of the day. The audience recognized this, and recalled him again and again. Dr Koussevitzky's accompaniment was enjoyable though a little too robust.

Arthur Honegger's "Symphonic Movement" is typical of him and needs to be heard several times before any adequate appraisal can be made. Evidently the composer intended to write "absolute" music, for he has ventured neither title nor program to indicate otherwise. Insistent rhythm and dissonance are its primary qualities, though, by dint of brevity and repetition of salient parts, a certain organic unity was attained. Though one remained unmoved by this music, stirred in no way, a dispassionate reporter could not but remark upon the clarity of texture, not common to most ultra-modern music. There are rhythmic suggestions of "Pacific 231," and the short slow section at the end is reminiscent of that in the symphony Honegger composed for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary. He has used in this new score, an E-flat saxophone, in musicianly fashion. This ought to prove to all that the saxophone, hitherto a step-child of the instrumental family, ought to be admitted to the symphonic domestic circle. Provided, of course, it is always employed as artistically as here. Mr Loeffler also proved this a while ago.

No forward looking person likes to be considered an old fogey because his conscience will not permit him to find much real music in a piece of this sort. Nor, on the other hand, ought an honest man to strip off his garments of integrity and join the cult of the ultra-moderns just because others are doing it. William J. Henderson, one of America's most liberal elder critics, spoke of this type of music as "pepper and vinegar." That fits perfectly.

It may be that in the music of the future all 12 tones of the scale will be turned loose simultaneously to disturb the esthetic neighborhood with their harmonic squabbles. But some of us do not think so, preferring to consider the restlessness, the mistaking of mere noise for power, the utter lack of emotion, that typifies ultra-modern music, to be an unhappy interlude that eventually will be past. According to such an authority as Ernest Newman, a comparable state obtained in Italian music shortly after the Florentines abandoned polyphony for homophony in the 17th century. The most glorious chapters in music were written after that period. Perhaps history will repeat itself. Let us hope so.

Next week the following music will be played: Pierne; "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme," op 49; Vaughan Williams: "First Norfolk Rhapsody"; Markevitch: "Introduction and Hymn" (first performance in America); Strauss: Tone poem, "A Hero's Life."

C. W. D.

WHAT THE CRAWFORDS WILL PLAY AT KEITH'S THIS WEEK

The organ program to be presented by Mr and Mrs Jesse Crawford at the twin-consoles in the Keith Theatre for the week starting tomorrow, is as follows:

Prelude in C sharp minor, "The Rosary," finale of "The Dance of the Hours," "Ah, But Is It Love?", "This Time It's Love," "Love is the sweetest Thing," vocal interlude by Lew Ashe, "Shadow Waltz," "Thanks," "Music From Across the Sea."

Time to Stop

"So you have stopped tracing your ancestors. I suppose the farther back you went the harder it got."

"That wasn't the worst. The farther back I went the harder my ancestors got, too."—Stray Stories

---

OVATION FOR SYMPHONY LEADER

Trav Nov 4

Playing of Tchaikovsky's Work Brings Thunder of Applause

Once and again a great conductor is able take a composition of not much more than ordinary merit and through the medium of an excellent orchestra interpret it so brilliantly that those listening are forced to loud enthusiasms.

Such indeed was the case yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra took in hand Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 4 in F minor. Their reward was an ovation the like of which has not been heard in Symphony hall this season. There was thunderous applause backed by rumblings from hundreds of stamping feet and roars of approval from dozens of throats. Through it all went Dr. Koussevitzky gently indicating by gesture that the success was due to efforts of Concert Master Burgin and the orchestra. But the audience knew otherwise.

This fourth concert in the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series was a memorable one not alone for the playing of the Tchaikovsky but for that which had gone before—namely the distinguished Dutch pianist Egon Petri playing as guest soloist in a performance of Mozart's concerto in E flat major for pianoforte and orchestra. Also on the program was the first American performance of Honegger's Mouvement Symphonique No. 3.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony is admittedly more Russian and not as great as his "Pathetic" and there are people, particularly those who falsely consider themselves the musical and tonal elect, who today think very little of his Pathetique. Believing this authentic and lonely masterpiece to be unworthy of praise, what must these scoffers consider the fourth symphony!

Yet, yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky's playing of that same fourth symphony lifted and stirred deeply a great multitude of persons—individuals generally who have been made doubly critical by long association with good music. Perhaps the "elect" are wrong.

The Mozart concert came just before the Tchaikovsky work. Though written in 1785, records indicate that for some unknown reason it had not been played before by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston. Strangely again, no mention of this fact was made in the program notes.

Be that as it may, it was a delicate and pleasing thing, one which gave the pianist, Petri, ample opportunity to demonstrate this virtuosity. This he well did, playing Mozart with a rippling smoothness within long memory excelled only by Walter Gieseking.

Honegger's Mouvement Symphonique, given its first American performance yesterday, was heard only two weeks ago in the composer's own Paris. It is dated "Paris, October, 1932; Chesieres-Paris, January, 1933," and was dedicated "to Wilhelm Furtwanger and the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin."

It proved to be so-called absolute music of a type that was modern a few years ago. Its basis was atonality, that is, a system which attempts to deny key entirely. At times the rhythmic dissonances were rather interesting and a saxophone solo toward the end gave pleasure. Aside from that the work was insignificant when compared with others on the program.

W. T. C., Jr.

MUSIC

Her Nov 4

Symphony Concert

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Interest in yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, centered on Mozart and Tschaikowsky. Honegger's new work called forth but indifferent response. It was an astute piece of program-making to put Mozart's E flat concerto for pianoforte between Honegger and Tschaikowsky, for it gave this delightful work the most advantageous setting.

The concerto is one of the most delightful bits of the highest type of comedy, from the pen of Mozart, to whom the language of the eighteenth century comedy of manners was second nature. He had an acute sense of the importance of the serious element in true comedy. Even the graver moments of the slow movement and the slow episode in the final movement are brought into sharper relief by the knowledge that the most perplexing moments of such comedy never come without an unfailing sense of humor with which to meet them. Wit was pitted against wit; one intrigue was dissolved in another. Recourse to the sword was but an outward gesture and death at most a thought with which to toy in a charming aria. In all these things Mozart is past master. To dwell again on his handling of concerto problems is to waste words.

Ejon Petri, soloist in the Mozart work, is an artist of high ideals. He seemed a bit too serious in the first movement, and the last movement lost, curiously enough, some of its gayety by being taken a bit too fast. He played with simplicity of manner, penetrating thought, and excellent taste. He brought to his reading a beautiful tone quality and a scale of dynamics admirably suited to Mozart's style—and to his audience, a keen delight. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were equally devoted in their part of the concerto.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony brought an amazing contrast to the second part of the concert. Lovers of this symphony should hear it from Koussevitzky. He scored a triumph with this work, which he interprets with the utmost warmth and sympathy, finding at all times the most effective utterance for Tschaikowsky's thoughts. The Scherzo, with Koussevitzky at the helm of the Boston Symphony, is a veritable tour de force. It brought a burst of applause at its conclusion. And why shouldn't it? It is not solemn music; it is a thrilling human experience to those who love the work, an experience only exceeded in thrills by the last movement. Here Dr. Koussevitzky drew from his colleagues a warmth and body of tone almost incredible, but one that never degenerated into mere noise.

Honegger's Mouvement Symphonique No. 3 made its American debut at this concert, a debut which aroused a response which can only be described as indifferent. The work itself can not be expected to start a controversy, nor will it add to the prestige of its composer. Sonorities reminding of "Pacific 231" and scoring for saxophone solo, which latter joins in dialogue with the English horn and oboe, are prominent features. But throughout, is an apparent barrenness of idea as well as of purpose disappointing to those who have felt the force of Honegger's earlier works.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES

YES IN 'NIG

Dutch Pianist in Debut at Symphony

By MOSES SMITH

Preceded by a great European reputation and greeted enthusiastically elsewhere in this country, Egon Petri, Dutch pianist, makes his first public appearance in Boston at this week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

Flanked on one side by the first American performance of Honegger's "Mouvement Symphonique No. 3" and on the other by a Koussevitzkyan battle-horse, the Tchaikovsky fourth symphony, Petri's "vehicle" for the occasion—a Mozart concerto in E-flat—is scarcely likely to excite an audience and set it to stamping its feet. It was the mark of a musician, however, to choose such a work, rather than a more grateful Romantic concerto—grateful, that is to say, in the way of exhibiting technical facility and powers.

Yet even this concerto of Mozart, played as it was by Petri at yesterday's matinee, could show those who looked beneath the surface how fine a technic the pianist has. It showed even more his thoughtful and sensitive musicianship, in the curve of a phrase, the pointing and heightening of a rhythm, the feeling for quantity of tone. Yet not always for quality of tone; for it seemed to me that Petri was too free in the use of the damper pedal. This, I hasten to add, is a matter of opinion.

At any rate, the performance of the concerto (which is not familiar) was excellent, and in admirable sympathy with the important orchestral part. If the applause was milder than it might have been, perhaps the cause was that the audience had been led to expect too much. This was my own case.

As to the new work by Honegger, it is vigorous and it has rhythmic variety and subtlety. Its thematic material has character, and its dissonances are quite bearable. The conciseness of the form, too, is arresting, and the themes are strongly developed.

RDAY, NOVEMBER 4,

CONTRASTS IN LIST BY SYMPHONY

Mozart, Honegger and Tchaikovsky Pieces Performed

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Hard indeed to suit would be he who could find nothing to his liking in the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, which presented pieces by composers of such diverse styles and outlooks as Mozart, Honegger and Tchaikovsky.

MOZART OUTSTANDING

Although Honegger's "Third Symphonic Movement," played for the first time in America, was a novelty from the pen of one who, by virtue of past, if not of recent, performance, is an outstanding figure in the contemporary musical scene, although Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra wreaked themselves upon Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with a passion and a frenzy that well-nigh exceeded the composer's own, the climax of the afternoon came, nevertheless, with the performance of Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat major, with Egon Petri as the soloist.

Beforehand it was possible to wish that Mr. Petri, who enjoys a very considerable reputation, had chosen for his first public appearance in this city something warmer, more robust than a concerto of Mozart.

Played by an Artist

But the piece had not progressed far before such repinings were stilled. For here was Mozart played as he has been played all too rarely, even in Symphony Hall, and the experience of hearing him so played was proving a treasurable one.

Mr. Burk's admirable programme note quoted the Englishman, Sacheverell Sitwell, as saying that this Concerto is "delicate in mood and of exceptional finish and elegance." But this characterization does not go far enough. There is a hint of pathos in the chief theme of the slow movement, half prophetic, perhaps because of its key, of the Funeral March in Beethoven's "Eroica," and the A-flat major section of the Finale has a richness of color that calls to mind the three last and greatest of the composer's symphonies.

Not only from Mr. Petri, but from Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra came yesterday the expression of these qualities in Mozart's music. Both pianist and conductor were quick to seize upon any suggestion that Mozart was here offering something besides delicacy and elegance. Yet nowhere was there hint of inflation, of expanding the music to something beyond the composer's own intentions. Incidentally, Mr. Petri's playing was remarkable for its limpidity, its unfailing flow and charm of time, its rhythmic buoyancy, its resourceful use of tonal color.

There were soloists in the orchestra, too, although they were not included in the general applause that followed. Mention may then be made here of the flute of Mr. Laurent, of the bassoon of Mr. Laus.

Honegger's No. 3

As the successor of "Pacific 2-3-1" and "Rugby," this "Mouvement symphonic No. 3" proved disappointingly lacking in individuality and distinction. The music was Honegger's own, but we had heard it all before. As in the Symphony of three seasons ago, the locomotive-snorts of "Pacific" were in evidence, if not that piece's verve and momentum, and the incongruous happy ending, the sudden change from brutality to beatification, recalled that Symphony's close.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth, of exceptional brilliance, if now and then open to the reproach of excessive noisiness, provoked a storm of enthusiasm.

'NIGHT FLIGHT'

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 5 - 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra First Concert Nov. 17; Large Committee One of Sponsors

ADRIAN VAN SINDEREN is chairman of the special committee for the 47th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Brooklyn which will be inaugurated Friday, Nov. 17, under the sponsorship of this committee, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn. The five concerts on Nov. 17, Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6 will be given at the Academy of Music. Assisting Mr. Van Sindern are Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, Mrs. John Anderson, Charles D. Atkins, Frank L. Babbott, Dr. Frank L. Babbott Jr., William R. Bayes, Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Miss Alice Brinsmade, Dr. William B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Charles B. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, William M. Calder, J. Norman Carpenter, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Harris M. Crist, Supreme Court Justice James C. Cropsey, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Supreme Court Justice Norman S. Dike, Miss Mary E. Dillon, Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Duval, Mrs. William P. Earle Jr., S. Raymond Estey, Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis and Theodore L. Frothingham.

Other committee members are Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Mrs. William H. Good, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, George Hewlett, Mrs. James M. Hills, Miss Amelia B. Hollenback, Dr. Alexander C. Howe, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. William Kennedy Jr., Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John E. Leech, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. Frank Melville Jr., Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Frank C. Munson, Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. Burt F. Nichols, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Mrs. George Notman, Neilson C. Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles E. Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds.

Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter Jr., Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. William C. Spelman, Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Stutzer, Mrs. John F. Talmage, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, William A. Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, John T. Underwood, Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin C. Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mrs. Josephine D Wilkin, Dr Ralph C. Williams, Surrogate George A. Wingate, Mrs. Harry M. Wingle, Cornelius D. Wood; R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Annie S. Wyckhoff and Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

Mrs. Charles Franklin is chairman of the junior committee which includes Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Miss Dorothy R. Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Miss Elizabeth Paffard, Miss Florence E. Read and Mrs. Robert M. Winslow. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra throughout the season, marking the 10th consecutive year he has held the baton in Brooklyn.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 5 - 1933

Opening its Carnegie Hall season on Nov. 16 and 18, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will introduce at its Thursday evening concert Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces" after a story of Poe, together with Ravel's "Tobeau de Couperin" and Sibelius's Second symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky at the first Saturday matinee here will conduct Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn," new to America this week in Boston, to which the local bill adds Pierné's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," Vaughan Williams's First "Norfolk Rhapsody" and Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV - 1933

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will pay its first New York visit of the season next week, giving concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, November 16 and 18, and at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening, November 17.

The evening program for November 17 includes Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the first performance here of three pieces for orchestra "after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe," Op. 59, by Nickolai Tcherepnin, and Sibelius's second symphony. The tale in question is "The Masque of the Red Death"; the composer quoting three excerpts from Baudelaire's translation as a key to the three movements, which are titled "In the Room of the Ebony Clock," "A Revel" and "Fate." The works was composed in Paris in 1931 and 1932, and dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, who conducted its first two performances in Boston on October 13 and 14. Tcherepnin is best known here as the arranger and finisher of Moussorgsky's "The Fair at Sorochintzy," produced at the Metropolitan in November, 1930.

In the Saturday program, Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce to New York an introduction and hymn by the young Russian composer, Igor Markevich, whose "Rebus" proved a controversial novelty here last winter The other numbers will be Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme by Gabriel Pierne, Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Richard Strauss's "Ein Holdenloben."

e Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra ram of the season this afternoon in m "Tannhäuser" for the first half and ntermission. Elsa Alsen, soprano, and ra Company, tenor, will be the soloists.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

NOV - 1933

Koussevitsky Orchestra Is Rare Delight

By STUART D. GOULDING.
Times-Union Music Critic.

Witness the quiet wisdom of Serge Koussevitzky in his selection of programs. The concert of the Boston ymphony at Schenectady was well calculated to suit the temper of his audience. Assured, not here to make an impression butto satisfy a craving for music yet desirous also of instructing while he pleased, his arrangement comprised works from four composers in three centuries and included neither their lightest nor their heaviest compositions. Range, balance, contrast all were there offered generously yet not to satiation.

Mozart, reconstructing the eighteenth century with his emphasis on strings, the fiery Moussorgsky contrasted with the Tchaikowsky imagery, the suauve Strauss with his fanatasies. These were enough for an evening and delightful. Other conductors come weighted down with heavy tomes over which they and the audience labor. Then, for encore, they offer sop in the form of novelties or popular, melodic and often mediocre works.

His selections explain in part why Koussevitsky is without superior in America as a conductor. In Boston, where he plays for a season and occasionally in New York there is little he fails to offer his audiences. In the former, particularly, his winter concerts, in contrast to the summer Pop concerts, include the deepest works of the older masters as well as the most novel of novelties. At all times he pleases his audiences as well as himself and so all are content. Os to his musicianship, it has stood the test of time and the severest critics. Some cities have the Boston Symphony more than once a season. It would appear that in an area so appreciative of symphonic music he could be heard here for more than once a year.

* * *

The day after the Boston Symphony I tuned in on Carnegie Hall in time to hear the last half of Bruno Walter's broadcast concert with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Despite its location in America's metropolis, this organization, to my mind, never has achieved the catholicity of the Boston group. I think the cities have something to do with it. In the vicinity of Huntington avenue there is still to be found that atmosphere of repose which is forever lacking on Manhattan. There is a harshness to the Philharmonic-Symphony that is never present in the Boston orchestra and I have noticed it not merely over the radio but in Carnegie Hall. There, in those brief invasions from Boston, Koussevitsky's players still retain that ease of manner for which their New York colleagues strive yet fail to achieve. Nor is the Philharmonic-Symphony alone in this harshness, it exists in other orchestras which have their being among the skyscrapers.

Nevertheless, Bruckner's Eighth Symphony was worth listening to. Not a devotee and one who still objects to the strident brasses he intrudes and the Wagnerian dramatisms he affects, I nevertheless enjoyed the Austrian's thematic treatment of his subject. Occasionally the Eighth forgets Wagner and returns to the composer's Vienna. Then it becomes a delight and one wonders if Bruckner would not have been happier and perhaps greater had he never heard the man who became his master. Possibly one of his first four symphonies conducted by one less theatrical than Walter would relieve more of the Viennese. Possibly Koussevitzky is the man to reach back of the Tannhauser-incrusted compositions and reveal the earlier and more likeable Bruckner.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

NOV - 1933

Boston Symphony

The principal number of the program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at the Lyric on November 14 is the Second Symphony in D major by Jan Sibelius, contemporary Finnish composer. This is regarded by critics as an orchestral masterpiece, but it is seldom heard.

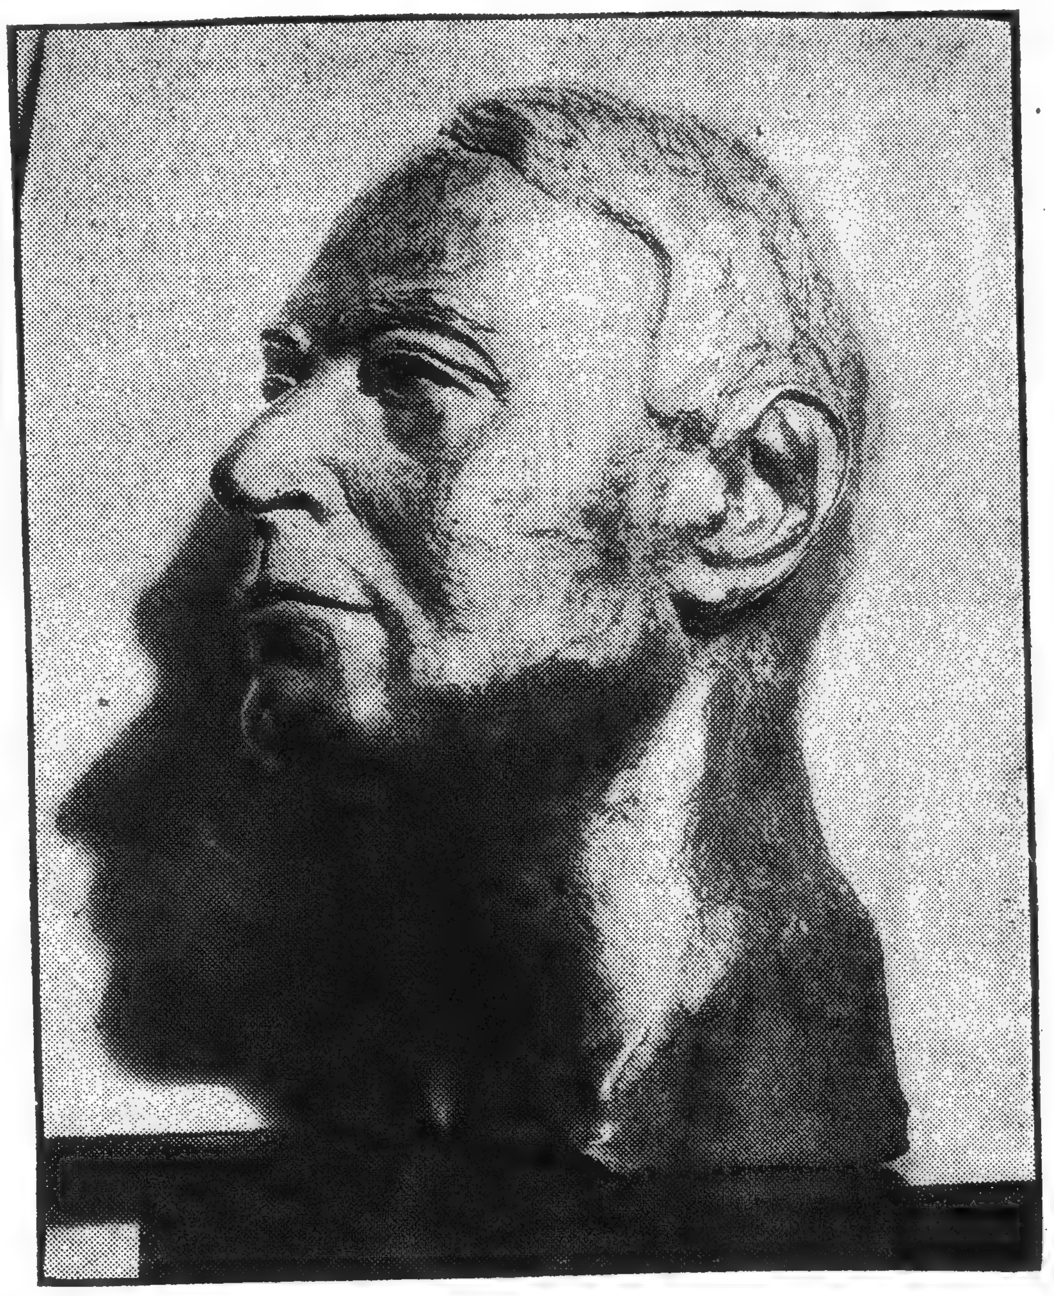
Another work on the program is Mozart's Little Serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic" for strings.

The concert of November 14 will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV - 1933

Maestro In Bronze



Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been sculptured in bronze by his wife, Mme. Natalie Koussevitsky. This head is being shown for the first time as a part of an exhibition of paintings and sculpture in Symphony Hall, Boston, honoring the conductor's tenth year as leader of the Boston Orchestra.

Past and Present Judgments on The Music of Beethoven

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

The Beethoven Cycle of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had an auspicious beginning, under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, this past week. On Sunday next, in Symphony Hall, Arthur Schnabel will present a Beethoven program consisting of five of the pianoforte sonatas. On Nov. 9, the Chardon Quartet starts its Cambridge series which will be devoted exclusively to the quartets of Beethoven.

We wonder whether those who consider Beethoven's technique "primiitive and experimental" in his C major (first) symphony are correct in assuming that this "formal, rather than big work" is lacking in individuality, even in character. Perhaps this is the "historical" point of view. But the historical attitude has too often proved itself musically shallow, except in the case of what may be termed "period" writers,—those who confined themselves to a musical language that shall reflect only and always the manners and the style of the times for which they wrote.

How many of our best musicians have made a more than passing study of the earlier piano sonatas of Beethoven? The first (in F minor) shows an almost volcanic quality compared to most the solo piano works of Mozart, except the big C minor Fantasie which precedes the sonata in the same key. A steady and sure emancipation from the influence of Haydn and Mozart—perhaps even more from the latter—is apparent to all who will base their findings on the musical evidence found between Beethoven's Opus 2 and Opus 4.

Those who find most of the new music nothing but ugliness of sound should read, as they run, the appended criticism of Beethoven's works published in the "Tablettes de Polymnie" in 1810, which we have appropriated from Phillip Hale's program notes for the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

On the other hand, Cambini and Garaude were alarmed by the "astonishing success" of Beethoven's works, which were "a danger to musical art; the contagion of Germanic harmony has reached the present school of composition formed at the conservatory. It is believed that a periodical use of the most barbaric dissonances and a noisy use of all the orchestral instruments will make an effect. Alas, the ear is only stabbed; there is no appeal to the heart."

Donald Francis Tovey, Reid professor of music at Edinburgh University, has based his scholarship on musical facts,—a most unorthodox procedure. Besides, his is an intensely musical nature. More heresy! We quote passages from a section called "Organic Unity," in the preface to his "Companion to Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas":

"What becomes of Beethoven's revolutionary tendencies when we treat his works as individuals and his forms as arising from the inner nature of his materials instead of being imposed from without? Obviously, on such a view the strictest form is not that which is most like some average deduced from many classical examples, but that which, when adequately described, will account most nearly for every note in the work. . . .

at 8:15—50c to $2.50. Wed.
Sat.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

NOV 1933

Symphony Will Give Classic And 3 Moderns

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's directions opens the first series of concerts it has given here in a number of years the night of November 14, it will be heard in a program consisting of one classic master and three moderns.

Mozart will be represented by his little Serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Jan Sibelius by his celebrated Second Symphony in D major, Moussorgsky's by an operatic Prelude and Richard Strauss by a tone poem.

Sibelius, who ranks with the foremost living European composers, is a native of Finland best known to the general public for his orchestral work "Finlandia."

His D major Symphony has been called one of the finest modern works in its form though it is among the more rarely heard symphonic compositions.

The Boston Symphony was the only one of the great orchestras to visit Chicago during the Century of Progress Exposition and its concert in Orchestra Hall on October 23 was generally acclaimed the principal musical event of the season. Two of the works to be given at the Lyric were on the program—the Mozart an the Sibelius, and both received particular critical praise. One of the critics declared that Dr. Koussevitzky "is one of the great dramatists of the baton, one of the inspired master of orchestral address." His art, this writer added, is based upon a brilliant and impeccable technique.

H. A. F. P.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 6 1933

Boston Symphony's Program Is Ready

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces the program to be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra when the famous organization visits New Haven to give a concert in Woolsey Hall a week from tonight at 8:25.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Second in D major by Jean Sibelius. This score is considered one of the most eloquent the famous living Finnish composer has written. The first part of the program will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso for String orchestra, Opus 6, No. 12. Dr. Koussevitzky will also play the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Following is the entire program:—

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12.
Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina."
Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," in the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form, Op. 28.
Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43.
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e soave
Finale: Allegro moderato

Nov 7 E Sun

, TUESDAY, NOVEM

Music

JAN SIBELIUS' Second Symphony, in D major; Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, a Strauss tone poem, and an operatic prelude by Moussorgsky are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on Tuesday evening of next week, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The promise of the Sibelius work draws attention to this concert. Of all the Finnish composer's long string of symphonies—and some critics consider him the greatest living master of this form—only one has ever been played in Baltimore, it appears. It was the third, also given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians, on March 5, 1929.

It also may be noted that Mr. Koussevitzky is the foremost exponent of Sibelius in this country. He played all of the symphonies in Boston last season, gave an all-Sibelius program in New York, and also played Sibelius as a guest conductor in England during the past summer. He was rewarded for his devotion, incidentally, by being promised the composer's Eighth Symphony for its premiere.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

1933

SYMPHONY IN NEW CONCERT SERIES

First of Monday Night Programs Attracts Big Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~, conductor, began the first of the Monday evening series of concerts at Symphony hall last night with an interesting program that included two established works and one novelty. An audience, large and of a more varied quality than ordinarily seen at symphony concerts, attended and gave evidence of keen appreciation.

To those none too well founded musically, and there were a goodly number present, much pleasure was received from the novelty—a work by Nicholas Tcherepnin, the Elder, which was played for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular pair of concerts on Oct. 13 and 14 and was entitled "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale of Edgar Allen Poe." It was dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. The score called for an exceptionally large orchestra with a special percussion choir.

This composition, based on the sinister story of "The Masque of the Red Death," by Poe, renewed impressions previously received. It was delineative, programmic music skillfully but not originally building an atmosphere of the shuddery variety. Too often were touches of Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinski. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky and his men overcame the enormous technical difficulties and gave a brilliant performance. Even superbly played, the piece obviously lacked musical unity and failed to impress as anything more than an attempt at spectacular orchestration.

For the real lovers of good music the remainder of the program was devoted to Mozart's delightful serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and Brahms's first symphony in C minor. The Mozart serenade, appropriately performed by a reduced orchestra, demonstrated again that Mozart, composing, had beauty of form and substance, euphony and rhythm always in mind even though the composition were of small dimensions. The music was of the kind that will never age and bids fair to outlive huge symphonic poems. The playing of it was beautifully clear, now gay, now playful, at times even tender, but never melancholy as some conductors love to make it.

As to Brahms's first symphony—many present last night were already familiar with Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable way with Brahms from the festival of last spring. Others soon were of like mind At end all were most enthusiastic. The horn solo, reminiscent of the Alpine horn awakening the echoes in the Bernese Oberland, was of especial clearness and purity.

W. T. C., Jr.

Her. MUSIC Nov. 7

57

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program — Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; N. Tcherepnin, Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

The first concert of this season's Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Despite unfavorable weather conditions a large audience found its way to Symphony hall.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" was a happy choice for an opening number. This work for string orchestra, was given a reading of spontaneous simplicity. No detail was neglected and yet nothing was allowed to come between the composer and his ideas. There can be no higher purpose. The strings were properly reduced somewhat for this modest work. If conductors of large symphonic bodies would do the same for the orchestral part of the Mozart concertos, these works would gain in vitality. What we almost invariably have is a group of string players larger than Mozart ever dreamed of for such cases. Conductors instinctively keep them from covering the solo parts, but the string tone, except in the tuttis, sounds suppressed, which it is. A smaller group, using their normal resources throughout, would give sonorities that intensify without losing balance.

N. Tcherepnin's Three Pieces, after a tale by Poe, has but recently been reviewed in these columns. It was playd at the second of the regular series and received due attention from the pen of Mr. Philip Hale. Last night's audience was evidently moved by the music which Poe's horrors inspired; they applauded with great enthusiasm. Dr. Koussevitzky shared with his men the thanks of the audience for some magnificent playing. One does not tire of hearing the Boston Symphony; on the contrary, one's appreciation grows with each hearing.

Brahms's C minor Symphony was written after he had had much experience in orchestral writing; it followed the early Serenades, op. 11 and 16, the D minor concerto for piano, the Variations on a Theme of Haydn, as well as the orchestral element in his German Requiem, the Triumphlied and the Schicksalslied. In composing this symphony Brahms moved with great caution, keeping the first three movements for 10 years before attacking the finale. This symphony has features rare in his works: a solemn introduction to the first movement and one to the last that might be termed mysteriously expectant. In each case the introduction brings forth figures that are destined to take shape as themes in the movements in question. The first movement—after its introduction — begins at white heat.

Brahms has an almost Mozartian sense of movement, the lack of which has tied up some of Bruckner's most beautiful music. We do not always see eye to eye with the Koussevitzky interpretation of this work, for he does not bring to it that uncanny penetration, by simple means, that he brings to his readings of so many other composers. No composer is more meticulous than Brahms in the shaping of his themes and the proportioning of his phrases.

The slow movement is in the remote key of E major (an unusual happening that we meet in the C minor concerto by Beethoven, heard at one of Sunday's concerts). The third movement has moments of Brahms's greatest charm—a charm that is always virile. Shortly after the return to its first section, following an episode of Hungarian flavor, there is the slightest suggestion of the atmosphere of Wagner's Meistersinger in the strings. We do not presume to suggest that Brahms was plagiarizing in this passage, but it is well known that his favorite Wagner opera was "Die Meistersinger," and no composer is left completely untouched by a work he greatly admires. There is a definite note of triumph in the final movement, the theme of which has been described as too much like a theme in the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth, but it is just here that Brahms, in his essential meaning, is most original.

E. L. M.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A large and reverent, rather than enthusiastic, audience greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the first concert of the present season which was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program was not designed to spare either conductor or orchestra but, despite the fleeting impression, through the demanding "Leonore" Overture No. 3, that everyone was being almost obviously careful. the music yesterday afternoon sang out as free and warm as if the orchestra had not been dispersed and at separate business for several months. The program was as follows.

Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms..Symphony No. 3 in F Major
Debussy.................... Nocturnes
a. Nuages
b Fetes
Scriabin..........The Poem of Ecstasy

The program. too, included music at which Dr. Koussezitzky, and the orchestra through his training of it, specially excel. Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky alone were missing from a program which might have been a list of the conductor's favorites.

Through the difficulties of the long slow sections of the "Leonora" Overture (and conductors, as well as singers, are best tested by a slow movement) the orchestra moved in dignity, and the worrisome details attendant on blending the music of the orchestra with the calls of the trumpet offstage, and on the final section, with each string choir in unison, playing against the others, were as nothing. The nobility of the music sounded through as if there were no technical difficulties at all, which is not usual, even for so fine an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, at its first concert of the season.

The playing of the Brahms was very satisfying too. The heroic excitements of the first and last movements were no less beautifully played than the tender songs of the andante and the allegretto. One marvelled anew at the definite, clean tones from each choir of the orchestra—the bright, resilient strings, the combined suavities and mordancies of the woodwinds, the fruity darkness and glow of the brasses, and at the expressiveness of the whole.

Debussy's "Clouds," under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton, were given sharpness of outline while never losing their shifting colors, the enchanting evanescence of an incorporeal loveliness. "Fetes" he made as dramatically exciting, by means of a steady rhythm and an increasing crescendo as Ravel's "Bolero" may be as exciting, but more satisfying, musically.

"The Poem of Ecstasy," by which Scriabin actually achieved much of the abstract orgy he intended (curious, for such esoterics seldom approach anywhere near their goal, but so often end in meaningless vaporings) received a magnificent performance. Surging climax by climax, the music built itself into an orgiastic tide of sound. If Scriabin could hear it, he might faint and die, as he hoped to do, in a musical ecstasy.

E. B.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES

PLYMOUTH—"Biography," comedy by S. N.

Dr. Koussevitzky And the Mondays

Nov 7

AN atmosphere of enthusiasm and accomplishment surrounded last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the first of the new season's Monday series. Particularly happy was Dr. Koussevitzky's choice of program material. The orchestra has now behind it a month of concerts in the regular Symphony Hall series, two concerts in the Cambridge series and at least one other of the Tuesday cycle. It would have been a simple matter for the conductor to have repeated numbers previously heard or to have anticipated his immediate schedule. He preferred, instead, to include only one item from an earlier concert—Cherepnin's fantastic sketches after the tale of Poe, "The Masque of the Red Death." Otherwise, the program contained Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and the First Symphony of Brahms. These are pieces of pith and merit. In combining them, moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky not only provided balance and diversification of material but afforded opportunities for the orchestra to exhibit a range of ability and a variety of styles not usually available in a single program.

Had the reputation of the orchestra been at stake in this one concert, players and conductor could not have transmitted their music with more verve and devotion. How the character and mood of each piece was reflected in every detail of performance! In the limpid measures of Mozart's Serenade, Dr. Koussevitzky's motions were precise and sparing; there were phrases which slipped by with scarcely a stroke of the baton. The Boston Symphony strings, in their unanimity and precision, seemed almost to create a glowing life of their own.

Abruptly came the change in the strange fantasy of Cherepnin. Here the conductor whipped into sound the snarling strings and piping brass and woodwinds as some Mephistopheles might summon forth a nightmare of demons. Poe's story is one of horror gripping the imagination. If horror may be reflected in musical tone, Cherepnin has found the way. In "The Masque of the Red Death," tale or tone poem, there are passages representing the still terror that is felt in the presence of the supernatural as well as the wild tumult of escape from a frightful unknown. There are fearful complexities in the music and weird contrasts of instrumental timbres. Yet whatever was called for by way of orchestral performance, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players accomplished it with fierce intensity or keen theatrical sense.

Again a contrast—this time of the broad, the solid, the smiling and the uplifting First Symphony of Brahms. The insistent timpani beat out the stirring rhythm of the initial movement. The manner in which the players become thoroughly absorbed in this music; the earnestness with which Dr. Koussevitzky pushed forward with the vigorous advance, was later thrown into expressive contrast by the graciousness of the expanding Andante. Especially exhilarating was the closing movement with its broad melody like a hymn of joy. . . . In sum, with this symphony of Brahms, the orchestra gave one of its most inspiring and memorable performances.

N. M. J.

MUSIC Nov. 7

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky began in Symphony Hall last evening another series of Monday Symphony concerts. He offered a typically well-balanced and contrasted program. Two of the scores, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Brahms' C minor Symphony, are masterworks, and music in which Dr Koussevitzky excels. The other number was Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale by Poe," given a first performance anywhere at the concerts of Oct 13 and 14.

Mozart's little serenade for strings is truly a musical gem, absolutely free from a superfluous or a meretricious phrase. His inexhaustible flow of melody, the mingled pathos and elegant humor so characteristic of him, are to be observed in every bar. The score is obviously a favorite with Dr Koussevitzky, for it has frequently found place on his programs. His reading of it is notably fine, and he may justly be proud of the finesse with which his string sections play it. Simple as it may sound, this serenade is not easy to play well; the utmost delicacy and elegance of style are required, together with just the proper degree of exuberance.

Exception has been taken by some listeners to certain of the conductor's tempi in Brahm's Symphony. Following the score, one could note several such places. Yet, in view of the splendor and irresistible sweep of his interpretation, only a pedant could find cause for serious complaint. The first movement probably equals, in its impression of cosmic immensity, anything in symphonic literature. The finale, to an extent, partakes of this quality. It was not always so with Brahms; in the subsequent three symphonies he left the heights to concern himself with more intimate feelings. In essentials, Dr Koussevitzky plays the work ideally, save for overemphasis of the brass in the climax of the finale.

Tcherepnin's piece, though the work of a skilled writer for orchestra, still seems heterogeneous in style and too diffuse to convey graphically the incidents of its literary program, Poe's story, "The Masque of the Red Death." The audience was, of course, large and enthusiastic.

The next Monday concert will be played on Nov 27.

C. W. D.

FIRST MONDAY OF SYMPHONY

Nov 7

Mozart, Brahms and Tcherepnin Works Played

Last night saw the beginning at Symphony Hall of the current series of Monday evening Symphony concerts. Despite the disagreeable weather the hall was virtually filled by the expected enthusiastic audience.

Though the Tuesday afternoon concerts have "gone Beethoven," those of the other supplementary series are remaining faithful to the miscellaneous programme. Mozart, Brahms and Nicolai Tcherepnin were the composers of last evening, represented respectively by the serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the three pieces for orchestra after Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," and the First Symphony, in C minor.

Mozart's delectable composition is an especial favorite of Dr. Koussevitzky's and his and the orchestra's performance of it long ago reached perfection, while their versions of this and the other symphonies of Brahms are among their more notable accomplishments. Tcherepnin's suite, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, and given its world premiere at the second pair of this season's regular concerts, is a tour de force of instrumentation that exhibits the orchestra's virtuosity at the highest pitch. Last evening's audience, like its two predecessors, warmed to the music, though the critical ear finds it more ingenious than inspired.

American, After All

Nov 7

A few days ago, commenting on the singing of the Vienna Choir Boys, this department praised the skill and fidelity that they brought to our national anthem; recalled the pains which Europeans habitually bestow upon it; cited among other instances the orchestral version used by Dr. Muck in war-time at the Symphony Concerts. It now appears happily and from an authoritative source, that its origin was American. Says the informing letter:

> The version used by Dr. Muck was an orchestration made for the purpose by Frederick S. Converse, using the version as to melody, harmony and notation which was established by some twelve of us sitting around a table for a full day and a half. This work we did for the song-books about to be made for the American Army in the various camps, in the hope that the national anthem might at least receive a standard of melody and harmony, such as had already been officially established in France in similar manner for the Marseillaise. I believe that Converse's orchestration was also used by Monteux at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Symphonic Saturday

The Symphony Concert of Saturday renewed the general exhilaration and delight over the performance of Mozart's Piano-Concerto in E-flat by Mr. Petri, the conductor and the orchestra; ended in the general excitement and high-pitched applause that Chaikovsky according to Koussevitzky annually generates. As prelude Honegger's Symphonic Movement sounded better and was more affably received than on Friday. The timbre of Mr. Tapley's saxophone caught the ear. The rhythmic vigor of many a page made directer effect. Yet the whole still 57

THIS CLIPPING ...
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

NOV 6 - 1933

Symphony Will Give Classic And 3 Moderns

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's directions opens the first series of concerts it has given here in a number of years the night of November 14, it will be heard in a program consisting of one classic master and three moderns.

Mozart will be represented by his little Serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Jan Sibelius by his celebrated Second Symphony in D major, Moussorgsky's by an operatic Prelude and Richard Strauss by a tone poem.

Sibelius, who ranks with the foremost living European composers, is a native of Finland best known to the general public for his orchestral work "Finlandia."

His D major Symphony has been called one of the finest modern works in its form though it is among the more rarely heard symphonic compositions.

The Boston Symphony was the only one of the great orchestras to visit Chicago during the Century of Progress Exposition and its concert in Orchestra Hall on October 23 was generally acclaimed the principal musical event of the season. Two of the works to be given at the Lyric were on the program—the Mozart an the Sibelius, and both received particular critical praise. One of the critics declared that Dr. Koussevitzky "is one of the great dramatists of the baton, one of the inspired master of orchestral address." His art, this writer added, is based upon a brilliant and impeccable technique.

H. A. F. P.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 6 1933

Boston Symphony's Program Is Ready

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces the program to be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra when the famous organization visits New Haven to give a concert in Woolsey Hall a week from tonight at 8:25.

The symphony of the occasion will be the Second in D major by Jean Sibelius. This score is considered one of the most eloquent the famous living Finnish composer has written. The first part of the program will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso for String orchestra, Opus 6, No. 12. Dr. Koussevitzky will also play the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Following is the entire program:—

Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 12.
Moussorgsky, Prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina."
Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," in the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner, in Rondo Form, Op. 28.
Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43.
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e soave
Finale: Allegro moderato

Nov 7 E Sun

TUESDAY, NOVEM

Music

JAN SIBELIUS' Second Symphony, in D major; Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, a Strauss tone poem, and an operatic prelude by Moussorgsky are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on Tuesday evening of next week, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The promise of the Sibelius work draws attention to this concert. Of all the Finnish composer's long string of symphonies—and some critics consider him the greatest living master of this form—only one has ever been played in Baltimore, it appears. It was the third, also given by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians, on March 5, 1929.

It also may be noted that Mr. Koussevitzky is the foremost exponent of Sibelius in this country. He played all of the symphonies in Boston last season, gave an all-Sibelius program in New York, and also played Sibelius as a guest conductor in England during the past summer. He was rewarded for his devotion, incidentally, by being promised the composer's Eighth Symphony for its premiere.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRAVELER

NOV 7 - 1933

SYMPHONY IN NEW CONCERT SERIES

First of Monday Night Programs Attracts Big Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge [redacted]ky, conductor, began the first of the Monday evening series of concerts at Symphony hall last night with an interesting program that included two established works and one novelty. An audience, large and of a more varied quality than ordinarily seen at symphony concerts, attended and gave evidence of keen appreciation.

To those none too well founded musically, and there were a goodly number present, much pleasure was received from the novelty—a work by Nicholas Tcherepnin, the Elder, which was played for the first time anywhere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular pair of concerts on Oct. 13 and 14 and was entitled "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale of Edgar Allen Poe." It was dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. The score called for an exceptionally large orchestra with a special percussion choir.

This composition, based on the sinister story of "The Masque of the Red Death," by Poe, renewed impressions previously received. It was delineative, programmic music skillfully but not originally building an atmosphere of the shuddery variety. Too often were touches of Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinski. Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky and his men overcame the enormous technical difficulties and gave a brilliant performance. Even superbly played, the piece obviously lacked musical unity and failed to impress as anything more than an attempt at spectacular orchestration.

For the real lovers of good music the remainder of the program was devoted to Mozart's delightful serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nacht Musik," and Brahms's first symphony in C minor. The Mozart serenade, appropriately performed by a reduced orchestra, demonstrated again that Mozart, composing, had beauty of form and substance, euphony and rhythm always in mind even though the composition were of small dimensions. The music was of the kind that will never age and bids fair to outlive huge symphonic poems. The playing of it was beautifully clear, now gay, now playful, at times even tender, but never melancholy as some conductors love to make it.

As to Brahms's first symphony—many present last night were already familiar with Dr. Koussevitzky's admirable way with Brahms from the festival of last spring. Others soon were of like mind. At end all were most enthusiastic. The horn solo, reminiscent of the Alpine horn awakening the echoes in the Bernese Oberland, was of especial clearness and purity.

W. T. C., Jr.

Her. MUSIC Nov. 7

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program — Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; N. Tcherepnin, Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor.

The first concert of this season's Monday evening series of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Despite unfavorable weather conditions a large audience found its way to Symphony hall.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" was a happy choice for an opening number. This work for string orchestra, was given a reading of spontaneous simplicity. No detail was neglected and yet nothing was allowed to come between the composer and his ideas. There can be no higher purpose. The strings were properly reduced somewhat for this modest work. If conductors of large symphonic bodies would do the same for the orchestral part of the Mozart concertos, these works would gain in vitality. What we almost invariably have is a group of string players larger than Mozart ever dreamed of for such cases. Conductors instinctively keep them from covering the solo parts, but the string tone, except in the tuttis, sounds suppressed, which it is. A smaller group, using their normal resources throughout, would give sonorities that intensify without losing balance.

N. Tcherepnin's Three Pieces, after a tale by Poe, has but recently been reviewed in these columns. It was playd at the second of the regular series and received due attention from the pen of Mr. Philip Hale. Last night's audience was evidently moved by the music which Poe's horrors inspired; they applauded with great enthusiasm. Dr. Koussevitzky shared with his men the thanks of the audience for some magnificent playing. One does not tire of hearing the Boston Symphony; on the contrary, one's appreciation grows with each hearing.

Brahms's C minor Symphony was written after he had had much experience in orchestral writing; it followed the early Serenades, op. 11 and 16, the D minor concerto for piano, the Variations on a Theme of Haydn, as well as the orchestral element in his German Requiem, the Triumphlied and the Schicksalslied. In composing this symphony Brahms moved with great caution, keeping the first three movements for 10 years before attacking the finale. This symphony has features rare in his works: a solemn introduction to the first movement and one to the last that might be termed mysteriously expectant. In each case the introduction brings forth figures that are destined to take shape as themes in the movements in question. The first movement—after its introduction — begins at white heat.

Brahms has an almost Mozartian sense of movement, the lack of which has tied up some of Bruckner's most beautiful music. We do not always see eye to eye with the Koussevitzky interpretation of this work, for he does not bring to it that uncanny penetration, by simple means, that he brings to his readings of so many other composers. No composer is more meticulous than Brahms in the shaping of his themes and the proportioning of his phrases.

The slow movement is in the remote key of E major (an unusual happening that we meet in the C minor concerto by Beethoven, heard at one of Sunday's concerts). The third movement has moments of Brahms's greatest charm—a charm that is always virile. Shortly after the return to its first section, following an episode of Hungarian flavor, there is the slightest suggestion of the atmosphere of Wagner's Meistersinger in the strings. We do not presume to suggest that Brahms was plagiarizing in this passage, but it is well known that his favorite Wagner opera was "Die Meistersinger," and no composer is left completely untouched by a work he greatly admires. There is a definite note of triumph in the final movement, the theme of which has been described as too much like a theme in the last movement of Beethoven's Ninth, but it is just here that Brahms, in his essential meaning, is most original.

E. L. H.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A large and reverent, rather than enthusiastic, audience greeted Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the first concert of the present season which was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program was not designed to spare either conductor or orchestra but, despite the fleeting impression, through the demanding "Leonore" Overture No. 3, that everyone was being almost obviously careful, the music yesterday afternoon sang out as free and warm as if the orchestra had not been dispersed and at separate business for several months. The program was as follows.

Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3
Brahms. . Symphony No. 3 in F Major
Debussy.................... Nocturnes
a. Nuages
b. Fetes
Scriabin..........The Poem of Ecstasy

The program, too, included music at which Dr. Koussezitzky, and the orchestra through his training of it, specially excel. Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky alone were missing from a program which might have been a list of the conductor's favorites.

Through the difficulties of the long slow sections of the "Leonora" Overture (and conductors, as well as singers, are best tested by a slow movement) the orchestra moved in dignity, and the worrisome details attendant on blending the music of the orchestra with the calls of the trumpet offstage, and on the final section, with each string choir in unison, playing against the others, were as nothing. The nobility of the music sounded through as if there were no technical difficulties at all, which is not usual, even for so fine an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, at its first concert of the season.

The playing of the Brahms was very satisfying too. The heroic excitements of the first and last movements were no less beautifully played than the tender songs of the andante and the allegretto. One marvelled anew at the definite, clean tones from each choir of the orchestra—the bright, resilient strings, the combined suavities and mordancies of the woodwinds, the fruity darkness and glow of the brasses, and at the expressiveness of the whole.

Debussy's "Clouds," under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton, were given sharpness of outline while never losing their shifting colors, the enchanting evanescence of an incorporeal loveliness. "Fetes" he made as dramatically exciting, by means of a steady rhythm and an increasing crescendo as Ravel's "Bolero" may be as exciting, but more satisfying, musically.

"The Poem of Ecstasy," by which Scriabin actually achieved much of the abstract orgy he intended (curious, for such esoterics seldom approach anywhere near their goal, but so often end in meaningless vaporings) received a magnificent performance. Surging climax by climax, the music built itself into an orgiastic tide of sound. If Scriabin could hear it, he might faint and die, as he hoped to do, in a musical ecstasy.

E. B.

TONIGHT IN THE THEATRES
PLYMOUTH—"Biography," comedy by S. N

Dr. Koussevitzky And the Mondays

Trans Nov 7

AN atmosphere of enthusiasm and accomplishment surrounded last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the first of the new season's Monday series. Particularly happy was Dr. Koussevitzky's choice of program material. The orchestra has now behind it a month of concerts in the regular Symphony Hall series, two concerts in the Cambridge series and at least one other of the Tuesday cycle. It would have been a simple matter for the conductor to have repeated numbers previously heard or to have anticipated his immediate schedule. He preferred, instead, to include only one item from an earlier concert—Cherepnin's fantastic sketches after the tale of Poe, "The Masque of the Red Death." Otherwise, the program contained Mozart's Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and the First Symphony of Brahms. These are pieces of pith and merit. In combining them, moreover, Dr. Koussevitzky not only provided balance and diversification of material but afforded opportunities for the orchestra to exhibit a range of ability and a variety of styles not usually available in a single program.

Had the reputation of the orchestra been at stake in this one concert, players and conductor could not have transmitted their music with more verve and devotion. How the character and mood of each piece was reflected in every detail of performance! In the limpid measures of Mozart's Serenade, Dr. Koussevitzky's motions were precise and sparing; there were phrases which slipped by with scarcely a stroke of the baton. The Boston Symphony strings, in their unanimity and precision, seemed almost to create a glowing life of their own.

Abruptly came the change in the strange fantasy of Cherepnin. Here the conductor whipped into sound the snarling strings and piping brass and woodwinds as some Mephistopheles might summon forth a nightmare of demons. Poe's story is one of horror gripping the imagination. If horror may be reflected in musical tone, Cherepnin has found the way. In "The Masque of the Red Death," tale or tone poem, there are passages representing the still terror that is felt in the presence of the supernatural as well as the wild tumult of escape from a frightful unknown. There are fearful complexities in the music and weird contrasts of instrumental timbres. Yet whatever was called for by way of orchestral performance, Dr. Koussevitzky and the players accomplished it with fierce intensity or keen theatrical sense.

Again a contrast—this time of the broad, the solid, the smiling and the uplifting First Symphony of Brahms. The insistent timpani beat out the stirring rhythm of the initial movement. The manner in which the players become thoroughly absorbed in this music; the earnestness with which Dr. Koussevitzky pushed forward with the vigorous advance, was later thrown into expressive contrast by the graciousness of the expanding Andante. Especially exhilarating was the closing movement with its broad melody like a hymn of joy. . . . In sum, with this symphony of Brahms, the orchestra gave one of its most inspiring and memorable performances.

N. M. J.

Glo MUSIC Nov 7

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky began in Symphony Hall last evening another series of Monday Symphony concerts. He offered a typically well-balanced and contrasted program. Two of the scores, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Brahms' C minor Symphony, are masterworks, and music in which Dr Koussevitzky excels. The other number was Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale by Poe," given a first performance anywhere at the concerts of Oct 13 and 14.

Mozart's little serenade for strings is truly a musical gem, absolutely free from a superfluous or a meretricious phrase. His inexhaustible flow of melody, the mingled pathos and elegant humor so characteristic of him, are to be observed in every bar. The score is obviously a favorite with Dr Koussevitzky, for it has frequently found place on his programs. His reading of it is notably fine, and he may justly be proud of the finesse with which his string sections play it. Simple as it may sound, this serenade is not easy to play well; the utmost delicacy and elegance of style are required, together with just the proper degree of exuberance.

Exception has been taken by some listeners to certain of the conductor's tempi in Brahm's Symphony. Following the score, one could note several such places. Yet, in view of the splendor and irresistible sweep of his interpretation, only a pedant could find cause for serious complaint. The first movement probably equals, in its impression of cosmic immensity, anything in symphonic literature. The finale, to an extent, partakes of this quality. It was not always so with Brahms; in the subsequent three symphonies he left the heights to concern himself with more intimate feelings. In essentials, Dr Koussevitzky plays the work ideally, save for overemphasis of the brass in the climax of the finale.

Tcherépnin's piece, though the work of a skilled writer for orchestra, still seems heterogeneous in style and too diffuse to convey graphically the incidents of its literary program, Poe's story, "The Masque of the Red Death." The audience was, of course, large and enthusiastic.

The next Monday concert will be played on Nov 27.

C. W. D.

FIRST MONDAY OF SYMPHONY

Post Nov 7

Mozart, Brahms and Tcherepnin Works Played

Last night saw the beginning at Symphony Hall of the current series of Monday evening Symphony concerts. Despite the disagreeable weather the hall was virtually filled by the expected enthusiastic audience.

Though the Tuesday afternoon concerts have "gone Beethoven," those of the other supplementary series are remaining faithful to the miscellaneous programme. Mozart, Brahms and Nicolai Tcherepnin were the composers of last evening, represented respectively by the serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the three pieces for orchestra after Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," and the First Symphony, in C minor.

Mozart's delectable composition is an especial favorite of Dr. Koussevitzky's and his and the orchestra's performance of it long ago reached perfection, while their versions of this and the other symphonies of Brahms are among their more notable accomplishments. Tcherepnin's suite, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, and given its world premiere at the second pair of this season's regular concerts, is a tour de force of instrumentation that exhibits the orchestra's virtuosity at the highest pitch. Last evening's audience, like its two predecessors, warmed to the music, though the critical ear finds it more ingenious than inspired.

American, After All Nov 7

A few days ago, commenting on the singing of the Vienna Choir Boys, this department praised the skill and fidelity that they brought to our national anthem; recalled the pains which Europeans habitually bestow upon it; cited among other instances the orchestral version used by Dr. Muck in war-time at the Symphony Concerts. It now appears happily and from an authoritative source, that its origin was American. Says the informing letter:

> The version used by Dr. Muck was an orchestration made for the purpose by Frederick S. Converse, using the version as to melody, harmony and notation which was established by some twelve of us sitting around a table for a full day and a half. This work we did for the song-books about to be made for the American Army in the various camps, in the hope that the national anthem might at least receive a standard of melody and harmony, such as had already been officially established in France in similar manner for the Marseillaise. I believe that Converse's orchestration was also used by Monteux at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Symphonic Saturday

The Symphony Concert of Saturday renewed the general exhilaration and delight over the performance of Mozart's Piano-Concerto in E-flat by Mr. Petri, the conductor and the orchestra; ended in the general excitement and high-pitched applause that Chaikovsky according to Koussevitzky annually generates. As prelude Honegger's Symphonic Movement sounded better and was more affably received than on Friday. The timbre of Mr. Tapley's saxophone caught the ear. The ryhthmic vigor of many a page made directer effect. Yet the whole still [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play Mozart Work at Lyric

First of Three Concerts to Be Presented Next Tuesday Evening; Grand Opera Troupe Coming Here For Thanksgiving Week

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

TWO PRIZE-WINNING compositions by Franz C. Bornschein, Baltimore composer whose works have won widespread recognition, were included in the recent Founder's Day program of the San Francisco Musical Club. They were "Enchanted Island," a national prize winner, and his setting of "The Spirit of Light," which gained distinction in an international competition. The compositions were sung by the choral section of the San Francisco club under the direction of Alfred Hurtgen, with the assistance of soloists and a large orchestra.

Koussevitzky's Program

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected a seldom-heard Mozart work for the opening of the first of the orchestra's three Lyric concerts next Tuesday night. This is a "little serenade" for strings called "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Other numbers he has selected are the prelude to "Kohvantschina," one of the best known of Moussorgsky's operas and Sibelius' Second Symphony. Both of these works are as unhackneyed as the Mozart; the Sibelius score ranks with the important modern symphonies and is generally considered the best work of its composer, who is a Finn and who is still living. Richard Strauss will be represented on the program by his merry tone poem, "Tyll Eulenspiegel."

Elmar," and is producing director of the Cincinnati Opera summer season, in addition to singing in its performances. Before going to the Metropolitan he attracted wide attention with the Chicago Civic Opera.

Kreisler

Fritz Kreisler will play several of the big numbers of his repertoire when he gives his only Baltimore recital of the season at the Lyric the night of Dec. 1. He will have as his accompanist, Carl Lamson, pianist, who has been playing with him for many years and they will open the program with Greig's Sonata for the two instruments. After this, Kreisler will play Bach's unaccompanied Chaconne. The latter part of the program is devoted to smaller works including some of the vio linist's arrangements and origi compositions. This recital i second event of the Alba ert Series

---

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's three concerts at the Lyric this season, which will mark the return of this famous organization for a group of engagements after a long period, are included among events provided by the Associated Concert Clubs, as are those of the other two visiting orchestras, the Philadelphia and the National Symphony.

Sun Oct 8

The Associated Concert Clubs were organized a number of years ago by Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, Baltimore counselor for all three orchestras, and experience has shown that no single element, possibly, has done more to stimulate general interest here, it is said, in first-class orchestral music.

Members of the clubs are given special privileges and their number is constantly growing. The list now consists of twenty-four separate groups, this season's additions being the Junior League, the alumni associations of Johns Hopkins, Princeton, Harvard and Yale universities, the Baltimore Civic Opera Company and St. John's College students.

Exceptional interest in resumption of the Boston Symphony series is being shown, it is said, and its concerts are being anticipated among the highlights of the local musical season. All three of them will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

Exhibition in Symphony Hall

The doors of Symphony Hall will be opened tomorrow (Thursday) to all visitors who may wish to see the Koussevitzky exhibition. This collection has been arranged in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It contains portraits, sketches, caricatures and photographs of the conductor made at various times in his life. There are two busts—one of which was made by Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the conductor's wife. In cases there are shown manuscript scores which have been dedicated to him and to the orchestra and also many personal mementoes.

This is the last week of the exhibition which has been on view to the audiences of the Symphony concerts.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

Markevitch Deferred Trans Nov 8

THE ANNOUNCED NOVELTIES of the week for the Symphony Concerts were Gabriel Pierné's "Divertissements sur un Thème pastoral" Opus 49; the Introduction and First Hymn from Igor Markevitch's "Three Hymns." Markevitch scored his pieces for an orchestra with woodwinds in threes, brasses in pairs, liberal percussion, piano, and only a very few desks from each division of strings. He wrote, moreover, a music rich and full in texture. The result at the first rehearsal was clear proof of the inadequacy of the string section. With only enough parts copied to meet the composer's requirements, the performance of the Hymn was necessarily postponed until such later time as a sufficient number of parts can be provided. Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 5 in D, is substituted on the program; Pierné's piece remains the only novelty of the week.

Alive Again

The present betterment of the program-books at the Symphony Concerts under the new editorship of Mr. J. N. Burk continues. It has been long and much needed, it they were to regain their former interest and standing. Last week, for the first time within easy recollection, a new piece from a living and modernist hand — Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement—received adequate and illuminating introduction to Boston hearers. A number from "the standard repertory" — Mozart's Piano-Concerto in E-flat heard for the first times at these concerts—was also treated freshly and informingly, with no digressions into tedious archæology or dry-as-dust detail. In the re-shuffling of the notes about standard pieces, inherited from a previous editorship, the chosen pages are livelier and more engaging. At last the program-book is emerging from tired routine into life and interest again.

---

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance at the Lyric November 14 will mark the return of this famous organization for a regular series of concerts after a long period. Like the Philadelphia and the National Symphony orchestras, the Boston will appear here under the auspices of the Associated Concert Clubs, and all are booked by the T. Arthur Smith Bureau.

All three of the Boston Orchestra concerts — the others being January 31 and April 3—will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

E, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1933

MUSIC

BRAHMS' Sonata in D minor, Opus 108; Mozart's Sonata in E flat major and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata are announced as the program for the recital to be given by Albert Spalding, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, at Cadoa Hall, on the evening of Sunday, November 19. This will be the second recital of the Chamber Music Guild's series.

STRAUSS' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening at 8.30. These works are in addition to Sibelius' Second Symphony and Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, previously announced. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

A WORK which is seldom heard because in its fullest form it requires that an orchestra provide two soloists, is to feature the program of the Hilger Trio at Cadoa Hall on November 29, it is announced. The work is Brahms' double concerto for violin and cello, and is to be played in Brahms' own arrangement substituting piano for orchestra.

Written especially for the virtuosi, Joseph Joachim and Robert Hausmann, Brahms' friends, the concerto makes unusual demands on both violinist and cellist and at the same time provides each with the opportunities

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony Here Monday

In one of the finest symphonic programs ever arranged for New Haven, the Boston Symphony orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians comes here Monday for their initial appearance of the season, the event marking the season's second offering of the Woolsey Hall concert series. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as usual Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed Russian leader of the organization, will conduct.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will occupy the feature section of the program. This is one of the finest compositions of the great living Finnish composer, and the fact that it is to be performed here has caused widespread favorable comment. The balance of the program however, is likewise of fine type, including as it does Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," and Richard Strauss' melodious "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The third event of the series, scheduled for December 13th, will be the recital by Lawrence Tibbett, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MONDAY

In one of the finest symphonic programs ever arranged for New Haven, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians comes here Monday for their initial appearance of the season, the event marking the season's second offering of the Woolsey Hall concert series. The concert will commence at 8:30 and as usual Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the organization, will conduct.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will acupy the feature section of the program. This is one of the finest compositions of the great living Finnish composer, and the fact that it is to be performed here has caused widespread favorable comment. The balance of the program however, is likewise of fine type, including as it does Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," and Richard Strauss' melodious "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

NOV 10 1933

MU

BRAHMS' Sonata in D minor, Opus 108; Mozart's Sonata in E flat major and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata are announced as the program for the recital to be given by Albert Spalding, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, at Cadoa Hall, on the evening of Sunday, November 19. This will be the second recital of the Chamber Music Guild's series.

STRAUSS' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening at 8.30. These works are in addition to Sibelius' Second Symphony and Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, previously announced. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 11 1933

Boston Orchestra to Play 'Eroica' Wednesday

THE one week day concert next week, and a daytime program, is that by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall, Wednesday at 4:40 p. m.

As usual, Serge Koussevitzky, the dignified, but dynamic Russian, will conduct. Favorite among visiting conductors for many people, Koussevitzky will present two favorite orchestra compositions, pieces we are not likely to hear otherwise this season. They are Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks."

Koussevitzky

As different as night and day, they are next to each other on the program. The majesty of the Beethoven will follow the gayness and the subtle sorrow of the Strauss. A highly interesting arrangement.

The first part of the program appears merely introductory—Pierne's "Divertissements" and the prelude to Moussorsky's "Khovantchina," the latter a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citize

NOV 11 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE FRIDAY

First in Series of Five Concerts at Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-seventh season in Brooklyn will be inaugurated on Friday evening, with the first in a series of five concerts to be held at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, at 8:15 o'clock. As the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season, the inaugural concert which marks Dr. Koussevitzky's tenth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assumes added importance and an attendance exceeding that of any previous season is expected.

The program for the concert to be held Friday evening is as follows:

Pierne—Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Opus 49.
Mussorgsky — Prelude to the Opera "Chovantchina".
Strauss — "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks," after the old-fashioned roguish manner—in Rondo form, Opus 28.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and an enlarged Brooklyn committee, who ares ponsoring the current series, have scheduled the four succeeding Friday evening concerts on Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2, and April 6.

THIS CLIP
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

V 9 - 1933

Fine Program For Boston Symphony Next Monday

The first of the two concerts to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season is scheduled for Monday evening, the occasion being the second event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. The coming of the fine organization of one hundred and ten men is always one of New Haven's real musical treats, and the usual great crowd will attend.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian leader of the Boston orchestra has arranged a superb program for their initial appearance here this season. The symphony of the occasion will be the Second in D Major by Jan Sibelius, a score that is considered one of the most eloquent the famous living Finnish composer has written. The first part of the program will consist of Handel's Concerto Grosso for string Orchestra, Opus 6 No. 12 and will be followed by the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina", and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".

This is the first year that the Boston Symphony orchestra has planned to visit New Haven twice in a single season, and the innovation has met with more favorable comment than has been occasioned by any other musical event in a long time.

Tel. Chelsea 8860
OLD RELIABLE
Henry Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
106 SEVENTH AVE., N. Y.
BE SURE ITS HENRY
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CHRONICLE

Second Symphony Concert

At the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor, given on Thursday evening of last week, at Sanders theater, the program was as follows: Ravel, "Le Tombeau de Couperin" (suite for orchestra); Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina"; Stráuss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36.

Ravel, in this number, is more sedate than usual, and there is more of a decided melody than one is apt to notice in this composer—perhaps the thought of Couperin, a great writer for the clavecin, and whose music is still modern.

We have heard lately Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" many times, and this work of Strauss seems to be his best, to be most coherent, and perhaps the most enjoyable of anything he has done. It was grandly played as it usually is nowadays.

Tchaikovsky—great fourth symphony, which did not take the people's ear, like the fifth and sixth symphonies—it does now, however, and was marvellously performed, and made the usual great impression. Tchaikovsky, we understand, is to have a fiftieth anniversary of his death observed unusually during this season. He died Nov. 6, 1883. The third concert will be on Dec. 6, 1933.

—H. J. Storer.

—to similar pieces and that the younger modernists have occasionally repeated it.

The theme is simplicity itself. It is of true pastoral character, eight measures long, in 6-8 meter. It is sung at once by the English horn unaccompanied. It then receives treatment in eleven different ways: some of them variations, others more in the nature of free developments. The first two are variations in which strings accompany the melody, first heard in the basses, next in first violins. A canonic stretto follows in which the notes of the theme are unaltered except that the rhythm is that of continuous sixteenth notes, 2-4. Then follow four variations in which the theme in its original form is taken successively by bassoons, horns, trombone quartet, strings. A Viennese waltz on the theme comes next. The theme is again transformed to accommodate the rhythm of the succeeding Blues. A section marked by the composer "Phrase," for saxophone solo, leads into the final variant, which Pierné labels "En forme de Gigue."

Incidents and Prospects

The exhibition of Koussevitzkiana at Symphony Hall, to mark the tenth year of the conductor in Boston, will close after the Symphony Concert of Saturday. Today it is open to all comers.

Past conductors of the Symphony Concerts persist long in Germany. Max Fiedler, who directed the Boston Orchestra from 1908 through 1912 and then worked for years at Essen, is announced in Berlin for a "Brahms Evening" with the Philharmonic Orchestra. Here he was no young man.

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Play Mozart Work at Lyric

First of Three Concerts to Be Presented Next Tuesday Evening; Grand Opera Troupe Coming Here For Thanksgiving Week

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

TWO PRIZE-WINNING compositions by Franz C. Bornschein, Baltimore composer whose works have won widespread recognition, were included in the recent Founder's Day program of the San Francisco Musical Club. They were "Enchanted Island," a national prize winner, and his setting of "The Spirit of Light," which gained distinction in an international competition. The compositions were sung by the choral section of the San Francisco club under the direction of Alfred Hurtgen, with the assistance of soloists and a large orchestra.

Koussevitzky's Program

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected a seldom-heard Mozart work for the opening of the first of the orchestra's three Lyric concerts next Tuesday night. This is a "little serenade" for strings called "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik." Other numbers he has selected are the prelude to "Kohvantschina," one of the best known of Moussorgsky's operas and Sibelius' Second Symphony. Both of these works are as unhackneyed as the Mozart; the Sibelius score ranks with the important modern symphonies and is generally considered the best work of its composer, who is a Finn and who is still living. Richard Strauss will be represented on the program by his merry tone poem, "Tyll Eulenspiegel."

Elmar," and is producing director of the Cincinnati Opera summer season, in addition to singing in its performances. Before going to the Metropolitan he attracted wide attention with the Chicago Civic Opera.

Kreisler

Fritz Kreisler will play several of the big numbers of his repertoire when he gives his only Baltimore recital of the season at the Lyric the night of Dec. 1. He will have as his accompanist, Carl Lamson, pianist, who has been playing with him for many years and they will open the program with Greig's Sonata for the two instruments. After this, Kreisler will play Bach's unaccompanied Chaconne. The latter part of the program is devoted to smaller works including some of the vio linist's arrangements and origi compositions. This recital i second event of the Alba cert Series

---

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's three concerts at the Lyric this season, which will mark the return of this famous organization for a group of engagements after a long period, are included among events provided by the Associated Concert Clubs, as are those of the other two visiting orchestras, the Philadelphia and the National Symphony.

The Associated Concert Clubs were organized a number of years ago by Miss Elizabeth Ellen Starr, Baltimore counselor for all three orchestras, and experience has shown that no single element, possibly, has done more to stimulate general interest here, it is said, in first-class orchestral music.

Members of the clubs are given special privileges and their number is constantly growing. The list now consists of twenty-four separate groups, this season's additions being the Junior League, the alumni associations of Johns Hopkins, Princeton, Harvard and Yale universities, the Baltimore Civic Opera Company and St. John's College students.

Exceptional interest in resumption of the Boston Symphony series is being shown, it is said, and its concerts are being anticipated among the highlights of the local musical season. All three of them will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

Exhibition in Symphony Hall

The doors of Symphony Hall will be opened tomorrow (Thursday) to all visitors who may wish to see the Koussevitzky exhibition. This collection has been arranged in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 10th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It contains portraits, sketches, caricatures, and photographs of the conductor made at various times in his life. There are two busts—one of which was made by Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the conductor's wife. In cases there are shown manuscript scores which have been dedicated to him and to the orchestra, and also many personal mementoes.

This is the last week of the exhibition which has been on view to the audiences of the Symphony concerts.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

Markevitch Deferred

THE ANNOUNCED NOVELTIES o' the week for the Symphony Concerts were Gabriel Pierné's "Divertissements sur un Thème pastoral" Opu 49; the Introduction and First Hymı from Igor Markevitch's "Three Hymns." Markevitch scored his pieces for an orchestra with woodwinds in threes, brasse: in pairs, liberal percussion, piano, an only a very few desks from each divisio of strings. He wrote, moreover, a musi rich and full in texture. The result a the first rehearsal was clear proof o the inadequacy of the string section. Wit only enough parts copied to meet the composer's requirements, the performance o the Hymn was necessarily postponed unt such later time as a sufficient number o parts can be provided. Handel's Concerto Grosso for Strings, No. 5 in D, is substituted on the program; Pierné's piece remains the only novelty of the week.

Alive Again

The present betterment of the program-books at the Symphony Concerts unde the new editorship of Mr. J. N. Burk continues. It has been long and much needed, it they were to regain their former interest and standing. Last week, for the first time within easy recollection, a new piece from a living and modernist hand — Honegger's Third Symphonic Movement—received adequate and illuminating introduction to Boston hearers. A number from "the standard repertory" — Mozart's Piano-Concerto in E-flat heard for the first times at these concerts—was also treated freshly and informingl , with no digressions into tedious archæology or dry-as-dust detail. In the re-shuffling of the notes about standard pieces, inherited from a previous editorship, the chosen pages are livelier and more engaging. At last the program-book is emerging from tired routine into life and interest again.

New: From Pierné

Now that the performance of Markevitch's "Hymn" is postponed, only one new piece remains on the program for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday—the "Divertissements" on a pastoral theme by Gabriel Pierné, long the conductor of the Colonne Concerts in Paris, composer also, now living in semi-retirement. It is dedicated—writes A. H. M.—"To my dear friends and co-workers, the artists of the Colonne Orchestra." It was composed in the summer of 1931; was first heard in a Colonne Concert on Feb. 7, 1932. In a short note on the fly-leaf of the score the composer quotes Hans von Bülow to the effect that "the title does not have much more importance than the titles of most books considered in relation to the contents of those books." He further says that the piece is not a "divertissement" in the choreographic sense of the word, but rather in that of musical development. He forgets that eighteenth-century composers set the same title—"Divertimento" —to similar pieces and that the younger modernists have occasionally repeated it.

The theme is simplicity itself. It is of true pastoral character, eight measures long, in 6-8 meter. It is sung at once by the English horn unaccompanied. It then receives treatment in eleven different ways: some of them variations, others more in the nature of free developments. The first two are variations in which strings accompany the melody, first heard in the basses, next in first violins. A canonic stretto follows in which the notes of the theme are unaltered except that the rhythm is that of continuous sixteenth notes, 2-4. Then follow four variations in which the theme in its original form is taken successively by bassoons, horns, trombone quartet, strings. A Viennese waltz on the theme comes next. The theme is again transformed to accommodate the rhythm of the succeeding Blues. A section marked by the composer "Phrase," for saxophone solo, leads into the final variant, which Pierné labels "En forme de Gigue."

Incidents and Prospects

The exhibition of Koussevitzkiana at Symphony Hall, to mark the tenth year of the conductor in Boston, will close after the Symphony Concert of Saturday. Today it is open to all comers.

Past conductors of the Symphony Concerts persist long in Germany. Max Fiedler, who directed the Boston Orchestra from 1908 through 1912 and then worked for years at Essen, is announced in Berlin for a "Brahms Evening" with the Philharmonic Orchestra. Here he was no young man.

---

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance at the Lyric November 14 will mark the return of this famous organization for a regular series of concerts after a long period. Like the Philadelphia and the National Symphony orchestras, the Boston will appear here under the auspices of the Associated Concert Clubs, and all are booked by the T. Arthur Smith Bureau.

All three of the Boston Orchestra concerts — the others being January 31 and April 3—will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky.

E, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1933

MUSIC

BRAHMS' Sonata in D minor, Opus 108; Mozart's Sonata in E flat major and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata are announced as the program for the recital to be given by Albert Spalding, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, at Cadoa Hall, on the evening of Sunday, November 19. This will be the second recital of the Chamber Music Guild's series.

STRAUSS' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening at 8.30. These works are in addition to Sibelius' Second Symphony and Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, previously announced. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

A WORK which is seldom heard because in its fullest form it requires that an orchestra provide two soloists, is to feature the program of the Hilger Trio at Cadoa Hall on November 29, it is announced. The work is Brahms' double concerto for violin and cello, and is to be played in Brahms' own arrangement substituting piano for orchestra.

Written especially for the virtuosi, Joseph Joachim and Robert Hausmann, Brahms' friends, the concerto makes unusual demands on both violinist and cellist and at the same time provides each with the opportunities

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony Here Monday

In one of the finest symphonic programs ever arranged for New Haven, the Boston Symphony orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians comes here Monday for their initial appearance of the season, the event marking the season's second offering of the Woolsey Hall concert series. The concert will commence at 8:30, and as usual Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed Russian leader of the organization, will conduct.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will occupy the feature section of the program. This is one of the finest compositions of the great living Finnish composer, and the fact that it is to be performed here has caused widespread favorable comment. The balance of the program however, is likewise of fine type, including as it does Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina," and Richard Strauss' melodious "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The third event of the series, scheduled for December 13th, will be the recital by Lawrence Tibbett, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MONDAY

In one of the finest symphonic programs ever arranged for New Haven, the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians comes here Monday for their initial appearance of the season, the event marking the season's second offering of the Woolsey Hall concert series. The concert will commence at 8:30 and as usual Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed Russian leader of the organization, will conduct.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will acupy the feature section of the program. This is one of the finest compositions of the great living Finnish composer, and the fact that it is to be performed here has caused widespread favorable comment. The balance of the program however, is likewise of fine type, including as it does Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra; Moussorgsky's prelude to the opera, "Khovanstchina," and Richard Strauss' melodious "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

NOV 10 1933

MU

BRAHMS' Sonata in D minor, Opus 108; Mozart's Sonata in E flat major and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata are announced as the program for the recital to be given by Albert Spalding, violinist, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, at Cadoa Hall, on the evening of Sunday, November 19. This will be the second recital of the Chamber Music Guild's series.

STRAUSS' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," and the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," are to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening at 8.30. These works are in addition to Sibelius' Second Symphony and Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, previously announced. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 11 1933

Boston Orchestra to Play 'Eroica' Wednesday

THE one week day concert next week, and a daytime program, is that by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Constitution Hall, Wednesday at 4:40 p. m.

Koussevitzky

As usual, Serge Koussevitzky, the dignified, but dynamic Russian, will conduct. Favorite among visiting conductors for many people, Koussevitzky will present two favorite orchestra compositions, pieces we are not likely to hear otherwise this season. They are Beethoven's Third Symphony (Eroica) and Strauss' "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks."

As different as night and day, they are next to each other on the program. The majesty of the Beethoven will follow the gayness and the subtle sorrow of the Strauss. A highly interesting arrangement.

The first part of the program appears merely introductory—Pierne's "Divertissements" and the prelude to Moussorsky's "Khovantchina," the latter a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow.

other musical event in a long time.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citize

NOV 11 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE FRIDAY

First in Series of Five Concerts at Academy of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's forty-seventh season in Brooklyn will be inaugurated on Friday evening, with the first in a series of five concerts to be held at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, at 8:15 o'clock. As the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season, the inaugural concert which marks Dr. Koussevitzky's tenth consecutive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assumes added importance and an attendance exceeding that of any previous season is expected.

The program for the concert to be held Friday evening is as follows:

Pierne—Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Opus 49.
Mussorgsky — Prelude to the Opera "Chovantchina".
Strauss — "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Franks," after the old-fashioned roguish manner—in Rondo form, Opus 28.
Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and an enlarged Brooklyn committee, who ares ponsoring the current series, have scheduled the four succeeding Friday evening concerts on Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2, and April 6.

59

MUSIC

Globe Nov 11

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program for this week's Symphony concerts is not, as Nanki-Poo said of his vocal repertory, a thing of ballad snatches, but it is made up of three short pieces and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero's Life." Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major, No. 5, began the concert, taking the place of Igor Markevitch's new "Introduction and Hymn" which has been put aside for more rehearsal. Vaughan Williams' superb First Norfolk Rhapsody and Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" followed.

Williams' rhapsody had not been played by the Boston Symphony since 1926. Based on thematic material drawn from archaic English songs that Williams found in Norfolk, rhapsody is somewhat in the m of his "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," but considerably briefer and more varied in expression. Like most of Williams' music the harmonic and melodic treatment is modal, though nominally set in the key of E minor. None of the songs that Williams used has to do with nature—that is, except human nature, yet listening to this type of music one invariably thinks of the serenity and friendliness of a gentle countryside. Has any other composer of modern times recaptured so perfectly these aspects of the out-of-doors? Some may justifiably contend that Williams' music is a little cloying and lacks variety (as all modally treated music necessarily must); no one can deny the aptness of the composer's style to what he has to say, nor charge him with lack of consistent good taste.

M Pierne's Divertissements were composed a little more than two years ago and dedicated to the members of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, which he conducted for many years. The pieces were first played in that city in February, 1932. The composer himself evidently does not take his music too seriously; that is clear by a jocular statement, originally uttered by Hans von Buelow, that Pierne wrote on the score: "The theme has no more importance than the title of a book in relation to its contents." This theme is conscientiously stated at once by the English horn and worked over pleasingly and with obvious skill in orchestral technique in nine free variations, including one with saxophone solo.

Only a pedant would remark disparagingly upon the quiet tenor and the absence of emotional flights of music that is not intended to be pretentious. It is enough that M Pierne's score is agreeable. One of his variations is a "cortege blues" with muted trumpets taking the theme. The composer, alas, like so many Europeans, has not been successful in writing jazz. That, it would seem, is a distinctly American achievement. Both the music and the performance of the "blues" came as near to real jazz as does sound red Burgundy to synthetic gin.

Dr Koussevitzky performed Strauss' tone poem so marvelously, with overwhelming power and corruscating orchestral tone, that one inwardly sighed over the uneven merit of the score itself, its lapse into sheer childishness in the "battle" section. The rest of the work, despite its naive program, is fresh and persuasive, conceived before he had become "a clever man who once was a genius"—as Ernest Newman remarked in regard to another of Strauss' compositions—and written down by one of the greatest masters of instrumentation who ever lived.

The orchestra goes to New York this coming week. Richard Burgin will conduct at the next concerts, on Nov 24 and 25, Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain"; Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto, with Toscha Seidel as soloist, and Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony.

C. W. D.

Post

AY, NOVEMBER 11,

SYMPHONY PRESENTS A NOVELTY

Pierne's "Diversion" Pleases—Strauss for Sonority

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5, in D major, replacing the announced piece by the youthful Markevitch, the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon offered finally but one novelty, Gabriel Pierne's recent Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme.

STRAUSS FOR WINDUP

Dr. Koussevitzky is prone to plan his programme in terms of sonorous ascent and climax. Yesterday Handel provided only strings. Vaughan Williams, whose first Norfolk Rhapsody followed, wrote, to be sure, for the normal orchestra, but with sobriety and restraint. Before he was done Pierne, though discreet at the outset, became conventionally effulgent; but only Strauss, whose "Ein Heldenleben" brought the end, filled the listening ear to the full.

As a rule Dr. Koussevitzky's novelties are of the modernist sort that disturb the timid. Seldom are they as discreetly agreeable as these diversions by the eminent Parisian conductor and composer. So little was there that proved arresting in this amiably ingenious work that its presence on the programme may in all likelihood have been a gesture of friendship. With its grateful and effective scoring Pierne's piece is the sort of thing that the Symphony Orchestra tosses off with an easy virtuosity. A particular word may be said for Mr. Tapley's suave playing of the solo for saxophone.

Williams' Work Pleasing

There is more meat by far in the Englishman's Rhapsody, written some years before his "Pastoral" Symphony, but similarly fraught with the haunting sadness of modal folksong. In the Rhapsody the melodies are traditional; in the Symphony their melodic idiom and the harmonies appropriate to them have become the composer's natural speech. The hearing of either may be counted one of the rarer pleasures of the concert hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky's versatility as interpreter was yesterday impressively in evidence. Handel and Vaughan Williams came in characteristic voice, Pierne was played with the right degree of seriousness and the true Strauss sounded forth from the pages of "A Hero's Life." Not so fine or so well sustained a work as its immediate predecessor, "Don-Quixote," or the "Symphonia Domestica" which followed it, "Ein Heldenleben" nevertheless gives us glimpses of Strauss at his noblest.

Is "Good Show"

And however much we may deplore some of its too naive literalism, the piece as a whole provides what in another field would be called "a good show."

Yesterday's audience appeared to be hearing it with the attention that bespeaks not effort, but absorption.

Democrat & Leader

Opening its Carnegie Hall season in New York on Nov. 16 and 17 the Boston Symphony orchestra will introduce at its Thursday evening concert Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces" after a story by Poe, together with Ravel's "Tobeau de Couperin" and Sibileus Second Symphony. At the first Saturday matinee Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Markevitch's "Introduction and Hymn," new to America last week in Boston, to which he will add Pierne's "Divertisements on a Pastorale Theme", Vaughn's first "Norfolk Rhapsody and Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben".

Nov 11

E BOSTON HERALD, SATU

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE McMANUS

Program—Handel, Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major for string orchestra; Vaughn Williams, Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1; Pierne, Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, op. 49; Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben, Tone Poem, op. 40.

The original plan for the fifth pair of regular concerts of the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, included two new works by Igor Markevitch, whose "Rebus, an Imaginary Ballet," was given here toward the end of last season. Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 5 (edited by G. F. Kogel), took the place of the Markevitch pieces, to the delight of a large part of the audience. There were many last season who felt that a precocious handling of rhythms and of textural difficulties were not in themselves enough to sustain interest in the Markevitch piece, or even to create a desire to hear more works by the same composer. There were a great many more yesterday who were glad to hear the Handel, instead, because experience has taught them to expect some of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest moments whenever he conducts Handel. And they were not disappointed.

The underlying principle of concerto style is that of unequal vocal or instrumental forces brought into opposition. Yesterday's example was that of two solo violins and a cello in contrast to the entire string section. The esthetic features themselves are found in as simple forms as the arias of Alessandro Scarlatti, which Handel afterwards used as a model. In yesterday's concert—which will be repeated tonight—the solo parts were played by Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti.

Altogether, this fifth program gave considerable scope for solo playing to various members of the orchestra. They all appeared to admirable advantage and gave new cause for appreciation of the Boston Symphony. We cannot name individually all those who thus stood out, but it is only just to mention Mr. Burgin for his playing of the long and difficult solo in the "Heldenleben."

Vaughn Williams has given us in his Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1 a work of atmospheric beauty and vital imagination. The folk tunes he uses are matters of inspiration to this very English composer and his model treatment of his substances clothes them appropriately, yet he brings forth a composition thoroughly original.

The rhapsody was played with a deep and sympathetic understanding of its meaning.

And what truly diverting music the Pierne piece proved to be! This unpretentious music reflects, in its modest dimensions, a varied picture of much charm. It unfolds with the greatest ease and reveals a keen and delicate sense of humor, coupled with moments of more serious penetration, and a facile mastery of the orchestra which never descends to the level of mere technical exploitation. All these qualities were heightened by a performance of beautiful proportions.

There is nothing new to be said about the Strauss "Heldenleben." Those whom it enthuses are still its ardent admirers, though we sometimes are forced to wonder if they are without their doubtful moments. When Strauss would be most impressive he is often least spontaneous. Perhaps if we did not know such works as his "Till Eulenspiegel," or his "Don Juan," this very extended "Hero's Life" mighthold more interest. It can scarcely be said of the composer, in this work, what was said of Handel: "He achieves the most sublime effects with the simplest means." But to belittle is easy. The work is that of a master.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra were enthusiastically applauded throughout the concert and, despite the great length of the Strauss, a great many of the audience stayed to recall the conductor time and again.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 1 3 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

The music season hits its full stride this week, with the Boston Symphony, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's baton, making its seasonal bow at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, and playing again Saturday afternoon, and the Philadelphia Orchestra making its second visit of the season to the big auditorium tomorrow evening...The Schola Cantorum lets it be known that its annual Midwinter series of musicals will be given this year on the afternoons of December 5, 14 and 27, and January 4, 16 and 20. The artists will be Julia Nessy, Monte Carlo Ballet Russe, Kroll Sextet, Jascha Heifetz, Walter Gieseking and Hugh Ross.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 1 2 1933

Boston Symphony Concert

Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen will be the hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday. Sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season.

Members of the sponsoring committee who are on the reception committee for the opening concert includes Mrs. Frank L. Babbott Jr., Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle Jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, David H. Lanman, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Van Sinderen, Porter Steele, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Walter F. Wells and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Boxholders for the series of five concerts, which mark the 47th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, includes Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. M. C. Draper, Robert Alfred Shaw, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes, the Brooklyn Junior League, the Adelphi Alumni Association and the sponsoring committee.

A feature of the opening concert will be the tenth anniversary Koussevitsky exhibition, which was shown in Boston at the opening of the current season and which was sent from Boston for the Brooklyn opening. The exhibition, which will be on view in the opera house lobby on Friday evening, consists of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Koussevitsky in various moods as well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitsky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, has held this post the longest consecutive period in its history.

Included in the exhibit is a portrait by the famous Russian painter, K. P. Vodkin, an oil portrait made last Summer by Theodore Stravinsky, the son of the composer; a pastel showing Koussevitsky conducting the first performances of Scriabin's "Prometheus," with the composer at the piano; a bronze head recently made by Mme. Koussevitsky, his wife, and a granite bust made by the sculptor, Gurdjan, in 1912.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Citizen

Boston Symphony Boxholders Listed for Local Series; Season Begins Friday

Mrs. Richarrson Pratt will be the hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening. Sponsored by the Broolyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season.

Members of the sponsoring committee who are on the reception committee for the opening concert include: Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, Jr., Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Mrs. George F. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, Jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, David H. Lanman, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Porter Steele, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Walter F. Wells and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Boxholders for the series of five concerts which mark the forty-seventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, include: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Robert Alfred Shaw, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon and Phyllis Barnes, the Brooklyn Junior League, the Adelphi Alumni Association and the Sponsoring Committee.

A feature of the opening concert will be the tenth anniversary Kousevitsky exhibition which was shown in Boston at the opening of the current season and which was sent from Boston for the Brooklyn opening. The exhibition which will be on view in the Opera House lobby Friday evening consists of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Kousevitsky in various moods, as well as photographs sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitsky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924 has held this post the longest consecutive period in its history as successor to such noted leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

Included in the exhibit is a portrait by the famous Russian painter K. P. Vodkin; an oil portrait made last Summer by Theodore Stravinsky, the son of the composer, a pastel showing Dr. Koussevitsky conducting the first performance of Scriabin's "Prometheus," with the composer at the piano; a bronze head recently made by Mme. Koussevitsky, his wife; and a granite bust made by the sculptor, Gurdjan, in 1912.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 1 2 1933

Philip Hale, Boston Dean Of Music Critics, Retires

Also Gives Up Writing Program Notes for Orchestra

Philip Hale, dean of Boston's music critics, has resigned as critic for "The Boston Herald" and as program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is announced in the "Musical America" issue which went on sale yesterday. Mr. Hale, who will be eighty years old in March, has been writing for Boston newspapers since 1890 and for the "Herald" since 1903. He began to write his program notes for the Boston orchestra in 1901.

Mr. Hale has long been one of America's most famed music critics and scholars. His notes have become an invaluable library of information on orchestral literature and composers. His criticisms, while consistently devoted to the great masterpieces, have always been receptive to new works.

Mr. Hale's successor on the "Herald" is George S. MacManus, pianist and teacher.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

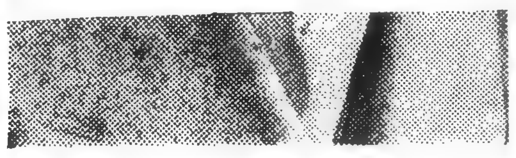
V 1 2 1933

Appearing in Carnegie Hall and

ORCHESTRAS

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-third season and its tenth under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will give its first New York concerts of the season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Thursday program, including Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Nicolai Tcherepnin's Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe, and Sibelius's second symphony, was announced last week, but Mr. Koussevitzky, following an old conductorial custom, has changed his Saturday program, omitting a Russian novelty, Igor Markevitch's Introduction and Hymn, and closing with Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The first half of the revised Saturday program includes Handel's fifth concerto grosso, as edited by G. F. Kogel; Vaughan William's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Gabriel Pierne's Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 60. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be the principal number in the Brooklyn program. Tcherpnin's work, inspired by Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death" was first performed in Boston on October 13-14.



Garo photo

Left to right: Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Sympho Thursday night; Jose Iturbi, who gives a piano ~~recital tomorrow~~ Damrosch, conducting the first concert of the Musicians Emerge

---

Brooklyn Times Union

NOV 1 2 1933

Boston Symphony Concert at Academy of Music, Friday

Mrs. Richardson Pratt will be the hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening. Sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season.

Members of the sponsoring committee who are on the reception committee for the opening concert include: Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, jr., Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, David H. Lanman, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Porter Steele, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Boxholders for the series of five concerts which mark the 47th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the 10th anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, include: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Robert Alfred Shaw, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon, and Phyllis Barnes, the Brooklyn Junior League, the Adelphi Alumni Association, and the sponsoring committee.

A feature of the opening concert will be the tenth anniversary Koussevitsky exhibition which was shown in Boston at the opening of the current season and which was sent from Boston for the Brooklyn opening. The exhibition, which will be on view in the Opera House lobby on Friday evening, consists of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Koussevitsky in various moods, as well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitsky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924 has held this post, the longest consecutive period in its history as a successor to such famed leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

Included in the exhibit is a portrait by the famous Russian painter, K. P. Vodkin; an oil portrait made last summer by Theodore Stravinsky, the son of the composer, a pastel showing Koussevitsky conducting the first performances of Scriabin's "Prometheus," with the composer at the piano; a bronze head recently made by Mme. Koussevitsky, his wife, and a granite bust made by the sculptor, Gurdjan, in 1912.

Conducts Here

Sergei Koussevitzky (above) will conduct his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert at Lyric tomorrow night.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

1 2 1933

Dupre Will Give Recital At Peabody

By CARROLL DULANEY.

The feature of the opening concert of its series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening will be the performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

The remainder of the program will be as follows:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik...Mozart
Serenade for Strings.
Prelude to "Khovantchina,"
Moussorgsky
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
Richard Strauss

The last two years have seen a notable awakening of interest in Sibelius. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been heard with increasing frequency.

Sibelius Movement

In this country the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has led the Sibelius movement. All seven of the Symphonies of Sibelius were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony created a profound impression. It will open the orchestra's New York season.

It is said that in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but touched with fear of a brutal rule. The third, in the nature of a scherzo, portrays the awakening of national spirit. In the Finale there is a song of hope in anticipation of a coming deliverer.

Someone has pointed out, however, that Sibelius was an individualist, and that the work may be more personal than racial. In either event, it is described as a work of soaring melody and great emotional power.

ON MUSI

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Lyric Tuesday evening to open its local season.

WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

1933

Symphony In Lyric Recital Tomorrow

Besides the rarely performed Sibelius Symphony No. 2 by Jan Sibelius, the program to be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the first of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony's three concerts of the season at the Lyric tomorrow night includes Mozart's little serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

During the last few years there has been a marked arousing of interest in the works of Sibelius, notably his Second Symphony. A Sibelius society was formed in England last summer to sponsor performances of his works and phonographic recordings of it.

In America, the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, for Koussevitsky has long been noted for his sympathetic interpretations and gave all seven of his symphonies in Boston last season in chronological order.

The Second Symphony created a profound impression when the orchestra presented it in Chicago last month.

It has been some time since Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" has been given here, and the Mozart and Moussorgsky compositions are so little familiar that they classify almost as novelties.

BALTMORE, MD.
SUN

NO 1933

Koussevitzky To Conduct At The Lyric

Feature Of Program Will Be Second Symphony Of Sibelius, Seldom Heard Locally

Compositions By Mozart And Moussorgsky And Humorous Tone Poem By Strauss Included

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at the Lyric on Tuesday evening for its first Baltimore concert of the season. A feature of the program will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which has been one of the outstanding successes of this organization—but is little known locally.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

REVIVAL OF SIBELIUS

There has been a revival of interest in Sibelius in the past two years throughout the musical world. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been played with increasing frequency in many cities. A Sibelius Society has been formed in England to sponsor the performance and the phonographic recording of his works.

In America the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, and all of the seven symphonies were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony in D major created a profound impression when it was performed in Chicago last month by Boston's orchestra. It will also open the same orchestra's New York season following the Baltimore concert.

REFLECTS FINNISH BEAUTY

Sibelius has long lived a life of seclusion in his native country. His music is considered to reflect the natural beauties of the Finnish landscape. When George Schneevoight, a friend and countryman of Sibelius, conducted the Second Symphony in Boston, he said that "in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul.

"The third, in the nature of a scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feelings, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the finale hope enters their breasts and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer."

It should be borne in mind, however, that Sibelius is an intense individualist and that perhaps even this work is more personal than racial in quality. It is music of soaring melody and emotional power.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Eugene Ormandy, one of the prominent orchestral directors before the public, will make his Baltimore debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the second concert of its current group of four at the Lyric the night of November 22.

He will present a program headed by Brahms' Symphony No. 1 and including works by Debussy, Ravel and Enesco.

BALTIMORE SYMPHONY

The opening number of the concert given by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra under the direction of George Siemonn at the Lyric on December 3 will be the Glazounow arrangement of Alexandre Borodine's "Unfinished Symphony."

This composition was brought by Director Siemonn from Paris. Borodine had written down two movements of the work at the time of his sudden and rather dramatic death. (He fell dead during a carnival party at his St. Petersburg house in 1887.) From the fragments of the two movements the score was arranged and orchestrated by Borodine's fellow-countryman, the composer Glazounow. It is in two movements, a moderato assai and a vivo. Glazounow also rewrote from memory the Overture to Borodine's opera, "Prince Igor."

The soloist for this concert will be the English-born soprano, Grete Stueckgold, Wagnerian prima donna with the Metropolitan Opera Company. It is expected that Mme. Stueckgold will sing arias identified with her opera roles as her contribution to the Baltimore Symphony concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

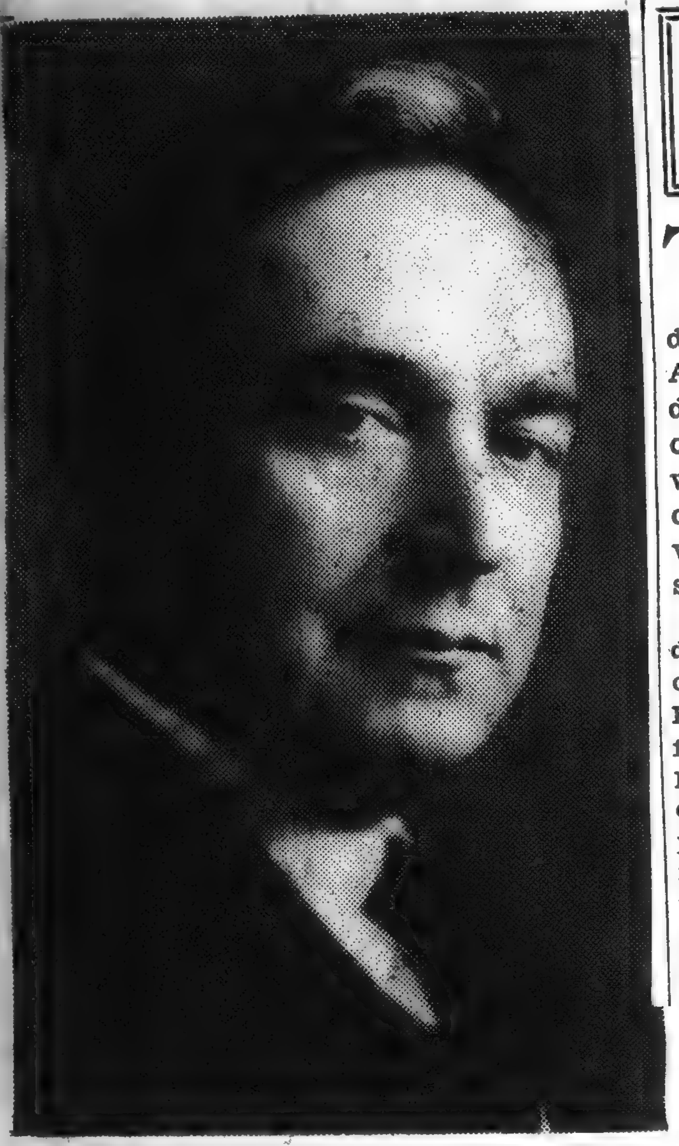
N. Y. Herald-Tribune

60

NOV 12 1933

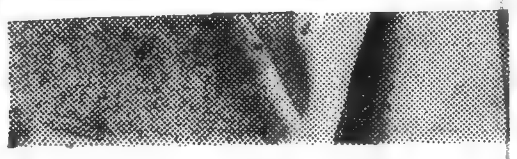
Appearing in Carnegie Hall and

ORCHESTRAS



THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its fifty-third season and its tenth under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, will give its first New York concerts of the season next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall and Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Thursday program, including Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Nicolai Tcherepnin's Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe, and Sibelius's second symphony, was announced last week, but Mr. Koussevitzky, following an old conductorial custom, has changed his Saturday program, omitting a Russian novelty, Igor Markevitch's Introduction and Hymn, and closing with Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony.

The first half of the revised Saturday program includes Handel's fifth concerto grosso, as edited by G. F. Kogel; Vaughan William's first Norfolk Rhapsody and Gabriel Pierne's Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 60. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony will be the principal number in the Brooklyn program. Tcherpnin's work, inspired by Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death" was first performed in Boston on October 13-14.



Garo photo

Left to right: Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Sympho
Thursday night; Jose Iturbi, who gives a piano re~~cital tomorrow~~
Damrosch, conducting the first concert of the Musicians Emerge

---

Conducts Here

Sergei Koussevitzky (above) will conduct his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert at Lyric tomorrow night.

Brooklyn Times Union

NOV 12 1933

Boston Symphony Concert at Academy of Music, Friday

Mrs. Richardson Pratt will be the hostess in the committee box at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening. Sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only major orchestra to make its appearance in Brooklyn this season.

Members of the sponsoring committee who are on the reception committee for the opening concert include: Mrs. Frank L. Babbott, jr., Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, David H. Lanman, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Porter Steele, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, and Surrogate George Albert Wingate.

Boxholders for the series of five concerts which mark the 47th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the 10th anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, include: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Robert Alfred Shaw, the Misses Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Arrietta Smith, Althea McCammon, and Phyllis Barnes, the Brooklyn Junior League, the Adelphi Alumni Association, and the sponsoring committee.

A feature of the opening concert will be the tenth anniversary Koussevitsky exhibition which was shown in Boston at the opening of the current season and which was sent from Boston for the Brooklyn opening. The exhibition, which will be on view in the Opera House lobby on Friday evening, consists of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Koussevitsky in various moods, as well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitsky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924 has held this post, the longest consecutive period in its history as a successor to such famed leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Fiedler, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

Included in the exhibit is a portrait by the famous Russian painter, K. P. Vodkin; an oil portrait made last summer by Theodore Stravinsky, the son of the composer, a pastel showing Koussevitsky conducting the first performances of Scriabin's "Prometheus," with the composer at the piano; a bronze head recently made by Mme. Koussevitsky, his wife, and a granite bust made by the sculptor, Gurdjan, in 1912.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

V 12 1933

Dupre Will Give Recital At Peabody

By CARROLL DULANEY.

The feature of the opening concert of its series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Tuesday evening will be the performance of the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

The remainder of the program will be as follows:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik...Mozart
Serenade for Strings.
Prelude to "Khovantchina,"
Moussorgsky
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks,
Richard Strauss

The last two years have seen a notable awakening of interest in Sibelius. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been heard with increasing frequency.

Sibelius Movement

In this country the Boston Orchestra, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has led the Sibelius movement. All seven of the Symphonies of Sibelius were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony created a profound impression. It will open the orchestra's New York season.

It is said that in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but touched with fear of a brutal rule. The third, in the nature of a scherzo, portrays the awakening of national spirit. In the Finale there is a song of hope in anticipation of a coming deliverer.

Someone has pointed out, however, that Sibelius was an individualist, and that the work may be more personal than racial. In either event, it is described as a work of soaring melody and great emotional power.

ON MUSI

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give at the Lyric Tuesday evening to open its local season.

---

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

OV 13 1933

Symphony In Lyric Recital Tomorrow

Besides the rarely performed Sibelius Symphony No. 2 by Jan Sibelius, the program to be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the first of the ~~Boston~~ Symphony's three concerts of the season at the Lyric tomorrow night includes Mozart's little serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" and Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

During the last few years there has been a marked arousing of interest in the works of Sibelius, notably his Second Symphony. A Sibelius society was formed in England last summer to sponsor performances of his works and phonographic recordings of it.

In America, the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, for Koussevitsky has long been noted for his sympathetic interpretations and gave all seven of his symphonies in Boston last season in chronological order.

The Second Symphony created a profound impression when the orchestra presented it in Chicago last month.

It has been some time since Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" has been given here, and the Mozart and Moussorgsky compositions are so little familiar that they classify almost as novelties.

BALTMORE, MD.
SUN

NOV 12 1933

Koussevitzky To Conduct At The Lyric

Feature Of Program Will Be Second Symphony Of Sibelius, Seldom Heard Locally

Compositions By Mozart And Moussorgsky And Humorous Tone Poem By Strauss Included

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at the Lyric on Tuesday evening for its first Baltimore concert of the season. A feature of the program will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius, which has been one of the outstanding successes of this organization—but is little known locally.

Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Mozart's Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

REVIVAL OF SIBELIUS

There has been a revival of interest in Sibelius in the past two years throughout the musical world. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been played with increasing frequency in many cities. A Sibelius Society has been formed in England to sponsor the performance and the phonographic recording of his works.

In America the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, and all of the seven symphonies were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony in D major created a profound impression when it was performed in Chicago last month by Boston's orchestra. It will also open the same orchestra's New York season following the Baltimore concert.

REFLECTS FINNISH BEAUTY

Sibelius has long lived a life of seclusion in his native country. His music is considered to reflect the natural beauties of the Finnish landscape. When George Schneevoight, a friend and countryman of Sibelius, conducted the Second Symphony in Boston, he said that "in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul.

"The third, in the nature of a scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feelings, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the finale hope enters their breasts and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer."

It should be borne in mind, however, that Sibelius is an intense individualist and that perhaps even this work is more personal than racial in quality. It is music of soaring melody and emotional power.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

Eugene Ormandy, one of the prominent orchestral directors before the public, will make his Baltimore debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the second concert of its current group of four at the Lyric the night of November 22.

He will present a program headed by Brahms' Symphony No. 1 and including works by Debussy, Ravel and Enesco.

BALTIMORE SYMPHONY

The opening number of the concert given by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra under the direction of George Siemonn at the Lyric on December 3 will be the Glazounow arrangement of Alexandre Borodine's "Unfinished Symphony."

This composition was brought by Director Siemonn from Paris. Borodine had written down two movements of the work at the time of his sudden and rather dramatic death. (He fell dead during a carnival party at his St. Petersburg house in 1887.) From the fragments of the two movements the score was arranged and orchestrated by Borodine's fellow-countryman, the composer Glazounow. It is in two movements, a moderato assai and a vivo. Glazounow also rewrote from memory the Overture to Borodine's opera, "Prince Igor."

The soloist for this concert will be the English-born soprano, Grete Stueckgold, Wagnerian prima donna with the Metropolitan Opera Company. It is expected that Mme. Stueckgold will sing arias identified with her opera roles as her contribution to the Baltimore Symphony concert.

61

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 2 1933

Conductor, Organist and Sin ger in Week's Music Events

We Syr

B Church Tuesday. Center: Eugene Stevens, bass, a newcomer to the Estelle t auditorium Tuesday. Right: Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston on at Constitution Hall.

BEETHOVEN'S "Eroica" symphony will be a feature of the program to be presented here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its three visits to Washington, for a concert in Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon at 4:40.

All music lovers remember the Beethoven festival given by Koussevitzky and his celebrated orchestra in its fiftieth anniversary season three years ago, of which the "Eroica" symphony was an outstanding success. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the platonic idealist, saw the liberator of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rulers. When the composer, on completing his score, learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and becoming still another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained no less noble for having been inspired by a beneficent military leader who did not exist. The slow movement is the greatest funeral march ever conceived, and the finale, an exultant torrent of rhythm and melody. When Schindler, Beethoven's friend, asked the composer in the course of conversation for his favorite among the nine symphonies. Beethoven mentioned the "Eroica."

A novelty of interest on this program is divertisements on a pastora theme, by Gabriel Pierne, which is to have its first American hearing in Boston this week. The French composer aims in this music frankly to entertain in a series of variations, one of which he calls "Cortege Blues."

The program will also include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," which is in effect a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. It is a rare gem by the celebrated composer of Boris Godounov. Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the program.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 1 2 1933

Koussevitzky's First Program Here on Nov. 15

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be a feature of the program to be presented here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its three visits to Washington, for a concert in Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon, November 15, at 4:40.

All music lovers remember the Beethoven Festival given by Koussevitzky and his celebrated orchestra in its fiftieth anniversary season three years ago, of which the "Eroica" Symphony was an outstanding success. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the platonic idealist, saw the liberator of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rulers.

When the composer, on completing his score, learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and becoming still another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained no less noble for having been inspired by a beneficent military leader who did not exist. The slow movement is the greatest funeral march ever conceived, and the finale an exultant torrent of rhythm and melody.

When Schindler, Beethoven's friend, asked the composer in the course of conversation for his favorits among the nine symphonies, Beethoven mentioned the "Eroica."

A novelty of interest on the program is "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme," by Gabriel Pierne, which is to have its first American hearing in Boston this week. The French composer aims in this music frankly to entertain in a series of variations, one of which he calls "Cortege Blues."

The program will also include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanchina," which is, in effect, a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. It is a rare gem by the celebrated composer of "Boris Godounov." Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the program.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 1 2 1933

Sibelus' Second Symphony Feature At Woolsey Hall

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Jan Sibelius, the composer of Finland, has made known to the world through his wonderful music, the spirit, the temperament and the innate poetry of his race. This Second Symphony particularly which is to be performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, has come to be one of the most popular in the symphonic repertory It has the tragic mood of a people driven by their bleak country and cold climate, oppressed by the past alternating domination of Sweden and Russia. But the triumphant finale, an outburst of great emotional power is the expression of a proud people, asserting their independance and freedom. The wonderful out-pouring which their past suffering caused to find expression in music still remains with us. Paul Rosenfeld in his Musical Portraits thus described the composer, his people and his music:

* * *

"Others have brought the North into houses and there transmuted it to music. And their art is dependent on the shelter, and removed from it, dwindles. But Sibelius has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew. And could we but carry it out into the northern day, we would find it undiminished, vivid with all its life. For it is the blood-brother to the wind and the silence, to the lowering cliffs and the sprays, to the harsh crying of sea-birds and the breath of fog, and, set amid them, would wax, and take new strength from the strength of its kin....The orchestral compositions of Sibelius seem to have passed over black torrents and desolate moorland, through pallid sunlight and grim primeval forests, and become drenched with them.

* * *

The instrumentation is all wet grays and blacks, relieved only by bits of brightness wan and elusive as the northern Summer, frostly green as the polar lights. The works are full of gnawing of bassoons and the bleakness of the English horn, full of shattering trombones and screaming violins, full of the sinister rolling of drums, the menacing reverberation of cymbals, the icy glittering of harps. The musical ideas of those of the compositions that are finely realized recall the ruggedness and hardiness and starkness of things that persist in the Finnish Winter. The rhythms seem to approach the wild, unnumbered rhythms of the forest and the wind and the flickering sunlight."

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Handel's Concerto Groese for String Orchestra; the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The concert will commence at 8:30, and will be the second event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

V 1 3 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WOOLSEY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Woolsey Hall tonight under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The concert commences at 8:30 and will mark the second offerihg of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. The coming of this famous organization of one hundred and ten musicians directed by the noted Russian conductor is one of the most important events on the musical schedule for this vicinity.

Sibelius' Second Symphony in D major will be the principal number on the program tonight. One of the finest works of the great Finnish composer, it has been received with wide acclaim. The Boston Symphony played it recently in Chicago and will also open their New York season with the selection.

The first number for tonight will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, and will be followed by Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina." The first half will conclude with Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Following intermission the last half of the program will be taken up by the Sibelius Symphony.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 4 1933

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
ho will conduct the Boston Symphony rchestra tomorrow afternoon in its rst concert of the season at Constituon Hall.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

Many To Attend Boston Symphony

Mrs. Roosevelt heads the list of boxholders for the Boston Symphony Concert tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock at Constitution Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra.

Other boxholders include, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. William H. Wood, Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, jr., Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. William Russell Magna, Miss Mabel T. Boardman, Mr. Frederick A. Keep, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, jr., Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Eliot, Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. James Clement Dunn, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. Alanson B. Houghton, Mrs. Gustave Weckel, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. Keith Merrill, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. C. C. Williams, and Mrs. David Aiken Reed.

* * *

JOU

NOV 13

Boston Symphony To Perform Sibelius Symphony Tonight

An event of great interest to many will be the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, little known hereabouts, which has been one of the outstanding successes of the Orchestra's season to date. This will be the closing number on tonight's program in Woolsey Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra; the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks."

There has been a notable awakening of interest in Sibelius in the past two years throughout the musical world. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been played with increasing frequency in many cities. A Sibelius society has been formed in England to sponsor the performances and the phonographic recording of his works. In America, the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, for Koussevitzky has long had an especial sympathy with this music. All of the seven symphonies were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony in D major created a profound impression when it was performed in Chicago last month by Boston's orchestra. It will also open the same orchestra's New York season.

Sibelius has long lived a life of seclusion in his native country. His music is considered to reflect the natural beauties of the Finnish landscape and in the earlier works such as this symphony, Sibelius' own people find a kinship of national feeling. When George Schneevoight, a friend and countryman of Sibelius, conducted this symphony in Boston he said that "in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns, undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul. The third, in the nature of a Scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the Finale hope enters their breasts and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer." It should be borne in mind, however, that Sibelius is an intense individualist and that perhaps even this work is more personal than racial in quality. It is music of soaring melody and great emotional power.

61

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 2 1933

Conductor, Organist and Singer in Week's Music Events

Washington's Players.

PLAYERS OPEN SEASON.

THE Columbia Players will open their subscription season of five plays next Wednesday, with a presentation of the Frederick Lonsdale comedy, "On Approval." The play will be given at Left: Rollo Maitland, Philadelphia organist, appearing in recital at St. Alba

Wentworth opera group, who will sing in the production of "Pinafore" at the Ro
Symphony Orchestra, giving the first concert of a series of three Wednesday aft

Boston Symphony Concert

BEETHOVEN'S "Eroica" symphony will be a feature of the program to be presented here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its three visits to Washington, for a concert in Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon at 4:40.

All music lovers remember the Beethoven festival given by Koussevitsky and his celebrated orchestra in its fiftieth anniversary season three years ago, of which the "Eroica" symphony was an outstanding success. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the platonic idealist, saw the liberator of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rulers. When the composer, on completing his score, learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and becoming still another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained no less noble for having been inspired by a beneficent military leader who did not exist. The slow movement is the greatest funeral march ever conceived, and the finale, an exultant torrent of rhythm and melody. When Schindler, Beethoven's friend, asked the composer in the course of conversation for his favorite among the nine symphonies. Beethoven mentioned the "Eroica."

A novelty of interest on this program is divertisements on a pastoral theme, by Gabriel Pierne, which is to have its first American hearing in Boston this week. The French composer aims in this music frankly to entertain in a series of variations, one of which he calls "Cortege Blues."

The program will also include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina," which is in effect a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. It is a rare gem by the celebrated composer of Boris Godounov. Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the program.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 4 1933

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY,
who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon in its first concert of the season at Constitution Hall.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

Many To Attend Boston Symphony

Mrs. Roosevelt heads the list of boxholders for the Boston Symphony Concert tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock at Constitution Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra.

Other boxholders include, Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. William H. Wood, Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. Robert Low Bacon, Mrs. Harlan Fiske Stone, Mrs. Eugene Meyer, jr., Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. William Russell Magna, Miss Mabel T. Boardman, Mr. Frederick A. Keep, Mrs. Jacob Leander Loose, Mrs. Hugh C. Wallace, Mrs. Edwin B. Parker, Mrs. Edward C. Walker, Mrs. Bayard Cutting, Mrs. Adolph C. Miller, Mrs. Copley Amory, Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, jr., Mrs. Chester Bolton, Mrs. John C. Breckenridge, Mrs. William Crozier, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mr. and Mrs. Frank M. Eliot, Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, Mrs. Thomas H. C. Reed, Mrs. James Clement Dunn, Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. Alanson B. Houghton, Mrs. Gustave Weckel, Mrs. W. W. Galbraith, Mrs. Henry Leonard, Mrs. Keith Merrill, Mrs. Oscar Jarecki, Mrs. William R. Castle, Mrs. John Ellerton Lodge, Mrs. C. C. Williams, and Mrs. David Aiken Reed.

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

NOV 1 2 1933

Koussevitzky's First Program Here on Nov. 15

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony will be a feature of the program to be presented here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of its three visits to Washington, for a concert in Constitution Hall on Wednesday afternoon, November 15, at 4:40.

All music lovers remember the Beethoven Festival given by Koussevitzky and his celebrated orchestra in its fiftieth anniversary season three years ago, of which the "Eroica" Symphony was an outstanding success. This symphony was inspired by the early exploits of Beethoven's contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte, in whom Beethoven, the platonic idealist, saw the liberator of mankind from the tyranny of oppressive rulers.

When the composer, on completing his score, learned that Napoleon was abusing his power and becoming still another tyrant, he destroyed the dedication in anger, but the great symphony remained no less noble for having been inspired by a beneficent military leader who did not exist. The slow movement is the greatest funeral march ever conceived, and the finale an exultant torrent of rhythm and melody.

When Schindler, Beethoven's friend, asked the composer in the course of conversation for his favorits among the nine symphonies, Beethoven mentioned the "Eroica."

A novelty of interest on the program is "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme," by Gabriel Pierne, which is to have its first American hearing in Boston this week. The French composer aims in this music frankly to entertain in a series of variations, one of which he calls "Cortege Blues."

The program will also include the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanchina," which is, in effect, a miniature tone poem depicting the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. It is a rare gem by the celebrated composer of "Boris Godounov." Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is also upon the program.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

V 1 3 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WOOLSEY TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Woolsey Hall tonight under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The concert commences at 8:30 and will mark the second offerihg of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. The coming of this famous organization of one hundred and ten musicians directed by the noted Russian conductor is one of the most important events on the musical schedule for this vicinity.

Sibelius' Second Symphony in D major will be the principal number on the program tonight. One of the finest works of the great Finnish composer, it has been received with wide acclaim. The Boston Symphony played it recently in Chicago and will also open their New York season with the selection.

The first number for tonight will be Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, and will be followed by Moussorgsky's Prelude to the opera "Khovantchina." The first half will conclude with Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Following intermission the last half of the program will be taken up by the Sibelius Symphony.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 1 2 1933

Sibelius' Second Symphony Feature At Woolsey Hall

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Jan Sibelius, the composer of Finland, has made known to the world through his wonderful music, the spirit, the temperament and the innate poetry of his race. This Second Symphony particularly which is to be performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Woolsey Hall tomorrow evening, has come to be one of the most popular in the symphonic repertory It has the tragic mood of a people driven by their bleak country and cold climate, oppressed by the past alternating domination of Sweden and Russia. But the triumphant finale, an outburst of great emotional power is the expression of a proud people, asserting their independance and freedom. The wonderful out-pouring which their past suffering caused to find expression in music still remains with us. Paul Rosenfeld in his Musical Portraits thus described the composer, his people and his music:

* * *

"Others have brought the North into houses and there transmuted it to music. And their art is dependent on the shelter, and removed from it, dwindles. But Sibelius has written music innocent of roof and inclosure, music proper indeed to the vasty open, the Finnish heaven under which it grew. And could we but carry it out into the northern day, we would find it undiminished, vivid with all its life. For it is the blood-brother to the wind and the silence, to the lowering cliffs and the sprays, to the harsh crying of sea-birds and the breath of fog, and, set amid them, would wax, and take new strength from the strength of its kin....The orchestral compositions of Sibelius seem to have passed over black torrents and desolate moorland, through pallid sunlight and grim primeval forests, and become drenched with them.

* * *

The instrumentation is all wet grays and blacks, relieved only by bits of brightness wan and elusive as the northern Summer, frostly green as the polar lights. The works are full of gnawing of bassoons and the bleakness of the English horn, full of shattering trombones and screaming violins, full of the sinister rolling of drums, the menacing reverberation of cymbals, the icy glittering of harps. The musical ideas of those of the compositions that are finely realized recall the ruggedness and hardiness and starkness of things that persist in the Finnish Winter. The rhythms seem to approach the wild, unnumbered rhythms of the forest and the wind and the flickering sunlight."

* * *

Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Handel's Concerto Groese for String Orchestra; the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The concert will commence at 8:30, and will be the second event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series.

JOU[illegible]

[illegible] 1 3 [illegible]

Boston Symphony To Perform Sibelius Symphony Tonight

An event of great interest to many will be the performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, little known hereabouts, which has been one of the outstanding successes of the Orchestra's season to date. This will be the closing number on tonight's program in Woolsey Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will also present Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra; the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina"; and Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks."

There has been a notable awakening of interest in Sibelius in the past two years throughout the musical world. The symphonies of the Finnish composer and his tone poems have been played with increasing frequency in many cities. A Sibelius society has been formed in England to sponsor the performances and the phonographic recording of his works. In America, the Boston Symphony conductor has in a sense led the Sibelius movement, for Koussevitzky has long had an especial sympathy with this music. All of the seven symphonies were performed in Boston last season in the order of their composition. The Second Symphony in D major created a profound impression when it was performed in Chicago last month by Boston's orchestra. It will also open the same orchestra's New York season.

Sibelius has long lived a life of seclusion in his native country. His music is considered to reflect the natural beauties of the Finnish landscape and in the earlier works such as this symphony, Sibelius' own people find a kinship of national feeling. When George Schneevoight, a friend and countryman of Sibelius, conducted this symphony in Boston he said that "in the first movement is felt the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns, undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul. The third, in the nature of a Scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the Finale hope enters their breasts and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer." It should be borne in mind, however, that Sibelius is an intense individualist and that perhaps even this work is more personal than racial in quality. It is music of soaring melody and great emotional power.

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

52

NOV 1 4 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert at Lyric Tonight

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Two unusual symphonies are scheduled for performance by the Boston Symphony tonight at the first of its three Lyric concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction and by the Baltimore Symphony at its initial appearance of the season Dec. 3.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Second Symphony of the contemporary Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, as the feature of a program headed by another unfamiliar work, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for strings, and further including the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina" and Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Tyll Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Russian Symphony

The work George Siemonn, director of the Baltimore Symphony, has selected as the principal item of his first program is Glazounow's arrangement of Borodine's "Unfinished Symphony." The score was brought to Baltimore by Mr. Siemonn from Paris and has never before been presented here. Borodine fell dead at a party at his home in Leningrad in 1887 and only fragments of this symphony were found among his manuscripts. Like the famous Schubert "Unfinished Symphony," the noncompletion of which has remained a mystery, it has but two movements.

Grete Stueckgold, Wagnerian prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan and other famous opera companies, will be the soloist of the concert.

Ormandy Debut

Eugene Ormandy will make his Baltimore debut as an orchestral conductor with the Philadelphia Orchestra at its second concert of the season at the Lyric Wednesday night next week. The principal number of his program is Brahms' First Symphony; it will be associated with Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Molinari's transcription of Debussy's familiar piano piece "L'Isle Joyeuse" and a Roumanian Rhapsody by Enesco.

At the Peabody

Marcel Dupre, famous French organist, will give this Friday afternoon's recital at the Peabody Conservatory. His program will include an excerpt from a Bach Cantata (No. 29). Adams' Fantaisie, dedicated to the organist, the Schorzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Finale from Poiste's Choral Symphony in D and three of his own works, Fragments from "Stations of the Cross," "Souvenir" and Improvisations upon a submitted theme.

Mr. Goodman to Play

Richard Goodman, Baltimore pianist, will give a recital at the new Rex Theater, 4617 York Road, this Thursday night. Mr. Goodman, who has appeared with much success here and elsewhere since returning from Paris, where he completed his musical education, will play several of the big numbers of his repertoire.

Baltimore Post
Nov 14

R 14, 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert at Lyric Tonight

Serge Koussevitzky Presents Work of Finnish Composer as Feature of Program; Baltimore Symphony Scheduled For Season's Initial Performance Dec. 3

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

Two unusual symphonies are scheduled for performance by the Boston Symphony tonight at the first of its three Lyric concerts under Serge Koussevitzky's direction and by the Baltimore Symphony at its initial appearance of the season Dec. 3.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Second Symphony of the contemporary Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, as the feature of a program headed by another unfamiliar work, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for strings, and further including the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Kovantchina" and Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Tyll Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 5 1933

GIVE CONCERT TODAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, is giving the first of the three concerts scheduled for this Winter this afternoon at 4:40 o'clock in Constitution Hall. After a period of 12 years, in which only one concert a season was possible, Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey has arranged that the Boston organization increase its visits to three. Serge Koussevitsky, who has held the post of conductor of the symphony longer than any other, gained additional fame this Summer by his conducting of the British Broadcasting Orchestra in the London musical festival at Queen's Hall. The program this afternoon is as follows: "Divertissements," by Gabriel Pierne; Moussorgsky's "Prelude to Kovanstchina," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3," the "Eroica." The next appearance of the orchestra will be on Tuesday, January 30.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

5 1933

With Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt occupying the Presidential box, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, this afternoon at 4:40 o'clock, will be heard in a concert which, after a lapse of a dozen years, renews its Washington concert series. During that interval of twelve years, the Boston Symphony has been heard here, from time to time, in single appearances, but not in a series. This afternoon's program will be the first of a series of three presented in Constitution Hall, under the management of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, in deference to a predetermined popular demand.

"Favori

Having pai

E. Sun Nov 15

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert At Lyric, Koussevitzky Conducting

THERE are one or two "virtuoso" conductors who can draw slightly larger audiences than Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra have been playing to at their last few concerts here, but there appears to be none who can outdo him in stirring and pleasing an audience. Thus—along with a handful of standees—there was a scattering of empty seats at the Lyric last night, but Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were given an ovation.

Featuring the program was Sibelius' Second Symphony in D major, a work new to Baltimore and played in response to a number of requests for a symphony by this contemporary Finn, of whom Mr. Koussevitzky is the foremost exponent in this country. It proved to be a work surcharged with emotion and was stirringly performed. The second movement was notable for its dramatic quality and the fourth was a pæan, with climax piled upon climax at the end.

THE concert opened with Mozart's serenade for string orchestra, Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, and this tuneful music was given with a delicacy and airiness that delighted the audience. The orchestra surpassed this in delicacy, however, with the next number, the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina." The prelude represents the coming of dawn and the softness of the effects attained was sometimes almost breathlike.

With Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" Mr. Koussevitzky again demonstrated his understanding of this composer. He filled the piece with humor, obtaining from the orchestra a finish of performance that evoked admiration, as well as chuckles. Throughout the concert his economical but expressive gestures—and his running fire of verbal admonitions as well—brought performances marked by precision, balance, clarity and rich tonal effects.

The orchestra's next concert comes on January 31.

H. B.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 1 4 1933

Musical Moments

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Woolsey Hall last night and played the most satisfactory program that they have given here in years. After the performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony, the audience, three thousand strong, tendered both conductor and orchestra a worthy tribute with round after round of thunderous applause.

It was, indeed, a stirring concert. The sterling qualities of execution and tonal splendor for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famous, need no rehearsal here. They have been long recognized. It is gratifying, nevertheless, to spend another evening with so fine a group of musicians and to hear the richness of orchestral color expressed in such fullness and power.

This excellent program opened with a Handel Concerto Grosso in D Major. It is authoritative music; solid, sure, and satisfying. Dr. Koussevitsky interpreted it with these qualities wrought in bold relief. In fact, it might be said that at times the more rapidly moving sections were overdone; but the slow movement played with consummate understanding.

One might dwell on the fascination of the Prelude to the opera "Khovanstchina" by Moussorgsky which was so beautifully played by the orchestra, were there time. But Strauss' famous work "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" demands consideration. On few occasions is this musical joke, the only masterpiece of its kind, performed with more finish. All the rougishness of the composer and his subject help to inspire a spirited performance. From the opening measures, cast in the mood of "once upon a time," through the musical narrative of Till's many moods and his fatal ending, to the concluding measures ending in a hearty musical laugh, Dr. Koussevitsky is eminently successful. The work is one of his notable accomplishments.

Attention was focussed, of course, on the symphonic work of one whose stature grows considerably with the passage of years. Sibelius work is just receiving the attention due it. His Second Symphony, often called the pastoral, is a distinguished composition filled with original conception and individual expression. It is typically twentieth-century in its shifting rhythm, its colorful modulations, and its modern tonal idioms. A certain freshness pervades the whole work bringing a sense of new and undiscovered paths of musical development. And with all this, it ends triumphantly in a great sonorous finale, not unlike many master works of earlier centuries. The composition was wonderfully played and won instant acclaim.

Music lovers may be grateful that Daggett M. Lee, manager of the Woolsey Hall series, has for the first time been able to secure this great orchestra for another appearance later in the season. It is with even more anticipation that one may look forward to the concert in February.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 1 4 1933

Hale and Farewell

Just what the brown wrapped, traditional programs of Boston's Symphony Orchestra are going to be like without the notes of Philip Hale nobody can imagine. Mr. Hale, who has been writing music notices for Boston newspapers since 1890 and, in particular, for "The Herald" since 1903, has resigned his office and another reviewer has taken his place. The news dispatches detailing his resignation don't even tell if George S. MacManus, his successor, is also heir to the program notes. Confusion, apparently, reigns in Huntington Avenue.

Mr. Hale has been an integral part of the Boston music, theater and newspaper scene for as long as H. T. Parker, and Friday afternoons at a Symphony shorn of his official presence will be barren indeed. He dates back to the good old days of a less opulent and glittering "Herald," to the times when Symphony was young, Major Higginson its generous Maecenas and Mrs. Jack Gardner its inevitable patron. Way back in the dim and happy past—when Karl Muck was conducting and Carl Wendling was concertmaster, when the curly brimmed top hat of the Collins & Fairbanks advertisement was in style and Edward MacDowell's organ transcriptions with a life of the author, by Lawrence Gilman, cost but a dollar—Mr. Hale was writing program notes and scanning them for typos from his aisle seat under the chaste statuary of Symphony Hall. Friday afternoon Symphony, naturally, transcends all individuals. Living, perennial, dominant Boston institution, it survives alike patrons and conductors, reporters and program annotators; but without Philip Hale it will never again be the same.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

NOV 1 4 1933

Conductor Is Honored

Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta, and Mrs. Sevitzky were guests yesterday at the Art Club, 220 South Broad street, of the organization's Women's Committee. Mrs. Edward G. McCollin presided. The Simfonietta opens its annual series of concerts here tomorrow night.

Conductor of the People's Symphony Orchestra of Boston, Mr. Sevitzky is a nephew of Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and one of the three bass viol soloists in the United States.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

NOV 1 4 1933

Edgar Allan Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death," one of his later stories, in which he displays his remarkable skill in piling up the horrors leading to the climax of the "Red Death" that had devastated the country and for which there was no cure, is the subject of the latest of Tcherepnin's compositions, which will be heard in New York for the first time at the first concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Wednesday evening. The other numbers on the program will be Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

Tel. WAtkins 9-4586
"SERVES YOU RIGHT"
PUBLIC SERVICE
CLIPPING BUREAU
INC.
220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPINGS
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
STAR ENTERPRISE

NOV 1 6 1933

Symphonic Ensemble to Play at College

The Symphonic Ensemble of Boston, composed of 15 musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give a concert in Students' building, Vassar college, Saturday night at 8:30. Russell Ames will direct the ensemble.

The program: Overture to Le Nozze di Figaro, Mozart; Ballet Suite, Rameau; Symphony in D major, Haydn; Overture to L'Epreuve villageoise, Grety; Deutsche Tanze, Mozart; Die Schlittenfahrt, Stravinsky; St. Paul's Suite for string orchestra, Gustav Holst; Bohemian Polka, Jaromir Weinberger; Premiere Danse Espagnole, Manuel de Falla.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 1 5 1933

Boston Programs

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is away from home for the opening of its season in New York and Brooklyn and concerts eleswhere. The regular concerts next week, as well as the second matinee on Tuesday will be conducted by Richard Burgin, the skilled concert master of the orchestra. For the regular concerts he will revive the London Symphony of Vaughan Williams. Toscha Seidel will be assisting artist in Tschaikowsky's Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra. The violinist is to play in the Community concerts in Nashua and Concord next month. At the Tuesday matinee Egon Petri will be assisting pianist in the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven.

63

BALTIMORE, MD.
POST

NOV 15 1933

Boston Symphony's Concert at Lyric Proves Work of Art

Large and Fashionable Audience Responds With Riotous Applause to Interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky and His Men to Musical Masterpieces

By WARREN WILMER BROWN

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night ranks with the greatest occasions of the kind in the entire range of my recollection. The selection, arrangement and interpretation of the numbers testified to the noble ability and discrimination of Serge Koussevitzky both as program maker and director, just as the performance of the orchestra left no doubt that it had few peers.

The opening little serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," was drawn from the purest source of Mozartian inspiration, a source as little contaminated by the world, perhaps, as any secular music has to offer. From the opening phrase (which is so startlingly similar in contour and content to that of Schubert's "Marche Militaire" as to suggest that the almost equally divine Franz was guilty, consciously or unconsciously, of plagiarism) to its closing Rondo it was an unalloyed joy.

Then came the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," read with a trenchant power that allowed nothing of its somber brooding mood, nothing of its intense emotionalism, to escape.

As the concert proceeded it was absorbingly interesting to note how this master among conductors built steadily and gradually to the climacteric point of the program, finally reached in Sibelius' Second Symphony in D Minor through Strauss' erstwhile iconoclastic "Tyll Eulenspiegel" tone poem, that brilliantly orchestrated score which achieves so well and so coherently what it sets out to do.

The symphony was a revelation. That a work of such towering esthetic and intellectual beauty should be so seldom heard is one of the mysteries that only the general run of conductors could explain. Perhaps most of them are afraid of it, either as a test of their own capabilities or those of their orchestras—if not both.

A work that cares so little about being ingratiating, that exists so largely beneath the surface, has other and far greater difficulties than those of a technical nature—and heaven knows they are exacting enough! It presented no obstacles to a clairvoyant interpretation either on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky or his men. Such a performance establishes its own criteria.

That the very large and fashionable audience was delighted at the Boston Symphony's return to Baltimore for a series of engagements—the concert was the first of three—after so many years of only one visit a season, was indicated impressively.

Dr. Koussevitzky was forced to take a dozen or so bows before he could start, and after each number he was recalled time and again. Throughout the evening the atmosphere was tense with the feeling that is generated only on those rare occasions when there is unison response to a demonstration of great art—an electric force, as it were, held in leash until breaks in the tension permit its outlet in clamorous applause.

BALTMORE, MD.
SUN

NOV 15 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Conductor At First Concert At Lyric

Partisans of classical, romantic and modern music all had something to cheer about last night at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted at the Lyric, and cheer they did.

The concert, the first of a series of three being given here this winter by the Boston orchestra, began with Mozart's charming and delicate serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

This was followed by the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina," which depicts the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this short prelude with an artistry which made the audience see the rising sun as they heard the noises which herald the coming of day.

—o—

The first half of the program was concluded with the playing of that humorous musical short story, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." That very merry rogue, Till, had a splendid time playing his practical jokes on people and being sufficiently modern to "give them the bird" when they became angry with him.

But Dr. Koussevitsky, who smiled as he led the orchestra into the somber passages which depict the rising anger of Till's many victims, hanged him very effectively at the end.

The symphony of the evening, Sibelius' second in D major, was the work which fused the classicist, the romanticist and the modernist into a single unit which applauded long and loud. The applause was shared by the conductor, the composer and the orchestra.

—o—

Members of the audience who for the first time last night heard a Sibelius symphony conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, learned why he is considered the greatest interpreter of the Finnish composer's music.

Beginning with the Allegretto and going through the second and third movements to the Finale, Dr. Koussevitzky built up the program of the piece until the listener created for himself the struggle of Sibelius' fellow-countrymen against the brutal rule of Russia and the final hope which enters their breasts in the anticipated coming of the deliverer.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony is scheduled for January 31.

J. P. C.

BALTIMORE, MD.
NEWS

NOV 15 1933

Sibelius Symphony Presented Here By Boston Orchestra

It would seem that Serge Koussevitsky is the patron saint, in America, of Sibelius.

But, unlike most patron saints, he does not rely on one act of grace to retain his rank, now that it has been acquired, for the works of the greatest Finnish composer are more frequetly found on the programs of Dr. Koussevitsky, than on those of any other conductor, perhaps.

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY

So it is not surprising that it was a Sibelius symphony, the second, which was found occupying the place of honor at the Lyric last evening, on the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first appearance in the series of concerts the great ensemble is to give here this winter.

The early symphonies of Sibelius are cast in the racial mold, partaking far more of the quality of a saga than the personal reactions reflected in his later works, though in this composition in D-major is already seen the preference for brief themes, little more than phrases, which is a conspicuous quality throughout Sibeliana.

ORCHESTRATION GIFT

Yet this composer's gift for orchestration is so fine that the sense of the mass is never lost, and the form retains merely the irrelevance of a scene in nature; work and play, fatigue and recreation, the sky, the moors, the threat of oppression.

The grave voices of the bassoons, in the second movement, speak the call to patriotism, to set aside fear, leading to the heroic progress of the third movement, passing, by a free transition, to the impressive sonorities of the finale, when it seemed almost that the tempestuous skies opened to show the unearthly glow of the promised Valhalla.

Dr. Koussevitsky conducted with all the ardor of a devotee and the art of a master, his men failing him in none of the instrumentation or needed temperamental response.

IN NORDIC MOOD

The program continued in the Nordic mood with the prelude to the Moussorgsky opera, "Knovanstchina," a tantalizing and pictorial fragment, representing sunrise over the Red Square in Moscow, beautifully molded in phrase and shading, and inspiring a keen desire to know what happened after the sun rose!

Farther south we passed to meet Till Eulenspiegel at his merry pranks, as seen through the musical lens of Richard Strauss, interpreted "after the old-fashioned rougish manner," in rondo form.

Be it Flemish or German, Till was a sad rascal, emblematic of Thirteenth Century humor, though his contemporaries finally failed to see the joke, and hanged him high as Haman.

Last night, through the feathery flutter of the first violin, we heard Till run away—too late. We heard the roll of the drum at his execution, his aggrieved voice, explaining—the angry drum's growl—"too late!"

EVENING'S HIGH SPOT

For part of the audience the high spot of the evening came at the beginning with the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart, presented with the utmost delicacy of execution, by the strings alone. Here was all the ordered simplicity of a formal garden, the chatelaine of the palace and her guests chatter in the soft moonlight, fountains sparkle, jewels glitter, not a thing is amiss according to the best Eighteenth Century mode.

Nor was there aught amiss with the splendid ensemble bringing here these assorted pictures and warm indeed was their welcome from the large audience.

H. A. F. P.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

NOV 16 1933

—MUSIC—

We Are Visited With Fine Concert From Northerners

Boston Symphony Plays Strauss and Beethoven for First of Three Concerts Here

By RUTH HOWELL

ALONG with the crisp, cold weather from the North came an afternoon of crisp, but not cold, orchestra playing from the North, when the Boston Symphony played yesterday in Constitution Hall. This was the first of three programs which this fine orchestra is to give here this winter and both the program and the performance heralded the importance of this trio of concerts.

As always, Serge Koussevitzky conducted. This little matter of the same conductor, week in and week out, season in and season out, make a difference in an orchestra's performance. Witness what Stock has done with the Chicago Symphony, and how the Philadelphia Orchestra plays under Stokowski.

Reflection

The Boston is, these days, Koussevitzky's orchestra, and it plays with the excellence and precision which he demands, and its achievements of tone and temperament are like his, colorful, dramatic, Russian. It has also gained from him a fine understanding of and feeling for semi-modern composition, and plays the newer works, French, Russian, Italian, things of intricate orchestration, as well as any orchestra in the country.

Three examples of this sort of composition were on yesterday's program and were given amazingly skillful and well nigh perfect performances. For all their color, tho—the delicate ballet-spirited Pierne "Divertissements," the somber Russian "Khovanstchina" prelude and Strauss' ever delightful "Till Eulenspiegel"—they had little emotional quality.

Not Teutonic

And when the orchestra came to Beethoven, playing the great "Eroica" symphony (No. 3), it performed with surpassing brilliance, lively precision, fire and elegance, but somehow missed the moving majesty of the Teutonic Beethoven. It was an admirable performance as such, but not the Beethoven that one looks forward to in the Eroica symphony. The tone quality, particularly in the violins, was not rich and robust, and the line of the music was lost in the details of exquisite phrasing.

You take your choice. Perhaps you like this extreme virtuosity in orchestra playing; or perhaps you would like to forget the details of the playing for the music. It is a matter of opinion—and perhaps a matter of tradition.

The next of these Boston Symphony concerts does not come until Jan. 30.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

16 1933

Season's First Concert Given By Symphony

Gabriel Pierne Novelty Features Program of Koussevitzky.

By Ray C. B. Brown.

With Gabriel Pierne's "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme" as the novelty on his program. Sergei Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Washington concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Constitution Hall. While the size of the audience was not commensurate with the occasion, there was abundance of appreciation to make the visitors feel welcome.

The Pierne work, aged only two years since its composition, revealed no new traits of imagination or inspiration in its author. Written with good craftsmanship and with adroit use of instrumental color, it presents a series of variations on a melody which is "pastoral" primarily, because it is given to the English horn. Having been tossed about the orchestra for six transformations, the theme turns into a Viennese waltz of distinctly Gallic attributes.

The waltz gives way to a "cortege blues" in which muted trumpets and some syncopated counterpoint essay unsuccessfully to capture the spirit of an alien idiom. The "blues" of M. Pierne would not be recognized in their native haunts. Even the introduction of a saxophone solo fails of the desired effect, because its lugubrious voice has the wrong accent. The concluding gigue, a brilliant piece of instrumentation, is more satisfactory. The work lives up to its title in being diverting, but like many diversions will quickly pass from memory.

In contrast to this showy dexterity, the next number brought the simplicity and moving frankness of Moussorgski's prelude to "Khowantchina." The very spirit of old Russia breaths in that picture of unfolding dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin. Moussorgski was one of the composers through whom the voice of the Slavic race found true utterance, and he never distorted it with sophistication. The prelude was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky with exquisite care for its nusances of color and stress.

The first half of the program closed with "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," played with a skill that matched the virtuosity of the score. Richard Strauss, whatever one may think of his spiritual greatness, towers among his contemporaries as a master in manipulation of the orchestra. He has all the devices of that complex instrument at his finger tips and employs them with the surety of a prestidigitator.

After the intermission came the classic that balanced the preceding miscellany—the "Eroica" symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it an eloquent reading, rich in those subtleties of musical speech that interpret the composer's inmost meaning.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 16 1933

WASHINGTON SOCIETY

Washington, D. C., Nov. 15.—[Special.]—President and Mrs. Roosevelt had a company at dinner tonight for their house guests. They are Norman H. Davis, Mrs. Charles Fayrweather, Mrs. Donner Roosevelt, Lieut. U. S. N. and Mrs. Victor F. Blakeslee of Philadelphia, Miss Farwell, and Mrs. Curtis B. Dall. Among the dinner guests were Miss Lilian Gish and Eddie Dowling.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon in Constitution hall and had as her guest Mrs. Fayrweather, author of children's books under the name of Margaret Doane.

Mrs. William H. Woodin, wife of the secretary of the treasury, entertained at luncheon today for Mrs. Roosevelt.

The Argentine ambassador and Mme. de Espil returned to the embassy after a visit in New York.

Cardinal Mundelein is at the Carlton, accompanied by the Rt. Rev. R. C. Maguire.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

NOV 1 6 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra In First of Three Concerts

Outstanding Characteristics of Performance at Constitution Hall—Dr. Koussevitsky as a Dynamic Leader.

By Alice Eversman.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, were welcomed again to this city yesterday afternoon at Constitution Hall at the first of the three concerts they will give here this Winter. This visiting organization has grown to be representative of the finest type of orchestra in which trained musicians pool their talents to the formation of a perfect whole, and this expert unity of purpose was once more impressed upon one at yesterday's concert.

The solidity of basic technique from a purely orchestral standpoint, and the musical intelligence which animates it, makes a perfect medium for the transmission of the noblest form of the art to which it is dedicated. Yesterday's performance was marked by a dignity of approach and an analytical concept that was imbued with the highest reverence for the work undertaken. Proper balance of contrast, an almost mathematical calculation as to the limit of the effect to be executed, superbly resonant tone and finesse of interpretation were the outstanding characteristics of the varied program.

Dr. Koussevitzky made his dynamic personality more and more felt as the program progressed until in the magnificent Eroica Symphony of Beethoven he reached a point of inspiration that brought forth a responding fire from the musicians in one of the most impressive renditions the famous symphony has ever had. It would be interesting to hear again the first numbers of the program also alive with the personal enthusiasm which developed later on. As it was, it would seem that the very elevation and purity of outlook, which was the predominant note of yesterday's performance, leaned more to the scientific than the emotional, and that the youthful, pulsing quality which is ever alive in music had been subdued in the striving for higher things.

There were moments throughout the program when the wish would intrude that the barriers be lowered to let through a less serious handling. It was not the fault of the program, for there was an excellent balance of type and mood from Pierne's "Divertissement" to the "Beethoven Symphony No. 3."

The "Divertissement" is not Pierne at his best, for he has to his credit greater compositions than the one played yesterday. Ever a schooled craftsman, he has written a pleasing number in which he has construed graceful variations on what he has termed "A Pastoral Theme." It is even doubtful if another tone color and lighter handling than that used by the orchestra yesterday would add greatly to this work, although it needed a less heavy reading than Dr. Koussevitzky gave it.

The somber Slavic color of the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," was admirably projected with exquisite regard for accentuating the nuances that alternate so movingly in this composition, and with a technical restrain of rare beauty that was of haunting loveliness at the finish. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was played with vitality and a style that rejoiced in the variety of orchestral effects of which Strauss was master and which found an equal in the legerdemain musicianship of Dr. Koussevitzky.

It was in the Eroica symphony, however, that the real character of the art of the Boston Symphony was more powerfully demonstrated. Here Dr. Koussevitzky found new sources of interest inspired by his unique ability to profoundly penetrate the most subtle thought of the composer. It was music in which one could lose oneself completely, so profound was the union of the spirit that created it and that of the interpreter. The audience found it difficult to applaud, for mere handclapping can never express the satisfaction, the refreshment and the spiritual uplift that results from music such as this played in this lofty manner.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 1 6 1933

WASHINGTON

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt entertained at dinner last night having among their guests Miss Lillian Gish and Mr. Eddie Dowling, who took a new motion picture to the White House for the President to see. Mr. Norman H. Davis, Ambassador-at-large, is a guest at the White House.

Mrs. Roosevelt was honor guest at luncheon yesterday of Mrs. William H. Woodin, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was one of the series of luncheons being given in honor of Mrs. Roosevelt by wives of the Cabinet officers and Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor. Mrs. Cordell Hull, wife of the Secretary of State, gave one before her departure with Mr. Hull for South America. Mrs. George H. Dern, wife of the Secretary of War, will entertain on December 12. The guests are being confined to the Cabinet hostesses and a very few additional guests. The company yesterday in addition to the Cabinet hostesses with the exception of Mrs. Hull and Mrs. Homer Cummings, wife of the Attorney General, who is in Greenwich, Conn., were Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts, Mrs. Dean Acheson, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Miss Mabel Boardman, Representative-elect Isabella Greenway, Mrs. Woodin Minor and Miss Louise Jessup, sister of the hostess.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday.

The Secretary of War and Mrs. George H. Dern have as their guests their son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. John Dern and their small son, John jr. Secretary and Mrs. Dern will pass the week end in New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOV 1 6 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING BRILLIANT

By RONALD THORNE

Serge Koussevitzky and his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance of the season at Constitution Hall yesterday, under the management of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, presenting a program notable for its inclusion of three works rarely presented here, as well as the great "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, reputedly the composer's own favorite among his own symphonies.

The Boston Symphony is, and has been for years one of the world's great orchestras. It rose to preeminence under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, and though it fell from that high estate following his departure, its rebuilding began with the acquisition of Serge Koussevitzky ten years ago—this is his "anniversary season"—and its steady progress since that time has once more brought it to the same high position it formerly held.

"Eroica" Impressive

The "Eroica" was played with tremendous effect. The second movement, generally known as the funeral march, was particularly impressive. Undoubtedly inspired by the career of Napoleon, the "Eroica" has been a puzzle to commentators because the scherzo follows the second movement. Some have even contended that it should be played first. If this reviewer might diffidently offer a suggestion, may it not be that Beethoven intended the first movement to represent conflict—as has been generally believed—the second a lament for the heroic dead, the third something like the expression of bottled-up feelings that was manifested in our own Armistice 15 years ago? It seems a logical arrangement.

Tells Merry Pranks

Richard Strauss, represented by "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," gave the critics another puzzle in this work. But the most satisfactory treatment of "Till" is simply to enjoy him. Strauss has expressed in his music the character and career of this picaresque fellow of medieval days, and however much one may choose to read into it, that, in substance, is all that one will find.

Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" prelude, representing dawn over the Red Square in Moscow—which was "red" long before the Soviets ever assumed power, and is named for the color of the buildings surrounding it—was another interesting feature of the program. The entr'acte music from this opera has enjoyed quite a vogue on symphonic programs of late, but the prelude is less familiar.

To open this highly enjoyable concert, Koussevitzky presented Pierne's "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme," recalling in some of its orchestration the popular "Entrance of the Little Fauns." It is one of the few symphonic works in which the saxophone is given almost solo honors. Thoroughly enjoyable, it nevertheless gives the effect of some disjointedness because of its several rather abrupt changes of tempo and character.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 1 6 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACCLAIMED HERE IN COLORFUL PROGRAM

By HELEN FETTER COOK

There was a particularly distinguished air about Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its first concert of the season. An audience, led by Mrs. Roosevelt, was attentive and enthusiastic to ovation degree. With characteristic suaveity Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program, ~~balanced~~ in colorful themes, with a refreshing novelty on it as well as one of the most satisfying of all the symphonies.

The novelty was Pierne's carefree "Pastoral," which started out quite in character (with the English Horn) but became increasingly syncopated and sophisticated before the end—a clever piece of writing. The woodwinds made the most of plentiful opportunities in this work—and so did the brasses.

The prelude music of Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" that has a somber, forboding motif midway of it was played with exquisite pianissimo work by the strings in its finale. Excellent contrast was afforded the Pierne and the impish tone poem of Richard Strauss ("Till Eulenspiegel") by the Russian work.

Both the first and second movements of the Beethoven third symphony (The Eroica) were dramatically played, the funeral march being given fullest value in its lofty beauty that has a religious quality. The scherzo seemed more logical than ever effectively setting off the preceding slow movement. The material air of the finale brought the concert to a brilliant close.

Always this orchestra plays with a polished refinement that is impressive. There will be two more programs here this winter with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The series is presented under Mrs. Dorsey's management.

HERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY, NOVEM

17

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky and the Bostonians Bring Us an Orchestral Tale After Poe

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Ravel, Suite for orchestra, "Le Tombeau de Couperin."
2. Nicolai Tcherepnin, Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a Tale of Poe, Op. 59.
   (First time in New York)
   Intermission
3. Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43.

THE chief of the Bostonians brought his extraordinary orchestra to New York Thursday night for the first time this season, and again we were made to realize how very fortunate are the music lovers of this country, who, despite the treacherous times in which we live, are privileged to hear music of the highest class performed through more than half the year by such magnificent instruments as this, and the Philadelphia band, and the insurpassable orchestra that dwells among us here, and other accomplished groups of players who still intrepidly carry on.

Some of us, considering such privileges and benefactions as these, and the sacrifices they entail, may well wonder if the obstinate idealism of Americans about which we talk so much is really appreciated at its full value.

* * *

Thursday night's performance of that great organization over which the suavely volcanic Mr. Koussevitzky presides was quite as dazzling as its present-day traditions have led us to expect. It would be hard to imagine anything more transparent and delicately jewelled than the orchestra's exposition of Ravel's delightful suite, or a more gorgeously multicolored blaze of tone than Mr. Koussevitzky kindled in certain climactic pages of the evening's novelty—which, unfortunately, happened to be, intrinsically, pretty sad stuff. But that was nobody's fault except the composer's; for there was really nothing else for the unhappy Mr Koussevitzky to do but play the work, since, after the sadistic habit of composers, Mr. Tcherepnin had dedicated it to him. (When will the orchestral leaders of the world unite to form a Society for the Prevention of Cruel Dedications to Conductors?)

* * *

The novelty in question is a set of "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe." The composer of it is the elder Tcherepnin—Nikolai, the father of Alexander—who now, in his sixty-first year, dwells, as all good Russian music-makers do, in the City of Light. The "tale of Edgar Allan Poe" referred to in Mr. Tcherepnin's title is that famous horror yarn, "The Masque of the Red Death"; and Mr. Tcherepnin's music sets out to translate into tone the essentials of the grisly tale, as they emerge in the famous French version of Baudelaire.

We are taken by Mr. Tcherepnin through those chambers of dread in one of which stood the gigantic clock of ebony whose striking of the hour chilled the hearts of the terrified revelers in the Prince's abbey; and we are brought face to face with the appalling figure that wore "the habiliments of the grave," whose vesture was "besprinkled with the scarlet horror."

* * *

Now, clearly, the first thing that one must require of a composer setting this tale of Poe's to music is that he should make our flesh creep. But this is precisely what Mr. Tcherepnin fails to do. His score must have caused the Sacred Codfish itself to weep tears of sympathetic grief at the thought of inevitable orchestral deficits increased by Mr. Tcherepnin's playful requirements, which include such pre-depression luxuries as, for example, five oboes, five flutes, five clarinets. But, alas, it takes more than an expensively swollen orchestra to make the listener's flesh creep. It takes something which Mr. Tcherepnin has forgotten to include in his score—it takes a re-creative musical imagination.

There are composers who can make your flesh creep by the rhythm of a kettle-drum or a chord of the muted horns. Mr. Tcherepnin is not among them. His stock in trade appears to consist chiefly of borrowed goods. If musical pilfering were taken seriously, many composers, of course, would be in jail; but Mr. Tcherepnin rather overworks this merry pastime. He begins by giving us huge handfuls of Debussyan whole-tone scales and augmented triads, mixed with helpings from "Siegfried"; so that we start off with a confused impression that the ghost of the lamented Claude is having a nightmare, complaining in his sleep that Fafner has crawled into the crypt of Golaud's castle and is terrifying all Allemonde with his roars.

* * * *

But this is only a beginning for Mr. Tcherepnin. He does not confine his attentions to Debussy. He ranges widely, liberally, playing no favorites. If you are looking for any particularly striking invention that has occurred to a creative musician within the last half-century, you will probably find some trace of it in this score.

* * *

It is scarcely to be wondered at, therefore, that at the end of the piece you find yourself asking, "But where is Mr. Tcherepnin? And where, incidentally, is Poe?" Alas, there appears to be no such composer as Mr. Tcherepnin. Poe, to be sure, can still be read—in Baudelaire's French translation, if you insist. But as for Mr. Tcherepnin—well, you may perhaps be reminded of the ghastly mummer in Poe's tale, who, when the revelers seized him, proved to be quite literally nothing at all: for they found the cerements and the mask of death "untenanted by any tangible form."

* * *

It remains to be added that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played the novelty superbly, and that the audience appeared to like it.

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

104

NOV 16 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra In First of Three Concerts

Outstanding Characteristics of Performance at Constitution Hall—Dr. Koussevitsky as a Dynamic Leader.

By Alice Eversman.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra and its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, were welcomed again to this city yesterday afternoon at Constitution Hall at the first of the three concerts they will give here this Winter. This visiting organization has grown to be representative of the finest type of orchestra in which trained musicians pool their talents to the formation of a perfect whole, and this expert unity of purpose was once more impressed upon one at yesterday's concert.

The solidity of basic technique from a purely orchestral standpoint, and the musical intelligence which animates it, makes a perfect medium for the transmission of the noblest form of the art to which it is dedicated. Yesterday's performance was marked by a dignity of approach and an analytical concept that was imbued with the highest reverence for the work undertaken. Proper balance of contrast, an almost mathematical calculation as to the limit of the effect to be executed, superbly resonant tone and finesse of interpretation were the outstanding characteristics of the varied program.

Dr. Koussevitzky made his dynamic personality more and more felt as the program progressed until in the magnificent Eroica Symphony of Beethoven he reached a point of inspiration that brought forth a responding fire from the musicians in one of the most impressive renditions the famous symphony has ever had. It would be interesting to hear again the first numbers of the program also alive with the personal enthusiasm which developed later on. As it was, it would seem that the very elevation and purity of outlook, which was the predominant note of yesterday's performance, leaned more to the scientific than the emotional, and that the youthful, pulsing quality which is ever alive in music had been subdued in the striving for higher things.

There were moments throughout the program when the wish would intrude that the barriers be lowered to let through a less serious handling. It was not the fault of the program, for there was an excellent balance of type and mood from Pierne's "Divertissement" to the "Beethoven Symphony No. 3."

The "Divertissement" is not Pierne at his best, for he has to his credit greater compositions than the one played yesterday. Ever a schooled craftsman, he has written a pleasing number in which he has construed graceful variations on what he has termed "A Pastoral Theme." It is even doubtful if another tone color and lighter handling than that used by the orchestra yesterday would add greatly to this work, although it needed a less heavy reading than Dr. Koussevitzky gave it.

The somber Slavic color of the prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," was admirably projected with exquisite regard for accentuating the nuances that alternate so movingly in this composition, and with a technical restrain of rare beauty that was of haunting loveliness at the finish. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" was played with vitality and a style that rejoiced in the variety of orchestral effects of which Strauss was master and which found an equal in the legerdemain musicianship of Dr. Koussevitzky.

It was in the Eroica symphony, however, that the real character of the art of the Boston Symphony was more powerfully demonstrated. Here Dr. Koussevitzky found new sources of interest inspired by his unique ability to profoundly penetrate the most subtle thought of the composer. It was music in which one could lose oneself completely, so profound was the union of the spirit that created it and that of the interpreter. The audience found it difficult to applaud, for mere handclapping can never express the satisfaction, the refreshment and the spiritual uplift that results from music such as this played in this lofty manner.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 16 1933

WASHINGTON

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt entertained at dinner last night having among their guests Miss Lillian Gish and Mr. Eddie Dowling, who took a new motion picture to the White House for the President to see. Mr. Norman H. Davis, Ambassador-at-large, is a guest at the White House.

Mrs. Roosevelt was honor guest at luncheon yesterday of Mrs. William H. Woodin, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was one of the series of luncheons being given in honor of Mrs. Roosevelt by wives of the Cabinet officers and Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor. Mrs. Cordell Hull, wife of the Secretary of State, gave one before her departure with Mr. Hull for South America. Mrs. George H. Dern, wife of the Secretary of War, will entertain on December 12. The guests are being confined to the Cabinet hostesses and a very few additional guests. The company yesterday in addition to the Cabinet hostesses with the exception of Mrs. Hull and Mrs. Homer Cummings, wife of the Attorney General, who is in Greenwich, Conn., were Mrs. Charles Evans Hughes, Mrs. Owen J. Roberts, Mrs. Dean Acheson, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Adolph Caspar Miller, Mrs. Frederic A. Delano, Miss Mabel Boardman, Representative-elect Isabella Greenway, Mrs. Woodin Minor and Miss Louise Jessup, sister of the hostess.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday.

The Secretary of War and Mrs. George H. Dern have as their guests their son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. John Dern and their small son, John jr. Secretary and Mrs. Dern will pass the week end in New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

NOV 16 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACCLAIMED HERE IN COLORFUL PROGRAM

By HELEN FETTER COOK

There was a particularly distinguished air about Constitution Hall yesterday afternoon. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was giving its first concert of the season. An audience, led by Mrs. Roosevelt, was attentive and enthusiastic to ovation degree. With characteristic suaveity Serge Koussevitzky conducted a program, ~~balanced~~ in colorful themes, with a refreshing novelty on it as well as one of the most satisfying of all the symphonies.

The novelty was Pierne's carefree "Pastoral," which started out quite in character (with the English Horn) but became increasingly syncopated and sophisticated before the end—a clever piece of writing. The woodwinds made the most of plentiful opportunities in this work—and so did the brasses.

The prelude music of Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" that has a somber, forboding motif midway of it was played with exquisite pianissimo work by the strings in its finale. Excellent contrast was afforded the Pierne and the impish tone poem of Richard Strauss ("Till Eulenspiegel") by the Russian work.

Both the first and second movements of the Beethoven third symphony (The Eroica) were dramatically played, the funeral march being given fullest value in its lofty beauty that has a religious quality. The scherzo seemed more logical than ever effectively setting off the preceding slow movement. The material air of the finale brought the concert to a brilliant close.

Always this orchestra plays with a polished refinement that is impressive. There will be two more programs here this winter with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The series is presented under Mrs. Dorsey's management.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

NOV 16 1933

KOUSSEVITZKY'S CONDUCTING BRILLIANT

By RONALD THORNE

Serge Koussevitzky and his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra made their first appearance of the season at Constitution Hall yesterday, under the management of Mrs. Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey, presenting a program notable for its inclusion of three works rarely presented here, as well as the great "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, reputedly the composer's own favorite among his own symphonies.

The Boston Symphony is, and has been for years one of the world's great orchestras. It rose to preeminence under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, and though it fell from that high estate following his departure, its rebuilding began with the acquisition of Serge Koussevitzky ten years ago—this is his "anniversary season"—and its steady progress since that time has once more brought it to the same high position it formerly held.

"Eroica" Impressive

The "Eroica" was played with tremendous effect. The second movement, generally known as the funeral march, was particularly impressive. Undoubtedly inspired by the career of Napoleon, the "Eroica" has been a puzzle to commentators because the scherzo follows the second movement. Some have even contended that it should be played first. If this reviewer might diffidently offer a suggestion, may it not be that Beethoven intended the first movement to represent conflict—as has been generally believed—the second a lament for the heroic dead, the third something like the expression of bottled-up feelings that was manifested in our own Armistice 15 years ago? It seems a logical arrangement.

Tells Merry Pranks

Richard Strauss, represented by "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," gave the critics another puzzle in this work. But the most satisfactory treatment of "Till" is simply to enjoy him. Strauss has expressed in his music the character and career of this picaresque fellow of medieval days, and however much one may choose to read into it, that, in substance, is all that one will find.

Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" prelude, representing dawn over the Red Square in Moscow—which was "red" long before the Soviets ever assumed power, and is named for the color of the buildings surrounding it—was another interesting feature of the program. The entr'acte music from this opera has enjoyed quite a vogue on symphonic programs of late, but the prelude is less familiar.

To open this highly enjoyable concert, Koussevitzky presented Pierne's "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme," recalling in some of its orchestration the popular "Entrance of the Little Fauns." It is one of the few symphonic works in which the saxophone is given almost solo honors. Thoroughly enjoyable, it nevertheless gives the effect of some disjointedness because of its several rather abrupt changes of tempo and character.

HERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY, NOVEM

17

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Koussevitzky and the Bostonians Bring Us an Orchestral Tale After Poe

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

First New York concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Ravel, Suite for orchestra, "Le Tombeau de Couperin."
2. Nicolai Tcherepnin, Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a Tale of Poe, Op. 59. (First time in New York)

Intermission

3. Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43.

Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor

THE chief of the Bostonians brought his extraordinary orchestra to New York Thursday night for the first time this season, and again we were made to realize how very fortunate are the music lovers of this country, who, despite the treacherous times in which we live, are privileged to hear music of the highest class performed through more than half the year by such magnificent instruments as this, and the Philadelphia band, and the insurpassable orchestra that dwells among us here, and other accomplished groups of players who still intrepidly carry on.

Some of us, considering such privileges and benefactions as these, and the sacrifices they entail, may well wonder if the obstinate idealism of Americans about which we talk so much is really appreciated at its full value.

* * *

Thursday night's performance of that great organization over which the suavely volcanic Mr. Koussevitzky presides was quite as dazzling as its present-day traditions have led us to expect. It would be hard to imagine anything more transparent and delicately jewelled than the orchestra's exposition of Ravel's delightful suite, or a more gorgeously multicolored blaze of tone than Mr. Koussevitzky kindled in certain climactic pages of the evening's novelty—which, unfortunately, happened to be, intrinsically, pretty sad stuff. But that was nobody's fault except the composer's; for there was really nothing else for the unhappy Mr Koussevitzky to do but play the work, since, after the sadistic habit of composers, Mr. Tcherepnin had dedicated it to him. (When will the orchestral leaders of the world unite to form a Society for the Prevention of Cruel Dedications to Conductors?)

* * *

The novelty in question is a set of "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe." The composer of it is the elder Tcherepnin—Nikolai, the father of Alexander—who now, in his sixty-first year, dwells, as all good Russian music-makers do, in the City of Light. The "tale of Edgar Allan Poe" referred to in Mr. Tcherepnin's title is that famous horror yarn, "The Masque of the Red Death"; and Mr. Tcherepnin's music sets out to translate into tone the essentials of the grisly tale, as they emerge in the famous French version of Baudelaire.

We are taken by Mr. Tcherepnin through those chambers of dread in one of which stood the gigantic clock of ebony whose striking of the hour chilled the hearts of the terrified revelers in the Prince's abbey; and we are brought face to face with the appalling figure that wore "the habiliments of the grave," whose vesture was "besprinkled with the scarlet horror."

* * *

Now, clearly, the first thing that one must require of a composer setting this tale of Poe's to music is that he should make our flesh creep. But this is precisely what Mr. Tcherepnin fails to do. His score must have caused the Sacred Codfish itself to weep tears of sympathetic grief at the thought of inevitable orchestral deficits increased by Mr. Tcherepnin's playful requirements, which include such pre-depression luxuries as, for example, five oboes, five flutes, five clarinets. But, alas, it takes more than an expensively swollen orchestra to make the listener's flesh creep. It takes something which Mr. Tcherepnin has forgotten to include in his score—it takes a recreative musical imagination.

There are composers who can make your flesh creep by the rhythm of a kettle-drum or a chord of the muted horns. Mr. Tcherepnin is not among them. His stock in trade appears to consist chiefly of borrowed goods. If musical pilfering were taken seriously, many composers, of course, would be in jail; but Mr. Tcherepnin rather overworks this merry pastime. He begins by giving us huge handfuls of Debussyan whole-tone scales and augmented triads, mixed with helpings from "Siegfried"; so that we start off with a confused impression that the ghost of the lamented Claude is having a nightmare, complaining in his sleep that Fafner has crawled into the crypt of Golaud's castle and is terrifying all Allemonde with his roars.

* * * *

But this is only a beginning for Mr. Tcherepnin. He does not confine his attentions to Debussy. He ranges widely, liberally, playing no favorites. If you are looking for any particularly striking invention that has occurred to a creative musician within the last half-century, you will probably find some trace of it in this score.

* * *

It is scarcely to be wondered at, therefore, that at the end of the piece you find yourself asking, "But where is Mr. Tcherepnin? And where, incidentally, is Poe?" Alas, there appears to be no such composer as Mr. Tcherepnin. Poe, to be sure, can still be read—in Baudelaire's French translation, if you insist. But as for Mr. Tcherepnin—well, you may perhaps be reminded of the ghastly mummer in Poe's tale, who, when the revelers seized him, proved to be quite literally nothing at all: for they found the cerements and the mask of death "untenanted by any tangible form."

* * *

It remains to be added that Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra played the novelty superbly, and that the audience appeared to like it.

Nov 17 NY World

Koussevitsky Entrances Carnegie Hall Audience

Boston Orchestra Leader Presents Program Free from Hackneyed Numbers.

By PITTS SANBORN.

WE have learned to expect something out of the ordinary whenever Serge Koussevitzky visits Carnegie Hall at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so last evening when that famous constellation swam into our ken for the first time this season we were not in the least surprised to find before us a program assembled according to the authentic Sergean tradition.

Not one of its three numbers was hackneyed, for neither Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," which opened proceedings, nor the second symphony of Sibelius, which closed them, has been played here too often. Rather the contrary. And Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe" (The Mask of the Red Death) was a first time in New York. On paper this array made a brave and attractive showing.

In the performance there could be no doubt about the pleasure afforded by Ravel's suite for small orchestra. Though the tomb of the title is Couperin's (that distinguished French composer died two hundred years ago September in his sixty-fifth year), the suite is actually a memorial to friends of the composer who were killed in the World War. The name of Couperin indicates the archaic flavor of the music, and the several sections—a prelude, a forlane, a menuet, and a rigaudon—conform to the procedure of the ancient suite of Couperin's time.

Execution Most Expert.

Of course there is nothing incongruous about memorial, or even funeral, dances. Their ritual tread, sometimes stately, sometimes not, is doubtless as old as mourning. Consequently this orchestral suite, which Ravel derived from his longer piano suite of the same name, is in all ways exquisitely appropriate, especially in the adroitness and finesse of the instrumentation, with its fascinating interplay of timbres and colors. The execution accorded it last evening was most expert.

A symphony by Sibelius is always welcome. Year by year the fame of the Finnish composer is growing, and justly. The world is coming to realize that in him we have one of the greatest of symphonists, even though he be not, as Cecil Gray, his indefatigable champion, seems to believe, the greatest of them all.

Sibelius Work Compelling.

Of course the second symphony is not yet typical Sibelius, but rather a point of departure—in the words of Mr. Gray the "beginning of a new line," containing the "germs of immense and fruitful development." Nevertheless. quite apart from considerations of symphonic evolution, it is a work of compelling power and beauty. One is heartily glad that Mr Koussevitzky saw fit to bring it forward again.

Nikolai Tcherepnin probably became known to local audiences through two agreeable and harmless ballet scores which formed part of the repertory of the unforgetable Diaghileff company—"Le Pavillon d'Armide" and "Narcisse." The pieces heard last night are another matter. Composed in 1931-32 they are naturally far more modern in idiom, and they also make very much more noise.

Indeed, they are scored for one of the largest instrumental aggregations ever assembled. Besides such luxuries as five flutes, five oboes, two English horns, etc., it boasts an incredible battery of pulsatiles, including such matters as a tam-tam, a xylophone, castanets, small bells, chimes and a variety of drums. In addition to all that there is an organ.

An Aimless Deafening Bore.

The three pieces which this paraphernalia of noise is employed to illustrate are entitled, respectively, "In the Room of the Ebony Clock," "A Revel," and "Destiny," each bearing quotations from Poe's familiar tale in the celebrated French translation of Baudelaire.

Now, far be it from me to attempt interference with the inexorable march of fate, and of first impressions I am exceedingly wary (often as one returns to those treacherous incidents of perception), yet for once I shall launch a sweeping opinion that is no better grounded. At the risk of some day having to eat my words, I found this Tcherepnin opus an aimless, deafening, unconscionable bore.

Dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, the three pieces were play quite magnificently.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 17 1933

Boston Symphony Season On

Conductor Koussevitzky Offers Novelty by Techerepnin, Expatriated Russian.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its local season in Carnegie Hall last evening. Like his predecessors, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Mr. Koussevitzky invited the attention of his audience to a novelty. This was "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," by Nicolai Techerepnin, born in Leningrad in 1873 and now one of the expatriated Russians dwelling in Paris.

The tale which fired the composer's fancy was "The Masque of the Red Death."

Tcherepnin became acquainted with Poe through Baudelaire's translation. Probably that is a better rendering of the unique American than Tcherepnin's. It is not essential to the purpose of this brief report on Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty to summarize the content of Poe's grewsome tale of a Prince's vain effort to escape a plague. The composer has endeavored to put into music the hall of the ebony clock, the fete at which the Prince and his companions reveled in fancied safety, and the triumph of fate in the entry of the red death and the destruction of the revelers.

Everything except a saxophone is employed in the score—a small army of oboes, English horns, clarinets, bassoons and brass instruments, tambourines, cymbals, triangle, Tamtam, castanets, xylophone, chimes, small bells, piano, celesta, organ and two harps, beside the noble company of strings. There is a magnificent display of orchestration. There are many familiar devices in the thematic content, including an overworked chromatic scale, which may be supposed to represent the shivers coursing down the spines of the Prince and his guests.

Listening to this prodigious composition one felt that he would have been more moved if the musician had tried to publish his emotions aroused by reading Poe's tale. But instead of that Tcherepnin chose the venerable and obvious method of tonal description of incidents. This kind of music seldom soars toward the stars. It most frequently capers ineffectively on the cold, cold ground. And that is what it did in Tcherepnin's composition. We have rarely listened to a heavier, duller and more stupefying work. The Bostonians performed it superbly, but it was not in their power to breathe into it the breath of life.

It was preceded by Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which is not unfamiliar to New York music lovers. It was introduced by Pierre Monteux in 1920. It has the characteristic depth and color of Ravel's orchestration and his opulance of advanced harmony which he always employs with skill and taste. The concert concluded with the second symphony of Sibelius. The audience bestowed its greatest applause on Mr. Koussevitzky, when it heartily welcomed him to the platform. It made a much smaller demonstration when he stepped down after leading the orchestral riot of his Russian friend.

N.Y. EVENING POST

NOV 17 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Boston Symphony Begins New York Concerts Under Koussevitzky With a Novelty After Poe

FOR the forty-eighth time in as many years, the Boston Symphony began a series of New York concerts last night, returning to Carnegie Hall for its first visit of the current season, once more under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestra and conductor were greeted heartily by a large audience in which were to be recognized patrons and subscribers of many years' standing. The evening was one of cordial applause, with something more than that at the climactic conclusion of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, placed last on the program. The heroic sonorities of the apotheosis of this bardic work created much the same stir as when Mr. Koussevitzky last conducted the symphony in New York.

The program contained a novelty, freshly imported from Paris, in the form of the elder Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe"; his Opus 59. As indicated by some lines in French quoted as clews to the descriptive and dramatic content of the three pieces, they are "after Baudelaire" as well as "after Poe." From the French poet's translation of "The Masque of the Red Death," Tcherepnin derived the program material for his music, which seeks to picture in musical terms, first "The Room of the Ebony Clock," then "A Revel" and finally the appearance of the specter of the dread plague and the ghastly struggle that ensues, with the fateful clock sounding the chimes of death.

Uses Large Orchestra

NIKOLAI TCHEREPNIN, like his son, Alexandre, is a composer of skill and resource. In this music he has employed a large orchestra in a manner to suggest sometimes his master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, sometimes Rimsky's greater confrere, Moussorgsky, and sometimes their all too versatile heir, Igor Stravinsky. Save, however, for an inescapable reminder of the striking clocks of "Boris Godounoff," he has written music that is not conspicuously derivative. It is most effective at the outset and again at the close, with some glassy descending passages in the violins creating momentarily an atmosphere as eerie as is Poe's.

Otherwise, the work scarcely rises above mediocrity either as music of independent appeal or as a tonal transcription of the tale. The revel is ingenious and amply vigorous but scarcely orgiastic. The music of the specter evokes nothing of dread or awe. The composer has done well with his material, but not well enough to make it the equivalent of "The Masque of the Red Death." After all, Poe had genius.

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," with its delicate and irisated sonorities, was gracefully and adroitly performed as the curtain-raiser of the concert.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 18 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

The valiance with which Serge Koussevitzky espouses the cause of composers who are still alive is something to cheer about. Still I cannot help feeling that this valiance got the better of him when he chose Nikolai Tcherepnin's Three Pieces for Orchestra after Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death" for the novelty of Thursday evening's typically brilliant Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, the first of the season. Redundant, prolix, pretentious and singularly ineffective in creating any of the macabre "creepiness" of Poe's works, this work suffered by contrast with the magnificent Ravel "Tombeau de Couperin," which preceded it and the majestic Sibelius Second Symphony which followed. Extended comment on these selections is unnecessary. Suffice it to record that the virtuosity of the Boston musicians gave new cause for rejoicing, and that the evening as a whole resulted in new glory for the group. The large audience was whipped into an ovation by the Sibelius piece.

Greater tribute to the rendition of the Ravel selection cannot be paid than by mentioning that, when the end of the Menuet movement was at hand, and an auto horn in Fifty-seventh street had to sound, it sounded in tune! So bewitching is the orchestra.

▼

N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 17 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its first concert of the season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music tonight, the program being as follows: Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Third Symphony.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 17 1933

MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall, ~~8:45 p.m.~~

THE PROGRAM:

"Le Tombeau de Couperin — Suite for ochestra....Maurice Ravel

Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe (Opus 59)........Nikolai Tcherepnin (First performance in New York)

Symphony No. 2 in D (Opus 43)...............Jan Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians over whom he presides moved sedately into Carnegie Hall last night, dispensing a program which, while it gave us ample cause to hail the glories of sublime performance, left us to wonder why Mr. Koussevitzky had undertaken the ungrateful task of painting a cabbage to look like a rose.

The cabbage, in this case, was a pretentious discourse by Mr. Tcherepnin the elder, having to do with that tale by Edgar Allan Poe, "Mask of the Red Death." The composer turned to the Baudelaire translation in French, rather literal and therefore reverent, of the Poe story. His score is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky.

To me it is a hodge-podge of piffle, cleverly orchestrated, and strained at every seam by the urge to be "different." It was accorded a performance immeasurably better than it deserved.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra performed the Ravel piece, uninteresting save in the color and dexterity of the Ravel orchestration, with the utmost nicety and elan. The murmuring pines and the hemlock, occasionally translated to the farmhouse of the Finnish countryside, which impress Sibelius in most of his musical moments, appeared again before the audience as Dr. Koussevitzky began the second symphony. Its hints of Tchaikowsky, to which Mr. Cecil Gray alludes, are not intrusive. There is a certain pervasive sweep of the outdoors, a peasant honesty about it that I have found most satisfying.

65

Koussevitzky Entrances Carnegie Hall Audience

Boston Orchestra Leader Presents Program Free from Hackneyed Numbers.

Nov 17 NY World

By PITTS SANBORN.

WE have learned to expect something out of the ordinary whenever Serge Koussevitzky visits Carnegie Hall at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so last evening when that famous constellation swam into our ken for the first time this season we were not in the least surprised to find before us a program assembled according to the authentic Sergean tradition.

Not one of its three numbers was hackneyed, for neither Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," which opened proceedings, nor the second symphony of Sibelius, which closed them, has been played here too often. Rather the contrary. And Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe" (The Mask of the Red Death) was a first time in New York. On paper this array made a brave and attractive showing.

In the performance there could be no doubt about the pleasure afforded by Ravel's suite for small orchestra. Though the tomb of the title is Couperin's (that distinguished French composer died two hundred years ago September in his sixty-fifth year), the suite is actually a memorial to friends of the composer who were killed in the World War. The name of Couperin indicates the archaic flavor of the music, and the several sections—a prelude, a forlane, a menuet, and a rigaudon—conform to the procedure of the ancient suite of Couperin's time.

Execution Most Expert.

Of course there is nothing incongruous about memorial, or even funeral, dances. Their ritual tread, sometimes stately, sometimes not, is doubtless as old as mourning. Consequently this orchestral suite, which Ravel derived from his longer piano suite of the same name, is in all ways exquisitely appropriate, especially in the adroitness and finesse of the instrumentation, with its fascinating interplay of timbres and colors. The execution accorded it last evening was most expert.

A symphony by Sibelius is always welcome. Year by year the fame of the Finnish composer is growing, and justly. The world is coming to realize that in him we have one of the greatest of symphonists, even though he be not, as Cecil Gray, his indefatigable champion, seems to believe, the greatest of them all.

Sibelius Work Compelling.

Of course the second symphony is not yet typical Sibelius, but rather a point of departure—in the words of Mr. Gray the "beginning of a new line," containing the "germs of immense and fruitful development." Nevertheless. quite apart from considerations of symphonic evolution, it is a work of compelling power and beauty. One is heartily glad that Mr Koussevitzky saw fit to bring it forward again.

Nikolai Tcherepnin probably became known to local audiences through two agreeable and harmless ballet scores which formed part of the repertory of the unforgetable Diaghileff company—"Le Pavillon d'Armide" and "Narcisse." The pieces heard last night are another matter. Composed in 1931-32 they are naturally far more modern in idiom, and they also make very much more noise.

Indeed, they are scored for one of the largest instrumental aggregations ever assembled. Besides such luxuries as five flutes, five oboes, two English horns, etc., it boasts an incredible battery of pulsatiles, including such matters as a tam-tam, a xylophone, castanets, small bells, chimes and a variety of drums. In addition to all that there is an organ.

An Aimless Deafening Bore.

The three pieces which this paraphernalia of noise is employed to illustrate are entitled, respectively, "In the Room of the Ebony Clock," "A Revel," and "Destiny," each bearing quotations from Poe's familiar tale in the celebrated French translation of Baudelaire.

Now, far be it from me to attempt interference with the inexorable march of fate, and of first impressions I am exceedingly wary (often as one returns to those treacherous incidents of perception), yet for once I shall launch a sweeping opinion that is no better grounded. At the risk of some day having to eat my words, I found this Tcherepnin opus an aimless, deafening, unconscionable bore.

Dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, the three pieces were play quite magnificently.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 17 1933

Boston Symphony Season On

Conductor Koussevitzky Offers Novelty by Techerepnin, Expatriated Russian.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its local season in Carnegie Hall last evening. Like his predecessors, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Mr. Koussevitzky invited the attention of his audience to a novelty. This was "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," by Nicolai Techerepnin, born in Leningrad in 1873 and now one of the expatriated Russians dwelling in Paris.

The tale which fired the composer's fancy was "The Masque of the Red Death."

Tcherepnin became acquainted with Poe through Baudelaire's translation. Probably that is a better rendering of the unique American than Tcherepnin's. It is not essential to the purpose of this brief report on Mr. Koussevitzky's novelty to summarize the content of Poe's grewsome tale of a Prince's vain effort to escape a plague. The composer has endeavored to put into music the hall of the ebony clock, the fete at which the Prince and his companions reveled in fancied safety, and the triumph of fate in the entry of the red death and the destruction of the revelers.

Everything except a saxophone is employed in the score—a small army of oboes, English horns, clarinets, bassoons and brass instruments, tambourines, cymbals, triangle, Tamtam, castanets, xylophone, chimes, small bells, piano, celesta, organ and two harps, beside the noble company of strings. There is a magnificent display of orchestration. There are many familiar devices in the thematic content, including an overworked chromatic scale, which may be supposed to represent the shivers coursing down the spines of the Prince and his guests.

Listening to this prodigious composition one felt that he would have been more moved if the musician had tried to publish his emotions aroused by reading Poe's tale. But instead of that Tcherepnin chose the venerable and obvious method of tonal description of incidents. This kind of music seldom soars toward the stars. It most frequently capers ineffectively on the cold, cold ground. And that is what it did in Tcherepnin's composition. We have rarely listened to a heavier, duller and more stupefying work. The Bostonians performed it superbly, but it was not in their power to breathe into it the breath of life.

It was preceded by Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which is not unfamiliar to New York music lovers. It was introduced by Pierre Monteux in 1920. It has the characteristic depth and color of Ravel's orchestration and his opulance of advanced harmony which he always employs with skill and taste. The concert concluded with the second symphony of Sibelius. The audience bestowed its greatest applause on Mr. Koussevitzky, when it heartily welcomed him to the platform. It made a much smaller demonstration when he stepped down after leading the orchestral riot of his Russian friend.

N.Y. EVENING POST

NOV 17 1933

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Boston Symphony Begins New York Concerts Under Koussevitzky With a Novelty After Poe

FOR the forty-eighth time in as many years, the Boston Symphony began a series of New York concerts last night, returning to Carnegie Hall for its first visit of the current season, once more under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestra and conductor were greeted heartily by a large audience in which were to be recognized patrons and subscribers of many years' standing. The evening was one of cordial applause, with something more than that at the climactic conclusion of the Second Symphony of Sibelius, placed last on the program. The heroic sonorities of the apotheosis of this bardic work created much the same stir as when Mr. Koussevitzky last conducted the symphony in New York.

The program contained a novelty, freshly imported from Paris, in the form of the elder Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe"; his Opus 59. As indicated by some lines in French quoted as clews to the descriptive and dramatic content of the three pieces, they are "after Baudelaire" as well as "after Poe." From the French poet's translation of "The Masque of the Red Death," Tcherepnin derived the program material for his music, which seeks to picture in musical terms, first "The Room of the Ebony Clock," then "A Revel" and finally the appearance of the specter of the dread plague and the ghastly struggle that ensues, with the fateful clock sounding the chimes of death.

Uses Large Orchestra

NIKOLAI TCHEREPNIN, like his son, Alexandre, is a composer of skill and resource. In this music he has employed a large orchestra in a manner to suggest sometimes his master, Rimsky-Korsakoff, sometimes Rimsky's greater confrere, Moussorgsky, and sometimes their all too versatile heir, Igor Stravinsky. Save, however, for an inescapable reminder of the striking clocks of "Boris Godounoff," he has written music that is not conspicuously derivative. It is most effective at the outset and again at the close, with some glassy descending passages in the violins creating momentarily an atmosphere as eerie as is Poe's.

Otherwise, the work scarcely rises above mediocrity either as music of independent appeal or as a tonal transcription of the tale. The revel is ingenious and amply vigorous but scarcely orgiastic. The music of the specter evokes nothing of dread or awe. The composer has done well with his material, but not well enough to make it the equivalent of "The Masque of the Red Death." After all, Poe had genius.

Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," with its delicate and irisated sonorities, was gracefully and adroitly performed as the curtain-raiser of the concert.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

NOV 18 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

The valiance with which Serge Koussevitzky espouses the cause of composers who are still alive is something to cheer about. Still I cannot help feeling that this valiance got the better of him when he chose Nikolai Tcherepnin's Three Pieces for Orchestra after Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death" for the novelty of Thursday evening's typically brilliant Boston Symphony concert at Carnegie Hall, the first of the season. Redundant, prolix, pretentious and singularly ineffective in creating any of the macabre "creepiness" of Poe's works, this work suffered by contrast with the magnificent Ravel "Tombeau de Couperin," which preceded it and the majestic Sibelius Second Symphony which followed. Extended comment on these selections is unnecessary. Suffice it to record that the virtuosity of the Boston musicians gave new cause for rejoicing, and that the evening as a whole resulted in new glory for the group. The large audience was whipped into an ovation by the Sibelius piece.

Greater tribute to the rendition of the Ravel selection cannot be paid than by mentioning that, when the end of the Menuet movement was at hand, and an auto horn in Fifty-seventh street had to sound, it sounded in tune! So bewitching is the orchestra.

N. Y. EVENING POST

NOV 17 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its first concert of the season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music tonight, the program being as follows: Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme," Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Beethoven's Third Symphony.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 17 1933

MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall.

THE PROGRAM:

"Le Tombeau de Couperin"—
Suite for ochestra....Maurice Ravel
Three Pieces for Orchestra, after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe
(Opus 59)........Nikolai Tcherepnin
(First performance in New York)
Symphony No. 2 in D
(Opus 43)...............Jan Sibelius

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians over whom he presides moved sedately into Carnegie Hall last night, dispensing a program which, while it gave us ample cause to hail the glories of sublime performance, left us to wonder why Mr. Koussevitzky had undertaken the ungrateful task of painting a cabbage to look like a rose.

The cabbage, in this case, was a pretentious discourse by Mr. Tcherepnin the elder, having to do with that tale by Edgar Allan Poe, "Mask of the Red Death." The composer turned to the Baudelaire translation in French, rather literal and therefore reverent, of the Poe story. His score is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky.

To me it is a hodge-podge of piffle, cleverly orchestrated, and strained at every seam by the urge to be "different." It was accorded a performance immeasurably better than it deserved.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra performed the Ravel piece, uninteresting save in the color and dexterity of the Ravel orchestration, with the utmost nicety and elan. The murmuring pines and the hemlock, occasionally translated to the farmhouse of the Finnish countryside, which impress Sibelius in most of his musical moments, appeared again before the audience as Dr. Koussevitzky began the second symphony. Its hints of Tchaikowsky, to which Mr. Cecil Gray alludes, are not intrusive. There is a certain pervasive sweep of the outdoors, a peasant honesty about it that I have found most satisfying.

66

Times Nov 17

AMUSEMENTS

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

AUDIENCE CHEERS FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony and Its Director Are Acclaimed at First Concert Here.

STIRRING SIBELIUS FINALE

Second Symphony Seen as Having Come Into Its Own—Tcherepnin Work in Premiere Here.

By OLIN DOWNES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave its first New York program of the season last night in Carnegie Hall, with a finale, in the form of Sibelius's Second symphony, which drew shouts and cheers from the audience. This is not astonishing in view of the heroic and dramatic character of the score, the immense simplicity of the themes and instrumentation, and its orchestral background, so picturesque, so thrilling, of the wild North.

This symphony is in the earlier style of Sibelius. It does not offer the subtle harmonic characteristics, the economical orchestration, the wholly unprecedented treatment of themes that occur in later works. The Second symphony speaks with the large utterance of the early gods. Here Sibelius needed no subtleties and would not have availed himself of them if they had been within his knowledge. He speaks, instead, with a Northern grandeur of ancient and ancestral things.

His accents are those of his forefathers. At a stroke, at the very beginning, in a measure, he evokes the Northern landscape, melancholy solitudes, silence made the more pervasive by the soughing of winds over the waste and the lonely cries of animals. Then there are the sullen forebodings, the angry protests of the instruments, the voices that prophesy war.

The vast second movement, in which the orchestra broods and mutters and at times sings with a sweet and sad lyricism, now reminisencent of Tchaikovsky, now of something far more Scandinavian, is in itself an immense saga. The tale begins with the narrative of the bassoons, the strange pluckings of the basses, it continues with always more intensity of expression and mood. The sombre reverberations, the shrill outcries of drums and brasses and wind instruments, give place to music that has the very scent of the warm and fleeting Spring.

The Scherzo: The tempest whirls down, and then, after a pause, the pastoral song of the oboe carries with it a profound nostalgia, a memory of things gentler than the grim and frozen landscape. The movement sweeps directly into the finale, with its chant that is battle-drunk, and the roar of surf, and the steady and irresistible march, through all the registers of the orchestra, of the central theme. The climax prepares with the trombones, that roar joyfully like old dragons in their lairs, and the shouting of the trumpet, and the peroration which is as the vision of Walhalla and the drinking bouts and quarrels and wish-maidens, visioned by those about to perish in conflicts under black, Northern skies.

This symphony, which for many years appeared to conductors a frigid and forbidding score, has now come into its own. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is largely responsible for this, has reaped extraordinary success with it. Its actual musical material is no longer recondite, but indeed obvious. It is only protected from banality by its tremendous spirit and grip and stride. It is obviously, about to become a popular favorite, and the dangerous time is near when it will rank with the music of Tchaikovsky as surefire with an audience. But its quality of Northern myth and the composer's heroic vision, and the stark strength of his inspiration and work will long hold the music secure in the public heart and mind.

The novelty of the concert was the first New York performance of Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra after a tale of Edgar Allan Poe." These pieces, dedicated to Mr. Koussevitzky, were completed last year in Paris. The tale that inspired them is "The Masque of the Red Death," as translated by Baudelaire. The different parts treat of the hall of the ebony clock that strikes the fatal hour: the dancing, and the appearance of the spectre. The orchestra employed is a very large modern band. Modern, contemporaneous, is the harmonic quality of the music, well received by an audience favorably disposed toward Mr. Tcherepnin's talent.

At the beginning of the concert Mr. Koussevitzky and his men played Ravel's suite for orchestra, "Tombeau de Couperin." The music is fascinating because of its ingenious and highly sophisticated harking back to the style of an earlier age. It is consummately finished and distinctive in technic, offering the most delicate and precise juxtaposition of opposing orchestral timbres, and the most adroit disposition of old rhythms and melodic figures suggested by them. The whole thing is graceful, aristocratic, sometimes poetical and more often sardonic, and it is another one of the little monuments that Ravel will have left behind him, testimony to his art, his cunning and skill. The orchestra of the Boston, with its suppleness, finesse and individual prowess of the members is ideally fitted to present this entertaining music.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 17 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY PERFORMS WORK BY RUSSIAN MODERNIST

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

Has the visit of Litvinoff brought about the deluge of his country's music that is engulfing New York these days? Two orchestras gave all-Russian programs recently, and last evening there was another bow in the direction of Moscow. It was made by the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, with Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces" opus 59 (based on Edgar Allan Poe's tale, "The Masque of the Red Death"), their first local performance.

Affixed Tcherepnin's score, as a key to the three movements, are quotations from Baudelaire's French translation of the Poe story. In the music the sections are called "In the Room of the Ebony Clock," "A Revel" and "Fate" (with subdivisions). The composition, written in Paris, 1931-32, is dedicated to Mr. Koussevitszky, who premiered it at Boston last month.

New York's acquaintance with the Tcherepnin muse antedates the concert of last evening, and the metropolis has successfully survived the melodically sterile and emotionally dry products from the pen of the Russian modernist. He is adept with the mere technics of orchestration, but one always feels that the result is essentially facture without feeling. Now and then in the "Three Pieces," Tcherepnin catches the macabre spirit of Poe's narrative of pestilence and death, but on the whole the music chatters and gibbers without striking any truly imaginative note or suggesting any impulse beyond mental drive. When the composition sounded its finish, the fame of Poe remained secure, but Tcherepnin had added nothing to his artistic stature in this bailiwick.

The rest of the Koussevitszky program offered the charming and beautifully orchestrated "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite by Ravel, which the conductor and his orchestra made into a series of enchanting pastels in tone; and the second symphony, by Sibelius, who was once a talent and is now being belatedly publicized as a genius. Sibelius labors mountainously in his symphonic scores and brings forth inspirational mice. Not even the devoted interpretation and fervent playing heard last evening made the majority of hearers ready to accept the Sibelius symphony as a towering masterpiece. That composer is a Finnish cross between Mahler and Bruckner. In a few years he will be best remembered by his bit of tonal treacle, the "Valse Triste."

N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 17 1933

Music

'The Red Death' Impressive

By Henriette Weber

Three thousand human beings sat in a daze last night after the last gripping measures of "The Red Death" had intoned a fateful message. It seemed like an endless pause before rustlings and murmurs from various parts of Carnegie Hall proclaimed that the audience was coming to. Then came wave after wave of ever-increasing applause for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his superbly trained orchestra.

The occasion was the concert of the Boston Symphony, beginning its forty-eighth New York season. The mimediate cause of the audience's strange behavior was the exciting orchestral tone painting of Edgar Allen Poe's "The Mask of the Red Death," by Nicolai Tcherapnin, a Russian composer now living in Paris.

The work has the simple title of "Three Pieces for Orchestra." They are played without pause, and their character indicated by the composer's outline: "In the Room of the Ebony Clock." "A Revel." "Fate—The Spectre—The Last Struggle—Chimes of Death."

It is gorgeous modern writing, so highly dramatic that the audience sat tense and strained, and had to get itself together after Dr. Koussevitzky had quietly laid down his baton. The score it dated "Paris—1931-32," and was performed from manuscript. It is dedicated to the Boston conductor who gave it its first American hearing in Boston last month.

The concert opened with "The Tomb of Couperin" in which Ravel, the modern Frenchman, molds his twentieth century musical ideas into acient dance forms as reminiscent of the deathless music Couperin wrote in the Seventeenth Century. Here too, Dr. Koussevitzky gave ample proof that he is without question one of the very greatest of conductors—and one of the quietest! The concert closed with the second Sibelius Symphony.

The Boston visitors will open their afternoon series at Carnegie Hall, tomorrow at 2:30.

* * *

the Hippodrome, will celebrate her birthday with her first American appearanee in this role. Members of the Women's University Club, and of the Woman's Club of New Rochelle and of Mt. Vernon, will attend in honor of the young artist's birthday. Miss Powers, by the way, is another one of the artistic products of the Frank La Forge Studios.

* * *

The two pianists of the Joos Ballet, Fritz Cohen and Hans Muller-Kray, are to go on the air Nov. 18, from 6:15 to 6:30, over WEAF.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION

1933

VARI

By WILLA

Philip Hale has retired as music editor of the Boston Herald and editor of the Boston Symphony program books. ~~His successor~~ on the Herald is George S. MacManus, with Alexander Williams as assistant. John N. Burke, a member of the Symphony Hall staff, follows him as editor of the program books.

"Musical America" points out that ever since he began writing for the Boston papers in 1890, Mr. Hale has made steady and illuminating contributions to a general knowledge of music. He first was on the Post, which he left in 1891 to join the Journal, where he remained until his association with the Herald began in 1903.

Although many regard Mr. Hale only as a brilliant and trenchant newspaper writer, older musicians have not forgotten that he was a church organist who held leading posts of this nature in Albany and Troy, N. Y., and in Roxbury.

Born in Norwich, Vt., Mr. Hale attended Phillips-Exeter Academy and Yale University. His first profession was that of the law. He abandoned the bar to which he was admitted in Albany and went abroad in 1882 to study music in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart and Paris with such masters as Raif, Guilmant, Bargiel and Rheinberger. Returning to Albany he conducted the Schubert Club of Albany for several years before identifying himself permanently with Boston and Boston newspapers.

His annotations and program notes for the Boston Symphony, carried on regularly since 1901 constitute an inexhaustible library of rare interest and authoritativeness.

Mr. MacManus, who takes up Mr Hale's work on the Herald was formerly on the music faculty of the University of California and more recently a teacher at the New England Conservatory of Music. A bachelor of music of Edinburgh University, Mr. MacManus has made American tours as a pianist in such company as Pablo Casals, Georges Enesco and Roszi Varady.

Mr. Burke, a graduate of Harvard University, is already known for his share in the production of a book about the Boston Symphony.

* * *

Brook

Dr.
Sciences occasion
tra. In Educati and Mr

Brooklyn,

NOV

The Bost Plays at

The Boston
pened its 48t
ith a concert
ight. Serge ucted. The avel's "Tom
Three Pieces f ale by Edga cherepnin, a ymphony. Th
ovelty—a wo
ificance, evo
Poe's "Masque
The audience politely. The ng trifles, M often conducte
Sibelius symp
both these wor ul divertissem uestioned ma perlative perf

Boston Syn
47th B

The Boston
oncert tonigh
Music inaugu
the orches his first of a eld at the rts and Scie ersary of Dr adership of vill be comm
The tenth ky exhibition

he beginning
phony Hall, B play in the C night. This paintings an Koussevitzky
well as ph parchments
picting variou

67

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 18 1933

CONDUCTOR HONORED ON 10TH ANNIVERSARY

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky with leading figures of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the floral wreath he received last night at the Academy of Music on the occasion of his tenth anniversary as conductor ctor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In group, left to right, are: Charles D. Atkins, director of the Department of Education; Mme. Koussevitzky, Dr. Koussevitzky, Irene Miles, Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mr. Blum, president of the board of trustees of the Broklyn Institute.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 18 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First Concert of the Season; Box Guests for Event

One of the brilliant openings of the Brooklyn music season took place last night with the first performance of the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a distinguished audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. A feature of the performance was the celebration of the 10th anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra.

Edward C. Blum, president of the Board of Trustees of the Brooklyn Institue of Arts and Sciences, and Mrs. Blum had as their box guests former Justice and Mrs. Norman S. Dike, Mme. Koussevitzky, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Brady, Mrs. Frank Day Tuttle and Thornton Thayer. Mr. and Mrs. Blum entertained at dinner in their home, 45 Plaza St., before the concert.

Preceding the concert members of the sponsoring committee for the series received in the foyer. Receiving were: Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Justice and Mrs. Dike, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromlev. Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. William P. Earle Jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy R. Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow and Mrs. Walter F. Wells.

Richardson Pratt and Mrs. Pratt, who was the hostess in the committee box, had as their guests Mr. and Mrs. Gordon C. Thayer, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur D. Pinkam and Mr. and Mrs. James Kellum Smith.

The Misses Virginia Felter, Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Leslie Olcott, Sally Harding, Betty Lathrop and Stella Rae Carter occupied the Junior League box. Their guests were C. T. Van Woert Jr., Robert Bergen, Stewart Richards, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch, Gregory Price, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbe. Miss Lathrop entertained the group at dinner at her home, 436 Clinton Ave., beforehand.

Occupying the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were William Slater, headmaster of Adelphi Academy, and Mrs. Slater, Mr. and Mrs. John Franklin Moult, Mrs. Harry W. Buchanan, Miss E. Jessie Ogg, Miss Jessie M. Righter and Hector Q. Jackson.

The Misses Phyllis Barnes, Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Louise Goetze and Althea McCammon also occupied a box at last night's performance.

Frank L. Babbott, who has taken two boxes for the season, invited members of the staff of the Woodward School and Packer Institute to be the guests in his boxes last night. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Sprackling, Miss E. Frances Woodward, Miss Nell More, Mrs. Willowdean Handy, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Welch and Miss Carol Preston attended the concert, representing the Woodward School, and members of the faculty of the Packer Collegiate Institute who attended were the Misses Jessie Addoms, Helen Debevoise, Elizabeth Wright and Helen Crossman.

As a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky a laurel wreath was presented to him over the footlights at the beginning of last night's performance. The wreath was presented by ~~the Board of Directors of the~~ Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Following the performance, guests were invited to view the exhibition of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Koussevitzky and also photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitzky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, has held this post the longest consecutive period in its history as successor to such famed leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 18 1933

Boston Symphony Opens Season Here; Institute Directors Honor Dr. Koussevitzky

One of the brilliant openings of the Brooklyn music season took place last night with the rst performance of the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a distinguished audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. A feature of the performance was the celebration of the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Edward C. Blum, president of the board of trustees of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and Mrs. Blum, had as their box guests at the concert former Supreme Court Jpstice and Mrs. Norman S. Dike, Mme. Koussevitzky, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Brady, Mrs. Frank Day Tuttle and Thornton Thayer, Mr. and Mrs. Blum entertained at dinner in their home, No. 45 Plaza street, before the concert.

Mrs. Richardson Pratt, who was hostess in the committee box, had as her guests: Mr. and Mrs. Gordon C. Thayer, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur D. Pinkam, Mr. and Mrs. James Kellum Smith and Mr. Pratt.

The Misses Virginia Felter, Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Leslie Olcott, Sally Harding, Betty Lathrop and Stella Rae Carter occupied the Junior League box. Their guests were C. T. Van Woert, Jr., Robert Bergen, Stewart Richards, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch, Gregory Price, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee.

Occupying the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were William Slater, headcaster of Adelphi Academy and Mrs. Slater, Mr. and Mrs. John Franklin Moult, Mrs. Harry W. Buchanan. Miss E. Jessie Ogg, Miss Jessie M. Righter and Hector Q Jackson.

The Misses Phyllis Barnes, Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Louise Goetz and Althea McCammon also occupied a box at last night's performance.

Frank J. Babbott, who has taken two boxes for the season, invited members of the staff of the Woodward School and the Packer Institute to be the guests in his boxes last night.

Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Sprackling, Miss E. Frances Woodward, Miss Neil More, Mrs. Willowdean Hanry, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Welch and Miss Carol Preston attended the concert representing the Woodward school and members of the faculty of the Packer Collegiate Institute who attended were Miss Jessie Addoms, Miss Helen Debevoise, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Miss Helen Crossman.

Preceding the concert a committee of members of the committee sponsoring the Boston Symphony concerts here, received in the foyer at the rear of the opera house. The group included: Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Justice and Mrs. Dike, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll. Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Crawford, Mrs William P Earle, Jr., Mrs. Summer Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, Jr., Mrs. Charles F. McDermott, Miss Irene Miles, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Mrs. Walter F. Wells.

As a tribute to Dr. Koussevitsky, a laurel wreath was presented to him over the footlights at the beginning of the performance. The wreath was presented by the board of directors of the Brooklyr Institute of Arts and

Following the performance guests were invited to view the exhibition of paintings and sculpture of Dr. Kousevitzky and also photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitzky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, has held this post the longest consecutive period in its history as successor to such famed leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 17 1933

The Boston Symphony Plays at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 48th New York season with a concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussewitsky conducted. The program included Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale by Edgar Allen Poe, by N. Tcherepnin, and Sibelius' second symphony. The Tcherepnin was the novelty—a work of no great significance, evoking episodes from Poe's "Masque of the Red Death." The audience listened and received it politely. The Ravel pieces, charming trifles, Mr. Koussewitsky has often conducted here, as he has the Sibelius symphony. Last evening both these works, the one a delightful divertissement, the other an unquestioned masterwork, received superlative performances.

Boston Symphony Marks 47th Brooklyn Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert tonight at the Academy of Music inaugurates the 47th season of the orchestra in Brooklyn. At this first of a series of five concerts held at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston Symphony will be commemorated.

The tenth anniversary Koussevitzky exhibition, which was shown at the beginning of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be on display in the Opera House lobby tonight. This exhibit consists of paintings and sculptures of Dr. Koussevitzky in various moods, as well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts depicting various phases of his career

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 17 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ACADEMY TONIGHT

Forty-seventh Season of Orchestra in Brooklyn Will Be Inaugurated

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert to-night at the Academy of Music inaugurates the forty-seventh season of the orchestra in Brooklyn. At this first of a series of five concerts, held at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Academy of Music, the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's leadership of the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra will be commemorated.

The progcam for to-night's concert is as follows: Piere, Divertissemente on a Pastoral Theme; Vaughan Williams, Norfolk Rhapsody; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," after the old-fashioned reguish manner in Rondo form; Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E-ffat major, "Eroica."

The tenth anniversary Koussevitzky exhibition, which was shown at the beginning of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, will be on display in the Opera House lobby to-night. This exhibit consists of painting and sculptures of Dr. Koussevitzky in various moods, as well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts depicting various phases of his career.

The four succeeding Friday evening concerts of the current season, as scheduled by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and an enlarged Brooklyn committee, who are sponsoring the series, will be held Jan. 5, Feb. 1, March 2 and April 6.

Boston Symphony Conductor Given Institute Wreath

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's tenth anniversary as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the occasion for a celebration last night before a distinguished Brooklyn audience at the orchestra's first concert in its 6th annual Brooklyn series in the Academy of Music.

As Dr. Koussevitzky appeared on the platform to begin the concert a laurel wreath was presented to him over the footlights by the board of directors of the Brooklyn institute of Arts and Siences.

Following the concert the guests were invited to retire to the foyer of the opera house to view the tenth anniversary Koussevitzky exhibition of sculpture, paintings and photographs of the conductor.

Edward C. Blum, president of the board of trustees of the institute, and Mrs. Blum were hosts to Mme. Koussevitzky and a group of prominent guests in their box during the concert. Prior to the concert they entertained at dinner in their home, 45 Plaza St.

Brooklyn Times Union

NOV 18 1933

Society

Edited by Dorothy White

Boston Symphony Concert Opens Musical Season In a Brilliant Manner

One of the brilliant openings of the Brooklyn music season took place last night with the first performance of the 46th annual Brooklyn concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a distinguished audience at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. A feature of the performance was the celebration of the tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Edward C. Blum, president of the Board of Trustees of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and Mrs. Blum, had as their box guests last night former Justice and Mrs. Norman S. Dike, Mme. Koussevitzky, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Brady, Mrs. Frank Day Tuttle and Thornton Thayer. Mr. and Mrs. Blum entertained at dinner in their home, 45 Plaza st., before the concert.

Preceding the concert a committee of members of the sponsoring committee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra received in the foyer at the rear of the opera house. Receiving last night were: Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Justice and Mrs. Dike, Mrs. Bruce Bromley, Mrs. George E. Brower, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Judge Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Mrs. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles Franklin, Miss Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Mrs. Edwin P. Maynard, jr., Mrs. Charles J. Mc-Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Walter Truslow and Mrs. Walter F. Wells.

Mr. Richardson Pratt and Mrs. Pratt, who was the hostess in the committee box, had as their guests: Mr. and Mrs. Gordon C. Thayer, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur D. Pinkam, Mr. and Mrs. James Kellum Smith.

The Misses Virginia Felted, Janet Collett, Marjorie Findley, Leslie Olcott, Sally Harding, Betty Lathrop and Stella Rae Carter occupied the Junior League box. Their guests were C. T. Van Woert, jr., Robert Bergen, Stewart Richards, Harry Meislahn, Roland Rasch, Gregory Price, Russell Harding and Edward Silsbee.

Occupying the box of the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy were William Slater, headmaster of Adelphi Academy, and Mrs. Slater, Mr. and Mrs. John Franklin Moult, Mrs. Harry W. Buchanan, Miss E. Jessie Ogg, Miss Jessie M. Righter and Hector Q. Jackson.

The Misses Phyllis Barnes, Dorothy Remsen Johnson, Louise Goetze and Althea McCammon also occupied a box at last night's performance.

Frank L. Babbott, who has taken two boxes for the season, invited members of the staff of the Woodward School and the Packer Institute to be the guests in his boxes last night. Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Sprackling, Miss E. Frances Woodward, Miss Nell More, Mrs. Willowdean Handy, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Welch and Miss Carol Preston attended the concert representing the Woodward School and members of the faculty of the Packer Collegiate Institute who attended were Miss Jessie Addoms, Miss Helen Debevoise, Miss Elizabeth Wright, Miss Helen Crossman.

As a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky, a laurel wreath was presented to him over the footlights at the beginning of last night's performance. The wreath was presented by the board of directors of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Following the performance, the guests were invited to view the exhibition of paintings and culpture of Dr. Koussevitzky and also photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. Dr. Koussevitzky, who assumed the role of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924, has held this post the longest consecutive period in its history as successor to such famed leaders as Gericke, Nikisch, Pauer, Muck, Rabaud and Monteux.

Serving as members of the committe for the Brooklyn series of Boston Symphony concerts are:

Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Mr. Juan A. Almirall, Mrs. John Anderson, Mr. Charles T. Atkins, Mr. Frank L. Babbott, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, jr., Hon. William R. Bayes, Dr. Nathan T. Beers, Mr. Edward C. Blum, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Mr. Robert E. Blum, Miss Alice Brinsmade, Dr. W. B. Brinsmade, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Charles R. Buckley, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, Hon. William M. Calder, Mr. J Norman Carpenter, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mr. I Sherwood Coffin, Hon. Frederick E. Crane, Mrs. Frederick L. Cranford, Mr. Walter H. Crittenden, Mrs. Harris M. Crist, Hon. James C. Cropsey, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Hon. Norman S. Dike, Miss Mary E. Dillon, Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier.

Mrs. Guy Duval, Mrs. William P. Earle, jr., Mr. S. Raymond Estey, Mr. Sumner Ford, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mr. Theodore L. Frothingham, Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Mr. Walter Hammitt, Mr. George Hewlett, Mrs. James H. Hills, Miss Amelia B. Hollenbeck, Mr. Alexander C. Howe, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, Mr. William T. Hunter, Mr. Henry A. Ingraham, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Mr. Ralph Jonas, Mr. James H. Jourdan, Mrs. William Kennedy, jr., Mr. Jacob C. Klick, Mr. David A. Lanman, Mr. Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leach, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott and Mrs. William W. Marshall.

Mrs. Frank Melville, jr., Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Alfred E. Mudge, Mrs. Frank C. Munson, Mrs. Charles F. Murphy, Mrs. Burt F. Nichols, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Mrs. George Notman, Mrs. Neilson, Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, Mr. James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Mrs. Benjamin rince, Mr. G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Donald Ross, Mrs. Clinton L. Rossiter, jr., Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Mrs. Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. B. Herbert Smith, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mr. Porter Steele, Mrs. Herman Strutzer, Mrs. John F. Talmage.

Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mr. Thornton C. Thayer, Mr. William Armour Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mr. Carl H. Tollefsen, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Dr. Joshua M. VanCott, Mr. John T. Underwood, Mr. Paul E. Vernon, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, Mrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Miss Josephine D. Wilkin, Dr. Ralph C. Williams, Hon. George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry M. Wingle, Mr. Cornelius D. Wood, Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, Miss Annie S. Wycoff, Mrs. W. H. Ziegler.

Junior League Committee—Chairman: Mrs. Charles Franklin; Mrs. Ronald Hart, Miss Dorothy R. Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Lathrop, Mrs. E. P. Maynard, jr., Miss Elizabeth Pafford, Miss Florence E. Read, Mrs. Robert M. Winslow.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

NOV 18 1933

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Concert Season Here; Serge Koussevitsky Honored

The Brooklyn music season received considerable impetus last evening with the first of the 1933-1934 concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The large and representative audience that crowded the Academy of Music for the occasion stood in tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston musicians, as he stepped to the chrysanthemum banked podium. Immediately preceding the first tap of his baton, Dr. Koussevitzky was presented with a laurel wreath, a tribute of esteem and affection from the board of trustees of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The occasion was mathmatical as well as musical. The concert marked the opening of the forty-sixth annual Brooklyn series of five concerts to be given here by the orchestra and the first of the tenth anniversary appearances here of Dr. Koussevitzky's as leader of the Boston Symphony Orcestra. The concert was the first performance here this season by a major orchestra.

During the intermission and following the concert, guests were invited to inspect the tenth anniversary Koussevitzky exhibition of sculptors, paintings, and photographs of the conductor in the foyer of the opera house.

The program, last night was a notable one. Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 was presented as the first half. Following the intermission three selections from the works of composers still living were played. They were the Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 49 of Pierne, Norfolk Rhapsody. No. 1 of Vaughan Williams and Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in rondo-form, Op. 28 of Strauss.

The symphony, a mighty work, the composer's tribute to Napoleon was interpreted in the lofty manner. Dr. Koussevitzky more than "pleased" his audience. He stirred them with his reading of the second movement, the funeral march; the sad, dirge-like wail rose and fell with measured beat which seemed to toll the passing of a great hero. Followed by the lively, rapid scherzo, the whole effect of the symphony and its rendition was the more striking.

In the second half of the program the Strauss selection was the most interesting. The Till Eulenspiegel pranks were played by the orchestra in almost pictorial form. The haunting, constantly recurring little phrases of the work are such passages with which Dr. Koussevitzky can always charm an audience.

The Pierne composition, the theme of which is first introduced by the English horn, and the Williams composition were perhaps a bot lost in the mid-ribs of a concert which opened with the "Eroica" and closed with "Till Euleniegel." The Pierne piece was pleasing, especially in the passages in which the wind instruments were called upon for performance. A Viennese waltz interweaves the theme most pleasantly while a "cortege blues" by the muted trumpets leads the theme into a new rhythm. The passage of the blues is such as to make one forget for a few moments that one is attending a symphony concert and not hearing a first-rate jazz band.

The Koussevitzky exhibition, which has been arranged in connection with the conductor's tenth anniversary as leader of the orchestra will remain on view at the Academy of Music until January.

The exhibition consists of sculpture and paintings of Dr. Koussevitzky aes well as photographs, sketches, parchments and manuscripts relating to his career. The artists depict the conductor in various moods and modes.

HONORED AT CONCERT

(World Wide Photo.)

The tenth anniversary of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (above) as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was ceelbrated last night at the orchestra's first concert in its forty-sixth annual Brooklyn series before a distinguished and enthusiastic audience in the Academy of Music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Brooklyn, N. Y. Eagle

NOV 18 1933

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra Open Their Brooklyn Season With Beethoven, Pierne, Vaughan Williams and Strauss

When Mr. Koussewitsky and the Boston Orchestra play in Brooklyn it is not always possible to tell whether one is listening to new music or to music one has had at least an opportunity of hearing before. Mr. Koussewitsky frequently gives precedence to Brooklyn over Manhattan when introducing novelties in New York, but his Brooklyn following is never appraised of the fact, as it might be, quite simply, by printing the conventional formula, First Time at These Concerts, after the name of the novelty in the program. Instead, a subscriber to the Academy of Music concerts of the Bostonians must rely on his memory to tell him that he has or has not heard before this work or that by a contemporary composer, the date of which is recent and the name of which is unfamiliar.

I am quite certain, for example, that last night's program—the first that the Boston Orchestra has offered at the Academy this season — included a novelty in Pierne's Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme. The program notes assigned the composition of this work to 1931, and I am sure that had it been heard here before in the short interval since then, I should have remembered it, inconsequential though it is. I think that both Mr. Koussewitsky and the institute, which sponsors his Brooklyn concerts, are overlooking something here, for an audience likes to be told when it has the privilege of hearing something for the first time — however unimportant the novelty may be, it listened to it with livelier interest, knowing that it is a novelty.

Last evening the Pierne was played following Beethoven's third symphony and the intermission, introducing the second part of the program. It proved a negligible piece, even for Pierne to have turned out, but pleasant to listen to. Pierne has taken a theme of rather unpromising character and developed it in a series of rather ingenious variations which include a waltz, a "blues," and a brilliant gigue finale. Had he preserved triple time throughout the piece, he might have called it a Passacaglia—a more impressive title than Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme and one which conveys an idea of the form in which the greater part of the work appears to have been written. The instrumentation is unusually felicitous, the source of much of the charm of the piece.

From Pierne, Mr. Koussewitsky turned to Vaughan Williams, whose Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1, may also have been performed on this occasion for the first time in Brroklyn. We hear too little of Vaughan Williams' music. Few of his compositions have been played in this country and those few infrequently, yet he has written many fine things; his is the rare attribute of an essentially poetic imagination through which experience sifting leaves behind a precious residium. The Norfolk Rhapsody is not one of the best things he has given us, but it reveals his special quality, in its twilight mood, its nostalgis harking back to a past of which only the most affective aspects are conveyed to us in English folksong.

Mr. Koussewitsky's program concluded with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The first part was, as I have said, given over to the "Eroica." The orchestra played superbly under a conductor who this season completes a term of 10 years as its executive head—an anniversary commemorated at the Academy last night in a collection of pictures and sculptures of Mr. Koussewitsky, shown at the rear of the auditorium.

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting. At the Academy of Music last night, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute.

THE PROGRAM

Beethoven	Third Symphony
Pierne.	Divertisement on a Pastoral Theme
Vaughan William.	Norfolk Rhapsody
Strauss	"Till Eulenspiegel"

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 19 1933

Concert on Tuesday Night Is Important Musical Event

Providence Symphony Orchestra to Open Its Season With Program Featured by Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and New Choral Work

The concert by the Providence Symphony Orchestra, Wassili Leps, conductor, in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night, is a musical event of unusual importance to this city. It will be the opening of the season for the orchestra and will feature the first presentation in Providence of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the specially organized Providence Symphony Chorus of more than 100 voices and a selected quartet of soloists. Of further interest will be the premiere of a choral work, "The Primal Note," poem by Caroline Hazard, music by Mr. Leps, written specially as an introductory number and dedicated to the people of Providence.

Another important musical affair of the week is the Memory Day organ recital for Edgar John Lownes by Marcel Dupre, the eminent French player, in Sayles Hall, Brown University, Saturday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The public is invited.

This afternoon at 4 o'clock the Oratorio Society continues its series of presentations with Saint-Saen's opera, "Samson and Delilah," in the auditorium of the Elmwood Congregational Church, Elmwood avenue and Greenwich streets. The doors will be open at 3 o'clock and the public is invited. The opera, in oratorio form, is included in this year's program at the insistent requests of many of the Society's followers. William W. DeRoin is the director and the cast will be as follows: Delilah, Eva G. McMahon; Samson, William W. DeRoin; High Priest of Dagon, James King; Abimelech, Satrap of Gaza, James King; an Old Hebrew, Arthur L. Elvin; Philistine Messenger, Vernon Morrell; First Philistine, Stanley Hall; Second Philistine, Arthur L. Elvin. The accompanists are Medora Ladeveze, organist, and Charles D. Fiske, pianist.

Announcements for the week follow:

TUESDAY

Providence Symphony Orchestra, Wassili Leps, conductor. Providence Symphony Chorus, soloists—Lucia Chagnon, soprano; Marjorie Peugnet, contralto; William W. DeRoin, tenor; Igor Gorin, baritone, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:30 p. m.

"The Primal Note" .... Leps
(Poem by Caroline Hazard: dedicated to the people of Providence)
"Dream Pantomime," from "Hansel and Gretel" .... Humperdinck
Overture, "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
Symphony No. 9, opus 125 .... Beethoven
  Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso
  Scherzo, molto vivace
  Adagio molto e cantabile
Choral Finale on Schilelr's "Ode to Joy"

SATURDAY

Memory Day organ recital for Edgar John Lownes, all-Bach program. Marcel Dupre, Sayles Hall, Brown University, 4:30 p. m.

1. Fantasy and Fugue in G-minor
2. Three Chorales:
   "Oh Man Bewail Thy Sins"
   "In Thee Is Joy"
   "Awake, Ye Christians"
3. Sonata in E-flat major
   Allegro-Andante-Finale
4. Sinfonia from 29th Cantata
5. Prelude and Fugue in A-minor
6. Three Chorales:
   "Christ Lay in the Bands of Death"
   "In Dulci Jubilo"
   "Rejoice, Ye. Christians"
7. Toccata and Fugue in D-minor

NEWS AND COMMENT

"Samson and Delilah," which the Oratorio Society is singing this afternoon, brought fame to its composer with the success that came from the start. The work was written in 1877 and first presented under the patronage of Liszt in Weimar, Germany, in December of that year. Its first great performance occurred in Paris at the National Academy of Music in 1892. Delilah was sung by Rosina Block, Samson by Talazac, and the High Priest by Jacques Bouhy. The opera was received with unbounded enthusiasm and has been very popular ever since.

It has been staged many times by the Metropolitan Opera in New York and the Civic Opera in Chicago, with many of operas luminaries appearing in the stellar roles.

"Samson and Delilah" is included in the repertoire of most oratorio societies, both here and abroad. The composer himself directed his work in oratorio form in Brussels in 1878. As one critic has said, the operatic presentation gives the effect of dramatic oratorio rather than that of lyric opera. It is frequently included in the program of the Worcester Festival, having ben presented there nine times in little over 20 years.

Among the musical gems are "The Spring With Her Dower," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," one of the most famous of contralto arias; "Oh Love! of Thy Might Let Me Borrow," "Doubt Not the God Above You," "Who Dares Raise the Voice of Pride?" and "Hearest Thou, O God, from Thy Throne."

◆ ◆ ◆

At the 75th anniversary service at 11 o'clock this morning, the choir of 35 men and boys of All Saints' Memorial Church will give the following program under the direction of Roy P. Bailey, organist and choirmaster: Te Deum Laudamus in B-flat, Stanford; Jubilate Deo in E, Horatio Parker; Prayer Anthem, "Bless the Lord, O My Soul," Ippolitof—Ivanof; Psalm C L, Cesar Franck; Benediction response, "To Thee We Sing," Arensky. Preceding the service, organ selections will include Benediction, Saint-Saens; Chorale Prelude, "Das Alte Jahr Vergangen Ist", Bach, and Rhapsodie No. 3 on Breton Melodies, Saint-Saens. The Postlude will be Final, Premiere Symphonie, MaQuaire.

◆ ◆ ◆

The MacDowell Club meets tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock at the home of Miss Louise Bixby, 50 Lenox avenue, with Miss Lylia Ellis as assisting hostess. The program will be as follows: Piano solos, "The Pines," H. Alexander Matthews; Etude, Schutte, "Melodie," Rachm off, Miss Elizabeth Higgins. So solos, "Humoresque," Dvorak; anni ade," Schubert; "Spring," Hilda prano Carl Schrayssheun, Miss Loui Seren- violin; Miss Louise Waterma h. Mrs. Mrs. Louise F. Durfee, accompa Bixby. lin solos, "Legende," Wieniaw 'cello; price Viennois," Kreisler, Mrs. nist. Violerts; Mrs. Mildred Foote, acc ski; "Ca- Musical items, Mrs. James Lut Eva Robompanist. her.

◆ ◆ ◆

The fall musicale of the Wo publican Club will be held Fr men's Renoon at 2:30 o'clock in the he day afterat 63 Washington street. Or adquarters gram are Miss Hazel Lenberg the prowho will sing two groups of soprano. folk songs in costume, and M Swedish garet Prew, flutist. Miss Louis iss Marwill be the accompanist. The e Winsor ments are under the direction arrange- Ada Holding Miller. of Mrs.

TO GIVE "RUDDIGORE" IN CONCERT FORM

The operetta "Ruddigore," b and Sullivan, will be sung in Gilbert form by a group of 20 well kno concert ers under the direction of John wn singer at Churchill House on the eve B. Arch-Tuesday, Nov. 28, at 8:30 o'clock ning of Thomas Crosby, Jr., will act as Prof. preter, telling the story and imperso intering the characters of the piece. nat- Ruth Tripp will be at the piano. "Ruc and gore," the third in the famous series di- operettas, has been infrequently pe o formed in this country but contains wealth of sprightly music which clothes Gilbert's delicious plot, this time satirizing the blue blood of Old England.

During the past few years, these singers have given "Patience," "Iolanthe," and "The Gondoliers" in this unpretentious manner and this fall they will come before the general public, using the title of "The Savoyards," which characterized the original D'Oyley Carte Company who performed the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas at the Savoy Theatre in London. The group comprises the following singers: Sopranos—Louise Tracy Arnold, Harriet Carpenter Eden, Ann Skeffington, Alice Parker Southey, Eunice Standish; Contraltos—Elsie Lovell Hankins, May Stockwell Hiller, Irma Howe, Ivy Cook Morris, Ruth Vining Wilks; Tenors—Howard C. Arnold, Preston F. Ralph H. Hankins, Donald Walter R. Mo ner, Geo Rober

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DEC. 5

On Dec. 5, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the first of its four concerts in this city, and appearing for the first time in the Metropolitan Theatre. A special box set has been built on the stage so that the orchestra may be heard in its full tonal brilliance and the large stage itself will easily accommodate the entire personnel of 110 Succeeding Providence concerts will take place on Jan. 16, March 13 and April 10.

This is the 53rd season of the great orchestra and the 10th under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, whose term now exceeds in length any continuous term by the former conductors of this orchestra. The personnel, in many ways the most brilliant which has been assembled in a single orchestra, continues virtually unchanged from a number of seasons past. It was a principle which first brought the orchestra to world preeminence that a permanent personnel under a single conductor, unhampered in his artistic aims, is the true road to orchestral greatness.

The season has begun notably in Boston and other cities. An outstanding event was the western tour of the orchestra last month which included a sensational concert in Chicago, which had not been visited for three years. The Boston Symphony, unlike any other, has extended its travelling schedule this season. There are to be three concerts each in Baltimore, Washington, D. C.—the first of these having been given in the week past. The opening concerts of the series in New York took place last Thursday and Saturday.

The Harvard Club of Rhode Island, of which George S. Squibb is President, is bringing the Harvard University Instrumental Clubs for a concert and dance at Agawam Hunt Friday evening, Dec. 22. The instrumental clubs were organized when the Harvard Glee Club went musically "highbrow," as the expression goes. They include banjo and mandolin units and the so-called "Gold Coast Orchestra" and vocalists, and their function is to preserve the lighter and traditional type of program of such college organization. As present arrangements go the orchestra and specialists will entertain during dinner at the club, followed by a concert program and dance.

◆ ◆ ◆

A piano and xylophone musicale will be held this afternoon at 3:15 o'clock by the Progressive Musicians Club at the studio of Mrs. Gertrude Greenhalgh Walker, 956 York avenue, Pawtucket.

Marcel Dupre

Noted French organist will appear in Memory Day recital for Edgar John Lownes in Sayles Hall, Brown University, Saturday afternoon.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 18 1933

Boston Symphony Concerts to Start

First of Four Providence Appearances Will Be Made December 5.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of four symphony concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, December 5. This, the 53rd season of the great orchestra and the 10th under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has begun notably in Boston and other cities. In a recent visit to Chicago as part of a western tour, the orchestra played with nothing less than a sensational success. The orchestra this week is giving its first concerts of the season in New York, and likewise in Washington, D. C., and Baltimore—in which two cities there are to be a series for the first time in a number of seasons.

For the Providence concerts, season tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

On the stage of the Metropolitan Theatre a special box set has been constructed in order to give the audiences the full tonal brilliance of the orchestra. The concerts will take place on December 5, January 16, March 13 and April 10.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAVENPORT, IOWA
Democrat & Leader

NOV 19 1933

Serge Koussevitzky is planning to conduct a Beethoven cycle with the Boston Symphony orchestra. The concerts will be given on Tuesday afternoons beginning Nov. 21. At this series three overtures, "Leonore," the "Coriolanus" and "Prometheus," will be given. The music to Goethe's Egmont, the Fifth Piano concerto, the triple concerto and all of Beethoven's symphonies will be played. Arturo Toscanini will follow the same plan with the New York

(Continued From Preceding Page)

Philharmonic when he returns from Europe.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE NEW YORK
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
No Connection with any other ROMEIKE

220 WEST 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

NOV 17 1933

Civic Music Group Announces Plans

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Here Dec. 11

The Worcester Civic Music Association, which will occupy the auditorium during its fourth concert series has announced its schedule of concerts for the season which includes the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, directing, will be heard Monday evening, Dec. 11, at 8.15 o'clock. The local concert will be one of the organization's first concert tour.

Florence Austral, soprano and John Amadio, her flutist husband, will be the artists in the recital scheduled for Wednesday evening, Jan. 17.

The following month, on Feb. 6, the Tokatyan Trio, comprising Armand Tokatyan, Egyptian tenor; Hans Hess, 'cellist, and Sonia Sharnova, contralto, will be heard.

Mischa Levitzki, reknown pianist, will be the recitalist for the Feb. 27 concert.

The season will conclude with a recital by Efrem Zimbalist, the great violinist, March 6.

No tickets to these concerts may be sold, admission open only to members of the Civic Music Association. These memberships were issued early in the fall and the membership list closed until the beginning of next season. The Rev. Dr. Thomas Sherrard Roy is president.

The talent committee which arranged for the concerts comprises Hamilton B. Wood, Miss Fanny A. Hair, Wilfred B. Feiga, Mrs. Marshall N. Goold, Charles A. Grosvenor, and Mrs. Alfred J. Pearson.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 19 1933

PHILIP HALE'S WORK

Contribution of Distinguished Critic Who For a Period Lays Down His Pen

By OLIN DOWNES.

MR. PHILIP HALE, the very distinguished music critic of The Boston Herald, has relinquished his task, at least for a season, to take a much-needed rest from his arduous and modest labors. His readers and colleagues of two continents will sorely miss his writings, however ably his department of The Herald may be represented.

Not only in Boston, where he is lonely and unrivaled, but in the world of English letters that concern music (Mr. Hale's singular versatility and brilliancy in other fields than music must go unmentioned here), he is a man whose international reputation as critic and writer could only be conditioned by his reticence in all that concerned his personal interests.

He was once well called by the late James Huneker "the phenomenal Philip Hale." Nothing offers stronger justification of the adjective than Mr. Hale's sense of proportion and his almost abnormal conscience about everything pertaining to his labors. A pettier man, with less equipment and influence, would have become inflated and dogmatic. Mr. Hale's cultural perspective would have apprised him, had that been necessary with one of his character, of the limitations of knowledge and the human mind, and the fallibility of opinion.

Persistently he has refused offer after offer, however advantageous, of publishers and editors who wished him to put within covers more durable than those of newspapers, program books, periodicals the fruits of his study, imagination and capacity for original thinking. From his example certain of his colleagues might have taken a lesson. Mr. Hale worked as steadily and unassumingly as any other honest man at his daily task, intent upon the proper fulfillment of its every duty, great or small; concerned only with giving the best in him to his employer, his public and the cause of music.

Those interested directly or indirectly in the useful art of criticism are aware, if they cannot emulate him, of what it means to build upon knowledge as basis for the play of imagination and individual opinion; to estimate at their actual value instead of their popular acceptance precepts which crumble before the onslaught of intellectual honesty; to recognize beauty and genius when and where they appear, regardless of whether tradition and respectability endorse their appearance. From the beginning Philip Hale fought the fight that the man who dares to be himself and maintain his integrity in the face of the normal human hostility to independence must fight, and never stop fighting, in the presence of insistent and resentful mediocrity.

That contest has been Mr. Hale's indulgence as well as his sworn duty. Through the years he has been not only a formidable warrior but an intrepid leader. Those who know the man know his ideality and his warm and profound humanity, often disguised from his fellow-creatures. They know his scorn of compromise and sycophancy, his impulsive, often hot-headed rushing to the defense of that which needed protection. With the reputation, especially in those years when a man's strength and capacity for righteous indignation are at their height, of a merciless and sharp-tongued commentator, Mr. Hale's generous deeds were known to those who could have told of the numerous occasions when he put out a strong hand to help the weak and sustain a good cause against its enemies. He did this from no pharisaical pretension, but simply from the impulse, which he could not control, to strike a blow where it was needed, and often he reaped difficulty and misunderstanding from the occasion.

It is a pleasure to relate that in the exercise of his judgment and his principles Mr. Hale made enemies where a man should make them: among those who dislike fearlessness and unorthodox opinion. The enemies of art are plentiful—the money changers in the temple, the ostensible high priests and benefactors who actually play tricky little games for prizes as petty as they are. When such individuals or conditions were targets of Hale's attack it was a joy to watch the battle, waged with deadly weapons, not the least of which was his priceless sense of humor. These were coupled with the power of the man's sincerity. Other and more easy-going writers were for periods more popular than Hale; also they were regarded with more cordiality in high places. When they countenanced or even encouraged what was commonplace, or forebore to expose in unmistakable terms what was inferior or otherwise injurious to the musical art, they were rated as being more "constructive." It was not in Hale's nature to do that. He condemned as he praised, with an incorrigible thoroughness. And, of course, by the disgruntled ones his inexhaustible enthusiasm for what was great and original passed unnoticed, or was willingly forgotten. Long after Mr. Hale has left us—and may that time be far off—his adventures among masterpieces, his zest and insight and intrepidity of a discoverer of beauty, will mak inspiring reading.

* * *

These qualities and characteristics are the truth of the man and his mind. They are not cited to deny the intensity of his musical reactions and idiosyncrasies, or conclusions which, like those of others, have appeared one-sided. An expressive art has many aspects, and music as many interpretations as the natures of those who listen. Often an unexpected verdict of Hale would be advanced with such force, brilliancy and color in statement that his review brought doubt and consternation to other commentators, equally sincere, but of an opposite persuasion! The future will doubtless show instances when he stood on the wrong instead of the right side of the critical fence; but not many when he failed to provoke thought on the part of the reader.

It is doubtful if any other music critic in this country has written fewer dull articles, or articles more pregnant with ideas expressed in terse, colloquial, finished English, which had the quality of poetry when this was appropriate and desirable.

* * *

In his preparation for musical criticism Mr. Hale was singularly fortunate. Born to write, he took literary prizes at Yale. Always an omnivorous reader, his mind has been schooled in special ways. He graduated at the bar. He has more than once expressed the value he attached to experience of many kinds, reportorial as well as editorial, on newspapers.

His musical training embraced preliminary studies in America, practical experience as organist and years of study abroad in Germany and in France, where he worked under masters of reputation, and where, in the latter country, he added to German methods of study the clarity, the precision, sensitiveness and spirit of French letters and music. He would have been in any case a most brilliant and incisive commentator, but it is evident that, aside from the native quality of his mind, he learned, through his exceptional acquaintance with French culture, to wear his learning lightly and present it in the most striking and assimilable form to the reader.

This background also saved him from the provincialism and fetishism that seems to be a characteristic of much German thinking about music. It is true that Mr. Hale harbored a native and pronounced antipathy to German heaviness, sentimentality and portentousness of style, which he enthusiastically assailed, whether he believed it to exist in Reger or Brahms or Wagner. The reverse of the medal is the curiosity and the quick intuition that he showed in welcoming the music of composers as far apart as Tchaikovsky, new when Hale entered the ring; César Franck when he was viewed as a vague and discordant mystic; the exponents of the Russian school, at the time that Mussorgsky was unknown and Rimsky-Korsakoff a long and queer name in the American musical consciousness; and Debussy when he and his French contemporaries were the wildest revolutionists of all, and the statement that Debussy might be as great and original a composer as Richard Strauss sounded like partisanship or madness. For the French symphonists and impressionistic composers Hale did more than all all his contemporaries put together. Among American composers he was quick to perceive the significance of such opposed figures as MacDowell and Chadwick, Henry Gilbert and Charles Martin Loeffler. He estimated with remarkable justice the character and the worth of Puccini's operas as they came on the boards—"Bohème," "Tosca," and those that preceded and followed. He passionately admired the music of Bach and the clavicenists, and the "Rigoletto" as well as the "Otello" and "Falstaff" of Giuseppe Verdi.

* * *

As for the vistas of information that Mr. Hale has opened for his readers—they are already proverbial. Reference has often been made in these columns to the brilliancy and erudition of the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They, indeed, are inexhaustible and unrivaled mines of information, communicated with a gusto and freshness of style that give the reader the feeling of a companion drawing up to the fire and talking with inexhaustible resource and fascination.

These particular phases of Mr. Hale's critical activities take no account of his work in many other directions than those of music, which for a long period included dramatic criticism; the daily column concerning men and things that he conducted for years for The Boston Journal and Herald; the editorials he wrote, also for many years, for The New Music Review; and the articles which appeared in various other places. How he has accomplished so much, so well, remains rather a mystery, even to his associates. And he is not a man who lifts an article from one place to plant it in another, or who ceaselessly refashions from a small store of original material.

The contrary is true. In each of the places mentioned Mr. Hale did different work; to each one of his literary functions he has given exceptional character and distinction. Readers owe him a debt that is unpayable. No one can replace him, could be substituted, that would fully recompense us for the cessation of his efforts. But the work of the generation that follows Mr. Hale can never go back of a certain level, thanks to his accomplishment and its great and lasting effect.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 19 1933

ON CUTTING A SYMPHONY

To the Music Editor:

Some years ago you did me the honor of publishing a letter of mine in which I commented upon the remarkable habit conductors have fallen into of "cutting" the last movement of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony. I hesitate to intrude upon ou again, lest I appear to take advantage of your courtesy; on the other hand, in view of the Tchaikovsky commemoration, and Bruno Walter's recent performance of this symphony, it may not be altogether inappropriate for me to ask your indulgence for a discussion of this unique matter.

It is customary, at the present time, for all conductors—with the exception of Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Gabrilowitsch—to omit a portion of the finale of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony. Specifically, the cut is made some four bars following letter M, and running to some four bars preceeding letter R. If my memory serves me, Mr. Dobrowen, when he played the work last season, made his own individual contribution by omitting the repetition of the "motto" theme, when it is given out by the brass under the counterpoint figure in the violins. This, however, is not, I believe, customary; the chief cause for wonder and dismay is the fact that such conductors as Mengelberg, Furtwängler, Damrosch and Walter play this finale with approximately a cut of 116 bars—bars which contain, for many of us, the finest music in the symphony.

Mr. Mengelberg, in answering the present writer's criticism of this regrettable procedure, stated that he was authorized to make this cut by the composer's brother, Modest Tchaikovsky. No one doubts Mr. Mengelberg's word; but the fact remains that even with this authorization (assuming there was no misunderstanding), we still prefer the original version; and we wonder how it happens that Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Safonoff and dozens of other Tchaikovsky specialists never used this cut. What is more to the point—what is, indeed, decisive—is the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky emphatically denies the existence of any such authorization. This denial he has made in conversation with the present writer. Mr. Koussevitzky would appear to be our best living authority on Tchaikovsky.

In a day of chaotic change and stress an academic discussion of this sort may seem a little futile. On the other hand, it may be of some slight interest to persons who care for music and who hold Tchaikovsky in affectionate esteem. For it may safely be assumed that if the choice were given the public between the "cut" version of the finale and the published score, the latter would be given the vote.

I would respectfully beg conductors to desist from this regrettable custom. In so far as I know, no other symphony is subjected to this extraordinary treatment, although there are a number of the Brahms and Beethoven symphonies that might benefit, to a far greater degree than the Fifth symphony of Tchaikovsky from deletions. I would again point out that even if Tchaikovsky had indicated this cut, we would be justified in assuming that it was not necessarily a preference on his part. It is doubtless true—as Mr. Furtwängler pointed out to the writer—that the movement gains in symmetry and more nearly approximates the rondo form when played with this cut; but it is likewise true that the biggest moments of the finale are contained in that portion of the work which is now almost invariably omitted.

In conclusion, allow me one word of anticipation. I am aware that this is not a life or death matter, and I am likewise aware that, for the musical highbrow, the fate of Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony is not a matter of particular importance. In my own opinion, it ranks far below the composer's Fourth and Sixth symphonies and his "Francesca da Rimini." The point is, however, that it is a popular and well-loved work by a composer who remains, in the words of Lawrence Gilman, "a solitary and engrossing figure in the world's music." Accepting this, it would seem like arrogance and condescension for conductors to persist in this tasteless and stupid cut, unless they can offer us indisputable proof that Tchaikovsky himself authorized it.

CHARLES L. BUCHANAN.

New York, Nov. 14, 1933.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 19 1933

69

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS BRILLIANTLY

Handel Concerto Grosso No. 5 Brings Out Virtuosity of String Section.

TCHAIKOVSKY 4TH HEARD

Vaughan Williams Rhapsody and Pierne Work Complete Koussevitzky Program.

By OLIN DOWNES.

It was the truly magnificent music of George Frederick Handel (Concerto Grosso No. 5) and the emotional drive and the superlative performance of Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony, and Handel, too, which gave distinction to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Between these composition, which began and ended the program, were inconsequential works of Vaughan Williams and Gabriel Pierné. The first, "Norfolk Rhapsody, No. 1," was poetical but somewhat invertebrate and by no means representative of the best in the composer. The second, "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme," played for the first time here, is labored and tedious for all its orchestration and its tiresome ingenuities. But Handel at one extreme and Tchaikovsky at another—these works, though they constituted well-known material, again proved the vitality and the abiding eloquence of great music.

The Handel Concerto Grosso gave play to the warm and brilliant tone of the strings and their superb virtuosity. The solo players in this grand concerto of a previous century were Richard Burgin and J. Theodorowitz, violins, and J. Bedetti, 'cellist. The three played their solo parts like the most accomplished chamber music performers. But the whole string choir deserves the same comment. The string orchestra, repieni and concertante, discoursed Handel's music with a bravura, a glow of tone and style, and a noble melancholy in the slow movement that were moving in the extreme. Then the listeners heard the voice of Handel, the strong man, the happy warrior, but the one who also knew deep grief and tribulation.

Some weeks ago a tone poem by Janacek after Gogol's "Taras Bulba" was played, and this recalled the tremendous scene in that epic when the youth Ostap, tortured on the wheel, looked about at the faces of the savage crowd, seeking comfort—not from wife or sweetheart, not from a weeping mother, but from some strong man to give him courage in his need. It is courage, it is comprehension like that which may come from a slow movement by Handel.

As for the poor music, why speak of it? Except to remark that it is seldom that Mr. Koussevitzky makes less than an interesting program. And there are those who, admiring him very much in Tchaikovsky, nevertheless wish that the Boston Symphony programs, in a city where the orchestral season is so liable to run along lines deadly true to tradition, could be spent on composers who need more than Tchaikovsky does the ministrations of such a conductor and such an orchestra.

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 19 1933

Richard Burgin will conduct the sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday and Saturday. The program will be Mussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, with Toscha Seidel as soloist, and Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony.

N. Y. AMERICAN

10

NOV 19 1933

THREE SYMPHONY CONCERTS HEARD

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

New York stood under he sign of symphony yesterday, for three major orchestras sounded instrumental song—the Boston symphony and the Philharmonic, respectively, played at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and evening; and the Musicians' Emergency Fund Orchestra gave a nocturnal concert at Madison Square Garden. (Description of the last-named event may be found in another column.)

Our Bostonian visitors, conducted by the polished and incisive Serge Koussevitzky, opened their program with Handel's "Concerto Grosso", No. 5, in D major, performed with appropriate rhythmic firmness, healthful tone, and musical directness. Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody", No. 1, is a lively and imaginative example of modern English writing, and Mr. Koussevitzky and his assisting experts gave the work a finely-colored and stirring presentation.

Other items on the program were Pierne's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme" and the fourth symphony, F minor, by Tschaikowsky. The Russian music (perhaps to celebrate the new Soviet-American entente cordiale) brought out the most brilliant and picturesque playing of the afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky responded in his conception, to all the sensuous tune and passionate muscularity of the most popular of Russian composers. The listeners reacted with a corresponding ovation.

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 19 1933

Boston Symphony Plays Tchaikovsky's 4th Here

Koussevitzky's Baton in Debut of Season at Carnegie Hall

Tchaikovsky's numerous admirers have no cause for complaint this season. Not only has Bruno Walter already given them the three principal symphonies, the fourth, fifth and sixth, with a tone poem and an operatic excerpt for good measure, but yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky courted and won his audience's favor with his own intensely personal reading of the fourth symphony. The remainder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee program at Carnegie Hall comprised Handel's fifth Concerto Grosso in D, Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapscdy and a work new here, Pierre's the Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 49.

Mr. Williams's Rhapsody, based on English folk airs, is most engaging in its quieter, contemplative moments, but less appealing when it introduces rather bumptious sailor tunes of the veteran Pierne's Divertissement, it may be said that it was diverting only in that it led the listener into thinking, as Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra traversed its arid pages, of how much worthy music might have been performemd in the same amount of time. The most entertaining variations in the score were a Viennese waltz and a foxtrot. But neither was attractive enough to make one forget that Ravel had done an infinitely more alluring modern version of a Viennese waltz in "La Valse," and that Robert Russell Bennett had devised numerous more original and equally cleverly orchestrated foxtrots.

The most rewarding moments of the afternoon came at the beginning with the Mandel concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky always does well by Handel and the superb string section of the orchestra has seldom sounded more translucent.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 19 1933

MUSIC

By JULIAN SEAMAN

A Matinee.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky gave its first matinee concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. This program, w ith one exception, consisted of works more or less familiar to New York audiences.

The opening number, the Handel Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major, was beautifully played, the strings having that particularly rich quality that this conductor always seems to be able to elicit from them. The Norfolk Rhapsody by Vaughan Williams was charming, interesting musically and much appreciated by the hearers.

The novelty of the afternoon was the Pierne offering, "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme". This set of variations, dances, or whatever one might care to call them, are delightful, unpretentious movements, orchestrated with all the delicacy one has come to expect from this facile and polished Frenchman. The program concluded with the Tchaikowsky fourth symphony, bringing the concert to a rousing finish. —E.B.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 20 1933

BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Matinee of Season Given in Carnegie Hall.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. It was a pleasant entertainment, and began auspiciously with Handel's concerto grosso in D major, No. 5. The performance of this eighteenth century composition for strings displayed the rich, suave and sonorous tone of the Boston players of bowed instruments to great advantage. The old music wears well. It possesses all of Handel's skill in the fashioning of melody and his knowledge of instrumental style. The solo parts were admirably played by Richard Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, violinists, and Jean Bedetti, cellist.

The second number was Vaughan Williams's first "Norfolk Rhapsody," the surviving member of an abandoned symphony. This is a delightful treatment of folk music, replete in both sentiment and gentle humor. Furthermore it is typically English and therefore of well-marked individuality. It was formerly the fashion to sneer at British music, but music lovers have come to perceive the good qualities of it and to enjoy its embodiment of the feeling of the English people.

The third offering was the novelty of the concert, Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme for Orchestra," opus 49. Pierne was born in 1863, but his new work, written in 1931, is not without youthful spirit, juvenile candor and even naivete. The term "divertissements" is not intended to suggest a ballet. It is used to designate a series of free variations on the theme which is published by an English horn. There is a variation for double basses and another for violins and a third for wood winds.

Thereafter the progress of the composition leads to one variation in which the saxophone, readmitted to the respectable company for which it was originally intended intones a melancholy tune which brings to the American mind the familiar blues now associated with saxophonic wailings. M. Pierne's saxophone does not moan or cackle; it sings with as much dignity as a clarinet.

Did the composer nevertheless succumb to the all-pervading influence of jazz when he indulged in some phrases syncopated in true gold coast manner? The composition contains also a hint of the enthroned waltz of Vienna and concludes with a jig, which is a dance belonging to all kinds of nations. The work is of no large importance but it serves to furnish a few minutes of entertainment for indulgent music lovers.

After the intermission one was reminded that M. Pierne's set of variations included one for strings pizzicato, because Mr. Koussevitzky led his forces in a performance of the much played fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. This work contains the pizzicato ostinato which shocked the conservatives in 1890, when it was first heard here under the baton of Walter Damrosch. We do not crane at such fences now, but take them in our stride like thoroughbred hunters after novelty. And we have learned to measure the F minor symphony at its real value, which is considerable. The great Boston orchestra was better employed in playing it than in filling the hall with Tcherepnin's prodigious orchestration of platitudes heard at Thursday night's concert.

N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 20 1933

Music

Bostonians Play Pierne Novelty; 12,000 at Benefit Concert

By Henriette Weber

It was a real inspiration to listen to the Boston Symphony rchestra Saturday afternoon. The program, built on a most nteresting plan by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, under his virtuoso onducting, presented two hours of unalloyed delight, and the arge and appreciative audience in Carnegie Hall thought so too.

After a Concerto Grosso by andel, played impeccably, came e first of Vaughan Williams' orfolk Rhapsodies." Based on group of authentic folk songs, has the romance and idyllic mplicity of the countryside told delightful music.

Then came the novelty of the ogram, "Divertissements on a storal Theme" by Pierne, played re for the first time. The piece in reality a series of variations tonal designs which blend or pose by turns the groupings of e orchestra. In the seventh vaation there arose an intriguing ennese waltz through which the eme was woven. Then came a lues" episode for muted trumps, and a final brilliant gigue or . Dr. Kousevitzky gave a masly interpretation of the Fourth mphony of Tschaikowsky for e second half of the concert.

The Boston Orchestra comes ain in January.

N.Y. EVENING POST

NOV 20 1933

Music

Novelty by Bostonians

ANOTHER of those pleasant novelties which audiences applaud politely and promptly forget was introduced by Serge Koussevitzky at Saturday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Gabriel Pierne, now in his seventy-first year, has written some variations which he calls "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" that go their way neatly and deftly. Beyond that they call for no comment here. The program otherwise embraced a noble Concerto Gross by Handel (No. 5 in D major), with the solo parts admirably cared for by Messrs. Burgin, Theodorowicz and Bedetti; Vaughan Williams's not very absorbing Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1, and Tchaikovsky's perennial Fourth Symphony. In its entirety the playing was of higher vitality than the program.

N. Y. World-Telegram

NOV 20 1933

Stueckgold Recital Fills Town Hall

Boston Symphony's and Other Offerings Discussed.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra rounded out its first visit of the season to New York, with a Carnegie Hall matinee on Saturday that had as its features Handel's noble Concerto Grosso No. 5 for strings and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. Between these works of major moment Mr. Koussevitzky led his admirable band through the first "Norfolk Rhapsody" of Vaughan Williams and Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" (an agreeable enough novelty of little real importance).

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

20 1933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

Serge Koussevitzky's praiseworthy penchant for recognizing the living achieved new point Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony, under his baton, played a "first time in New York"—the Pierne Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 49, a gay lively, unpretentious work, and the Vaughan Williams First Norfolk Rhapsody. The point is that the excellent work being done in England by such craftsmen as Williams is too infrequently acknowledged. The Pierne piece was worthy of the attention lavished on it by Koussevitzky and his virtuosi.

Haendel's wonderful Fifth Concerto Grosso in the Kogel edition, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony completed the first New York matinee of the orchestra this season. A large audience was properly grateful.

PAWTUCKET, R. I. TIMES

(2)

NOV [illegible]

Boston Symphony Concerts to Start

First of Four Providence Appearances Will Be Made December 5.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of four symphony concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, December 5. This, the 53rd season of the great orchestra and the 10th under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has begun notably in Boston and other cities. In a recent visit to Chicago as part of a western tour, the orchestra played with nothing less than a sensational success. The orchestra this week is giving its first concerts of the season in New York, and likewise in Washington, D. C., and Baltimore—in which two cities there are to be a series for the first time in a number of seasons.

For the Providence concerts, season tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

On the stage of the Metropolitan Theatre a special box set has been constructed in order to give the audiences the full tonal brilliance of the orchestra. The concerts will take place on December 5, January 16, March 13 and April 10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I. NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1933

Boston Symphony To Present Four Concerts Here

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

First to Be on Dec. 5, with 110 Musicians on Stage in Metropolitan

First of a series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be held in the Metropolitan theatre Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. This is the 53d season of the orchestra and the 10th under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, whose term now exceeds in length any continuous term by former conductors of the orchestra.

The personnel continues this season virtually unchanged, with a full complement of 110 musicians. The stage facilities of the Metropolitan will accommodate the entire personnel and assure the full brilliance of orchestral sonority.

Other concerts here will be on the evenings of Jan. 16, March 13 and April 10. The orchestra has extended its travelling schedule this season. A western tour last month included a concert in Chicago. During the last week the orchestra visited Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn.

170

N. Y. AMERICAN

NOV 1 9 1933

THREE SYMPHONY CONCERTS HEARD

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

New York stood under he sign of symphony yesterday, for three major orchestras sounded instrumental song—the Boston symphony and the Philharmonic, respectively, played at Carnegie Hall in the afternoon and evening; and the Musicians' Emergency Fund Orchestra gave a nocturnal concert at Madison Square Garden. (Description of the last-named event may be found in another column.)

Our Bostonian visitors, conducted by the polished and incisive Serge Koussevitzky, opened their program with Handel's "Concerto Grosso", No. 5, in D major, performed with appropriate rhythmic firmness, healthful tone, and musical directness. Vaughan Williams' "Norfolk Rhapsody", No. 1, is a lively and imaginative example of modern English writing, and Mr. Koussevitzky and his assisting ~~experts gave~~ the work a finely-colored and stirring presentation.

Other items on the program were Pierne's "Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme" and the fourth symphony, F minor, by Tschaikowsky. The Russian music (perhaps to celebrate the new Soviet-American entente cordiale) brought out the most brilliant and picturesque playing of the afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky responded in his conception, to all the sensuous tune and passionate muscularity of the most popular of Russian composers. The listeners reacted with a corresponding ovation.

* * *

N. Y. Herald-Tribune

NOV 1 9 193

Boston Symphony Plays Tchaikovsky's 4th Here

Koussevitzky's Baton in Debut of Season at Carnegie Hall

Tchaikovsky's numerous admirers have no cause for complaint this season. Not only has Bruno Walter already given them the three principal symphonies, the fourth, fifth and sixth, with a tone poem and an operatic excerpt for good measure, but yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky courted and won his audience's favor with his own intensely personal reading of the fourth symphony. The remainder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee program at Carnegie Hall comprised Handel's fifth Concerto Grosso in D, Vaughan Williams's first Norfolk Rhapsody and a work new here, Pierre's the Divertissement on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 49.

Mr. Williams's Rhapsody, based on English folk airs, is most engaging in its quieter, contemplative moments, but less appealing when it introduces rather bumptious sailor tunes of the veteran Pierne's Divertissement, it may be said that it was diverting only in that it led the listener into thinking, as Mr. Koussevitzky and his admirable orchestra traversed its arid pages, of how much worthy music might have been performemd in the same amount of time. The most entertaining variations in the score were a Viennese waltz and a foxtrot. But neither was attractive enough to make one forget that Ravel had done an infinitely more alluring modern version of a Viennese waltz in "La Valse," and that Robert Russell Bennett had devised numerous more original and equally cleverly orchestrated foxtrots.

The most rewarding moments of the afternoon came at the beginning with the Mandel concerto. Mr. Koussevitzky always does well by Handel and the superb string section of the orchestra has seldom sounded more translucent.

J. D. B.

NEW YORK MIRROR

NOV 1 9 1933

MUSIC

—By JULIAN SEAMAN—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky gave its first matinee concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. This program, w ith one exception, consisted of works more or less familiar to New York audiences.

The opening number, the Handel Concerto Grosso No. 5 in D major, was beautifully played, the strings having that particularly rich quality that this conductor always seems to be able to elicit from them. The Norfolk Rhapsody by Vaughan Williams was charming, interesting musically and much appreciated by the hearers.

The novelty of the afternoon was the Pierne offering, "Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme". This set of variations, dances, or whatever one might care to call them, are delightful, unpretentious movements, orchestrated with all the delicacy one has come to expect from this facile and polished Frenchman. The program concluded with the Tchaikowsky fourth symphony, bringing the concert to a rousing finish. —E.B.

NEW YORK SUN

NOV 201933

BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Matinee of Season Given in Carnegie Hall.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. It was a pleasant entertainment, and began auspiciously with Handel's concerto grosso in D major, No. 5. The performance of this eighteenth century composition for strings displayed the rich, suave and sonorous tone of the Boston players of bowed instruments to great advantage. The old music wears well. It possesses all of Handel's skill in the fashioning of melody and his knowledge of instrumental style. The solo parts were admirably played by Richard Burgin and J. Theodorowicz, violinists, and Jean Bedetti, cellist.

The second number was Vaughan Williams's first "Norfolk Rhapsody," the surviving member of an abandoned symphony. This is a delightful treatment of folk music, replete in both sentiment and gentle humor. Furthermore it is typically English and therefore of well-marked individuality. It was formerly the fashion to sneer at British music, but music lovers have come to perceive the good qualities of it and to enjoy its embodiment of the feeling of the English people.

The third offering was the novelty of the concert, Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme for Orchestra," opus 49. Pierne was born in 1863, but his new work, written in 1931, is not without youthful spirit, juvenile candor and even naivete. The term "divertissements" is not intended to suggest a ballet. It is used to designate a series of free variations on the theme which is published by an English horn. There is a variation for double basses and another for violins and a third for wood winds.

Thereafter the progress of the composition leads to one variation in which the saxophone, readmitted to the respectable company for which it was originally intended, intones a melancholy tune which brings to the American mind the familiar blues now associated with saxophonic wailings. M. Pierne's saxophone does not moan or cackle; it sings with as much dignity as a clarinet.

Did the composer nevertheless succumb to the all-pervading influence of jazz when he indulged in some phrases syncopated in true gold coast manner? The composition contains also a hint of the enthroned waltz of Vienna and concludes with a jig, which is a dance belonging to all kinds of nations. The work is of no large importance but it serves to furnish a few minutes of entertainment for indulgent music lovers.

After the intermission one was reminded that M. Pierne's set of variations included one for strings pizzicato, because Mr. Koussevitzky led his forces in a performance of the much played fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky. This work contains the pizzicato ostinato which shocked the conservatives in 1890, when it was first heard here under the baton of Walter Damrosch. We do not crane at such fences now, but take them in our stride like thoroughbred hunters after novelty. And we have learned to measure the F minor symphony at its real value, which is considerable. The great Boston orchestra was better employed in playing it than in filling the hall with Tcherepnin's prodigious orchestration of platitudes heard at Thursday night's concert.

N. Y. JOURNAL

NOV 201933

Music

Bostonians Play Pierne Novelty; 12,000 at Benefit Concert

By Henriette Weber

It was a real inspiration to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon. The program, built on a most interesting plan by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, under his virtuoso conducting, presented two hours of ~~unalloyed~~ delight, and the large and appreciative audience in Carnegie Hall thought so too.

After a Concerto Grosso by andel, played impeccably, came e first of Vaughan Williams' orfolk Rhapsodies." Based on group of authentic folk songs, has the romance and idyllic mplicity of the countryside told delightful music.

Then came the novelty of the ogram, "Divertissements on a storal Theme" by Pierne, played re for the first time. The piece in reality a series of variations tonal designs which blend or pose by turns the groupings of e orchestra. In the seventh vaation there arose an intriguing ennese waltz through which the eme was woven. Then came a lues" episode for muted trumps, and a final brilliant gigue or . Dr. Kousevitzky gave a masrly interpretation of the Fourth mphony of Tschaikowsky for e second half of the concert.

The Boston Orchestra comes ain in January.

* * *

N.Y. EVENING POST

NOV 201933

Music :

Bostonians

ANOTHER of those pleasant novelties which audiences applaud politely and promptly forget was introduced by Serge Koussevitzky at Saturday's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Gabriel Pi now in his seventy-first year, written some variations which calls "Divertissements on a Pasl Theme" that go their way atly and deftly. Beyond that they l for no comment here. The proam otherwise embraced a noble ncerto Gross by Handel (No. 5 D major), with the solo parts mirably cared for by Messrs. Burn, Theodorowicz and Bedetti; aughan Williams's not very abbing Norfolk Rhapsody No. 1, Tchaikovsky's perennial Fourth hony. In its entirety the plays of higher vitality than the n.

N. Y. World-Telegram

NOV 201933

Stueckgold Recital Fills Town Hall

Boston Symphony's and Other Offerings Discussed.

By PITTS SANBORN.

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra rounded out its first visit of the season to New York, with a Carnegie Hall matinee on Saturday that had as its features Handel's noble Concerto Grosso No. 5 for strings and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. Between these works of major moment Mr. Koussevitzky led his admirable ~~band through~~ the first "Norfolk Rhapsody" of Vaughan Williams and Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme" (an agreeable enough novelty of little real importance).

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

201933

Music

by Larry Lipskin

Serge Koussevitzky's praiseworthy penchant for recognizing the living achieved new point Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony, under his baton, played a "first time in New York"—the Pierne Divertisements on a Pastoral Theme, Op. 49, a gay lively, unpretentious work, and the Vaughan Williams First Norfolk Rhapsody. The point is that the excellent work being done in England by such craftsmen as Williams is too infrequently acknowledged. The Pierne piece was worthy of the attention lavished on it by Koussevitzky and his virtuosi.

Haendel's wonderful Fifth Concerto Grosso in the Kogel edition, and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony completed the first New York matinee of the orchestra this season. A large audience was properly grateful.

▼

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

2

NOV 1 8 1933

Boston Symphony Concerts to Start

First of Four Providence Appearances Will Be Made December 5.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first of four symphony concerts at the Metropolitan Theatre, Providence, on Tuesday evening, December 5. This, the 53rd season of the great orchestra and the 10th under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has begun notably in Boston and other cities. In a recent visit to Chicago as part of a western tour, the orchestra played with nothing less than a sensational success. The orchestra this week is giving its first concerts of the season in New York, and likewise in Washington, D. C., and Baltimore—in which two cities there are to be a series for the first time in a number of seasons.

For the Providence concerts, season tickets are now on sale at Steinert's.

On the stage of the Metropolitan Theatre a special box set has been constructed in order to give the audiences the full tonal brilliance of the orchestra. The concerts will take place on December 5, January 16, Maŕch 13 and April 10.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

NOV 201933

Boston Symphony To Present Four Concerts Here

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

First to Be on Dec. 5, with 110 Musicians on Stage in Metropolitan

First of a series of four concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be held in the Metropolitan theatre Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. This is the 53d season of the orchestra and the 10th under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, whose term now exceeds in length any continuous term by former conductors of the orchestra.

The personnel continues this season virtually unchanged, with a full complement of 110 musicians. The stage facilities of the Metropolitan will accommodate the entire personnel and assure the full brilliance of orchestral sonority.

Other concerts here will be on the evenings of Jan. 16, March 13 and April 10. The orchestra has extended its travelling schedule this season. A western tour last month included a concert in Chicago. During the last week the orchestra visited Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn.

71

Plays a

Here, There, Everywhere, Music-News

Tr. Nov 21

The Young Men and Sibelius, Concert-Hall Wagner, Deserted Germany

MORE, perhaps, than its elders suspect Sibelius is the symphonist of the younger generation. At the moment, for exemplary evidence, a letter comes to this department from two students in a college of the Middle West. They know Sibelius's symphonies only from recordings which, fortunately, they can repeat as often as they would hear; while all around them is a world whose Sibelius stops short at "Finlandia." They have this and that question to ask about the composer which need not be answered in this place. Between the questions they venture comment certainly significant of themselves and possibly of the youth that sooner or later will be the hearers and the sustainers of concerts up and down America. One of them writes:

> My friend owns Stokowski's recording of the Fourth Symphony. I recently have received the new album of the Sibelius Society (including the Seventh Symphony), and we are both agreed that Sibelius is the greatest writer of symphonies whom the world has ever known. But we are not agreed on this one thing, at least: Is the Seventh or the Fourth the more difficult to understand, the more difficult in which to find out what Sibelius is driving at, so to speak? My friend thinks that the Fourth is more formidable and more difficult to appreciate; while I contend that only the first of those opinions is true. The Seventh may be more melodious, but, I think, it is far more remote, being calmer and more restrained, and far harder to tackle.

To have such listeners among the young men is reward that any composer, great or small, may prize. To have such readers is also the sufficient reward of that very minor person, when compared, the reviewer. He makes bold none the less to commend this current instance to the considerable body of listeners in any concert-hall for whom a symphony, even by Sibelius, enters through one ear, leaves by the other; along the way quickening only a passing interest, a momentary emotion; no sooner heard, almost, than forgotten in the next routine of the day. "Should one think of or try to do such things?" ask the young men of their questioning over the Fourth and the Seventh Symphonies. They may be reassured. Such debatings are the life and soul of music in the receivers, the justification of the concert-hall, the records, the printed score, conductor, orchestra, reviewers and commentators, the whole apparatus of modern music-making.

' will be taken to New York.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon Beethoven cycle, in Symphony Hall yesterday. He performed the "Leonore" overture, No. 2, the Second Symphony and the "Emperor" piano concerto. Egon Petri, splendid Dutch pianist, who made his Boston debut with the orchestra a few weeks ago, was soloist.

Mr Burgin rearranged the orchestra somewhat, placing the double basses at the right of the stage, and dispensing with two of their number for the symphony. The concert master of the Boston Symphony, as it almost goes without saying, has a gift for conducting. His temperament, as revealed in the relatively few concerts he has directed here, tends to well-balanced, unsensational interpretations.

Without exception his performances yesterday were tastefully conceived and carried out. Yet Mr Burgin was prone to sluggish tempi, especially in the symphony; because of this, he and Mr Petri were not infrequently at odds during the concerto. Mr Burgin did not attempt to dramatize—much less theatricalize—Beethoven's music, being satisfied to obtain clear, sonorous tone and an easily perceptible exposition of the architectural symmetry of the scores.. The accompaniment he provided for the concerto, save for the matter of tempi, was beautifully sensitive.

One could hardly imagine a more fastidious performance than Mr Petri achieved. It was, moreover, occasionally thrilling, thereby offering proof that a good musician does not have to pound and make a big noise to gain genuine dramatic effects. Mr Petri was most warmly applauded.

The second "Leonore" overture is neither as well known nor played so frequently as the "Leonore" No. 3. Although similar in thematic material and general plan, it lacks the refinement, the cumulative dramatic force, and the intellectual discipline of its sister piece. Compared to the "Leonore" No. 3, the overture heard yesterday is as American melodrama of the 1880's to Attic tragedy. That, perhaps, is enough said.

The next concert of the Beethoven cycle will occur on Jan 23. C. W. D.

MUSIC

Her Nov 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Beethoven program: Symphony No. 2, in D major; concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat major; Overture Leonore No. 2. Conductor, Mr. Burgin. Soloist, Mr. Egon Petri.

A capacity audience greeted the second program of the Beethoven series by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The concert was conducted by Mr. R. Burgin, the concert-master, in the place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

One heard the Second Symphony with delight. From the slow introduction to the first movement—an introduction that embodies the best features of both Mozart and Haydn style in such matters to the very end, there is an almost unmatched wealth of melodies. And this work was called "subversive" (sittenverderblich)! The slow movement has influenced more than one composer who followed Beethoven, namely Schubert, in his Grand Duo. Beethoven here echoes details from his own piano sonata op. 28 and in the Scherzo—of very small proportions, but worthy of any Beethoven period—he becomes the prophet of things to come on a grander scale—the trio of the Scherzo of the ninth symphony.

Egon Petri won great and just applause for his masterful performance of the E flat concerto.

Without pose of any kind, he won his audience on the merits of his splendid playing. That he knows no technical difficulties, goes without saying; that he never loses sight of beauty is more important. He is an artist of unalloyed sincerity, whose tonal palette covers a wide dynamic range and whose intuitions show a fine and forceful appreciation of some of Beethoven's greatest utterances.

The concerto itself begins with a majestic introduction of a rhapsodic character, given out by the piano, over the chord of E flat in the orchestra. This whole passage is falsely supposed to do away with the "opening tutti," one of the most important features of the concerto style and nowhere achieved more successfully by Beethoven than in his G major and E flat concertos. The opening tutti marches past in all its splendor as soon as the introductory passages for piano are over. And what a stroke of genius is the later return of the piano in a chromatic run over sharply articulated chords of the orchestra! It was in the introductory measures that one might have wished to hear the piano part more freely played than was the case yesterday. The orchestra provided an excellent accompaniment, though there were a few times when the entrances of piano and orchestra might have dovetailed more perfectly.

Beethoven rejected his overture "Leonore No. 3" as unfitted to the opening scenes of his opera "Fidelio"; even its earlier version, "Leonore, No. 2," which we heard yesterday, is equally inspired by the heroic events of the last act and each was in turn put aside for a fourth effort, the "Fidelio Overture," where Beethoven achieves the requirements for the first act. Where in all music is there a more pathetically beautiful melody than than that allotted to Florestan?

The concert gave a great deal of enjoyment to a responsive and appreciative audience. Mr. Burgin's desires were carried out loyally by his colleagues and he was recalled a number of times in recognition of his conducting, which was marked by intelligence and imagination.

---

ment's credit.

SYMPHONY IN SECOND SERIES

Petri Soloist in 'Emperor' Concerto—Burgin Leads

Post Nov 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the second of the Tuesday series which this season is devoted to the music of Beethoven, had many features of interest. First of all Mr. Burgin, who will also lead the concerts of next Friday and Saturday, was the conductor. Secondly there was a soloist, the Dutch pianist, Egon Petri, playing the "Emperor" Concerto. The first item on the programme was the generally and unjustly neglected Second Symphony, while the final number was the Overture to "Leonora." No. 2, virtually a preliminary sketch for No. 3 which has almost altogether displaced it.

Mr. Petri, who not so long ago gave us proof of his remarkable powers in a performance of a Concerto of Mozart at a pair of regular Symphony Concerts, disclosed them anew yesterday in his maastefly, poised and polished version of the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven. If his performance of the Mozart Concerto will be longer remembered, it will be only because in the case of the "Emperor" the greatness of the music itself is inclined to overshadow its interpreter.

Admitting that the third "Leonora" Overture—in reality the second—is a sounder and more effective composition than its predecessor of yesterday's concert, the second "Leonora" is nevertheless an extraordinary piece of music, replete with strength and dramatic fire. That Beethoven in rewriting it could better it is no small evidence of his powers. Yesterday's performance of it was an eloquent and stirring one.

Trans

NOVEMBER 22, 1933

s --- Films

With Egon Petri At Symphony Hall

The Pianist As Soloist For Second Concert in the Beethoven Cycle

YESTERDAY'S concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved once more the astuteness of its conductor as a program maker. The concert was the second in the Beethoven cycle. Eschewing the chronological type of program, which would have brought two "small" symphonies to the first concert, Dr. Koussevitzky at that time played the First and Third. Speculation at once arose as to the next program: would it contain the Second and Fourth, both also "small" symphonies? The answer gave pleasure to the knowing. There would be only one symphony, the Second; for climax there would be an overture with rousing final measures—the Second Leonore; while for a third piece there would be a concerto—the Fifth, or "Emperor." With Egon Petri at hand as soloist, the inclusion of a concerto on this program was little short of a master stroke.

One reports also the changed aspect of the orchestra as to seating plan. For yesterday, at least, there was no long row of double basses flanking the left; instead these instruments and their players were grouped at the right, immediately in the rear of the 'cellos. The effect in such passages as give the main melodic line to 'cellos and basses, was exceedingly happy; while in other passages the change brought no bad effects. One wonders whether it is permanent, or an experiment, or the wish of the assistant conductor, Mr. Burgin, who stands on the podium for the present week. For this is the vacation week, which is Dr. Koussevitzky's at the end of the first quarter of the season.

The concert showed Mr. Burgin's continuing increase in stature as a conductor. It was a sure hand, a thoughtful mind that guided the players yesterday. One felt that the Beethoven of the Second Symphony and of the Leonore Overture Number Two stood fully revealed that the soloist in the concerto received masterful support.

Certainly the high spot of the afternoon was Mr. Petri's playing of the "Emperor" Concerto. One had the impression that the pianist was combining into a marvelous synthesis qualities that are to all intents and purposes opposites; that the frequently excusing phrase, "these are but the faults of the pianist's excellent qualities," could not apply to him. There were no such faults. To be specific: A more heroic reading of the concerto it would be difficult to imagine. But heroic readings all too often bring with them bombast, heaviness, too great emphasis upon the rhetorical, and a host of related misfortunes. Mr. Petri achieved the one and avoided the other. With his heroic treatment of Beethoven there was an equal sparkle, an equal verve, an equal buoyancy. Nor were finely chiseled subtleties lacking. Rarely, has one heard the equal of the elfin-like soft, delicately rhythmed passages in the first movement. One could go on, enumerating excellence after excellence in a memorable performance. That Mr. Burgin was thoroughly at one with the soloist is high tribute to his way with the orchestral parts of the concerto.

But there was a more unfortunate side to this concerto also. It is not often that there are serious misadventures in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And avoidable misadventures are almost non-existent. But such did occur yesterday afternoon when on the entry of the piano after the first tutti it was painfully discovered that piano and orchestra were by no means at the same pitch. Such things should not be allowed to happen. It is not for a reviewer to attempt to decide where the blame belongs. The reviewer must record the fact in the stout hope that it will never be allowed to happen again.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, in such a performance as that of yesterday, brought regrets that it is not heard more often. Its brightness, its gayety, the exuberance and freshness of its rhythms, the charm and the beauty in the contours of its melodies, are such as gladden the heart. "Early Beethoven"—yes; "slight"—yes; but for all that, a music exceedingly fine. Also, it is good occasionally to hear the "Leonore No. II." Much less played than "No. III," it has its own excellences which should by no means be ignored. That these came to inspired performance yesterday, we thank Mr. Burgin. A. H. M.

---

in the right place.

Bostonians Abroad Tran Nov 22

The reviewers in New York had little to say, relatively, of the concert by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon. The Sun rose manfully to the defence of Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody" and of Pierné's new "Divertissements," which most other newspapers dismissed indifferently or scornfully. "As for the poor music, why speak of it?" exclaimed one master-mind that within memory trickled over the air. For The Sun, however, the Rhapsody was "a delightful treatment of folk-music, replete with both sentiment and gentle humor"; while the "Divertissements" were not "without youthful spirit, juvenile candor and even naïveté," though the composer who made them was on the edge of his seventieth year. For the rest, the usual "routines" about Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major at one end of the program, and Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the other. Both displayed the Bostonian strings. New York admires them.

Programs in Prospect

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Theatre Arts Monthly

NOV - - 1933

BY way of continuing the orchestral interest in opera, Eugene Goossens of the Cincinnati Orchestra has just finished a score on the subject of Don Juan, for which Arnold Bennett wrote the libretto; and even the conservative Boston Symphony, besides repeating Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, an orchestral variant of the opera, is to do the whole third act of Moussorgsky's delightful opera Khovantchina in concert form.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JOURNAL

NOV 2 1933

The SIDESHOW

. . . In spite of good intentions, one goes on making these lists and with pencil in hand I shall presently grub through all my books to refresh my own untrustworthy enthusiasm in the field. . . . The current issue of "Musical America" contains a more extended announcement of the resignation of Philip Hale, dean of Boston's music critics, as critic for the Boston Herald. Mr. Hale, who will be 80 years old in March, has been writing for Boston newspapers since 1890 and for the Herald since 1903. He began to write his program notes for the Boston orchestra in 1901.

Mr. Hale has long been one of America's most famed music critics and scholars. His notes have become an invaluable library of information on orchestral literature and composers. His criticisms, while consistently devoted to the great masterpieces, have always been receptive to new works.

Mr. Hale's successor on the Herald is George S. MacManus, pianist and teacher. The Boston Symphony's program books will continue to make use of Mr. Hale's notes for works already in the orchestra's repertoire; notes for new numbers will be supplied by John N. Burke, publicity director for the orchestra.

. . . Perhaps Mr. Hale's most mellow attribute was that of witty daily columnist equipped to discuss almost every subject under the sun, and I am proud that it was my fortune to know him rather well in my earlier newspaper days.

CHICAGO, ILL.

TIME

NOV 20 1933

Retired. Philip Hale, 79, dean of U. S. music critics; as critic for the Boston Herald and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A onetime lawyer, he studied music in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart, Paris, became an organist and choral conductor, a newspaper critic in 1890. As Herald critic since 1903, he was famed for witty, lucid, learned writing, for his bright Windsor ties and for the green felt bag which he carried almost everywhere.

71

Plays a

Here, There, Everywhere, Music-News

Tran Nov 21

The Young Men and Sibelius, Concert-Hall Wagner, Deserted Germany

MORE, perhaps, than its elders suspect Sibelius is the symphonist of the younger generation. At the moment, for exemplary evidence, a letter comes to this department from two students in a college of the Middle West. They know Sibelius's symphonies only from recordings which, fortunately, they can repeat as often as they would hear; while all around them is a world whose Sibelius stops short at "Finlandia." They have this and that question to ask about the composer which need not be answered in this place. Between the questions they venture comment certainly significant of themselves and possibly of the youth that sooner or later will be the hearers and the sustainers of concerts up and down America. One of them writes:

> My friend owns Stokowski's recording of the Fourth Symphony. I recently have received the new album of the Sibelius Society (including the Seventh Symphony), and we are both agreed that Sibelius is the greatest writer of symphonies whom the world has ever known. But we are not agreed on this one thing, at least: Is the Seventh or the Fourth the more difficult to understand, the more difficult in which to find out what Sibelius is driving at, so to speak? My friend thinks that the Fourth is more formidable and more difficult to appreciate; while I contend that only the first of those opinions is true. The Seventh may be more melodious, but, I think, it is far more remote, being calmer and more restrained, and far harder to tackle.

To have such listeners among the young men is reward that any composer, great or small, may prize. To have such readers is also the sufficient reward of that very minor person, when compared, the reviewer. He makes bold none the less to commend this current instance to the considerable body of listeners in any concert-hall for whom a symphony, even by Sibelius, enters through one ear, leaves by the other; along the way quickening only a passing interest, a momentary emotion; no sooner heard, almost, than forgotten in the next routine of the day. "Should one think of or try to do such things?" ask the young men of their questioning over the Fourth and the Seventh Symphonies. They may be reassured. Such debatings are the life and soul of music in the receivers, the justification of the concert-hall, the records, the printed score, conductor, orchestra, reviewers and commentators, the whole apparatus of modern music-making.

" will be taken to New York.

MUSIC

Globe Nov 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin conducted the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday afternoon Beethoven cycle, in Symphony Hall yesterday. He performed the "Leonore" overture, No. 2, the Second Symphony and the "Emperor" piano concerto. Egon Petri, splendid Dutch pianist, who made his Boston debut with the orchestra a few weeks ago, was soloist.

Mr Burgin rearranged the orchestra somewhat, placing the double basses at the right of the stage, and dispensing with two of their number for the symphony. The concert master of the Boston Symphony, as it almost goes without saying, has a gift for conducting. His temperament, as revealed in the relatively few concerts he has directed here, tends to well-balanced, unsensational interpretations.

Without exception his performances yesterday were tastefully conceived and carried out. Yet Mr Burgin was prone to sluggish tempi, especially in the symphony; because of this, he and Mr Petri were not infrequently at odds during the concerto. Mr Burgin did not attempt to dramatize—much less theatricalize—Beethoven's music, being satisfied to obtain clear, sonorous tone and an easily perceptible exposition of the architectural symmetry of the scores. The accompaniment he provided for the concerto, save for the matter of tempi, was beautifully sensitive.

One could hardly imagine a more fastidious performance than Mr Petri achieved. It was, moreover, occasionally thrilling, thereby offering proof that a good musician does not have to pound and make a big noise to gain genuine dramatic effects. Mr Petri was most warmly applauded.

The second "Leonore" overture is neither as well known nor played so frequently as the "Leonore" No. 3. Although similar in thematic material and general plan, it lacks the refinement, the cumulative dramatic force, and the intellectual discipline of its sister piece. Compared to the "Leonore" No. 3, the overture heard yesterday is as American melodrama of the 1880's to Attic tragedy. That, perhaps, is enough said.

The next concert of the Beethoven cycle will occur on Jan 23. C. W. D.

MUSIC

Her Nov 22

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Beethoven program: Symphony No. 2, in D major; concerto for pianoforte No. 5, in E flat major; Overture Leonore No. 2. Conductor, Mr. Burgin. Soloist, Mr. Egon Petri.

A capacity audience greeted the second program of the Beethoven series by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The concert was conducted by Mr. R. Burgin, the concert-master, in the place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

One heard the Second Symphony with delight. From the slow introduction to the first movement—an introduction that embodies the best features of both Mozart and Haydn style in such matters to the very end, there is an almost unmatched wealth of melodies. And this work was called "subversive" (sittenverderblich)! The slow movement has influenced more than one composer who followed Beethoven, namely Schubert, in his Grand Duo. Beethoven here echoes details from his own piano sonata op. 28 and in the Scherzo—of very small proportions, but worthy of any Beethoven period—he becomes the prophet of things to come on a grander scale—the trio of the Scherzo of the ninth symphony.

Egon Petri won great and just applause for his masterful performance of the E flat concerto.

Without pose of any kind, he won his audience on the merits of his splendid playing. That he knows no technical difficulties, goes without saying; that he never loses sight of beauty is more important. He is an artist of unalloyed sincerity, whose tonal palette covers a wide dynamic range and whose intuitions show a fine and forceful appreciation of some of Beethoven's greatest utterances.

The concerto itself begins with a majestic introduction of a rhapsodic character, given out by the piano, over the chord of E flat in the orchestra. This whole passage is falsely supposed to do away with the "opening tutti," one of the most important features of the concerto style and nowhere achieved more successfully by Beethoven than in his G major and E flat concertos. The opening tutti marches past in all its splendor as soon as the introductory passages for piano are over. And what a stroke of genius is the later return of the piano in a chromatic run over sharply articulated chords of the orchestra! It was in the introductory measures that one might have wished to hear the piano part more freely played than was the case yesterday. The orchestra provided an excellent accompaniment, though there were a few times when the entrances of piano and orchestra might have dovetailed more perfectly.

Beethoven rejected his overture "Leonore No. 3" as unfitted to the opening scenes of his opera "Fidelio"; even its earlier version, "Leonore, No. 2," which we heard yesterday, is equally inspired by the heroic events of the last act and each was in turn put aside for a fourth effort, the "Fidelio Overture," where Beethoven achieves the requirements for the first act. Where in all music is there a more pathetically beautiful melody than than that allotted to Florestan?

The concert gave a great deal of enjoyment to a responsive and appreciative audience. Mr. Burgin's desires were carried out loyally by his colleagues and he was recalled a number of times in recognition of his conducting, which was marked by intelligence and imagination.

---

ment's credit.

SYMPHONY IN SECOND SERIES

Petri Soloist in 'Emperor' Concerto—Burgin Leads

Post Nov 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, the second of the Tuesday series which this season is devoted to the music of Beethoven, had many features of interest. First of all Mr. Burgin, who will also lead the concerts of next Friday and Saturday, was the conductor. Secondly there was a soloist, the Dutch pianist, Egon Petri, playing the "Emperor" Concerto. The first item on the programme was the generally and unjustly neglected Second Symphony, while the final number was the Overture to "Leonora," No. 2, virtually a preliminary sketch for No. 3 which has almost altogether displaced it.

Mr. Petri, who not so long ago gave us proof of his remarkable powers in a performance of a Concerto of Mozart at a pair of regular Symphony Concerts, disclosed them anew yesterday in his maasterly, poised and polished version of the Fifth Concerto of Beethoven. If his performance of the Mozart Concerto will be longer remembered, it will be only because in the case of the "Emperor" the greatness of the music itself is inclined to overshadow its interpreter.

Admitting that the third "Leonora" Overture—in reality the second—is a sounder and more effective composition than its predecessor of yesterday's concert, the second "Leonora" is nevertheless an extraordinary piece of music, replete with strength and dramatic fire. That Beethoven in rewriting it could better it is no small evidence of his powers. Yesterday's performance of it was an eloquent and stirring one.

Trans

NOVEMBER 22, 1933

s --- Films

With Egon Petri At Symphony Hall

The Pianist As Soloist For Second Concert in the Beethoven Cycle

YESTERDAY'S concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved once more the astuteness of its conductor as a program maker. The concert was the second in the Beethoven cycle. Eschewing the chronological type of program, which would have brought two "small" symphonies to the first concert, Dr. Koussevitzky at that time played the First and Third. Speculation at once arose as to the next program: would it contain the Second and Fourth, both also "small" symphonies? The answer gave pleasure to the knowing. There would be only one symphony, the Second; for climax there would be an overture with rousing final measures—the Second Leonore; while for a third piece there would be a concerto—the Fifth, or "Emperor." With Egon Petri at hand as soloist, the inclusion of a concerto on this program was little short of a master stroke.

One reports also the changed aspect of the orchestra as to seating plan. For yesterday, at least, there was no long row of double basses flanking the left; instead these instruments and their players were grouped at the right, immediately in the rear of the 'cellos. The effect in such passages as give the main melodic line to 'cellos and basses, was exceedingly happy; while in other passages the change brought no bad effects. One wonders whether it is permanent, or an experiment, or the wish of the assistant conductor, Mr. Burgin, who stands on the podium for the present week. For this is the vacation week which is Dr. Koussevitzky's at the end of the first quarter of the season.

The concert showed Mr. Burgin's continuing increase in stature as a conductor. It was a sure hand, a thoughtful mind that guided the players yesterday. One felt that the Beethoven of the Second Symphony and of the Leonore Overture Number Two stood fully revealed that the soloist in the concerto received masterful support.

Certainly the high spot of the afternoon was Mr. Petri's playing of the "Emperor" Concerto. One had the impression that the pianist was combining into a marvelous synthesis qualities that are to all intents and purposes opposites; that the frequently excusing phrase, "these are but the faults of the pianist's excellent qualities," could not apply to him. There were no such faults. To be specific: A more heroic reading of the concerto it would be difficult to imagine. But heroic readings all too often bring with them bombast, heaviness, too great emphasis upon the rhetorical, and a host of related misfortunes. Mr. Petri achieved the one and avoided the other. With his heroic treatment of Beethoven there was an equal sparkle, an equal verve, an equal buoyancy. Nor were finely chiseled subtleties lacking. Rarely, has one heard the equal of the elfin-like soft, delicately rhythmed passages in the first movement. One could go on, enumerating excellence after excellence in a memorable performance. That Mr. Burgin was thoroughly at one with the soloist is high tribute to his way with the orchestral parts of the concerto.

But there was a more unfortunate side to this concerto also. It is not often that there are serious misadventures in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And avoidable misadventures are almost non-existent. But such did occur yesterday afternoon when on the entry of the piano after the first tutti it was painfully discovered that piano and orchestra were by no means at the same pitch. Such things should not be allowed to happen. It is not for a reviewer to attempt to decide where the blame belongs. The reviewer must record the fact in the stout hope that it will never be allowed to happen again.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, in such a performance as that of yesterday, brought regrets that it is not heard more often. Its brightness, its gayety, the exuberance and freshness of its rhythms, the charm and the beauty in the contours of its melodies, are such as gladden the heart. "Early Beethoven"—yes; "slight"—yes; but for all that, a music exceedingly fine. Also, it is good occasionally to hear the "Leonore No. II." Much less played than "No. III," it has its own excellences which should by no means be ignored. That these came to inspired performance yesterday, we thank Mr. Burgin. A. H. M.

---

in the right place.

Bostonians Abroad Tran Nov 22

The reviewers in New York had little to say, relatively, of the concert by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon. The Sun rose manfully to the defence of Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody" and of Pierné's new "Divertissements," which most other newspapers dismissed indifferently or scornfully. "As for the poor music, why speak of it?" exclaimed one master-mind that within memory trickled over the air. For The Sun, however, the Rhapsody was "a delightful treatment of folk-music, replete with both sentiment and gentle humor"; while the "Divertissements" were not "without youthful spirit, juvenile candor and even naïveté," though the composer who made them was on the edge of his seventieth year. For the rest, the usual "routines" about Handel's Concerto Grosso in D major at one end of the program, and Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony at the other. Both displayed the Bostonian strings. New York admires them.

Programs in Prospect

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Theatre Arts Monthly

NY NOV - - 1933

BY way of continuing the orchestral interest in opera, Eugene Goossens of the Cincinnati Orchestra has just finished a score on the subject of Don Juan, for which Arnold Bennett wrote the libretto; and even the conservative Boston Symphony, besides repeating Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, an orchestral variant of the opera, is to do the whole third act of Moussorgsky's delightful opera Khovantchina in concert form.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 22 1933

The SIDESHOW

. . . In spite of good intentions, one goes on making these lists and with pencil in hand I shall presently grub through all my books to refresh my own untrustworthy enthusiasm in the field. . . . The current issue of "Musical America" contains a more extended announcement of the resignation of Philip Hale, dean of Boston's music critics, as critic for the Boston Herald. Mr. Hale, who will be 80 years old in March, has been writing for Boston newspapers since 1890 and for the Herald since 1903. He began to write his program notes for the Boston orchestra in 1901.

Mr. Hale has long been one of America's most famed music critics and scholars. His notes have become an invaluable library of information on orchestral literature and composers. His criticisms, while consistently devoted to the great masterpieces, have always been receptive to new works.

Mr. Hale's successor on the Herald is George S. MacManus, pianist and teacher. The Boston Symphony's program books will continue to make use of Mr. Hale's notes for works already in the orchestra's repertoire; notes for new numbers will be supplied by John N. Burke, publicity director for the orchestra.

. . . Perhaps Mr. Hale's most mellow attribute was that of witty daily columnist equipped to discuss almost every subject under the sun, and I am proud that it was my fortune to know him rather well in my earlier newspaper days.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIME

NOV 20 1933

Retired. Philip Hale, 79, dean of U. S. music critics; as critic for the Boston Herald and program annotator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A onetime lawyer, he studied music in Berlin, Munich, Stuttgart, Paris, became an organist and choral conductor, a newspaper critic in 1890. As Herald critic since 1903, he was famed for witty, lucid, learned writing, for his bright Windsor ties and for the green felt bag which he carried almost everywhere.

72

Concert-Chronicle

Bostonians in New York

THE RETURN of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra to New York last week drew the usual praise from the reviewers for both band and conductor. Said Mr. Gilman, for example in The Herald Tribune: "The chief of the Bostonians brought his extraordinary orchestra to New York on Thursday for the first time this season, and again we were made to realize how fortunate are the music-lovers of this country, who, despite the treacherous times in which we live, are privileged to hear music of the highest class performed through more than half the year by such magnificent instruments as this, and the Philadelphia band, and the insurpassable orchestra that dwells among us here, and other accomplished groups of players who still intrepidly carry on. . . .

"Thursday's performance of that great organization over which the suavely volcanic Mr. Koussevitzky presides was quite as dazzling as its present-day traditions have led us to expect. It would be hard to imagine anything more transparent and delicately jewelled than the orchestra's exposition of Ravel's delightful suite, ['Le Tombeau de Couperin'] or a more gorgeously multi-colored blaze of tone than Mr. Koussevitzky kindled in certain climactic pages of the evening's novelty [Cherepnin's Pieces after a Tale of Poe] which, unfortunately, happened to be, intrinsically, pretty sad stuff." . . . The report in The Times also records "the shouts and cheers" that rewarded the performance of the Sibelius's Second Symphony.

Hubbub over Cherepnin

As for the elder Cherepnin's adventure into delineative music for Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," heard in Boston at a pair of Symphony Concerts last October, the reader of the more authoritative reviews in New York might suppose him, or it, to the horned beast of the Apocalypse. Outside the paragraphs quoted above, Mr. Gilman devotes to it the whole of an unsparing article. More briefly Mr. Henderson keeps him company in The Sun. Mr. Thompson heaves assorted bricks from the columns of The Evening Post; while in The World-Telegram Mr. Sanborn cries to high heaven against "an aimless, deafening, unconscionable bore." So onward.

It were hard to find clearer revelation of the ruts through which orchestral programs in New York move than this hubbub over an unimportant piece that for us in Boston passed the musical time not uninterestingly for as much as twenty-five minutes, then descended into the symphonic shades. But in the capital of music in these United States one "standard" and routine piece succeeds another so insistently that when Mr. Stokowski or Dr. Koussevitzky arrives with a novel number, the reviewers in sheer relief expatiate for or against it. Last Tuesday, for example, the Philadelphians played to them the First Symphony of the young Russian, Shostakowicz. Had it been a new-found monument of music, this and that reviewer could not have examined it more thoroughly. On Thursday followed Cherepnin's descriptive "Masque of the Red Death," only to be torn and rent as already specified. In the hinterlands of Boston and Philadelphia, one piece, more or less, of new music, generates no such excitements; passes readily as item in the day's interest or the day's work.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

NOV 2 0 1933

Symphonic Ensemble of Boston Gives Fine Program for Morning Musicals, Inc.

I have endeavored to program the works of an eariler day that have a definite beauty and charm and present modern works that have outstanding merits and worthy of repeated performances.

Some have the true beauty of glorious melodic line, others interesting rhythmical patterns and brilliant devices of orchestral scoring.—Russell Ames Cook.

More than 1,000 assembled in the grand ballroom of Hotel Syracuse Sunday afternoon for the first Twilight Musical of Morning Musicals, Inc., by Russell Ames Cook and his Symphonic Ensemble of Boston. This interesting event set a new mark in the musical progress of the city. The audience was enthusiastic and the entire program was received with evident pleasure and enthusiasm.

The ensemble comprises five musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a group available for Syracuse at this time, due to week-day engagements in New York State, with a rehearsal in Boston this morning. The program provided was satisfactory and of lingering beauty. Mozart, Rameau, Hydn, Gretry, Stravinsky, de Falla and Weinberger were included in the composers chosen, the Mozart "Marriage of Figaro" overture opening the concert.

Especially pleasing was the "Berceuse" from Stravinsky's "L'Oiseau de Feu" with its sympathetic appeal. Another favorite was "Die Schlittenfahrt" from a Mozart group. The Haydn "London" symphony, as the D. Major Symphony is known, was a fitting climax to the first group of classics.

Head ushers were: Mrs. Preston D. Fogg and Mrs. Henry E. Mills.

Ushers: Mrs. Arthur White, Mrs. Carl Bye, Mrs. Frederick Whiteside, Miss Charlotte Dewey, Mrs. George L. Mulfinger, Mrs. Robert Mathews, Mrs. Edward M. Jones, Miss Mildred Oakes, Mrs. Archie Bedford, Mrs. Ross L. King, Jr., Miss Norma Allewelt, Miss Ruth Hindon, Mrs. Eugene Lichtenberg, Mrs. Burch McMorran, Mrs. Gerard McKee, Mrs. H. A. McArthur and Miss Mabel Menken.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

NOV 2 0 1933

IN THE FIELD OF MUSIC

NEW YORK (AP)—There has been only one subject of conversation in musical New York since last Monday, when a California child in a short white dress proved her right to rank with the historical prodigies of music.

She is Ruth Slenczynski. She plays piano at the age of 8 years with a combination of musical "rightness" and virtuosic technique that is unbelievable until heard—and she has the gift of instinctive showmanship. When she attacked the gruelling "Winter Wind" etude of Chopin she literally lifted her audience out of its seats. The gasp could be heard in the lobby outside.

So that when the seat sale opened last Thursday for her second recital, November 25, it was no surprise to find the lobby of the hall filled with eager patrons. Half the hall had been sold by 11 o'clock in the morning, which meant that tickets had been pushed through the wicket just as fast as the salesmen could manage them.

The first program was of adult dimensions, including the Bach Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue (for an 8-year-old!); the Beethoven "Pathetique" sonata; the Mendelssohn "Rondo Capriccioso," and a difficult Chopin group. On the second program this Menuhin of the piano will play the F major "Italian" concerto by Bach, and the fabulous little F major sonata of Mozart's. Among other things of moment.

There is a chance that Ruth's smile will show a vacant space in the middle of the row of teeth exposed. Ruth's New York debut arrived just as her baby teeth were leaving her!

* * *

Two distinguished conductors are returning to their New York assignments this week—Serge Koussevitzky and Walter Damrosch.

The first concert of the Boston Orchestra's New York-Brooklyn season was given Thursday night and introduced Nikolai Tcherepnin's "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a tale of Edgar Allen Poe" to New York—introduced successfully, be it known. Koussevitzky for years has made a point of introducing new music to America.

And Walter Damrosch is scheduled to conduct the first of his series for the musicians' emergency fund Saturday night in Madison Square Garden. It is a Bach-Wagner program, and enlists the support of ten soloists—Harold Bauer, George Barrere, Frances Blaisdell, Henri Deering, Dorothea Flexer, Ernest Hutchinson, Herbert Gould, Charles Naegele, Albert Spalding and Theodore Webb.

* * *

As a matter of fact, it has been a week of orchestras. Leopold Stokowski's Philadelphia Magicians ennobled the first symphony of the still-young Dmitri Shostakovitch, and other Russian music, Tuesday night, and Bruno Walter and the Philharmonic played, for novelties, Franz Shreker's "The Birthday of the Infanta" and David Stanley Smith's "1929—A Satire," Wednesday night.

Professor Smith's music was received with courtesy by the audience, but scarcely with enthusiasm. It is an effort to express the frustration and more of the 1929 crash in tone; perhaps it is too large an order for any musician, working with the vague material a musician must fortunately use. Professor Smith is dean of music at Yale University.

* * *

Giulio Gatti-Casazza has decided to impersonate Santa Claus to the extent of providing the annual performance of "Hansel und Gretel" as usual on Christmas Day. The Christmas Day matinee has been a fixture for a good many seasons; this Winter it means opening the Metropolitan a day earlier, since the season does not begin officially until Tuesday, December 26.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

NOV 2 2 1933

Handicapping Conductors

LAWRENCE GILMAN, music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, makes a point in his review of a recent concert in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. GILMAN, while lavish in his praise of the performance, is severe in his condemnation of NICOLAI TCHEREPNIN'S "Three Pieces for Orchestra, After a Tale of Edgar Allan Poe," which he terms "intrinsically pretty sad stuff."

MR. GILMAN excuses the conductor on the ground that it was not his fault—that "there was nothing else for the unhappy MR. KOUSSEVITZKY to do but play the work, since, after the sadistic habit of composers, MR. TCHEREPNIN had dedicated it to him."

Then MR. GILMAN murmurs disconsolately:

> When will the orchestral leaders of the world unite to form a Society for the Prevention of Cruel Dedications to Conductors?

It is a reasonable question. After all, composers consider themselves creative artists—and many of them are. To dedicate a piece to a conductor, however, savors of commercialism. It puts the conductor in a tight corner. Many times he has the choice either of being churlish, and refusing to play the composition written in his honor for the profit of the composer, or else of introducing inferior music into his program.

MR. GILMAN'S point is well taken.

BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

NOV 2 5 1933

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Serious Note On The Variety Of The Orchestral Programs In Baltimore

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: It appears that the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra's string of guest conductors is greater and more varied than its repertoire. The very intelligent review in The Sun tells the story.

We have been Brahms-ed and Tschaikowsky-ed to death, and not only that, but are compelled to listen to the same works of these composers year after year at the sacrifice of works that are being given in other communities with great success—works seldom, if ever, heard here.

Last week Mr. Koussevitzki treated us (and it was a real treat, indeed) to the Sibelius Second Symphony. The icy reception this great work received was nothing for Baltimore to be proud of. Last Friday Koussevitzki took this to New York. The audience at Carnegie Hall stood up and cheered for five minutes. Maybe that is the answer to why our programs are so confined.

Haydn wrote over a hundred symphonies. Certainly many are worthy of a hearing in Baltimore. Why can't we hear his "Surprise," "Clock," "London" and Oxford"? It has been some ten years since Damrosch gave the beautiful Chausson E Major; when we do get Dvorak it's always the "New World," yet his Fourth in G is among his finest works. And the Beethoven Second in D; it was given several times last year, but not in Baltimore. Critics everywhere have acclaimed this as a piece of music containing only the purest and most natural harmony, untainted with "gymnastics."

And Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's fine "Italian" and "Scotch" Symphonies, as well as the Schumann First and Fourth. Yes, the Baltimore Symphony did the first here some three years ago, but it's worthy of more hearings.

Brahms and Tschaikowsky are among my favorites and they wrote other great things beside the First and Fourth Symphonies, respectively. What's the idea of neglecting the former's beautiful Second, his "Academic Festival" and "Tragic" Overtures? Goldmark's "In the Springtime" Overture and his "Rustic Wedding" Symphony have been neglected for years, if ever done here at all.

Let's give Debussy and Ravel a rest—and, incidentally, our concert-goers. The finest of all Richard Strauss' works, "Ein Heldenleben," greeted with enthusiasm everywhere else, has yet to be brought to Baltimore. When have Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso" and his powerful "Dante" been done? Why not Saint-Saens' beautiful "Organ" Symphony?

RALPH B. BONWIT.

Baltimore, Nov. 23, 1933.

Trans. Nov 25th Mu.

Resurrection Afternoon At Symphony Hall

"A London Symphony" and Two More Numbers From The Past Decade

EACH AUTUMN the Symphony Concerts settle gradually into their stride. For those that frequent them, for those that write about them, the process is so familiar that with most it passes unnoticed. Yet in every musical year it leaves marks that the developing season gradually effaces. At the first pair of concerts conductor, orchestra and audience renew acquaintance; shake hands over a program in which "standard pieces," ancient, classical or modern, fittingly predominate. Next, almost before the series has begun to be such, the shadow of the annual journey westward descends upon the concerts. No doubt this touring week is desirable for the treasury and the prestige of the orchestra; but that, for the moment, is not the point. The conductor would be less than man and artist did not thought of those six or seven programs preoccupy him. They must be adjusted to the conditions before him. The orchestra must be ready, if possible at acme, to play the included pieces. Inevitably one, two or three slip into the preliminary concerts. Not always in Dr. Koussevitzky's usual proportioning run these second and third programs, adept and conscious designer though he is.

Toward the end of October comes the tour itself and the break of a week, thus early, in the series of concerts at home. No sooner have conductor and orchestra returned than a second journey looms. To New York, which is the capital of music in America, to other testing cities, they are about to make the first visit of the season. Inevitably the current programs bear this or that witness. Two more pairs of concerts and the home-series breaks again. Back comes the orchestra, and for the succeeding week Mr. Burgin is deputized as conductor. Nobody begrudges Dr. Koussevitzky a respite after a fortnight of nightly concerts, to say nothing of the travel between. Nor does Mr. Burgin fail to improve opportunity. But again the forward flow, the gradual expansion and heightening of the series, are interrupted. We of the audience are at the sixth pair of concerts, well toward the end of November, before these annual adjustments are finally accomplished.

Fortunately Dr. Koussevitzky then returns to conduct, without "trip" or other interruption, past the turn into January. Then the two weeks of guest-conductors to make annual, and sometimes exciting, stir. Finally the eleven pairs of concerts through which Dr. Koussevitzky, save for the monthly journeys to New York, is in continuous presence, with programs and orchestra at sustained interest and accomplishment. From the end of January through the end of April all things at Symphony Hall are as they should be with an ambitious conductor, an attuned orchestra, an eager public. Steadily the pulse of the season beats large and high. Familiar routine—it is easy to say—of musical year after musical year; but routine, none the less, that may profitably undergo examination, when a concert, like the first of the sixth pair on Friday, provides none too ample musical sustenance.

Through the second half of the program ran this dry, thin and, sometimes, tedious substance. To begin, the violin-concerto of Chaikovsky reappeared at Symphony Hall for the first time in nearly ten years. In new performance and fresh hearing reason for so long an interval was not far to seek. The technical feats that bestrew the concerto and set the eighteen-eighties a-marvelling, now make far less impression. The nineteen-thirties take it for granted that a violinist like Mr. Toscha Seidel, schooled by Auer and experienced in the concert-hall, will scarcely remind us of them so readily, roundedly and musically will they drop from bow and strings. In this full measure he accomplished the cadenzas, "passage-work," decorations, even the "incongruities" as violinistic orthodoxy used to count them.

The faults that the years underscore lie deeper. The whole concerto is overwritten beyond the generating invention, or the developing resource and imagination. The matter and the manner of the first movement are spun out till they cloy. Though the succeeding canzonetta is briefer, it provides no stimulating contrast. As for the finale, everyone knows by this time how the Russian bear—or moujik—with a single violin or a full orchestra to musick him, with a folk-theme in his head, and repetitious folk-phrases in his feet, will caper and cavort over such pages. Three weeks ago Chaikovsky was leading him through the finale of the Fourth Symphony, now through the finale of the violin-concerto.

Besides the silken, sensitive, limpid tone, which distinguished Mr. Seidel only drew out the more the lengths and sweetness, the pervading sentiment and ornament of the first two movements. Nor vivid and impetuous though he would be, did the violinist storm through the finale, as he must, if its fifty-year-old frenzies are to stir present ears. They need a Rubinstein of the violin rather than the sensitive and artful Seidel, the fiery, propulsive Koussevitzky rather than the discreet and cautious Burgin.

Nor is Musorgsky's "Night on the Bald Mountain," revived in its turn after eight years, too impressive or engrossing. Had he preferred the concert-hall to the theater and left more symphonic pieces behind, it might have missed its present precarious place in the occasional repertory. Musorgsky wrote and re-wrote it. Through two years the inheriting Rimsky-Korsakov meditated and revised. Such labor gradually stifled impulse, motion, impact. Orgies of sorcery and devilry are becoming rather trite symphonic story; while the dispersing church-bell of the dawn hardly renews the first fine surprise. Last week in New York the gentlemen of the press were playing hob with the elder Cherepnin's music to Poe's "Masque of the Red Death," likewise known to Boston. Is Musorgsky of this Witches Sabbath a whit more delineative, imaginative, resourceful? One listener suspects not. But Musorgsky is Russian classic up and down the world; whereas Cherepnin is only a Russian exile writing pieces in Paris.

As it was, Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," also revived after ten years, proved the salvation of the concert. Throughout Mr. Burgin led a responsive orchestra intelligently, capably, sympathetically; yet too often middling cool. This department is no friend to restricted nationalism. It is all for the widths of the world and highly individualized talents; but certain musics, like "Die Meistersinger" among operas, Chaikovsky's Fourth, Fifth and Sixth among symphonies, ask a conductor of the race for entire performance. Program or no program, Vaughan Williams's symphony is infused with the sights, sounds, character and atmosphere of London—the manifold pulse, the dissonant stir of it through the first movement; the drab, the melancholy, the nostalgia, through the second; the dark and the silence haunted by distant glow and din through the night-piece; the grinding stress and blunt swirl of the finale; at beginning and end the obbligato of the girdling river, idealized, everlasting.

Only an essential intermezzo, say after the night-piece, is lacking—the soft flash, the quick dart, of the spring upon a February or a March day into every London corner. Mists and gray and chill, then on the instant warmth and light and kindling brightness. The spring comes grudgingly to Boston, and New York. Graciously, swiftly, it steals upon Paris and London; while as yet music knows it not. Louise's—and Charpentier's—"Paris, printemps" is only passing phrase in an opera; while Dukelsky's "Paris and April" was only an overlooked "number" in a dubious review.

The "London Symphony" incites musical as well as illusory reactions. By date matter and manner it is early Vaughan Williams; but the maturer composer, addicted to his modes and folk-song, his churchly and pastoral prepossessions, hardly addresses so wide and persuaded an audience. The breadth and flow of the river-measures are no mean invention and achievement. "Calm without rage, without o'er flowing full," wrote seventeenth-century Denham of London's stream. In the twentieth Vaughan Williams musicks him.

The dissonant tumults, the contributing cornets, of the first movement and the finale have imaginative reason, make graphic impression. The nostalgic tunes of oboe and violas in the slow movement, the bare harmonies upon them, are self-contained music as well as summoned atmosphere. In the night-piece, which is scherzo, the pupil of Ravel sets in the glittering harmonies; the honest, hearty Englishman burks no gutter-ditty; the inventive composer predates Stravinsky and the hand-organs of "Petrushka" when he turns his strings and horns into a concertina blaring across the distant dark. . . . Believe it or not, there is music written in these full days of ours. Nor a jot the worse because it happens also to be urban.

H. T. P.

Subscription Opened

For the Eighteen Remaining Symphony Concerts

THE Symphony Concerts of this week complet onequarter of the current series. Eighteen pairs remain from the beginning of December through the end of April. They will be distinguished by the presence in January as guests of Arnold Schönberg, the composer and Sir Henry Wood, the London conductor; by the performance of acts from Wagner's opera, "Die Walküre," and Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantschina"; the assistance of Arthur Schnabel, Yehudi Menuhin and other eminent soloists; by a Chaikovsky Festival to close the season.

Since there are still available seats for these concerts on both Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, a new subscription is now open at Symphony Hall for threequarters of the series at threequarters of the original prices. . . . Proportional subscriptions may also be made to the Monday and the Tuesday series.

Richard Burgin Leads Boston Symphony in Concert

By MOSES SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of this week find Mr. Richard Burgin, concert-master, on the conductor's stand in place of his chief, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has taken a week's vacation. Mr. Burgin, who has been liked both for his progress and interpretative powers on his occasional appearances as conductor, leads a program consisting of Vaughan Williams' London Symphony, Tchaikovsky's violin concerto, and Moussorgsky's "Night On Bald Mountain."

Toscha Seidel, rare visitor to this city, is the soloist in the concerto. Throughout his performance at yesterday's matinee one heard justification for his excellent reputation, in his broad and beautiful tone, and in his entire command of his instrument. His version of the solo music (which is most of the work, since the orchsral part is slight) is warm and passionate, punctuated by frequent changes of tempi, as well as frequent rubato.

His pace for most of the first two movements was unbearably slow, while the last movement, as it is in compensation, was played so rapidly as not to be clear. I do not wish to minimize the musical elements in Mr. Seidel's playing when I say that such tempi are not for 1933. Nor do I believe that Tchaikovsky intended them.

The soloist was enthusiastically applauded by the audience. It ought to be said that orchestral accompaniment under Mr. Burgin was admirable and sympathetic—the tribute of one violinist to another. On his own, in the other two works of the program, Mr. Burgin directed beautiful performances. The London Symphony was an especially exciting experience, offered with all its beauty and majesty which make it one of the masterpieces of English music.

The performance of the Moussorgsky work was similarly happy, indicating the strides Mr. Burgin has made as conductor, and justifying the faith many of us have had in his artistry.

SYMPHONY IN EXCELLENT PROGRAM

Russian - English Works Enjoyed by Large Audience

Trav Nov 25

A work of considerable note returned to Symphony hall yesterday afternoon after an absence of 10 years. It was Vaughan Williams's "A London Symphony," heard virtually as a new composition. Sharing the program with it were Tchaikovsky's great concerto for violin in D major and Moussorgsky's orchestral fantasy "Une Nuit sur le Mont Chauve" ("A Night on Bald Mountain"). The guest soloist was Toscha Seidel.

In some respects the generally excellent Russian-English concert was listened to with regret for on the podium was Richard Burgin, ordinarily the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. His presence there served as reminder that one-fourth of the 24-pair-long seasonal concerts have been completed, for each year at conclusion of the fall journeys Dr. Koussevitzky takes a week's rest and Burgin conducts in his place.

It was indeed a pleasure, the hearing of this "London Symphony," a work which first brought very considerable fame to Vaughan Williams. In some respects characteristic of the older generation of English composers, it yet has an ever fresh spirit, many moving almost poetic measures and an especially beautiful ending.

In explanation of the composition, Williams has been quoted as saying: "The title might run 'A Symphony by a Londoner'; that is to say, various sights and sounds of London may have influenced the composer, but it would not be helpful to describe these. The work must succeed or fail as music and in no other way. Therefore, if the hearers recognize a few suggestions of such things as the Westminster chimes, or the lavender cry, these must be treated as accidents and not essentials of the music."

Considering the technical skill displayed, the deep and at times moving tones of the work, one can not help but wonder why Dr. Koussevitzky has not included it on his programs.

Last season Burgin conducted Williams's "Pastoral Symphony" intelligently and well. Yesterday he repeated his success with the "London Symphony," indicating he had considerable understanding and keen appreciation of the work to hand. However, his leadership throughout the Tchaikovsky and Moussorgsky numbers was not so fortunate. Koussevitzky would have been tremendous; he was merely up to the requirements of the score.

As soloist playing the extremely difficult and masterly concerto, the Russian violinist, Seidel, demonstrated that he was an excellent virtuoso always in command of his instrument, and at the same time exceptionally affected. His gestures were exaggerated, his wild swayings unnecessary. A Kreisler would never have acted in that manner, even when playing this, one of the greatest violin concertos in the world.

Yet, notwithstanding his unpardonable eccentricities, his interpretations were unusually fine. The smoothness of the performance was in some part due to the fact that the conductor, Burgin, is also a very able violinist.

W. T. C., Jr.

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra

During the week after the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first New York trip of the season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky permits himself a brief period of renewal, resigning his baton for the time to Mr. Richard Burgin, concertmaster. For the pair of concerts scheduled for Nov. 24 and 25 on the home grounds, the proconsul devised this scheme of art: Vaughan Williams, "A London Symphony"; Tchaikovsky, Violin Concerto; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain."

For among Mr. Burgin's responsibilities as viceroy, it appears, is that of keeping the name of Vaughan Williams in the program books. Presumably Dr. Koussevitzky does not find the music of this composer congenial, since he very rarely performs any of it. Last season Mr. Burgin gave the first performance at these concerts of the "Pastoral" Symphony; on the present occasion he offered the "London" as a virtual novelty; for it had not been heard in Boston since Mr. Pierre Monteux last directed it in Symphony Hall more than 10 years ago, and must therefore have been unfamiliar to many members of the orchestra as well as to many in the audience.

The symphony renewed its remembered impression as an individual music remarkable for its construction as for its atmosphere. Yet that remembered impression was not strengthened; for it seemed that somehow the Thames flowed now less mysteriously, that there was less vigor in the London populace, less gloom and pathos and menace in the air. Was this the result of imperfect assimilation of the score by conductor and orchestra? Or of the changes that a decade makes in a piece of music—and in a listener's ears? At all events, the "Pastoral" now looms as the greater work.

Mr. Toscha Seidel, the soloist, was another semi-novelty; he too had been absent 10 years from these concerts. In the meantime he has taken on a more mature appearance. He still possesses the tone of an Auer pupil, albeit a smaller one than those of some of his coevals. He has a very expert left-hand technique and a rather inflexible bow arm. For a native of Russia he appears to find remarkably little emotion in Tchaikovsky's Concerto. He played with great precision and with a fine show of virtuosity but with a singularly detached attitude. He was accorded the customary number of recalls, however; and the audience was equally cordial to Mr. Burgin and the orchestra during the rest of the program.

L. A. S.

174

URDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1933 Herald

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Vaughn Williams, A London Symphony; Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Violin, op. 35; Moussorgsky, "A Night on Bald Mountain." Conductor, Richard Burgin; soloist, Toscha Seidel.

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a large audience to Symphony Hall, practically every seat being taken. There is no better panacea, during these difficult times that the world is facing, than beautiful music and there is no more beautiful orchestral playing than that of the Boston Symphony.

Vaughn Williams's London Symphony took up the first half of the program. It was good to hear it preceded by the other works, for it demands a certain isolation to be heard to the best advantage. The composer would have had deep satisfaction in yesterday's performance. Mr. Burgin seems endowed with a peculiar sympathy and insight for Vaughn Williams's compositions. He conducted the symphony with a compelling enthusiasm that found continuous response from orchestra and audience.

Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto brought Toscha Seidel before a Boston audience for the first time in some years. That he has lost none of his popularity was evident in the hearty welcome he received as he came out to play. He is remembered as one of the greatest of the Auer clan and he played the concerto with a brilliance and warmth that is peculiar to himself and Elman. He has, however, his individual way of interpreting the concerto, particularly the intensity with which he stressed the lyric moments of the first movement. He has emerged from his temporary retirement from the concert stage a greater violinist than ever. Yesterday's audience forgot that it was Friday afternoon, and gave Mr. Seidel applause of a degree wholly unusual.

Moussorgsky, in some ways the most primitive and in others the most individual of Russian composers, was represented by his "Night on Bald Mountain," the third and last number of the program.

Great praise is due Mr. Burgin for his excellent conducting. Thoughout the afternoon he was greeted with spontaneous recognition of his worth.

Next weeks' pair of concerts brings Lowrie's Sinfonia Dialectica and three dances from de Falla's ballet "El Sombrero de Tres Picos." In addition to these works, Artur Schnabel, pianist, will appear as soloist in a concerto by Mozart and in one by Beethoven, the C minor. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

Yesterday's programs announce some particularly interesting features for the remaining Boston Symphony concerts of this season, to include the first act of "Die Walkuere" in concert form, with Paul Althouse and Elsa Alsen in the respective roles of Siegfried and Sieglinde. Arnold Schoenberg and Sir Henry Wood will be guest conductors in January, Paul Kochanski and Yehudi Menuhin are among the instrumental soloists. The third act of Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," with chorus and soloists, a Rimsky-Korsakoff program and a Tschaikowsky festival of which the final pair of concerts will be a part, complete the plan.

Bicycle Stolen as Boy Makes Last Payment

[Special Dispatch to The Herald]

NORTH ANDOVER, Nov. 24 — Police officials tonight are searching for the thief who stole 10-year-old Robert Hennessey's bicycle within 24 hours after the boy had made his last payment on the machine. Robert lives on Beachwood street.

AT ROBERT BRECK BRIGHAM

Miss Susan B. Newton, a member of the newly formed Housekeepers Club of Boston, is housekeeper at the Robert Breck Brigham Hospital, not at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, as was erroneously announced yesterday. Mrs. Ann Lewis is housekeeper at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

NOV 25 1933

To Bring N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra Here Next May

Wilfrid Tremblay of Portland, formerly of Lewiston, has engaged the Lewiston Armory for the evening of May 11, for what will be one of the finest concerts ever given in Lewiston.

He is bringing to this city the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, formed by the combination of the two leading orchestras in New York (the Symphony made famous by Walter Damrosch) and next to the Boston Symphony orchestra, perhaps the most outstanding orchestra in the country. Mr. Tremblay will conduct this orchestra with which negotiations have been completed. He is now negotiating with the famous soprano of the Metropolitan opera, Mme. Lily Pons, as soloist at this concert. There will also be a violin soloist — Mischa Piastro, concert master of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, if he is still in this country; if not, a violinist of equal note.

Mr. Tremblay is bringing these artists and the orchestra to Maine for the great Nordica Memorial Music Festival, arranged for May 8, 9, and 10 in Portland City Hall, and has decided to extend the Festival to Lewiston, his former home city, to the extent of one concert. As in the case of the festival in Portland, which is sponsored by the Nordica Memorial Association, proceeds of the concert, above expenses, will be devoted to the fund for the Nordica Museum in Farmington, where costumes, jewels and personal effects of the great Maine prima donna are preserved.

AY, NOVEMBER 25,

SYMPHONY RESTORES "LONDON"

Williams' Big Work Heard Again—Seidel Soloist

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A revival of Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony and the appearance of a solo violinist, Toscha Seidel, distinguished the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, which was further marked by the presence on the conductor's stand of Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra.

RESTORED TO REPERTORY

Annually, while Dr. Koussevitzky takes a well-earned holiday, Mr. Burgin conducts a pair of concerts and, be it said to his great credit, these concerts are sometimes among the most interesting of the season. A year ago Mr. Burgin introduced to Symphony Hall Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony and yesterday he was restoring to the repertory of the orchestra another master work by the most distinguished of living British composers, music that had not been played here since the days of Mr. Monteux.

The occasional touches of realism in "A London Symphony" serve to place it on a slightly lower aesthetic plane than its pastoral successor, which is pure mood. But there is mood in the "London" Symphony as well, and although the idiom of the earlier work is slightly different, less pronouncedly "modal," the "London" Symphony at its best is in much the same way haunting and nostalgic. A rare composer is Vaughan Williams, and not the least significant thing about his music is its faculty of making that which succeeds it on a programme tend to sound a little trite and obvious.

Mr. Seidel's Virtuosity

Not long ago the Britisher's "Norfolk Rhapsody" was doing such disservice for Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and yesterday, following hard on the heels of the Symphony, the first movement of Tchaikovsky's familiar Concerto seemed commonplace stuff despite the skillful and enthusiastic performance it was receiving both from Mr. Seidel and from Mr. Burgin and his fellows. With the second movement came more of musical distinction and Mr. Seidel's luscious tone could be better appreciated. The energies of the Finale inevitably carry it along, and here Mr. Seidel's virtuosity shone resplendent. That these excitements and the masterly playing which gave them voice should provoke hearty and continued applause was but to be expected.

Ends With Moussorgsky

For ending to a concert already sufficiently long, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra added that diverting bit of musical deviltry and poetic aftermath, Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain."

The performance was a brilliant one. With Moussorgsky, as with Williams and Tchaikovsky before him, Mr. Burgin as conductor had been wholly sympathetic.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

80 BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

DEC 1 - 1933

Call For Admirers Of Jean Sibelius To Stand Up And Be Counted

To the Editor of The Evening Sun—Sir:

All music lovers who are interested in furthering their acquaintance with the works of an indisputably great—but seldom heard—composer, please note this opportunity.

Petitions to Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, requesting him to present more of the major works of Jean Sibelius on his remaining visits here this season may be conveniently signed by anyone interested at the following places: The bulletin board just inside the fine arts and music room, second floor, the Enoch Pratt Free Library, Cathedral street, and at the desk of the Peabody Institute Library, Mount Vernon Place.

To anyone who might neglect to sign because they suppose such a petition will have no effect upon Dr. Koussevitzky, let me say that his manager told me that Dr. Koussevitzky played Sibelius' Second Symphony at his last concert because he had received a number of individual requests for a Sibelius composition.

Baltimore, Nov. 26. P. S. Hensel, Jr.

Ourselves and Others

Dec

At the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow the illustrious pianist, Artur Schnabel, is guest. Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled the program accordingly:

Sinfonia Dialetica	Lourié
Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra	Mozart
Concerto, No. 3, in C minor for Piano and Orchestra	Beethoven
Three Dances from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"	Falla

In New York Mozart and moderns divide Mr. Walter's program for the Philharmonic Concerts, viz.:

Symphony No. 39 in E-flat major (K. 543)	Mozart
Concerto, No. 4, in D major for Violin with Orchestra (Violinist: Albert Spalding)	Mozart
Poem for Violin and Orchestra	Chausson
Church Windows	Respighi

In Philadelphia, the novel number is Mr. Eichheim's new piece of music from the Far East, "Bali," after the island whence it was drawn. The full program stands:

Suite of Dances from the Operas, "Iphigenia in Aulis," "Orpheus" and "Arm[illegible]"	Gluck
Symphony in G minor	Mozart
Bali	Eichheim
Liebesnacht from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner

In Chicago, Mr. Stock is producing a new piece from Mr. Carpenter, by title—already used by Delius—"Sea Drift." In full the program is:

Symphony No. 8, in F Major	Beethoven
Sea Drift	Carpenter
La Folia, Variations for Violin and Orchestra	Corelli
Concerto, No. 4, in D major for Violin with Orchestra	Mozart
Two Dances, from the Suite, "From Foreign Lands" (Violinist: Mr. Szigeti)	Moszkowski

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will return to the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, heard from him and the Boston Orchestra two years ago for the first times in America. Thereafter: Ravel's setting for voice and orchestra of three poems by Klingsor, "Scheherazade." They will now be sung by Mme. Olga Averino. To conclude: the familiar Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë."

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge Dr. Koussevitzky proposes these pieces:

Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"	Mozart
Symphony, No. 3, in F major	Brahms
Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme	Pierné
Norfolk Rhapsody	Vaughan Williams
Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner

Globe Dec 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Although the distinguishing feature of this week's Symphony concerts is the appearance of Artur Schnabel as soloist in two piano concertos, there is also some interesting music new to Boston—Arthur Lourie's "Dialectic Symphony." The program is ended with Three Dances from De Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Mr Schnabel has chosen the A major concerto (K 488) of Mozart, and that in C minor, Op 37, of Beethov masterworks. Detailed praise elaborate analysis of the playing such a musician as Mr Schnabel make dry reading. One cannot help, however, but remark upon the subtle differentiation of style which he brought to each. Though the general mood and even certain sequences of notes in Beethoven's concerto are reminiscent of Mozart, the more turbulent manner of the mature Beethoven was here beginning to appear. Mr Schnabel treated this concerto in just the proper fashion, playing it neither too delicately, nor fervidly, as may properly be done with the master's later music. The slow movement, marvelous in itself, received a performance that defies description, one completely in accord with the nature of the musical substance. The final allegro aroused a flurry of handclapping and stamping that the Friday afternoon audience seldom bestows.

Unlike Mr Gieseking and Mr Petri, for example, Mr Schnabel does not concern himself with extreme delicacy of touch and articulation in Mozart, nor does he produce such a purling, fluid tone. His Mozart, though perfectly correct in style, is a little more solid, decidedly less subtle in nuance. For that reason one listener preferred his Beethoven. The latter, it seems, is in closer accord with his temperament. Mr Schnabel played to some of the finest orchestral accompaniments one has heard from Dr Koussevitzky.

Mr Lourie sent his "Dialectic Symphony" out into the world with a lengthy and abstruse apologia regarding the application of the science of dialectics to the art of music. Just what logic and reasoning have to do with the esthetic substance of one of the most emotional and elusive of arts is something for academicians to ponder about. At any rate, he sought to have various instruments of a large orchestra engage in a dialogue upon a question raised by Pascal. The latter, after ruminating upon the immensity of infinity and upon the Divine foresight that causes men to be born when and where they are born, boiled his musings down to this: "By what power have I been put in this time and place?"

Mr Lourie, said to be an intellectualist fond of subtle paradoxes, has in his writings combined some bits of sound philosophy with considerable obscure rhodomontade. He evidently frowns upon "program" music, but favors what he calls "dialectic" music; probably he does not consider his present piece in any sense "programmatic." Yet, since he has written a musical dialogue in which instruments reason out Pascal's question, he must, along the way, have conceived some definite progress of argument and some specific solution or point [illegible] disagreement. Does not this in itself constitute a sort of literary program? In absolute music, the notes must from extraneous ideas be as free as a juryman. "A paradox, a paradox, a most ingenious paradox."

The "Dialectic Symphony" is, nevertheless, interesting music, quite unlike, in style and mood, anything one has ever heard. Incidental dissonance and a multitude of varying rhythms proclaim it the product of a "modern." Although its form is said to be unconventional, repetition of outstanding melodic fragments gives it a suggestion of symmetry. Certain melodic and rhythmic devices Lourie has used are unconsciously associated in mind with the music of modern Yiddish operettas. Whether the work, after repeated hearings, will seem as fresh and vital as it did yesterday, remains with the future; it is certain, however, that none of the barren austerities of Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata" are present. In spite of the composer's indubitable originality, it is evident that he still is touched by the rays of the setting sun of Stravinsky.

De Falla's ballet music, so exuberant and so piquant in theme and instrumentation, was heard with pleasure. Dr Koussevitzky played it superbly. Revival of "Love, the Sorcerer," and "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" would be indeed welcome.

Mahler's great Ninth Symphony will be played next week. Olga Averino, soprano, will be heard in Ravel's "Scheherazade," a setting of three poems by Tristan Klingsor. Ravel's second "Daphne and Chloe" suite will also be heard.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, DECEMBER 2,

SCHNABEL ENCHANTS SYMPHONY

Pianist Arouses Big Audience by Playing Beethoven's 3d

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The applause that followed Arthur Schnabel's performance of Beethoven's Third Pianoforte Concerto at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was heartening.

When such playing of such music brings down the house all cannot be wrong with the world.

MASTER WORK BY MASTER

Generally this Concerto in C minor, unheard in Symphony Hall for a dozen years, is regarded with a certain condescension. In it Beethoven is seen on his way upward to the heights where sit enthroned and enshrined its successors in G major and E flat. Granted that the piece preserves certain 18th century conventions of form and style from which Beethoven was ultimately to free himself, it is still, when played as it was played yesterday, the utterance of a unique genius who could lend significance to common chords and stereotyped formulas.

In the Largo of this Concerto, however, Beethoven outstrips his generation and writes more as men were to write in the years to come. Brahms might have been proud to sign its chief theme with its curious and fleeting adumbration of the "Salut d' Amour" in Gounod's "Faust." From Mr. Schnabel, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, this poetic movement received yesterday a performance so rapt, devoted and inspired that the listener was made to feel as one present at the celebration of some sacred and solemn rite.

This was the climax of the concert, the climax even of many concerts. Before the Concerto had come, for the first time in Boston, a "Sinfonia Dialectica," by Dr. Koussevitzky's biographer, the mystical, over-cerebral Arthur Lurie. A singularly disjointed composition this, made up for the most part of strongly rhythmed melodic fragments naively reiterated, a piece that constantly threatened to fall apart and in time disappointed by not doing so more speedily, one that neither disturbed nor impressed, that came and went and in all likelihood will not come again.

A neatly turned, expressive and, in the Finale, occasionally over-fast performance of Mozart's familiar pianoforte Concerto in A major served as curtain raiser for the Concerto of Beethoven. The three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," brought the afternoon to a lively and brilliant close.

Herald Dec 2 THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Lowrie, Sinfonia Dialectica; Mozart, concerto for pianoforte in A major (Koechel 488); Beethoven, concerto in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra; de Falla, three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos"; ballet conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Artur Schnabel.

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra had the assistance of Artur Schnabel, pianist. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning from a short vacation, was warmly welcomed by audience and orchestra. The audience, which completely filled the hall, sat under the spell of some great music, beautifully performed. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra collaborated with Mr. Schnabel in memorable readings of concertos by Mozart and Beethoven.

Mozart wrote two concertos for pianoforte—the A major played yesterday and the C minor—during one month in 1786, an achievement equal to his composition of the E flat, G minor and C major symphonies within a few weeks two years later. This A major concerto—there is another smaller one in the same key—is as much a study in euphony as is the E flat symphony. It has some of the same outward features, namely the absence of oboes and the prominence of Mozart's favorite wind instrument, the clarinet. A remarkable feature of this concerto is its slow movement of tender melancholy in F sharp minor,—Mozart's only work in that key. The finale presents a luxurious number of themes: Mozart has his own special way of treating concerto and other rondos, yet some of his effects have been echoed in works as widely removed as Till Eulenspiegel by Richard Strauss.

Announcement was made early in the season that Mr. Schnabel would play nothing but Beethoven on his present tour. Boston music lovers were glad he included a Mozart concerto yesterday. Throughout the work the pianist's presentation was beautifully proportioned. The first two movements were particularly successful in mood, the slow movement being given with a touching simplicity that probed its deepest moments. And in the Beethoven concerto Mr. Schnabel revealed qualities that make for a complete performance of a great work. The coda of the first movement had ethereal sonorities and the slow movement was, as with the Mozart concerto, of outstanding loveliness. In fact, Mr. Schnabel seemed unusually interested in sheer beauty of sound at yesterday's appearance. He made pedal effects in the slow movement based on the original Beethoven autograph. These effects seemed strange to some, beautiful to others. But strange or beautiful they are but outward evidence and of no more value than the tinkling cymbal unless the inner meaning be there. Mr. Schnabel's artistry made a deep impression and brought him great success. At the conclusion of the Beethoven concerto, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were joint recipients, with Mr. Schnabel, of prolonged and hearty applause.

In the orchestral parts of the two concertos, Dr. Koussevitzky showed himself an artist of sincere integrity. He did not accompany the concertos; tuttis, solo parts and accompaniment passages were welded into a unified whole such as is seldom heard, yet only in this way can the true spirit of the classical concerto be understood.

The concert could have ended with the Beethoven. We were given, as a closing number, three dances by de Falla, for good measure. Even after the Beethoven they were refreshing to a degree, both in material and interpretation. Skillfully made, these dances have a sensuous charm that is at once delightful and stimulating.

Lowrie's Sinfonia Dialectica opened the program. Fortunately the first few measures of the Mozart concerto completely eradicated the doleful and boring impressions made by Mr. Lowrie's composition.

Next week's program includes Mahler's Ninth Symphony, Ravel's Scheherazade for voice and orchestra, and excerpts from his Daphnis and Chloe Ballet. Madame Olga Averino will be the soloist.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

DEC 2 - 1933

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

Beethoven's Third Symphony to Be Presented in Providence Theatre.

Next Tuesday evening at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season of four concerts in the Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will then conduct Beethoven's epic Third Symphony, known as the "Eroica" and inspired by his contemporary Napoleon. When Napoleon had himself crowned emperor, Beethoven, feeling that he had betrayed the cause of freedom, destroyed the dedication. But this monument to the great hero of the composer's imagination remains for the world to admire.

A score which Dr. Koussevitzky has introduced to America this season will also be heard on this program: Gabriel Pierne's "Divertissments on a Pastoral Theme." This piece which is in reality an entertaining set of variations has been played in New York and other cities as well as Boston. It contains a Viennese waltz, a blues, introduced by a saxophone solo; and a gigue.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" will also be played. This score has been called a miniature tone poem, describing the coming of dawn over the Red Square in Moscow. The remaining number, concluding the first part of the program, will be Richard Strauss' humorous tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The "Eroica" symphony was last given in Providence by this orchestra in the spring of 1930.

80

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN
DEC 1 - 1933

Call For Admirers Of Jean Sibelius To Stand Up And Be Counted

To THE EDITOR OF THE EVENING SUN—Sir:

All music lovers who are interested in furthering their acquaintance with the works of an indisputably great—but seldom heard—composer, please note this opportunity.

Petitions to Dr. Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, requesting him to present more of the major works of Jean Sibelius on his remaining visits here this season may be conveniently signed by anyone interested at the following places: The bulletin board just inside the fine arts and music room, second floor, the Enoch Pratt Free Library, Cathedral street, and at the desk of the Peabody Institute Library, Mount Vernon Place.

To anyone who might neglect to sign because they suppose such a petition will have no effect upon Dr. Koussevitzky, let me say that his manager told me that Dr. Koussevitzky played Sibelius' Second Symphony at his last concert because he had received a number of individual requests for a Sibelius composition.

Baltimore, Nov. 26. P. S. HENSEL, JR.

Ourselves and Others

Dec

At the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow the illustrious pianist, Artur Schnabel, is guest. Dr. Koussevitzky has assembled the program accordingly:

Sinfonia Dialetica .... Lourié
Concerto in A major for Piano and Orchestra .... Mozart
Concerto, No. 3, in C minor for Piano and Orchestra .... Beethoven
Three Dances from the Ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" .... Falla

In New York Mozart and moderns divide Mr. Walter's program for the Philharmonic Concerts, viz.:

Symphony No. 39 in E-flat major (K. 543) .... Mozart
Concerto, No. 4, in D major for Violin with Orchestra .... Mozart
(Violinist: Albert Spalding)
Poem for Violin and Orchestra .... Chausson
Church Windows .... Respighi

In Philadelphia, the novel number is Mr. Eichheim's new piece of music from the Far East, "Bali," after the island whence it was drawn. The full program stands:

Suite of [illegible] from the Operas, "Iphigenia [illegible] Aulis," "Orpheus" and "Arm[illegible]" .... Gluck
Symphony in G minor .... Mozart
Bali .... Eichheim
Liebesnacht from the Opera, "Tristan and Isolde" .... Wagner

In Chicago, Mr. Stock is producing a new piece from Mr. Carpenter, by title—already used by Delius—"Sea Drift." In full the program is:

Symphony No. 8, in F Major .... Beethoven
Sea Drift .... Carpenter
La Folia, Variations for Violin and Orchestra .... Corelli
Concerto, No. 4, in D major for Violin with Orchestra .... Mozart
Two Dances, from the Suite, "From Foreign Lands" .... Moszkowski
(Violinist: Mr. Szigeti)

Programs to Hand

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will return to the Ninth Symphony of Mahler, heard from him and the Boston Orchestra two years ago for the first times in America. Thereafter: Ravel's setting for voice and orchestra of three poems by Klingsor, "Scheherazade." They will now be sung by Mme. Olga Averino. To conclude: the familiar Second Suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë."

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Cambridge Dr. Koussevitzky proposes these pieces:

Serenade for Strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" .... Mozart
Symphony, No. 3, in F major .... Brahms
Divertissements on a Pastoral Theme .... Pierné
Norfolk Rhapsody .... Vaughan Williams
Prelude to the Opera, "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner

Globe Dec 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Although the distinguishing feature of this week's Symphony concerts is the appearance of Artur Schnabel as soloist in two piano concertos, there is also some interesting music new to Boston—Arthur Lourie's "Dialectic Symphony." The program is ended with Three Dances from De Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat."

Mr Schnabel has chosen the A major concerto (K 488) of Mozart, and that in C minor, Op 37, of Beethoven [illegible] masterworks. Detailed praise [illegible] elaborate analysis of the playing [illegible] such a musician as Mr Schnabel make dry reading. One cannot help, however, but remark upon the subtle differentiation of style which he brought to each. Though the general mood and even certain sequences of notes in Beethoven's concerto are reminiscent of Mozart, the more turbulent manner of the mature Beethoven was here beginning to appear. Mr Schnabel treated this concerto in just the proper fashion, playing it neither too delicately, nor fervidly, as may properly be done with the master's later music. The slow movement, marvelous in itself, received a performance that defies description, one completely in accord with the nature of the musical substance. The final allegro aroused a flurry of handclapping and stamping that the Friday afternoon audience seldom bestows.

Unlike Mr Gieseking and Mr Petri, for example, Mr Schnabel does not concern himself with extreme delicacy of touch and articulation in Mozart, nor does he produce such a purling, fluid tone. His Mozart, though perfectly correct in style, is a little more solid, decidedly less subtle in nuance. For that reason one listener preferred his Beethoven. The latter, it seems, is in closer accord with his temperament. Mr Schnabel played to some of the finest orchestral accompaniments one has heard from Dr Koussevitzky.

Mr Lourie sent his "Dialectic Symphony" out into the world with a lengthy and abstruse apologia regarding the application of the science of dialectics to the art of music. Just what logic and reasoning have to do with the esthetic substance of one of the most emotional and elusive of arts is something for academicians to ponder about. At any rate, he sought to have various instruments of a large orchestra engage in a dialogue upon a question raised by Pascal. The latter, after ruminating upon the immensity of infinity and upon the Divine foresight that causes men to be born when and where they are born, boiled his musings down to this: "By what power have I been put in this time and place?"

Mr Lourie, said to be an intellectualist fond of subtle paradoxes, has in his writings combined some bits of sound philosophy with considerable obscure rhodomontade. He evidently frowns upon "program" music, but favors what he calls "dialectic" music; probably he does not consider his present piece in any sense "programmatic." Yet, since he has written a musical dialogue in which instruments reason out Pascal's question, he must, along the way, have conceived some definite progress of argument and some specific solution or point of disagreement. Does not this in itself constitute a sort of literary program? In absolute music, the notes must from extraneous ideas be as free as a juryman. "A paradox, a paradox, a most ingenious paradox."

The "Dialectic Symphony" is, nevertheless, interesting music, quite unlike, in style and mood, anything one has ever heard. Incidental dissonance and a multitude of varying rhythms proclaim it the product of a "modern." Although its form is said to be unconventional, repetition of outstanding melodic fragments gives it a suggestion of symmetry. Certain melodic and rhythmic devices Lourie has used are unconsciously associated in mind with the music of modern Yiddish operettas. Whether the work, after repeated hearings, will seem as fresh and vital as it did yesterday, remains with the future; it is certain, however, that none of the barren austerities of Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata" are present. In spite of the composer's indubitable originality, it is evident that he still is touched by the rays of the setting sun of Stravinsky.

De Falla's ballet music, so exuberant and so piquant in theme and instrumentation, was heard with pleasure. Dr Koussevitzky played it superbly. Revival of "Love, the Sorcerer," and "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" would be indeed welcome.

Mahler's great Ninth Symphony will be played next week. Olga Averino, soprano, will be heard in Ravel's "Scheherazade," a setting of three poems by Tristan Klingsor. Ravel's second "Daphne and Chloe" suite will also be heard.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, DECEMBER 2,

SCHNABEL ENCHANTS SYMPHONY

Pianist Arouses Big Audience by Playing Beethoven's 3d

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The applause that followed Arthur Schnabel's performance of Beethoven's Third Pianoforte Concerto at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was heartening.

When such playing of such music brings down the house all cannot be wrong with the world.

MASTER WORK BY MASTER

Generally this Concerto in C minor, unheard in Symphony Hall for a dozen years, is regarded with a certain condescension. In it Beethoven is seen on his way upward to the heights where sit enthroned and enshrined its successors in G major and E flat. Granted that the piece preserves certain 18th century conventions of form and style from which Beethoven was ultimately to free himself, it is still, when played as it was played yesterday, the utterance of a unique genius who could lend significance to common chords and stereotyped formulas.

In the Largo of this Concerto, however, Beethoven outstrips his generation and writes more as men were to write in the years to come. Brahms might have been proud to sign its chief theme with its curious and fleeting adumbration of the "Salut d' Amour" in Gounod's "Faust." From Mr. Schnabel, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, this poetic movement received yesterday a performance so rapt, devoted and inspired that the listener was made to feel as one present at the celebration of some sacred and solemn rite.

This was the climax of the concert, the climax even of many concerts. Before the Concerto had come, for the first time in Boston, a "Sinfonia Dialectica," by Dr. Koussevitzky's biographer, the mystical, over-cerebral Arthur Lurie. A singularly disjointed composition this, made up for the most part of strongly rhythmed melodic fragments naively reiterated, a piece that constantly threatened to fall apart and in time disappointed by not doing so more speedily, one that neither disturbed nor impressed, that came and went and in all likelihood will not come again.

A neatly turned, expressive and, in the Finale, occasionally over-fast performance of Mozart's familiar pianoforte Concerto in A major served as curtain raiser for the Concerto of Beethoven. The three dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," brought the afternoon to a lively and brilliant close.

Herald Dec 2

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By GEORGE S. McMANUS

Program: Lowrie, Sinfonia Dialectica; Mozart, concerto for pianoforte in A major (Koechel 488); Beethoven, concerto in C minor for pianoforte and orchestra; de Falla, three dances from "El Sombrero de Tres Picos"; ballet conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky; soloist, Artur Schnabel.

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra had the assistance of Artur Schnabel, pianist. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning from a short vacation, was warmly welcomed by audience and orchestra. The audience, which completely filled the hall, sat under the spell of some great music, beautifully performed. Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra collaborated with Mr. Schnabel in memorable readings of concertos by Mozart and Beethoven.

Mozart wrote two concertos for pianoforte—the A major played yesterday and the C minor—during one month in 1786, an achievement equal to his composition of the E flat, G minor and C major symphonies within a few weeks two years later. This A major concerto—there is another smaller one in the same key—is as much a study in euphony as is the E flat symphony. It has some of the same outward features, namely the absence of oboes and the prominence of Mozart's favorite wind instrument, the clarinet. A remarkable feature of this concerto is its slow movement of tender melancholy in F sharp minor,—Mozart's only work in that key. The finale presents a luxurious number of themes: Mozart has his own special way of treating concerto and other rondos, yet some of his effects have been echoed in works as widely removed as Till Eulenspiegel by Richard Strauss.

Announcement was made early in the season that Mr. Schnabel would play nothing but Beethoven on his present tour. Boston music lovers were glad he included a Mozart concerto yesterday. Throughout the work the pianist's presentation was beautifully proportioned. The first two movements were particularly successful in mood, the slow movement being given with a touching simplicity that probed its deepest moments. And in the Beethoven concerto Mr. Schnabel revealed qualities that make for a complete performance of a great work. The coda of the first movement had ethereal sonorities and the slow movement was, as with the Mozart concerto, of outstanding loveliness. In fact, Mr. Schnabel seemed unusually interested in sheer beauty of sound at yesterday's appearance. He made pedal effects in the slow movement based on the original Beethoven autograph. These effects seemed strange to some, beautiful to others. But strange or beautiful they are but outward evidence and of no more value than the tinkling cymbal unless the inner meaning be there. Mr. Schnabel's artistry made a deep impression and brought him great success. At the conclusion of the Beethoven concerto, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were joint recipients, with Mr. Schnabel, of prolonged and hearty applause.

In the orchestral parts of the two concertos, Dr. Koussevitzky showed himself an artist of sincere integrity. He did not accompany the concertos; tuttis, solo parts and accompaniment passages were welded into a unified whole such as is seldom heard, yet only in this way can the true spirit of the classical concerto be understood.

